THESE feasts once over, the army had orders to assemble, in order to their passing immediately over into Asia ; but what their numbers were, historians by no means agree. Arrian says, that there were thirty thousand foot and above five thousand horse. Diodorus Siculus is more particular ; for he tells us, there were thirteen thousand Macedonian foot, seven thousand of the confederate states, and five thousand mercenaries. These were under the command of Parmenio. Of the Odrysians, Triballians, and Illyrians there were five thousand ; and of the Agrians, who were armed only with darts, a thousand. It is generally thought, that our author is mistaken in his first number, and that, instead of thirteen, there were but twelve thousand Macedonians ; because in the whole Diodorus says there were thirty thousand foot. It may be the Agrians are omitted in this total. As for the horse, he tells us there were eighteen hundred commanded by Philotas ; as many Thessalians under the command of Callas ; out of the several states of Greece six hundred led by Eurygius ; and nine hundred Thracians and Peonians, who led the van, under Cassander. Plutarch tells us, that, according to a low computation, he had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse ; and, according to the largest reckoning, thirty-four thousand foot, and four thousand horse. As to his fund for the payment of the army, Aristobulus says, it was but seventy talents ; and Onesicritus, who was also in this expedition, not only takes away the seventy talents ; but affirms the king was two hundred in debt. As for provisions, there was sufficient for a month,

* DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex. ARRIAN. l. i. c. 11.

a month, and no more. Antipater was left behind in Macedon, with twelve thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse <sup>1</sup>. Justin tells us, that to prevent any disturbances in his absence, Alexander caused such of the blood royal as he suspected to be put to death <sup>2</sup>; in which, however, he deserves no credit, since neither Diodorus, Arrian, Plutarch, nor any other Greek or Latin historian mentions any such thing; on the contrary, he is said to have checked his mother Olympias for having treated Cleopatra ill in his absence <sup>3</sup>.

THE army assembled at Amphipolis; from thence he march- He passes ed to the mouths of the Strymon, then crossing mount Pan- the Hel- gaeus, he took the road to Abdera. Crossing the river Ebrus, lespont.
he proceeded through the country of Pætis, and after twenty days reached Sestos, thence he came to Eleus, where he sacrificed on the tomb of Protesilaus, because he was the first among the Greeks who at the siege of Troy set foot on the Asiatic shore; he did this, that his landing might be more propitious than that of the hero to whom he sacrificed, who was slain soon after. The greatest part of the army under the command of Parmenio embarked at Sestos, on board a fleet of a hundred and sixty galleys of three benches of oars, besides small craft. Alexander himself sailed from Eleus, and, when he was in the middle of the Hellepont, offered a bull to Neptune and the Nereids, pouring forth at the same time a libation from a golden cup. When he drew near the shoar, he launched a javelin which stuck in the earth, then in complete armour he leaped himself upon the strand, and having erected altars to Jupiter, Minerva, and Hercules, he sacrificed to them, and then proceeded to Ilium <sup>4</sup>.

Strabo informs us, that at the time Alexander came thither Sacrifices
Ilium was little better than a village, distinguished only by a at Ilium.
small temple dedicated to Pallas; here the king sacrificed to the heroes buried in the neighbourhood, especially to Achilles, whom he declared to be particularly happy in two things, in having Patroclus for a friend, and Homer to record his actions. Hephestion, as a mark of his friendship to Alexander, crowned the tomb of Patroclus with flowers; after this the king sacrificed to Minerva, and taking down some arms which had hung there from the time of the Trojan war, consecrated his own in their stead. He sacrificed likewise to the ghost of Priam, to avert his wrath on account of his own descent from Achilles. We have thought fit to mark particularly these

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. PLUT. ARRIAN. ubi supra.

<sup>2</sup> Hist. l. xi.

c. 5. <sup>3</sup> PLUT. de virtut. Alex.

<sup>4</sup> DIODOR. ARRIAN. PLUT.

steps, because they greatly contribute to shew the genius and temper of this young hero. It is clear from them, that he was a zealous observer of the religious rites of his age, and that he had the greatest regard to decency and order, in every thing he did. Indeed, he took his rules of war from Homer, and scrupulously adhered not only to the maxims but to the customs mentioned by him ; thus instead of Calchas, who was the augur of the Greeks, he had Aristander the Telmissian for his soothsayer, without consulting of whom he suffered nothing of moment to be done. Hephestion was his Patroclus, and many things more of this kind we might note, if the nature of this work did not require a brevity inconsistent with such reflections * (C).

Alexander

* DIODOR. ARRIAN. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

(C) Alexander did not neglect the usual application to oracles on the undertaking his expedition. After the destruction of Thebes he went in person to Delphi, but arriving at the time that was held unlucky, the priestess refused to do her office. Alexander thereupon drew her by force into the temple, and she at last offering to sit down on the tripod, said by way of excuse for breaking through the antient custom of the temple, My son thou art invincible. At these words Alexander cried out, I accept the answer! (4), and said for no other. This with some may pass for an act of irreligion, whereas it was far from being so ; sudden answers were always held oraculous by the Greeks, if they were applicable to the thing inquired of, as we shall elsewhere shew at large. While the Olympic games were celebrating at Ægæ, Arrian tells us, there came advice that the statue of Orpheus on mount Pieria sweated, concerning the import of which, the Augurs and Soothsayers were much divided ; but Aristander of Telmissus, who, as we observed in the text, was the Calchas of Alexander, settled the king's mind by the following interpretation : Let it not disturb you, Sir, said he, the sweating of the image portends that all sorts of poets shall labour and sweat in describing your great actions (5). When Alexander was at Troy the priest of Minerva having observed the statue of Ariobarzanes, the king of Persia's lieutenant, to have fallen down in the temple, with other portentous signals, told the king, that if he fought in Phrygia, he would gain a great victory, kill some officer of distinction with his own hand, and be himself slightly wounded ; and on this account it was that Alexander took down the consecrated armour in the temple of Pallas, and left there his own (6) Long before this, if we may believe some authors, the destruction of the Persian empire by this

(4) Plutarch. in vit. Alex.
Arrian. lib. i. c. 11. Plutarch. ubi supra.

(5) Arrian. lib. i. c. 11. Plutarch. ubi supra.
(6) Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra.

Alexander continued his march towards the river Granicus, He spares without meeting with any considerable accident, if we except Lampsa- only the preservation of the city of Lampfacus, which on ac- cus, thro' count of its adhering to the Persians, he had determined to the art of destroy. Anaximenes, an eminent historian, well known in Anaxime- the court of Philip, and for whom Alexander himself had a nes. great esteem, met him on the road in order to intercede for the place of his birth. The king's indignation ran so high, that as soon as he came into his presence, he cried out, Anaximenes; I swear solemnly that I will not do what you desire me. My request then, Sir, (said the old man smiling) is, that you would turn Lampfacus. Alexander, charmed with his address, and considering at the same time the oath that he had made, ordered the city to be spared <sup>d</sup>. In the interim, the Persians had assembled a great army in Phrygia, amongst whom was Memnon the Rhodian; he was indeed the very hopes of Persia and the best officer Darius had. When it was known that the Macedonians were marching directly towards them, this Memnon gave it as his opinion, that they should burn and destroy all the country, and transport a moderate army over into Macedon. But the Persians, depending on their horse, refused to comply with his advice, and therefore posting themselves along the river Granicus, they determined there to wait the arrival of Alexander. Justin would have us believe, that the Persian army consisted of six hundred thousand foot <sup>e</sup>; Arrian says, there were but twenty thousand and the like number of horse *, which is most probable; Diodorus Siculus makes them ten thousand horse and a hundred thousand foot. All agree, that the horse very prince had been predicted. The priests of Diana at Ephesus, when the temple of the goddess there was burnt down, are reported to have given it as their sentiment, that the conqueror of Asia was that day born (7), which was true of Alexander, who came then into the world. It may be, these interpretations, and even the facts themselves, were forged long after the Macedonian conquest; but inasmuch as they serve to enlighten various passages in the best Greek and Latin authors, they ought to be recorded somewhere, and therefore, to avoid perplexing the text, we have thrown them into notes.

<sup>d</sup> VALER. MAX. lib. vii. c. 3.<sup>e</sup> Hist. ubi supra.

* Arrian says as above, that the Persian army consisted of about 20,000 horse and a like number of mercenary foot; but the authors in the history of Persia, (Vol. V. p. 58, note U) say their foot amounted, according to Arrian, to 200,000; which mistake seems to have been occasioned by the addition of a cypher.

(7) Plutarch. ubi supra.

were drawn up in one line, fronting the river, and the foot behind them †. The river itself was rapid, and the bank steep.

The battle at the Granicus.
Year of
the Flood, 2665.
Before
Christ,
334.

As soon as Alexander was informed of the posture the Persians were in, he ordered his forces to be drawn up in battalia, the foot in two lines, the horse on the right and left, and the baggage in the rear, and then moved directly towards the river. Parmenio, perceiving that he intended to fight, immediately addressed him in these words: “To me, my prince, it seems expedient, that we should encamp close by the river-side. For the enemy being far inferior to us in foot, I am persuaded their courage will not serve them to remain all night in their posts; and if they decamp, we may cross the river by break of day. We shall then have time to take all our measures before they can form, whereas we cannot pass now without great hazard. For how shall we lead our soldiers to ford a river in the sight of our enemies, which of itself is rapid, full of eddies, its banks deep and uneven as you see? Besides, will not the enemy’s horse, who are perfectly well disciplined, take the advantage of our heavy armed foot, as their order must be broke in climbing the opposite bank, to charge them in flank. If any ill accident should happen at present, it would not only be attended with terrible consequences, but would be also thought to have an ominous appearance in respect to the future progress of the war.” I agree; “Parmenio, returned Alexander, that what you say is very reasonable; but how shameful would it be for us, who have so easily passed the Hellepont, to be stopped by this brook. Such a conduct would reflect on the Macedonians and on myself, as if we were not able to look any danger in the face. The Persians too would from thence take heart, and believe themselves our equals, if our first attempt speak not that superiority in military boldness for which the arms of Macedon are already famous §”. As soon as he had done speaking, the king distributed his orders. To Parmenio he consigned the care of the left wing. The right he commanded himself, and under him Philotas. The Persians, when they saw him advancing, for he was easily distinguished by his armour and by his guards, immediately brought some squadrons from the right wing to reinforce the left; so soon were they

† ARRIAN. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra.
lib. i. c. 12.

§ ARRIAN.

struck with his presence. Ptolemy the son of Philip had the command of the forlorn, and entered the river first; Alexander with the whole right wing followed him; but instead of marching directly cross, as the Persians expected, he suffered his troops to slope according to the motion of the current, whereby they had an opportunity of forming in the water, and of charging in good order. The horse and light-armed troops commanded by Amyntas and Socrates were very warmly received; the sons of Memnon, and Memnon in person, charged them briskly, and behaved so well, that most of them were slain, those few who were left retired to the right wing, as it advanced, commanded by Alexander, who instantly threw himself into the thickest of the fight, and performed wonders there till his lance broke. Arctes the master of his horse, when he commanded him to give him another, shewed him the broken staff of his own with which he was fighting; Demaratus, however, one of the king's friends, reached him a spear, which as soon as Alexander grasped, he rode directly to attack Mithridates, son-in-law to Darius, who advanced at the head of a fresh body of horse, and, at their first meeting, striking him through the mouth, bore him to the ground; immediately Rhesaces, a Persian nobleman, struck the king over the head with his sword, cut off a part of his helmet, and slightly wounded him; but while he gave the stroke, the king, bearing upon him with his lance, struck him through the body, so that he fell down dead. Yet Spirithridates, coming behind Alexander, had at the same instant struck off his head, if Clytus had not disabled him, while his arm was lifted up<sup>b</sup>. The Macedonian horse began now to reach the shore in all parts, and the light-armed foot mixing themselves amongst them, the Persians, who were unable to stand the shock, began first to break where Alexander charged in person. The king did not pursue them far, because the mercenaries remained as yet firm, till being surrounded on all sides, they were, except two thousand who surrendered, cut to pieces to a man. Of the Macedonians twenty five of the king's body guard were slain, whose statues, cast in brass by Lysippus, the king sent to Dium, there to be set up as a memorial of their bravery and his gratitude. Besides these there fell of the horse between sixty and seventy, and of the foot thirty. These were the next day interred in their arms by the king's command; he granted also to their children, and to their parents, the freedom of those cities in which they dwelt, together with the release of all taxes and duties whatsoever ; as for the wounded, he visited them in person, saw them dressed, and heard from every man whatever he thought fit to say of his own deeds. He gave directions also for burying the Persians and Greek mercenaries ; but for such of the latter as remained prisoners, he sent them back to Greece in chains, saying, it was fit usage for such as he found in arms against their country. He likewise sent to Athens three hundred suits of Persian armour to be consecrated in the temple of Minerva, with this inscription ; Alexander the son of Philip, and all the Grecians, the Lacedæmonians excepted, have dedicated these spoils taken from the Barbarians who inhabit Asia. (D).

<sup>b</sup> PLUT. in vit. Alex.

THIS

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 17. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex. JUSTIN. lib. xi. c. 5.

(D) The different accounts we have of the battle of Granicus are in many respects absolutely incompatible. Diodorus Siculus says, that Alexander commanded the left wing, or at least that he charged there, though at the beginning of the paragraph he assigns that command to Parmenio. Instead of Mithridates, he calls the Persian Spithrobates, with whom Alexander fought, and tells us, that with his javelin he struck the king into the right shoulder-blade, from whence Alexander drew it, and returned it immediately (8). He also attributes to Rosaces what Arrian tells us of Spithridates, which in all probability induced Freinshemius in his supplement to Curtius (9), to look on Mithridates and Spithridates as the same person, in which he has certainly rectified no mistake in Arrian, but through an itch of criticising hath fallen into one himself. Whoever reads Arrian carefully will discern, that Mithridates was dead before Spithridates attacked Alexander ; that Mithridates was killed by Alexander himself, but Spithridates by Clytus. Besides, when he reckons up the great officers among the Persians, who fell in this battle, Arrian says expressly, there were Spithridates governor of Lydia, and Mithridates son-in-law to Darius. We have mentioned these facts, not so much on account of their importance, as to vindicate our following Arrian rather than any other writer on this subject ; and we hope every impartial reader will see and approve our reason, because his accounts are clearest and most consistent with themselves. Plutarch says, that the Persians lost twenty thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse in this battle, and the Macedonians only thirty four ; to eternize whose memory, Alexander caused so many statues of brass to be set up (10). This is certainly a little incredible, but Arrian's account inserted in

(8) Diodor Sicul lib. xvii.

(9) Sup. Curt. lib. ii. c. 5.

(10) Plut. in vit. Alex.

THIS battle put the king in possession of all the adjacent coun- The conse- try, of which he began immediately to take care, as if it had quences of been part of his hereditary dominions. Colas was constituted his victory.
 lieutenant of the province, from which the same tribute was exacted as heretofore had been paid to Darius. He himself marched towards Sardis, and when he was about seventy stadia distant from that city, he was met by Mythrenes governor of the garison in the castle, accompanied by the chief citizens ; these surrendering the city into his hands, and My- threnes the castle with the royal treasures therein contained.
 He then proceeded to the river Hermus about twenty stadia distant from Sardis, where he encamped, and from whence he dispatched Amyntas the son of Andromedes to Sardis to take the government of the castle, and carrying Mythre- nes with him, treated him honourably. To the Sardians and other Lydians, he granted the privilege of being governed by their antient laws. He then entered the castle, which was garisoned by Persians, and seemed to him well fortified. It was seated on a high rock, which was everywhere steep and surrounded with a triple wall. He our text is very clear ; he speaks not of thirty four, but of twenty five, statues, which were made not to represent all who fell in the battle, but those only who fell in the king's guards, who were all persons of distinction To say the truth, this is wonderful enough ; for it is not easy to comprehend how, in the space of ten years, which includes the whole reign of Alexander after this battle, Ly- sippus could make all these statues ; but that they were made and set up at Dium is certain, since we know that Q Mettellus sent them from thence to Rome. It seems somewhat strange, that Plu- tarch, who at other times speaks so favourably of Alexander's conduct, charges him upon this occasion with rage and madness in offering to pass a river in the sight and in defiance of a superior enemy Arrian's account shews, that Alexander offered some reasons for what he did ; and though it may be alledged, that the harangues in Greek authors are usually composed by themselves, and therefore cannot be acknowledged as authentic evidence, we apprehend that two answers may be in the present case given to this objection. The first, that supposing the fact true, the harangue contains the sentiment of the author, which amounts to this, that Alexander's conduct was defensible in the opinion of Arrian : the second, that as Arrian transcribed his history from the memoirs of Aristobulus and Ptolemy, who were eye and ear-witnesses of what they wrote, it may be well presumed, that he had at least the substance of the speeches he inserted from those authors too, and if so, then they will be the strongest evidence. This notion is rendered the more probable from the structure of these orations, which are far from being rhetorical, but, on the contrary, as plain and natural as can be imagined.

therefore

therefore proposed to erect a temple on the top of that eminence, and therein to dedicate an altar to Jupiter Olympius; but while he was yet in suspense, which part of the castle was most commodious for that purpose, a dreadful tempest arose on a sudden, huge claps of thunder were heard, and a violent storm fell on that part where the royal palace of the Lydian kings had stood. Thus the god seemed to point out the place where the temple should be erected; and it was ordered to be built accordingly. The government of this castle he committed into the hands of Pausanias, one of his friends, but the collection of tributes and imposts to Nicias. Asander the son of Philotas was constituted prefect of Lydia and the rest of the provinces of Spithridates, and had such a number of horse and light-armed foot allowed him as were judged necessary. Callas and Alexander the son of Æropus were dispatched into the province commanded by Memnon, and with them a very considerable body of troops<sup>k</sup>. In the mean time the mercenaries in garison at Ephesus, seizing two gallies of three banks of oars, retired; with them went Amyntas, who, as we have elsewhere observed, had deserted to Darius, as soon as Alexander ascended the throne. As soon as the king had information of this, he went to Ephesus in person, where he did every thing that was popular; he restored the democracy, and ordered the tribute which had been paid to the Persian to be applied to the rebuilding of the temple of Diana. It is said he would have been at the whole expence of that magnificent pile, if the Ephesians would have inscribed his name thereupon; but this they refused, chusing to keep the honour and the expence to themselves. His favours encouraged the commons of Ephesus to fall upon some persons of distinction, who had been formerly in the administration of affairs, and, notwithstanding they had taken sanctuary in the temple, to drag them to the market-place, where they stoned them; as these men had been guilty of very flagrant oppressions, Alexander would not interpose to save them, but immediately after their deaths, he issued out an edict, whereby he strictly forbad any farther inquiry into the conduct of the former magistrates, rightly conceiving, that if the people were suffered to treat the guilty thus, envy, malice, and avarice would soon lead them to treat the innocent in the same manner. This conduct of his gained him high reputation, all degrees of people owning him for their deliverer, while at the same time the nobles confessed that he was their preserver <sup>1</sup>. By another edict, he ordered the popular government to be restored in all the Greek cities, and sent Alcimalus with a body of troops to see it executed ; then with the remainder of his army he marched to besiege Miletus, before which his fleet commanded by Nicanor had lain for some time, and the Persian fleet was also in the neighbourhood of that city. The Milesians themselves were disposed to submit to Alexander, but Memnon, who with a considerable body of troops had entered the place immediately after the battle at Granicus resolved to defend it. We have already observed, that he was a great officer, and his conduct here was equal to the reputation he had before acquired ; for notwithstanding the Macedonian fleet blocked up the haven, the citizens were disaffected, and Alexander's veteran foot stormed the place almost as soon as they came before it ; yet he made a vigorous resistance, and after the city was taken withdrew with his garison into an island where part of the mercenaries capitulated, and were received into Alexander's service, the rest with Memnon himself withdrew to Halicarnassus <sup>m</sup>. When the king was fully master of Miletus, he treated the citizens with much humanity, but sold all the strangers he found for slaves. As soon as he was informed that the Persian fleet was withdrawn from Mycale, he dismissed his own (E) ; this was a very extraordinary step, and

<sup>k</sup> ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 18.

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alexand. <sup>m</sup> DIONOR SICUL. ubi supra. ARRIAN. ubi supra.

(E) After the battle at Granicus, Alexander's generals were a good deal perplexed as to the manner in which they should advise him to proceed ; for they saw plainly, that though their late victory had struck the Persians with great consternation, yet in effect it had very little lessened their power : Besides at sea they were still masters. What the sentiments of Parmenio were on this head and what those of Alexander, we learn from Arrian in the following words : The Barbarian fleet consisted of about four hundred ships. Parmenio advised Alexander to a naval engagement, assuring him, that the Greeks would be victors at sea, because a lucky omen had just happened, an eagle being seen upon the shore from one of the ships of his navy. He also added, that if they overcame their enemies, they would reap an immense advantage from such an engagement during the whole war ; and if they chanced to be overcome, he could not perceive that any vast danger could ensue, because the Persians, by virtue of their shipping, already held the sovereignty of the sea without fighting. As for his part, he would willingly enter himself on board, and share the danger of the fleet in his own person. However, Alexander returned him answer, that and authors are pretty much at a loss how to account for it. Diodorus Siculus says, that Alexander, being well informed of Darius's design to march against him immediately with a mighty army, determined by this means to cut off from his own troops all hopes of safety but from their valour ; he grounds this conjecture on the conduct of Alexander in the last battle, wherein he made his forces fight with the river at their back, so that flight was rendered impracticable, there being the chance of war if they fought, but no chance at all if they attempted to run away <sup>n</sup>. Arrian hath assigned us some better reasons ; he says in the first place, that Alexander had no money to pay them ; and in the second, that he was afraid to trust his fortune in an engagement at sea. There was a third reason much stronger than the other two ; he was determined to possess himself of all the sea-ports by means of his land-army, and having done this, he very rightly conjectured, that the Persians would be deprived of all use of their fleet for want of their usual recruits, and from their being deprived of ports where they might refit <sup>o</sup>. He had moreover some notion, that his fleet would be more wanting on the other side of the Hellespont, so that for many reasons he was determined to this measure, how extraordinary soever it might appear ; for though it be true, that never any general possessed personal courage in a higher degree than the prince of whom we are speaking, yet it is as certain, that he

<sup>n</sup> ubi supra.      <sup>o</sup> ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 19.

he was mistaken in his conjectures, and did not interpret the omen justly ; for it would be a point of small prudence in him with so few ships to hazard an engagement against a fleet so numerous ; and with soldiers so little trained up in naval discipline to pretend to attack the expert Cyprians and Phœnicians : Neither was he willing that the Barbarians should try the skill and valour of the Macedonians on so unstable an element : And besides, should they be beaten in a sea-fight, an inexpressible damage would accrue to them from the same their enemies would thereby gain. Add to this, that if the Greeks were animated by the news of an overthrow at sea, they would begin to study innovations. All which things maturely weighed, he deemed a sea-fight altogether unsafe at that juncture : And for his part he expounded the omen in a different manner. The eagle indeed he allowed promised success ; but as she was seen on the shore, it seemed rather to portend, that he should become master of the enemies fleet by beating their armies on the continent (11).

(11) Arrian, lib. i. c. 19.

was a great master in the art of war, and did many things which had the air of rashness from a superior skill in the military art, which enabled him to penetrate farther into the connection between causes and events, than many who were about him, and than most of the authors who have transmitted his history to posterity, as the reader will discern from the last note.

ALMOST all the cities between Miletus and Halicarnassus The siege submitted as soon as the former was taken, and the rest surrendered as soon as the king marched towards them; of Halicarnassus. but for Halicarnassus itself, Alexander was sensible that the reduction thereof would cost him both time and trouble: Memnon, whom Darius had declared high admiral and governor of the Lower Asia, commanded there in person with a very numerous garison<sup>p</sup>. Alexander encamped therefore at the distance of five stadia from the city, skirmishing daily with the garison, till he had provided all things for the siege. While things were in this situation, some of the citizens of Myndus privately promised Alexander to put their town into his hands, provided, he would advance towards it in the night with a considerable body of forces; this proposition the king very readily accepted, and drew out a considerable body of horse, supported by a body of light-armed foot, in order to go on this expedition. At midnight therefore he approached the walls according to his promise; but perceiving no signs of a surrender from the citizens, and considering that he had neither engines nor scaling ladders at hand, as coming there not to besiege a city, but to have it delivered to him; he nevertheless ordered the Macedonian phalanx to advance, commanding them to undermine the wall, which they did, and presently overturned one of the towers thereupon, without making a breach in the wall itself. But the citizens making an obstinate defence, and being assisted by the Halicarnassians who sent them succours by sea, Alexander was disappointed in his expectation of taking it at the first assault; wherefore, without more ado, he drew off and returned to his siege of Halicarnassus; and first of all ordered the ditch, which the citizens had dug round their walls, of thirty cubits in breadth and fifteen in depth, to be filled up, that so the wooden towers, out of which they were to direct their missive weapons against the besieged, and their engines to shake the walls might advance

<sup>p</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

forwards. The ditch being accordingly filled up, the towers began to advance ; but the besieged issued forth by night with a design to burn both the towers and engines which were now nigh the walls ; and had certainly effected their designs, had they not been encountered by the Macedonians who were placed to guard the engines, and others who came hastily forth at the noise of the skirmish ; so that they were with small loss beat back into the city. There fell of the Halicarnassians in this conflict one hundred and seventy, among whom was Neoptolemus the brother of Arrhabæus and son of Amyntas, one of those who had formerly fled to Darius. Of the Macedonians sixteen were slain, and near three hundred wounded ; for that sally being made in the night, they were the less able to guard their bodies and avoid the darts and arrows of their enemies<sup>q</sup>. We have in Arrian a very exact journal of this siege, wherein the greatest vigour was shewn on the part of the assailants, and the most obstinate resolution discovered by the defendants ; a most consummate experience in the affairs of war in both ; for as the king's troops frequently attempted to scale the walls, continued constantly to batter them with engines, and in some places proceeded by sap, so the garison sallied often, sometimes burnt the besiegers engines, at others levelled their works, yet were in all their attempts exposed to great danger, there happening a vast effusion of blood on both sides<sup>r</sup>. At last Orontobates and Memnon, and the rest of the Persian commanders, considering that they could not now hold the town long, because part of their walls was already beat down, and part shaken and ready to fall, and many of the defendants either cut off in the several encounters which had happened, or wounded and rendered unserviceable, and, having weighed the matter deliberately about the second watch of the night, set fire to the wooden tower which they had built to guard them from the shocks of the enemies engines, and to the arsenal where their artillery was lodged, as also to some houses near the wall, which last blazed out with much fury, because the wind setting that way, many flakes of fire were driven from the tower and arsenal thither. Hereupon some of the townsmen betook themselves to a castle in an island, and others to another castle called Salmais. Which when Alexander was informed of by some deserters, and when he beheld the raging flames, though it was near midnight, he nevertheless detached a body of Macedonians thither, with orders to slay those who set fire to the city, but to spare whomsoever they found in their habitations. As soon as it was day-light, Alexander, viewing the castles which the Persians and their mercenary troops had seized, resolved not to lay siege to them, as well because the reducing them, considering their situation, would take up too much time, as because they would not be of any great importance after he had reduced the city; wherefore taking care to inter those who fell in the last conflict by night, he commanded his engineers to convey the artillery to Tralles, which city he laid level with the ground, and marching thence into Phrygia, left a body of three thousand foot and two hundred horse, under the command of Ptolemy, to keep the country of Caria in obedience<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>q</sup> ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 21.<sup>r</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra

AT the time Alexander entered this country, there was a Ada made lady whose name was Ada, who claimed the title of queen of Caria thus: She was the daughter of Hecatomnus, and the sister of Hidrieus, and, according to the Carian laws, his wife too; on his death she succeeded him in the kingdom, but was quickly dispossessed of it by Pexodorus, whose son-in-law Orontobates succeeded him by the favour of Darius. Ada all this time held the city of Alinda, which was the strongest in those parts; the keys of which, as soon as he entered the province, she delivered to Alexander, and, as a farther mark of her respect, adopted him her son. The king, charmed by her obliging behaviour, and struck with that greatness of mind she manifested on this sudden turn of affairs, received the honours she did him very kindly, and, after having demolished Halicarnassus, he made her governess general of all Caria<sup>d</sup>. While his forces remained in Caria, Ada had often sent him presents of the best things the country afforded; and now, when he was about to depart, she sent him several cooks and confectioners to serve in his kitchen; but the king sent them back with this compliment, that his governor Leonidas long ago provided him better cooks than they, viz. Long morning marches to give him a stomach to his dinner, and slender dinners, which were sure to leave appetite enough for supper. This conduct of Alexander towards the queen of Caria was of great use to him; for it induced many of the princes of the Lesser Asia to revolt from the Persians, and put themselves under his protection. Mitridates king of Pontus was in the number of these; he was the ancestor of that famous king of the same name, who gave the Romans so much trouble, and was descended from the royal house of Persia; and, coming to Alexander's camp to pay his compliments to him, he acquired such a love for him, that he accompanied him in his Persian expedition<sup>u</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 24.<sup>d</sup> Id. lib. i.

The slaughter of the Marmarians.

Diodorus Siculus affirms, that the last action of the campaign was against the Marmarians, an inconsiderable people inhabiting on the borders of Lycia; their city was seated among rocks, and thence held by them to be impregnable. These people, either for the sake of booty, or from their warm attachment to the Persians, fell upon the rear of Alexander's army, cut a great number of Macedonians to pieces, and took a great part of the baggage; this exceedingly provoked the king, who immediately caused the place to be invested, and, as it had no fortifications but those of nature, he stormed it two whole days together. The old men then among the besieged would have persuaded them to surrender, but they declaring resolutely, that they would never submit, their elders advised them to put all their superannuated men, women, and children to death, then to force a passage through the enemies camp. This advice the young men embraced, when every one going home made a great feast, and, after eating and drinking plentifully with his wife and children, shut the door of his house, and then set it on fire. As soon as the flames began to mount, they, to the number of six hundred, sallied out, forced the Macedonian guard, and made their escape to the mountains<sup>w</sup>.

The new married men sent home.

WHEN the winter began to come in, Alexander made choice of Ptolemy the son of Seleucus, Cænus the son of Polemoërates, and Meleager the son of Ncoptolemus, to lead home to Macedon all the new-married soldiers in his army, that they might spend the winter with their wives, an act very extraordinary in its nature, and for which there was no precedent among the Greeks; but, inasmuch as it is exactly conformable to the law of Moses, some learned men have been tempted to believe, that Aristotle, who was well versed in the Hebrew learning, advised him thereto; however it was, Arrian tells us expressly, that no action of his life endeared him more to the Macedonians than this. He likewise sent Parmenio, and some other general officers, to raise recruits, some into Europe, and some into Asia* (F).

THINGS

* FLOR. lib. iii. c. 5.    w DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.    * ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 25.    DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.    PLUT. in vita Alex.

(F) The words of the law of Moses relating to this matter are these: When a man hath taken a new wife, he shall not go out to war,

THINGS being in this situation, and the king busy in providing for the next campaign, a very extraordinary piece of treason was discovered. Alexander the son of Æropus, whom the king had made general of the Thessalian horse, held a correspondence with Amyntas, who was in the service of Darius. Asifines a Persian was pitched on by the latter to carry letters to this Alexander, promising him a thousand talents of silver, and the kingdom of Macedonia, if he would undertake to murder the king; this Asifines Parmenio apprehended upon some suspicion or other, and, being examined, he confessed the whole business; whereupon the king sent instructions to Parmenio to apprehend Alexander, before he should be able to debauch the troops under his command, and thereby cause a defection, which, on account of the man's great quality, might be very dangerous. This commission was very happily executed, and the king thereby deliver-

A conspiracy discovered.

war, neither shall he be charged with any business; he shall be free at home for one year, and shall cheer up his wife which he hath taken (12). To this passage it might be objected, that Moses forbids the enlisting of new-married men, whereas Alexander dismissed those who actually served in his army; yet the truth is, that Alexander exactly fulfilled the law; for, in another place, it is enjoined the principal officers of the Hebrew army, when in the field to enquire, amongst other things, What man there is that hath betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her; let him go home and return to his house, lest he die in battle, and another man take her (13). We are well assured, that Aristotle was acquainted with, and highly esteemed the law of the Jews; we know too, that what Philip expected from him was not to instruct his son in scanning of verses, or solving grammatical niceties; but that he might become a worthy successor of himself, and an able king of Macedon. To this end, that truly wise man put a correct edition of Homer into the hands of his pupil, and doubtless acquainted him with whatsoever else he had collected in relation to the science of government from books or in his travels (14). This supposition therefore, that the practice of Alexander was founded on the Mosaic law, is very probable. To say the truth, the best laws in Greece were but copies of the Mosaic law, as some learned men in the last century have very fully shewn, and of which any impartial person may be easily convinced, if he will compare those laws, in their original languages, and consider how nearly the Greek approaches to an elegant translation of the Hebrew, necessary allowances being made for the difference in manners.

(12) Deut. xxiv. 5.
contra Appian. lib. 1.

(13) Deut. xx. 7.

(14) Joseph.

ed from a conspiracy which had given him no small disquiet<sup>z</sup> (G).

Alexander
proceeds in the conquest of the adjacent provinces.

Year of
the Flood 2666.

Before
Christ

333.

As soon as the season permitted, Alexander quitted the province of Phaselus where he now was, and, having sent part of his army through the mountainous country to Perga by a short but difficult road, he led the rest by the sea-shore, taking his rout by a certain promontory, where the way is altogether impassable, except when the north winds blow. At the time of the king's march the south wind had held for a long time, but of a sudden it changed, and blew from the north so violently, that, as he and his followers declared, they, by divine assistance, obtained a safe and easy passage. This is Arrian's account, not only in substance, but in his own words, of a march held by many to be miraculous, and even compared to that of the children of Israel through the Red-sea, while, on the other hand, it is the opinion of many, there is nothing extraordinary in it at all<sup>a</sup> (H). In this march

<sup>z</sup> ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 26. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. <sup>a</sup> ARRIAN. PLUT. ubi supra.

(G) We are told by Diodorus, that it was by a letter from his mother Olympias the king was informed of the conspiracy of Alexander the son of Æropus; however, Arrian, besides the information of Parmenio, informs us of another odd circumstance, which concurred to make this matter more observable. While the king, who then lay before Halicarnassus, was fast asleep about noon, a swallow came chattering about him, hovering over his head, and resting sometimes on one, and sometimes on the other, side of the bed. He being exceedingly fatigued was not easily awaked; but when her incessant chattering roused him from sleep, he put her away gently with his hand; notwithstanding which she was so far from endeavouring to escape, that she perched upon his head, and ceased not her noise till the king was thoroughly awake. This prodigy being deemed of too great moment to be disregarded, he immediately consulted with Aristander the Telmislian soothsayer, who assured him, that a conspiracy was formed against his life by one of his domestics, but that it would be brought to light, because the swallow was a domestic bird, and most exceedingly loquacious (15).

(H) There seems to be no just reason for believing any thing supernatural in relation to Alexander's passage by the sea-side. In his letters he spoke of it himself in terms the most plain and simple, affirming nothing more than that he marched from Phaselis through the straits called the Ladders (16). There is, however, a passage in Strabo, which seems to set this matter in a clear light, and

(15) Arrian, lib. i. c. 26.
Alex.

(16) Epist. Alex. ap. Plut. in vita

march he was met by deputies from the Aspendians, who desired him to spare putting a garison into their city, because they were content to be his faithful subjects, to which he readily assented, upon condition they paid him fifty talents, and sent him the same number of horses which they were wont to furnish to Darius; terms to which they also readily agreed; but while the king was employed in reducing other places in the neighbourhood, the Aspendians fortified their city, and refused to comply with the treaty which their deputies had made. Upon which the king marched immediately that way with his army. The city of Aspendus is seated chiefly upon a high and steep rock, the foot of which is washed by the river Eurymedon; but round the rock upon the plain are abundance of houses surrounded with a slight wall. As soon as Alexander approached, the inhabitants of the lower town, distrusting their safety there, fled, and betook themselves to the higher town or castle; which when he perceived, he entered the lower town with his army, and encamped within the walls. The besieged seeing Alexander's force, and themselves hemmed in on every side contrary to their expectations, sent messengers to intreat him to accept of the former conditions. Alexander, considering the strength of the place, and how unprovided he was to undertake a long siege, was willing to agree with them, though not upon the former terms; but insisted now, that their principal citizens should be delivered up as hostages; that the number of horses which they had before promised should be punctually delivered, and the number of talents doubled; and, moreover, that they should be under the command of such a garison as he should place over them, and pay an annual tribute to the Macedonians; and, lastly, that the cause concerning the field, which they were said to have wrested unjustly out of to prove very fully, that there was in this passage no miracle at all: “ Near the city of Phaselis, between Lycia and Pamphylia “ there is a passage, coasting along by the sea, through which “ Alexander marched his army. This passage is very narrow, and “ lies between the mountain Chinax, which overlooks the Pam- “ phylian sea, and the shore. It is dry at low water, so that tra- “ vellers pass through it with safety; but when the sea is high, it “ is all covered over. It was then in the winter season, and A- “ lexander, who depended much upon his good fortune, was re- “ solved to set out without staying till the floods were abated, so “ that his men were forced to march up to the middle in wa- “ ter (17). ”

(17) Strab. Geogr. lib.

their neighbours hands, should be referred to arbitration. This affair being finished, the king prosecuted his march to Telmessus, a very strong city, seated on the top of a high mountain, having another as high over-against it, and a narrow craggy road between these two. This pass the Telmessians had seized, and, if they had defended it as they ought, might in all probability have compelled the king to look for another road. But Alexander, rightly judging that the terror of an attack would oblige them to withdraw, encamped his forces at the very entrance of the passage, at the close of the evening, and in the morning, as he had rightly conjectured, it was perceived, that the Telmessians were retired into their city, the siege of which, on account of its strong situation, the king declined for the present, and continued his march through Phrygia, intending to reassemble all his troops at Gordium, whither he sent his orders to Parmenio to march, as he did also to Ptolemy and his colleagues, who, with the new-married men and recruits, were now returned from Macedonia <sup>b</sup>. On his march he met with deputies from Athens, who, in very submissive terms, besought him to dismiss such of their citizens, as he had taken fighting in the service of the Persians; but from this the king desired to be excused till the war was over, and then told them he would be content to hear what they could say in favour of their citizens <sup>c</sup>.

Darius
puts Charidemus to death.

Darius was all this time fighting for Alexander at home; for upon the death of Memnon his admiral, who had begun with great success to reduce the Greek islands again under his obedience, and was on the very point of invading Eubæa, he was quite at a stand, not knowing whom to employ in his stead; and being also irresolute as to the choice of a general, who should command the land-forces he had raised. There happened to be at this time of his court and council one Charidemus an Athenian, an officer of great merit, and who had served long, and with much reputation, under Philip of Macedon; this man, being heartily zealous for the Persian interest, and seeing it no less in danger from their own feeble councils, than from the Macedonian arms, took upon him in few words to set the king and his ministers right. While you, Sir, said he to Darius, are safe, the empire can never be at stake; let me exhort you therefore never to expose your person, but to make choice of some able general to march against your enemy. One hundred thousand men will be more than sufficient, provided a third of them be mercenaries, to compel him to abandon this enterprize; and if you will honour me with this command, I will be accountable for the success of what I advise. Darius, who was a wise and brave man, readily acceded to Charidemus's proposal; but the Persian lords who were present, through envy, inveighed bitterly against it; whereupon the Athenian was so far transported with passion, that he told them they were cowards, who would neither serve their master themselves, nor suffer him to be served by others. This moved them to charge him with treachery, and to alledge that he sought the command merely to put all things into the hands of the Macedonians; which made such an impression on Darius, that he ordered him to be instantly bound and delivered over to execution. Those who had pushed the king upon this barbarous and unjust act took care not to let the thing cool, but hurried the Athenian to instant death; to which as he went, he said aloud, Darius will very soon repent his cruelty towards me, when by the loss of his kingdom he shall find with how much injustice he has taken away my life<sup>d</sup>. Indeed Darius repented in a few days, but as our author rightly observes, powerful as he was, he could not recal from death him whom a hasty word had sent from the land of the living. He was forced therefore to take the counsel of his own subjects, and pursuant to their advice determined to march against Alexander with an army, which, as one of his predecessors emphatically said, had in it many men and few soldiers.

<sup>b</sup> ARRIAN. lib. i. c. 28.
lib. ii. c. 2.

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. CURT.

WHEN Alexander arrived at Gordium, and found himself Alexander under a necessity of remaining there some time, till the several corps of his army could unite, he discovered an earnest desire of seeing Gordius's chariot, and the famous knot in the harness, of which such strange stories had been published to the world. This Gordius, as the tale went, was a man of slender fortune among the antient Phrygians, who had a small piece of land and two yoke of oxen, one of which he employed in the plough, and the other in the waggon; and that on a certain day, while he was ploughing, an eagle alighted on the yoke, and there rested till the evening. He, terrified at the sight, hastened to consult the Telmiffian augurs in that case (for the art of divination was common to all that people, even to the women and children, so that it was in a manner hereditary); and when he arrived at a certain village in that country, he met a virgin going to a fountain, who foretold what should happen to him, and ordered him, as she was of the Telmissian progeny, to return to his field, and then offer sacrifice to Jupiter. Gordius, on the other hand, intreated her to accompany him thither, to teach him after what manner sacrifice should be performed. He, thus instructed by the virgin, took her to wife, and she bore him a son named Midas, who when he arrived at manhood was both beautiful and valiant. The Phrygians were at that time harassed with a cruel sedition, and going to consult the oracle were told, that a chariot should bring them a king who should quell their sedition. Whilst they were yet busy in offering their conjectures about this answer, Midas arrived with his father and mother, and appeared suddenly in his chariot before the council. They hereupon interpreting the answer to relate to him, as the man whom the god had told them should come thither in a chariot, made him their king. Their seditions he appeased, and consecrated his father's chariot to Jupiter the king, by hanging it up in his palace as an offering of thanks for the eagle, the bird of Jupiter, sent to his father, by which he received the kingdom. This was also reported concerning the chariot, that whosoever could untie the knot whereby it hung, should obtain the sovereignty over all Asia. The cord in which this knot was tied was composed of the inner rind of the corneil tree, and no eye could perceive where it had been begun or ended. Alexander, when he could find no possible way of untying it, and yet was unwilling to leave it tied, lest it should cause some fears to arise in the hearts of his soldiers, is said by some to have cut the cords with his sword, and affirmed that the knot was untied. But Aristobulus assures us, that he wrested a wooden pin out of the beam of the waggon, which, being driven in across the beam, held it up, and so took the yoke from it<sup>e</sup>. Arrian, from whom we have taken this relation, leaves his reader at liberty to receive which story he pleases. Curtius, on the contrary, declares positively, that the king cut the knot through with his sword, saying, as he struck, It matters not how it is undone. But what is the authority of Curtius compared to that of Aristobulus, who was an eye witness of the thing, and who declares as expressly that the king did not cut it? To which sentiment also Plutarch adheres. However it was, Arrian informs us, that a great tempest of thunder, lightning, and rain happening in the succeeding night, it was held declarative of the true solution of this knot, and that Alexander would become lord of Asia f.

<sup>d</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra, CURT. lib. iii. c. v.

<sup>e</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 30.
in vit. Alex.

<sup>f</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. PLUT.

ON Alexander's arrival at Ancyra a city of Galatia, the His vigil- province of Paphlagonia submitted to him, which he there-ance in upon added to the government of Calas, proceeding instantly entering to reduce Cappadocia as far as the river Halys, and then Cilicia. marched on to possess himself of Cilicia. This province was bounded on the west by Pamphylia, on the east by Syria, on the south by the bay of Iffus, and on the north by Cappadocia. In it were three famous streights or passes: The first at its entrance called the gate; the second called the streights of Amanus; the third near the bay of Iffus. It was the first of these which Alexander sought to surprize by a quick march, and which, when he came to the camp of Cyrus, a place so called, because Cyrus the younger had once taken post there with his army, he had the mortification to hear had been seized by the Persian, who had sent a considerable body of troops to defend it; this did not hinder the king from pursuing his design, and marching in the first watch of the night with his horse and light-armed foot to the very mouth of the pass, in order to attack it as soon as day broke. But the enemy spared him the trouble, for long before day, forgetting the importance of the place, they abandoned it, and sought their safety in flight; so that Alexander immediately took possession of it, and the next day marched all his army through into Cilicia without so much as a skirmish<sup>r</sup>.

As soon as he entered the province, he received advice, that His sharp Arfames, whom Darius had made governor of Tarsus, was sickness about to abandon it, and that the inhabitants were very ap-and won- prehensive he would plunder it before he withdrew. To pre-derful re- vent this, the king marched incessantly, and arrived just time covery enough to preserve the place; but his saving it had well-nigh cost him his life; for either through the excessive fatigue of marching, as some say, or, as others relate, by his plunging when very hot into the river *Cydna*s, which as it runs through thick shades hath its waters exceedingly cold, he fell into such a distemper as threatened his immediate dissolution. His army in a moment lost its spirits; his generals, who were wont to advise him, knew not what to do themselves; nay, his physicians were so affrighted, that the terror of his death hindered them from taking proper methods for preserving his life<sup>b</sup>. Philip the Acaranian alone preserved temper enough to examine the nature of the king's disease, the strongest

<sup>r</sup> ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 4. CURT. lib. iii. c. 9.
lib. ii. c. 4. CURT. lib. iii. c. 10.

<sup>b</sup> ARRIAN.

symptom of which was a continual waking, which he promised by the help of a draught to take off, and by composing his spirits to put him in a way of recovery. But while Philip was employed in preparing his medicine, the king received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was advised to be cautious of taking any thing from Philip, Darius having suborned him to take away his life. Having perused the letter, the king put it under his head; and when Philip brought him the potion, he took it out, and reached it to the physician, drinking the mixture with a steady and smiling look, while Philip read the letter. The composure of the man's countenance, and the answer he gave to the letter, by exhorting the king to quiet his thoughts, and to dispose himself to rest, assuring him that he would recover his health, if he pursued his directions, convinced Alexander of the falshood of the accusation. When, according to Philip's promise, the king began to recover his health, he not only testified an extraordinary gratitude towards the author of his cure, but also assured all who were about him that he had the justest sense imaginable of their loyalty and affection to his person, notwithstanding any suggestions he might have received to their prejudice.

He passes by Darius. IMMEDIATELY on his recovery, he dispatched Parmenio to seize the second streights, while he himself reduced such places in the neighbourhood as had not besought his protection. Being encamped at Soli, he received advice, that Ptolemy and Asander had beat the generals of Darius, and made great conquests on the Hellepont; this was very grateful intelligence, and Alexander caused very magnificent feasts and thews to be made in his camp on that account. A little after he was informed, that Darius was advanced through Syria within two days journey of the streights, upon which the king immediately marched towards him, and that with such expedition, that going through the defiles, he encamped near the city of Myriandrus. In the mean time Darius, led by his ill fate in the shape of his flatterers, had passed the streights of Amanus, and came down to Iffus, where he put most of the Macedonians he found to the sword<sup>1</sup>.

Darius returns to meet him. Alexander was so much surprized, when he first received the news that Darius was behind him, that he could scarce believe it to be true; but when he was thoroughly satisfied of the fact, and that Darius had again passed the river Pinarus, he called a council of war, wherein, without asking any body advice, he only told them, that he hoped they would remember their former actions, and that they, who were always conquerors, were about to fight people who were always beaten. He further observed, that Darius seemed to be infatuated, since he had with such expedition quitted an open and champain country, where his numbers might have acted with advantage, to fight in a place inclosed, where the Macedonian phalanx might well be drawn up, and where his multitudes could only incommode him. To these he added many other reflections on the antient glory of the Greeks, and as antient the infamy of the Barbarians. When he had finished his oration, those who were present shook hands, and, commending the king's magnanimity, promised that they would do their duty. Alexander then made the necessary dispositions for repassing the mountains, posted guards where he found them necessary, and then commanded his troops to refresh themselves, and to take their rest till morning <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 6 CURT. lib. iii. c. 16

At break of day he began to repass the mountains, oblig- Disposi- ing his forces to move in close order where the road was nar- ons of both row, and to extend themselves as they had more room ; the armies.
right wing keeping always close to the mountain, and the left to the sea-shore. On the right there was a battalion of heavy-armed troops; besides the targeteers under the command of Nicanor the son of Parmenio. Next these extending to the phalanx were the corps of Cænus and Perdiccas. And on the left the respective bodies commanded by Amyntas, Pto- lemy, and Meleager. The foot appointed to support them was commanded by Craterus : But the whole left wing was committed to Parmenio, with strict orders not to decline from the sea-shore, lest the Persians should surround them. Da- rius ordered twenty thousand foot and thirty thousand horse to pass once again the river Pinarus, finding that he already wanted room to draw up the rest. His first line consisted of thirty thousand Greek mercenaries, having on their right and left sixty-thousand heavy-armed troops, being the utmost the ground would allow. On the left towards the mountain he posted twenty thousand men, which from the hollow situation of the place were brought quite behind Alex- ander's right wing. The rest of his troops were formed into close and useless lines behind the Greek mercenaries, to the number in all of six hundred thousand men. When this was done, he suddenly recalled the horse who had passed the river, sending part of them to take post on his right against the Macedonians commanded by Parmenio, and the rest he ordered to the left towards the mountain, but finding them unserviceable there he sent the greatest part of them to the right : And then took upon himself, according to the custom of the Persian kings, the command of the main body. As soon as Alexander perceived, that the weight of the Persian horse was disposed against his left wing, he dispatched with as much secrecy as he could the Thessalian cavalry thither, and supplied their places on the right by some brigades of horse from the van and light-armed troops. He also made such dispositions, that, notwithstanding the mighty advantage of the hollow mountain, the Persians could not surround him. But as these precautions had much weakened the centre of his army, he ordered those advanced posts on the enemy's left, of which he was most apprehensive, to be attacked at the very beginning of the fight ; and when they were easily driven from them, he recalled as many troops as were necessary to strengthen his centre <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 6. CURT. lib. iii. c. 16.

Battle of Iffus.

Year of
the Flood,
2667.

Before
Christ,
332.

WHEN all things were in order, Alexander gave strict orders that his army should march very slowly. As for Darius, he kept his troops fixed in their posts, and in some places threw up ramparts, whence the Macedonians rightly observed, that he thought himself already a prisoner. Alexander at the head of the right wing engaged first, and without any difficulty broke and defeated the left wing of Darius. But endeavouring to pass the river after them, his troops in some measure losing their order, the Greek mercenaries fell upon them in flank, and made them fight not only for victory, but for their lives. Ptolemy, the son of Seleucus, and a hundred and twenty Macedonians of some rank were killed upon the spot. But the foot next to Alexander's right wing, coming in seasonably to its relief, fell upon the mercenaries in flank, amongst whom a miserable carnage was made ; they being in a manner surrounded by the horse and light-armed troops, which at first pursued the left wing, and the foot that had now passed the river. The Persian horse on the right still fought gallantly ; but when they were thoroughly informed of the rout of their left wing, the destruction of the Greek mercenaries, and that Darius himself was fled ; they began to break and betake themselves to flight too. The Thessalian cavalry pursued them close at the heels ; the narrow craggy roads incommoded them exceedingly, so that vast numbers of them perished. As for Darius, he fled soon after the left wing was broken in a chariot with a few of his favourites ;

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 8, 9.

†

favourites ; as far as the country was plain and open he escaped well enough ; but when the roads became rocky and narrow, he quitted it, and mounting a horse rode all the night ; his chariot, in which was his shield, his cloak, and his bow, fell into the hands of Alexander, who carried them back to his camp. The loss of the Persians did not fall much short of a hundred thousand men, and Ptolemy in his relation reports, that when Alexander's troops were in full pursuit of Darius, they filled up the ditches as oft as they were obstructed by them with heaps of dead bodies, and so without farther difficulty passed on (I). The tent of Darius had been

(I) In respect to the battle of Iffus, Diodorus informs us, that Alexander looked every-where about for Darius, and, as soon as he discovered him, with his handful of guards attacked him and the flower of the Persian army which was about him ; being as desirous of obtaining this victory by his personal valour, as of subduing the Persian empire by the courage of his soldiers. But when Oxathres the brother of Darius saw Alexander's design, and how fiercely he sought to accomplish it, he threw himself with the horse who were about him between his brother's chariot and the enemy, where an obstinate fight was maintained, till the dead bodies rose like an intrenchment about the chariot of Darius. Many of the Persian nobility were slain, and Alexander himself was wounded in the thigh. At the last, the horses in the chariot of Darius started, and became so unruly, that the king himself was forced to take the reins, the enemy, however, pressing so hard upon him, that he was constrained to call for another chariot, and mounted it in great danger. This was the beginning of the rout, which soon after became general. According to this author the Persians lost an hundred and twenty thousand foot and ten thousand horse ; the Macedonians three hundred foot and a hundred and fifty horse. After the battle he tells us, that Alexander returned to Darius's tent, and there bathed, and was lodged with all the luxury and magnificence of a Persian prince. He gives us also the story of Alexander's visit to Sisygambis with this addition, that the king called to him the little son of Darius and kissed him. The boy coming readily and shewing no sort of terror, the king turning to Hephestion said, This boy of six years old hath a noble countenance, a high spirit, and is more worthy of esteem than his father. He then promised, that he would take the same care of the child as if he were his own ; and assured the young ladies, that he would be no less careful in providing matches for them, than Darius himself would have been (18). Plutarch assures us, on the authority of one Chares, that Darius himself wounded Alexander in the thigh ; yet Plutarch observes that Alexander in his letter to Antipater, though he mentions his wound in his thigh, says nothing of been very early taken, and in it his mother, his wife, two daughters and a little son; there fell at the same time into the hands of the Macedonians the wives of the most considerable Persian noblemen; as for those of inferior officers, they had been with the heavy baggage and treasure conveyed to Damascus, which precaution, however, did not preserve them; for a little after all fell into the power of Parmenio, sent by Alexander for that purpose. In the evening of the day of action, when the king returned to the camp and went to refresh himself in the tent of Darius, he was extremely surprized to hear the loud cries and groanings of many women so near him; whereupon demanding of some who were near him, who these women were and what the occasion of their sorrow, he was informed, that they were the mother, the wife, his having received it from Darius. On his return to the camp after the pursuit, he entered Darius's tent, and immediately cried out, Come, let us cleanse and refresh ourselves in Darius's bath. No, cried one of his attendants, call it rather Alexander's; for the goods of the vanquished belong to the victor by the law of arms. After bathing, participating of a fine entertainment, and being conducted into the magnificent bed-chamber of the Persian king, Alexander could not help saying with an air of transport, This is to be a prince indeed. As to the respect shewn to the ladies, Plutarch's account is only a little warmer and more exalted than that of Arrian and Diodorus (19). Justin informs us, that the Persian army consisted of four hundred thousand foot, and a hundred thousand horse. He says, that the battle was hard fought, that both the kings were wounded, and that the Persians still fought gallantly when their king fled, but that they were afterwards speedily and totally routed; he is very particular as to their loss, which he says amounted to sixty-one thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and forty thousand taken prisoners. Of the Macedonians, he says, there fell no more than a hundred and thirty foot, and a hundred and fifty horse (20). Curtius, not mentioning the armies passing by each other, makes the whole of his relation very confused. Indeed it is so laboured, that it appears rather an exercise of rhetoric than a candid narration, and the close of it, which is what we have most to do with, exceeds all the rest. He agrees, that of the Persians there fell a hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. Of Alexander's army five hundred and four he says were wounded, thirty-two foot killed, and a hundred and fifty horse. That we may not suspect any error in transcribers, his own observation nails down the fact: Tantulo impendio ingens victoria stetit, so small was the cost of so great a victory (21).

(18) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii.

(19) Plut. in vit. Alex. (20) Justin lib. xi. c. 9. (21) Curt. lib. iii. c. 20—29.

the daughters of Darius, and the most considerable ladies of Persia who waited upon them; that the reason of their lamentation was the report of an eunuch, that he had seen in the hands of a soldier the cloak of Darius, whence he concluded that the king was slain. Alexander is said upon this occasion to have shed tears. However it was, he sent Leonatus, a person of the first rank amongst his officers, to free the women from their fears, by assuring them, that Darius made his escape; and at the same time to comfort them with promises of honourable treatment, a permission to wear royal apparel, and to be called and served as if they were still queens. The next day he went himself with Hephestion to their tent, that he might farther console the illustrious captives. Their garb being much alike, Sisygambis the mother of Darius fell down at the feet of Hephestion, being somewhat taller, supposing him to be the king. But when some of the attendants signified to her, by motions of their heads and hands, that she was mistaken, she immediately went and paid her devoirs to the king himself. He seeing her in some confusion, took her by the hand and raised her up, saying, Do not be uneasy, mother, you were not in the wrong, for he too is Alexander <sup>1</sup>. This passage is found in Arrian, who confesses, that he met with it in the works of most historians of those times; yet he seems diffident of the truth of it, and contents himself with saying what ought to be always said when it is mentioned; That there is so much worth and beauty in the action as ought to incline us to wish it true at least, if not to believe it. Other historians have not been so nice; they found the story good, inserted it therefore in their writings, and, taking occasion from thence to extol the virtue and clemency of Alexander, have never troubled their readers with any suspicions as to the certainty of the fact. But we in this, as in the foregoing relation of the battle, have stuck close to Arrian, from whom indeed there is no stirring without danger of falling, not only into incertainties, but into incredibilities; as the reader will perceive from a short specimen of inconsistencies, extracted from other writers and digested in the foregoing note.

Alexander made the best use of this signal victory, encouraging the provinces and petty princes in the neighbourhood to come and submit themselves voluntarily, treating all that did so, not as new and conquered, but as old and hereditary subjects, neither burdening them with soldiers, nor oppressing them with tribute. Menon, an antient officer of his, he appointed governor of Cælo-Syria, and assigned him such a body of horse, as he judged necessary for the safety of the province. The Persian had all this time a great fleet at sea, to which most of the little princes on the maritime coasts had been forced to join all the ships they could furnish, rather out of fear, than any inclination they had to concern themselves in the present dispute about the dominion of Asia, which, however it ended, they knew would leave them where it found them, tributaries and dependents. Strato, the son of Gerostratus, king of Arados and the neighbouring isles, took this opportunity of making peace for his father's subjects, who were in the utmost danger; their king with all their naval force being failed to join the Persian fleet. Strato prevented Alexander's march towards the dominions he held on the continent, by going of his own accord to his head-quarters, where, presenting him with a crown of gold, he submitted himself and all his dominions to his pleasure; whereby Alexander reaped all that he sought, viz. glory and power, and Strato lost nothing, but on the contrary avoided the Macedonian's entering his territories in a hostile manner <sup>m</sup> (K).

The conduct of Alexander in reducing Cœlœsyrta.

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 10, 11, 12.

AMONG

<sup>m</sup> ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 13.

(K) We have omitted in our text a very remarkable passage in Alexander's life, which is attested by many credible authors, amongst others by Diodorus and Plutarch, though it is not mentioned by Arrian at all. The reason, however, of our omitting it was, we knew not how or where certainly to place it. The story is best told by Curtius, and therefore from him we shall take it. He says, that Strato king of Sidon, being cordially attached to Darius's interest, Alexander, when he was in the neighbourhood of the city, gave his favourite Hephestion leave to bestow the kingdom upon whom he would. Hephestion having lodged with two brothers, and being extreamly taken with their kindness towards him, offered them the kingdom; but they alledging, that by the laws of their country it was hereditary, refused it on account of their not being of the royal blood. Hephestion, charmed with so noble a disinterestedness, desired them to name him to whom it of right belonged. The brethren readily told him, that there was one Abdalominus of the blood-royal, who

AMONG other places belonging to Gerostratus was Mara- Embassa- thus, a city on the continent, very considerable in respect of dors sent its extent, its wealth, and beauty ; thither for the sake of from Da- better accommodation, Alexander marched, and remained rius, to there a considerable time, while he debated in his council on intreat the the properest means for establishing the tranquility of his new- discharge acquired dominions, and for carrying on the war against Da- of his mo- rius. As for that prince, after he had a little recovered his ther, wife, astonishment, he collected, as well as he could, the scattered and chil- remains of his army, and retired with them as speedily as dren.

was so poor that he kept a little kitchen garden, and wrought in it for a subsistence, in the suburbs ; to him by the direction of Hephestion they carried the royal robes and crown ; they found him weeding, and having told him their errand, made him wash and clean himself, and array him as a king. He was then conducted to Alexander, about whom there were many who could not help inveighing against the raising so mean a man to a throne. Alexander looked on him a little, and then turning to those who were near him, said, His person does not at all disgrace his birth : I would be glad to know how he bore his poverty. I would to God, cried the new king, I may bear my prosperity as well ; these hands have ministered to my necessities, and as I had nothing, so I wanted nothing. Alexander was so well pleased with this answer, that he gave him the palace, furniture, and private estate of Strato ; nay, and added part of the adjacent country to his kingdom (22). Diodorus, instead of Sidon, lays the scene at Tyre after the reduction of that place ; but in this he must be mistaken, for the name of the first king of Tyre was not Strato, neither was he absent when the city was taken ; but on the contrary was himself taken in it, and, as we shall hereafter see, was also left king of Tyre by Alexander. Diodorus calls also the new king Ballonimus. He says too, that he was expressly recommended to the king by Hephestion, as a person of his own knowledge (23). Plutarch is wholly silent in his life of Alexander on this subject, but elsewhere he tells us the story. He transports us, however, to Paphos, where, he says, the former king being deprived for tyranny, Alynomus, a poor man, who had no possession but his garden, was by Alexander raised to the kingdom, because he was of the royal blood (24). But against this there is a material objection, which is, that Alexander never was at Paphos. As Curtius has told the story, it is well enough, especially as it is supported by Justin (25), yet not so well as to deserve a place in the body of the history, since it is impossible to set this story absolutely free from all objections.

(22) Curt. lib. iv. c. 4.
(24) Orat. de Fort. Alex.

(23) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.
(25) Justin. Hist. lib. xi. c. 10.

possible beyond the river Euphrates : From thence he wrote to Alexander at Marathus, and sent also ambassadors to intreat him to set at liberty his mother, his wife, and children. In his letter he expostulated pretty warmly on the injustice of the war commenced against him ; he alledged, that neither he nor any of his predecessors had ever injured the Macedonians ; that Philip had invaded them without any declaration of war ; and that himself had prosecuted that invasion without signifying what grievances he had sustained, or what satisfaction he expected ; that as to the end of the war providence would determine ; but that in the interim, he who was still a king requested of Alexander as a king also, that he would restore to him his mother, wife, and children ; and also name plenipotentiaries to treat of peace. Alexander sent back the ambassadors, and with them Thersippus, charged with a letter to Darius, which ran in these words “ Your “ ancestors, entering Macedonia and the rest of Greece, in“ jured us without having received the least provocation. I,
“ as the general of the Greeks have invaded Asia, to vin“ dicate them against their antient enemies the Persians, “ provoked by their repeated outrages. You also afforded “ aid to the Perinthians, who had grossly injured my fa“ ther, and Ochus sent likewise an army into Thrace, which “ is part of our dominions. My father was slain by trai“ tors suborned by you, as you have openly published in “ your letters ; so Arses being dispatched by Bagoas thro’
“ your contrivance, in open defiance of the Persian laws,
“ you have assumed the royal dignity. You have likewise “ entered into negotiations in Greece with a view to my “ prejudice, remitting money to the Lacedæmonians and o“ ther Greeks, received only by the former, and rejected “ by all the rest, in order to corrupt my allies, and to “ dissolve the grand alliance into which we have entered. I “ therefore have made war upon thee, because by such a “ variety of methods thou hast proved thyself my enemy.
“ Having also beaten thy lieutenants heretofore, and thyself “ lately with all thy army, I hold through the goodness “ of heaven this country. Such of your soldiers as have “ fled to me remain with me, and serve under me, not “ through constraint, but of their own free will. Come “ therefore to me, as to the lord of Asia. If thou art afraid “ that I should do any thing harsh towards thee, send some “ of thy friends to me who may take my oath. When “ thou art come, thy mother, thy wife, thy children, and “ whatever else you please, ask, they shall be thine. As “ to

‘ to the rest, when you write to me again, remember, that ‘ you write to the king of Asia ; treat me no more as ‘ your equal ; but as to the lord of all you have, signify ‘ what it is you want. If you do otherwise, I shall conceive ‘ myself injured : If you dispute my right, prepare to do ‘ it in another general engagement ; but do not fly, since ‘ it is to no purpose, for where-ever you go, I am deter‘ mined to follow you ” ’. It is certain this letter is in a very high strain, and one may almost pronounce that it is genuine by comparing the spirit it breathes, with that which at all times animated the words and actions of Alexander.

Parmenio, according to the instructions he had received, possessed himself entirely of the treasure, equipage, Alexander baggage, and whatever else Darius had left at Damascus der uses under the command of Cophenes ; all which, by the express the Greek direction of the king, he carried back to the same city, embassa- and there took an exact account of them. Amongst other dors to prisoners were the Greek ambassadors sent from Sparta, Athens, Darius and Thebes, to negotiate with the king the raising a com- with much motion, which might oblige Alexander to return home. These moderation by command of the king were sent to him as traitors ; as for the two Theban ambassadors, Alexander said, as he had left them no city in Greece, they had some reason for what they did, and therefore Ismenes being of a noble family, and Dionysodorus having been victor in the Olympic games, he, partly out of compassion to their country, and partly out of respect to themselves, freely set them at liberty *. When he knew, that the Athenian ambassador was Iphicrates, the son of Iphicrates the famous general, he said his family were under too many obligations to his father for his son to suffer any thing from his hands, and therefore not only dismissed him, but treated him with great kindness. As for Euthycles the Lacedæmonian, he would hear nothing either in favour of him or his country, but ordered him to remain in custody ; but afterwards, when affairs were better settled, he let him too go at large. Thus Alexander wisely kept terms with all the Grecian states, though at the same time he prudently pretended pity and personal respect, that it might not be at all suspected his moderation was tinged with fear ; though, as we shall hereafter hear from his own mouth, he had but a very indifferent opinion of the affection of the Greeks, and therefore as he trusted them little, so he was by no means forward to provoke them °.

* ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 14. DIODOR. lib. xvii. CURT. lib. iv. c. 2.

* The Theban ambassadors were, according to Arrian, Theffaliscus, the son of Ismenias, and Dionysodorus.

The Tyrians refuse to admit Alexander.

Tyre was in the number of those places, which, within a short space after the battle of Iffus, sent deputies to submit themselves to the conqueror; the king whose name was Azelmicus was absent in the Persian fleet; but his son was of the number of the deputies, and Alexander received him as favourably as he had done those who came from Byblus on the same errand. It is possible, the king intended to honour Tyre farther, for he acquainted the citizens that he would come and sacrifice to the Tyrian Hercules, the patron of their city, to whom they had erected a most magnificent temple. But these people, like most other trading nations, were too suspicious to think of admitting so enterprizing a prince with his troops within their walls. They therefore sent their deputies to him again, to inform him, that they were ready to do whatever he should command them; but as to his coming and sacrificing in their city, they could not consent to that, but were positively determined not to admit so much as one Macedonian within their gates. Alexander immediately dismissed their deputies in great displeasure. He then assembled a council of war, wherein he insisted strongly on the disaffected state of Greece, the power of the Persians at sea, and the folly of carrying on the war in distant provinces, while Tyre was left unreduced behind them; he also remarked, that, if this city was once subdued, the sovereignty of the sea would be immediately transferred to them, because it would fix their possession of the coasts; and as the Persian fleet was composed chiefly of tributary squadrons, those tributaries would fight the battels, not of their late, but of their present, masters. These reasons having persuaded the council to concur with them, the siege was immediately resolved on. It may seem somewhat strange, that Alexander, now in the current of his victories, an absolute prince, and impetuous in his temper, should condescend to explain himself so much at large, as to the nature and importance of his designs. But we are to consider, that his army was composed of veteran troops, commanded by old and experienced officers; that their valour did not consist in a short extravagant fury, but in a cool and determined resolution; in order to engage which, there was a necessity that the king should shew them not only what he would have them do, but why he conceived it fit to be done. Nor did his authority suffer at all thereby; for as the Macedonians always held themselves subjects and not slaves, so when once they were acquainted with the nature and expedience of the service required from them, they were indefatigable, and never refused to share any danger, in the execution of an undertaking they had once resolved on <sup>P</sup>.

° ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 15. CURT. lib. iv. c. 35.

THIS city was built on an island surrounded with prodigious walls, the sea as yet was open, and the Tyrians themselves had a considerable fleet, whereas Alexander had none at all. The first thing he projected was an artificial isthmus, that might unite the city to the shore, to which end he caused the sea to be sounded, and found the greatest depth three fathoms; this encouraged him exceedingly, and he was still the farther emboldened when he perceived that the bottom was a stiff clay, which served instead of mortar, and bound whatever was sunk into it more effectually than could have been done by art. The ruins of old Tyre furnished materials for the mole, which under the inspection of Alexander was carried on with amazing vigour, till such time as it approached pretty near the city, for then the Tyrians not only vexed the workmen with all sorts of missive weapons, but also sent armed barks on each side of the mole to harraß them, so that Alexander was forced to build two large wooden towers covered with raw hides, whereby they were defended from fire, as the workmen were by them from the insults of the enemy. The Tyrians for the destruction of these towers contrived a fire-ship, and on the yards thereof, instead of sails, they placed rows of buckets filled with sulphureous matter, the inside of the hulk was at the bottom filled with dry twigs; over them were laid all sorts of combustible matter, the stern they filled with rubbish, that sinking in the water it might raise the head the higher. Things thus prepared, as soon as they had a favourable wind they towed the hulk to sea, and ran her upon the mole directly between the towers, and then set it on fire; at such time as the masts began to burn, the weight with which their yards were charged broke them, whereby all the buckets fell into the fire, and greatly encreased its fury, so that not only the towers, but all the materials that were on the mole, were totally consumed. Alexander was not at all discouraged; on the contrary, he laid the foundation of a new mole broader than the former, and consequently capable of holding more towers; ordered new engines to be made, and began to concert measures for procuring a fleet, without which he saw clearly that all his endeavours would be in vain <sup>r</sup>.

Which induces the siege of Tyre.

<sup>P</sup> DIODOR. lib. xvii. CURT. lib. iv. c. 7. ARIAN. lib. ii. c. 16.

<sup>r</sup> ARIAN. lib. ii. c. 17.

The tributary princes join Alexander's fleet with their squadrons.

IT happened very happily for Alexander, that the moderation of his former conduct fully provided him for his present and future designs; for Gerostratus king of Arados, Enylus king of Byblus, most of the Cyprian princes, as also the Sidonian Squadron, in all an hundred and twenty sail arrived at Sidon, and offered him their service; the ill fate of the Persians at Iffus having discharged them their service, and Alexander's generous behaviour towards their subjects having attached them to his. To the same city came Cleander with a supply of four thousand fresh troops from Greece, and soon after a fleet from thence, so that after a short excursion into the neighbourhood of Antilibanus, he came again before Tyre with a new army and a fleet of upwards of two hundred sail. Andromachus, captain of the Cyprian navy, had the command on the left side, and Alexander himself commanded the blockade on the other. The citizens still made a desperate defence, and omitted nothing, which either art could devise, or valour execute, for the preserving of the place. At last seeing themselves reduced to such great straits, they resolved to attack the Cyprian Squadron posted at the mouth of the haven, which looks towards Sidon, and having before that time spread sails across the mouth of the haven, that their ships filled with soldiers, might not be discovered by the enemy; about noon (at which time the Macedonian soldiers were usually busied about their private affairs, and Alexander had retired from his fleet to his pavilion on the other side of the city) with five choice Quinqueremes, as many Quadriremes, and seven Triremes, filled with expert rowers and resolute soldiers, well armed for fight and inured to the sea, rowed out slowly and silently one by one against the enemy. But when they advanced within sight of the Cyprians, encouraging each other with a great shout and clashing of their oars, they attacked their fleet. But it happened that day, that Alexander having retired as usual to his pavilion, tarried there but a short time, and returned to his fleet. The Tyrians assaulted the enemy's ships all on a sudden, when some were entirely empty, and others by reason of the noise and violence of the attack were surprized, unprepared for resistance. Pnytagoras's Quinquereme was sunk at the first onset, with another commanded by Androcles the Amathusian and Pasicrates the Thurian: Others were forced on shore and beat to pieces. Alexander, hearing of this excursion of the Tyrian Triremes, immediately ordered as many ships as he could spare, and were well armed, to block up the mouth of the haven, and thereby hinder the rest of the Tyrian fleet from coming forth. He then with the Quinqueremes, which he had ready, and five Triremes well well prepared, sailing round the city, halted to attack the Tyrians. The besieged seeing this from the wall, and perceiving Alexander himself there, endeavoured by loud cries to recall their men who were on board ; and when their cries, by reason of the tumult, could not be heard, they made several signals for them to return, because the enemy was at hand. But finding too late that Alexander was upon them, they turned their sails and halted to the haven, yet few of them could save themselves by flight ; for Alexander's ships falling in suddenly among them, rendered some unfit for sailing, and one Quinquereme and a Quadrireme were taken at the very entrance of the port. The slaughter of the Tyrians was not great, because, as soon as they perceived it impossible to save their ships, they escaped into the harbour by swimming. The Macedonians, now knowing that the Tyrian fleet would be unserviceable, moved their engines up to the walls. Those which advanced on the side towards the rampart did no execution by reason of the firmness of the wall there ; others moved some hulks with engines to that quarter of the city which looks towards Sidon. But when they found their endeavours there fruitless, sailing along the whole south part of the wall towards Egypt, they tried to batter it every-where : And there indeed by the violence of their attacks, it was at first shaken, and afterwards beat down, and demolished. Whereupon they immediately mounted the breach by the help of their ladders, and began to storm the place : But the Tyrians without any great difficulty, repulsed them. Three days after this there happening a stark calm, Alexander resolved to make use of that opportunity to storm the city ; to this end he gave all the necessary directions. First he ordered a line of hulks, on board of which his battering engines were placed, to be towed as close as possible to the walls, and there brought to an anchor ; the engines were immediately brought to play upon the walls, and in a very short space made a tolerable breach. Then the first line of hulks weighed and stood to sea, or rather were towed off, and a second line having scaling ladders on board took their place ; a detachment of light-armed troops under the command of Admetus was assigned for the attack on one side, another corps of auxiliary foot conducted by Cœnus was to attack on the other side. Alexander himself at the head of a greater force was present, ready to sustain both. As the king took all this pains that the assault might be performed with vigour, so he was no less careful to provide that the enemy might not make as vigorous a defence ; with this view he gave orders for several false attacks, and also commanded that a squadron of armed vessels should sail continually round the city, threatening now one part of it, then another, and actually attacking any part where they found it feasible, which so well answered his end, that the Tyrians, every-where distracted, divided their forces, and knew not where to make their utmost efforts. However, they fought very gallantly against Admetus and his Macedonians, who first mounted the walls; that valiant officer being killed, as soon almost as he had set foot on the wall, by a spear; but Alexander, with fresh forces coming to the support of those who had first taken post on the wall, quickly drove the Tyrians from thence, and pursued them to the royal palace. In the interim Alexander's fleet broke into the haven on one side, and began to burn and sink the ships that were there: On the other, the Cyprians forced the haven, which they had hitherto blocked up, and, flushed with success, attacked and entered the city on that side. The Tyrians, seeing it would be to no purpose longer to defend their walls, retired in a body to a strong part of the palace, which they hoped yet to hold out; but Alexander following them, fell upon them there with such fury, that they were unable to resist, so that, after great effusion of blood, they betook themselves to flight, and sought a shelter in different parts of the city. A great slaughter also happened at the haven, where Cœnus and his forces entered the city; for the Macedonians were vehemently enraged at the citizens, partly for holding out the place so long, and partly because they having seized some of their men sailing from Sidon, first hoisted them up aloft upon their walls in sight of their friends, and afterwards flabbed them and threw their bodies into the sea. About eight thousand Tyrians were slain. Of the Macedonians, besides Admetus, who first entered the breach and took possession of the wall, about twenty targeteers fell in that attack, and during the whole siege about four hundred. They who fled to the temple of Hercules (being some of the chief Tyrian nobility, besides king Azelmicus, and some Carthaginian priests, who according to antient custom were sent to their mother city to offer sacrifice to Hercules) had the benefit of a free pardon. The rest, to the number of thirty thousand, including strangers, were sold for slaves. Alexander after this offered sacrifice to Hercules, at which his whole army assisted; the navy also performed a part in the solemnity. He moreover appointed Gymnic sports in Hercules's temple, which was then finely illuminated. The engine wherewith the wall was demolished he placed there, as an eternal monument of his victory. And the Tyrian ship consecrated to Hercules, which

which he had taken in a sea-fight, he caused to be hung up there<sup>c</sup> (L).

THE

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 24. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvii. PLUT. in vit. Alex. JUSTIN. lib. xi. c. 10. CURT. lib. iv.

(L) The taking of Tyre was foreshewn by a multitude of omens, if any credit is to be given to the historians who have recorded them; we have reserved them for a note, that they might not perplex the history; we shall mention only such as are most remarkable, that we may not tire the reader; and we shall leave him to make what judgment of them he pleases, without pretending to regulate his sentiments by our own. Arrian assures us, that the very night after Alexander had taken the resolution of besieging the place, he had a dream or vision, wherein he seemed to be scaling the walls of Tyre, in which he was assisted by Hercules, who gave him his hand to raise him up. Aristander explained this to be an infallible sign of the taking the city, but he declared, that it was a sign likewise the siege would prove an Herculean labour (26). Plutarch says, that there is a well in the neighbourhood of Tyre, which the inhabitants shewed, affirming, that Alexander slept near it when the place was first besieged; and that sleeping there he dreamed, that a satyr came and mocked him; that he ran after him a long time in vain; but that, at last and with much ado, he got hold of him. The diviners gave him an easy and elegant explanation of this vision; for dividing the Greek word Satyros, they shewed its signification to be, Thine is Tyre (27). In the city a man saw in a dream Apollo flying away; when he reported this before the people, they would have stoned him, supposing that he did it to intimidate them; on which the poor man was forced to fly to the temple of Hercules; but the magistrates having better considered it, fixed one end of a gold chain to the statue of Apollo, and the other to the altar of Hercules. A strange expedient this, and a pregnant instance of epidemic madness and superstition; however, when Alexander took the place, he set Apollo at liberty, and ordered him to be stiled Philalexandrus, that is, a lover of Alexander (28). Diodorus is very particular in the account he gives of all the methods practised by Alexander's engineers, and those of the town. It is too long to transcribe, but may be read by those who are skilled in such matters to very good purpose, as well as Arrian's accurate detail of the same siege; for it is certain, that the Tyrans did as much to defend themselves, as the wit or courage of man at that time would allow; neither was it altogether in vain, since it cost Alexander several months, and put all the force he had to the utmost stretch before

(26) Arrian. lib. ii.
Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra

(27) Plut. in vit. Alex.

(28)

Alexander reſet-tles Tyre.

THE uſage the Tyrians received was certainly very ſevere, and ſeemed very little reconcileable either to the politeneſs of a Grecian prince, or to that grandeur of ſoul which Alexander affected upon other occaſions. However, as he was a prince of great parts and learning, he knew how to find out very plauſible excuſes for the worſt things he did ; and in regard to the fact before us, beſides the cruelties which they had done to the Macedonians, which were revenged by the execution of ſuch multitudes, he alledged, that the ſelling them for ſlaves was an act of natural juſtice, the anceſtors of theſe Tyrians being no other than ſlaves, who, entering among themſelves into a conſpiracy, ſlew all their maſters in one night, then took their wives and became lords of the city, excepting only one Strato, who was preſerved by the fidelity of his ſlave ; his family Alexander alſo preſerved, tho' Azelmicus king of Tyre was deſcended therefrom. To him therefore, as if his quarrel had been with the people, he left the ſovereignty without diminution, and took great pains by draughts from other places to reſtore the city, and reſettle its principality. Thus Alexander gratified his reſentment againſt the Tyrians, by deſtroying their city, and ſelling them for ſlaves ; and when he had ſo done, he raiſed a high reputation of clemency by his generoſity towards the king, and the care he took of rebuilding the city.

He rejects the propoſitions made by Darius.

WHILE he was employed in this long ſiege, embaſſadors came again from Darius with theſe propoſals : That he would pay ten thouſand talents of ſilver for the ranſom of his mother, wife, and children ; that he would reſign to him all the countries between the Helleſpont and the river Euphrates ; they were reduced. Plutarch tells us, that Ariſtander, having from the intrails of a ſacrifice offered at the beginning of the ſeventh month, predicted, that it would be taken therein, the ſoldiers, when the general ſtorm was protracted to the very laſt day of that month, began to deride him ; but Alexander, to ſave the prophet's credit, ordered it to be called the twenty-eighth day of the month, inſtead of the thirtieth, which, however, was needleſs, for the place was taken the ſame day (29). Curtius's account of the ſiege ſwells with miraculous mounts, and wonderful triumphs over the ſea. He exhauſts whole provinces for timber, and makes free with mount Libanus, though Alexander never went near it (30). It is certain, that Alexander did great things here, but Nebuchadnezzar had done as much before when he took the ſame place (31).

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. lib. xviii. c. 3.

(29) Plut. ubi ſupra. (30) Curt. lib. iv. (31) Ezech. xxvi. 7.
ſeq. that

that he would consent to the marriage of his daughter, and, forgetting all that was past, would acknowledge him for his friend and confederate. When these terms came to be explained to the Macedonian council, Parmenio, who always spoke very freely, delivered it as his sentiment, that when the ends of the war were gained, it was unreasonable to abide its hazard; adding, If I was Alexander, I would accept these conditions. To which the king replied, So would I, if I was Parmenio. However, in his own name, he answered the ambassadors, That he did not want Darius's money: That he would not accept of a part of his empire instead of the whole: That he would take from him by force his country, his palaces, and treasure: That he would marry his daughter, if he pleased, without his consent; but that if Darius had a mind to try his humanity, he might come to him if he thought fit. This answer, how much soever it might have of the hero, had certainly not much of the politician. Had he accepted these propositions, he would have become the peaceable possessor of an extensive, rich, and powerful empire, and might have retained his hereditary kingdom of Macedonia and his authority over the Greeks, and in that condition have transmitted it to his posterity. But his boundless ambition hurried him on to a wild pursuit of conquests without end, as if all the nations of the earth had been created to pay him obedience, or to be made examples of his vengeance. Parmenio spoke the language of Philip, who would certainly have taken his advice on the same occasion, or rather would not have needed it<sup>u</sup>.

Tyre thus subdued, Alexander, notwithstanding the advanced season of the year, resolved to make an expedition into Syria, and in his way thither proposed to chastise the Jews, who had highly offended him during the siege of Tyre; for when he sent to demand of them provisions for the subsistence of his soldiers, they answered, that they were the subjects of Darius, bound by oath not to supply his enemies. When these people knew of the king's march towards them, they were under the greatest terror, and, as their last resource, had recourse to solemn acts of devotion, to prayers, processions, and particular fasts, till at length God was pleased to answer their petitions, by commanding Jaddua the High-Priest in a vision to array himself in his pontifical habit, to direct the priests to put on their proper garments, and, with the people cloathed in white, to advance in slow and solemn order to meet the Grecian prince. Jaddua and the rest did as they were commanded, and issuing out of the gates of Jerusalem, advanced as far as Sapha, an eminence at a small distance from the city, from whence as soon as they discerned Alexander's approach, they went to meet him. The king, when the high-priest drew near, halted towards him, bowed himself before him, and saluted him with religious veneration. This scene, which amazed the Macedonians, struck the Phœnicians and Syrians, not only with surprize, but with sorrow and discontent, for out of mere hatred to the Jews they had taken part in this expedition. Parmenio being near him took the liberty of asking the king, Why he adored the Jewish high-priest? To whom the king readily answered, He did not adore the priest, but God, whose minister he was. For when he was at Dium in Macedonia, and much troubled in his mind about the preparations necessary for his passing into Asia, he had a dream, wherein he saw this very person in his pontifical habit, who commanded him to lay aside his doubts and fears, and pass boldly into Asia, for that God would be his guide, and give him the empire of the Persians. On seeing therefore this person, he was convinced, that what he did was by the express assistance of the deity, who he also doubted not would protect him in all his future expeditions; wherefore, in gratitude for former victories and to testify his trust in the divine power, he had humbled himself before the priest. He afterwards accompanied Jaddua to Jerusalem, which he entered in a friendly manner, and offered sacrifices in the temple; the high-priest shewed him also the prophecies of Daniel, wherein the destruction of the Persian empire by himself is set forth, not in dark obscure terms, in equivocal or unintelligible verses, but graphically, as if the prophet had seen the whole transaction, and every circumstance attending it; whence it came to pass that the king went away extremely well satisfied; and at his departure asked, if there was nothing in which he might gratify himself or his people. Jaddua then told him, that, according to the Mosaic law, they neither sowed nor ploughed on the seventh year, therefore would esteem it a high favour, if the king would be pleased to remit their tribute in that year. To this request the king readily yielded, and having confirmed them in the enjoyment of all their privileges, particularly that of living under and according to their own laws, he then departed. In his march, the Samaritans, who, on the refusal of the Jews, had furnished him with provisions before Tyre, applied themselves to him, in hopes of receiving from him still greater matters than the

<sup>u</sup> ARRIAN. lib. ii. c. 25. DIONOR. SICUL. lib. xvii. CURR. lib. iv.

the Jews had done; but though Alexander received them civilly, and afforded a patient hearing of their request, yet he dismissed them with an unavailing answer, viz. That he had now many great affairs upon his hand, but that, when he should return from his Egyptian expedition, he would examine into, and, provided they were reasonable, comply with their demands. Having thus removed all difficulties so far, he advanced towards Gaza, the only place in this part of the world, which was still held for Darius<sup>w</sup>.

Gaza was a very large and strong city, seated about five miles from the sea-shore on a high hill, surrounded with strong walls. One Batis or Betis, an eunuch, had the government thereof committed to him by Darius, who, foreseeing what would come to pass, took care to provide all things necessary for a long and obstinate defence, causing all the fortifications to be repaired, magazines to be well furnished, and fearing his garison might be too small, he hired certain Arabian troops to serve in the place. All this did he, knowing of what importance Gaza was to his master, standing as it did in the entrance to Egypt, and being at the same time a bridle to Palestine. When Alexander summoned him, Betis returned a resolute answer, that he would defend it as long as he was able. Many of the king's council looking on the place as impregnable, dissuaded him from meddling with it; but he was not easily diverted from any thing he had once resolved on; Gaza therefore was instantly invested, and where he thought the walls were weakest, he caused a mount to be thrown up, and from thence brought his engines to play upon the city. At the beginning of this siege a very extraordinary accident happened: The king being about to sacrifice, and having a crown of gold on his head, a bird of prey hovering some time over him, let fall at last a stone from between his claws upon his head, and soon after flying to the engines was there taken, his feet being entangled in the nets, which covered the ropes wherewith they were wrought. Upon this Aristander was immediately consulted, and his answer was, that the city would certainly be taken; but at the same time he cautioned the king not to be so adventurous as he was wont, because some great danger was threatened to himself. The king accepted this advice very kindly, and did not expose himself for some time; but one day, when the Arabians made a furious sally and set fire to his engines, and had well-nigh driven the troops from the

Gaza besieged, and after two months taken.

<sup>w</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. Jud. lib. xi.

mount, he forgot the caution he had received, and advancing with a body of targeteers regained the post which had been lost, and drove the enemy into the place. But in the heat of the engagement he was wounded by an arrow, which, piercing his shield and breast-plate, lodged in his shoulder. Far from being concerned at this accident, he expressed no small satisfaction therein, for one part of the prediction being fulfilled, he questioned not but the other would come to pass. As soon as the great engines he had made use of at Tyre arrived by sea, he carried his works quite round the city, and battered the walls in several places at once. In the mean time, where the battering engines were not at work, he employed miners, who working secretly under the foundation of the walls, they suddenly fell down, to the great surprize of the citizens. When through these several methods a breach was practicable, three several attacks were made by the Macedonians with great resolution, in which notwithstanding they were repulsed with great effusion of blood. In the fourth the citizens had not such fortune, for the place was taken by storm, and they valiantly fighting were slain to a man*. Arrian says nothing of Betis the governor, neither doth Diodorus. Plutarch also is silent, and so is Justin†; but Curtius tells us a very strange story, and has had the good luck to be believed. He says that he was brought to the king half dead with wounds, to whom Alexander addressed himself in these words: Thou shalt not, Betis, die as thou fanciest, in an honourable way, but shall feel in captivity all the torments that can be devised for thee. To which the valiant eunuch gave no reply, but looked on the conqueror with a contemptuous smile. What, said Alexander, dost thou neither speak, kneel, nor entreat? I will find a way to vanquish thy silence, and force thee at least to groan. Having said this, he in a rage commanded his heels to be bored, and putting cords thro' them, bound him to his chariot, dragging him round the city till he died, boasting that in this he imitated Achilles, who dragged the body of Hector in the same manner‡. Arrian indeed tells us, that he sold the wives and children of the citizens for slaves; which is consistent enough with his practice upon other occasions; and one would think, that if Betis had been put to death in this manner, it could not have escaped the knowledge of Aristobulus and Ptolemy, from whose memoirs Arrian collected his history. These obstacles removed * ARRIAN. lib. ii. cap. ult.

 PLUT. in vit Alex. JUSTIN. lib. xi.

† DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvii.
 ‡ CURT. l. iv. c. 26.

and a garison left in Gaza, there was nothing now to hinder his so earnestly desired expedition into Egypt (M).

As soon as his soldiers had refreshed themselves, and he had received a body of recruits from Greece, Alexander marched from Gaza, and, in the space of seven days, reached Pelusium. Here he found no resistance; for Mazaces the Persian governor was able to make none<sup>a</sup>. He was dispirited with the continual misfortunes which had befallen his master's arms; he had a very indifferent army, and, which was still worse, he had the hearts of the most numerous nation in the world against him. It will afford much help to the subsequent narration, and yet take up very little room, to set this matter in a proper light. Most of the provinces of the Persian empire shewed a great deal of loyalty to Darius; but Egypt, as it had never been faithful to any of his predecessors, so it was now very impatient of throwing off his yoke, without regarding what other yoke it put on. The chief reason

The state of Egypt at that time.

<sup>a</sup> ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 1. PLUT. in vit. Alex. CURT. l. iv. c. 27.

(M) If Darius had always chosen such governors as this Betis, Alexander, with all the power of Greece, would not have triumphed so easily; for tho' this siege lasted but two months, yet it cost him such a number of men, that he sent Amyntas into Macedonia for recruits, and took pains to increase his army while it was in Egypt. Curtius has a very strange story in his account of this siege, and is singular in it; for there is not a word mentioned of any such thing elsewhere, if we except one legendary writer, whose credit is scarce on a par with his own. The story is this; An Arabian soldier, pretending to desert, came to Alexander and fell at his feet. The king put out his hand to raise him up, ordering that he should be kindly received; but as he arose, he, with a sword that was concealed under his shield, struck at the king's throat. Alexander avoided the blow by a gentle inclination of his body, and immediately after cut off the villain's head with his own sword (32). It was Neoptolemus, a near relation of Alexander by the mother's side, who first mounted the walls of Gaza. Plutarch does not tell us any thing of the number of the slain. Curtius says, there fell of the citizens ten thousand. Another author reduces this to six thousand (33). As to the Macedonians, we know nothing of their loss at all; and indeed, whenever we have any accounts of their losses, they are set so very low, that it is difficult to give credit to them; especially when, as in the present case, there are concurring circumstances, which amount to a proof, that their losses must have been very great.

of this was the great diversity between the religion of the Persians and that of the Egyptians. Not only Cambyfes, who was a tyrant, but Ochus, who was a voluptuous prince, had slain their consecrated Apis, and profaned the most sacred rites of their religion. The Persian governors and their under-officers ran all into the same humour; and thus the whole body of the people were exasperated in the highest degree against the government they should have defended, from principles, which, of all others, make men the most furious, viz. those of religion. The Egyptians had but a little before shewn the excess of their rancour, by joining with Amyntas, who, with four thousand mercenaries, fled hither from the battle of Iffus, and thought to have set up for himself; in which the Egyptians furthered him all they could <sup>b</sup>. Mazaces therefore, reflecting on all these things, and terrified perhaps with the examples of Tyre and Gaza, determined to admit Alexander peaceably. The king having entered so easily, sailed up the Nile, after leaving a garison in Pelusium, and when he was come to a convenient height, he landed, and leaving the river on his right hand, marched through the deserts to Heliopolis, then, crossing the river, he came to Memphis, where he offered pompous sacrifices, not only to the Grecian gods, but also to the Egyptian Apis. He likewise celebrated magnificent games, whereat assisted the most famous champions in Greece. From Memphis he sailed down the river to the sea; having passed round the city Canopus, he fixed on the place where the village of Scandria or Alexandretta now stands, as a convenient situation for a fine port and magnificent city. Alexander himself directed where every public structure should be erected. He also fixed the number of temples, the deities to whom they should be dedicated, and assigned particularly a large and eminent site for a temple to the Egyptian Isis. There was nothing now wanting but to trace, according to the custom of those times, the walls of the city; for doing this they had no materials at hand, this project of building a city being sudden; however, a workman advised the king to collect what meal there was among the soldiers, and to sift it in lines upon the ground, whereby the circuit of the walls would be well enough marked out. Alexander followed this advice, which answered very well; and Aristander, having considered it attentively, told the king, that it was an omen of the new city's abounding with all the necessaries of life <sup>c</sup>. Some say, that the bounds were no sooner marked out, than great numbers of birds came and pecked up the meal, and then flew away.

<sup>b</sup> DIODOR. I. xvii. CURT. ubi supra.    <sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. I. iii. c. 1, 2.

away ; which when the rest of the soothsayers held for an ill omen, Aristander alone held it to be a good one, affirming its meaning to be, that the city built in that place should become so populous as to send out colonies, as they had seen birds feed and rise from it<sup>d</sup>. He was certainly an excellent servant to his master ; for he was never at a loss either for expedients or expositions, and perhaps digressed as little from the rules of his art as any of his contemporaries. Certain it is, that Alexander paid great deference to his decisions ; for that prince affected all things which tended to render him popular. At this time he was especially careful to gain the affections of the Egyptians, which he did to such a degree, that they were ready to adore him ; for till prosperity rendered his pride too powerful for his reason, never any prince acted so steadily on the maxims of philosophic policy as he. We never find him grasping treasure, in order to gratify either a covetous or extravagant disposition. The richest spoils he gave to his friends ; the most curious he sent home to his mother and the Macedonian ladies ; little he reserved to himself. In point of women he was irreproachable, and for those vices which so foully tarnish the virtue of the Greeks, they served only as a foil to him ; so signal was his abhorrence of them. As to government, he was truly a friend to liberty, restored it where-ever he came, and shewed it as a wonder to those who had no idea of it before. It is true, that with all this he required submission to himself ; but it was a submission no way inconsistent with liberty, but that civil respect which is always due to a great captain in war, and a just and temperate ruler in peace. The reader may expect some reason for inserting this character here ; and we shall give it in few words : Alexander had been hitherto what we represent him ; we are now going to shew him in quite another light, intoxicated with vanity, and foolishly seeking to cover the foibles which disgraced him as a man, by pretending to be more than man, as painters use flowing robes and magnificent drapery to conceal defects of shape. It is not to be supposed that, from this period, he did nothing that was virtuous or praise-worthy ; all that we mean is, that as hitherto he had acted with such prudence as to commit very few, and those trivial mistakes, so henceforward he lost that moderation and magnanimity, which had made him so much loved and revered, and by attempting to exchange respect for adoration, and to extort a blind submission instead of a cheerful and rational obedience.

<sup>d</sup> CURT. l. i. c. 22. Dionor ubi supra.

obedience, he, in a great measure, extinguished the lustre of his former glory, and that authority derived therefrom, owing that affection and regard which the Macedonians still retained for him, to the memory of his former conduct, and to those intervals of humanity, in which he laid aside the ridiculous notion of his being allied to the divinity. But it is time to proceed to the source of these disorders (N).

Alexander visits the temple of Jupiter
Hammon.

AT this time Alexander formed his extraordinary design of visiting the temple of Jupiter Hammon. As to the motives which induced him thereto, Arrian tells us, that they were chiefly founded in the imitation of Perseus and Hercules, the former of whom had consulted that oracle, when he was dispatched against the Gorgons; and the latter twice, viz. when he went into Libya against Antæus, and when he passed into Egypt against Busiris. Now, as these heroes, viz. Perseus and Hercules, gave themselves out to be the sons of the Grecian Jupiter, so the Macedonian prince had a

(N) We follow the authority of Arrian in placing Alexander's directing the building of the city honoured with his name before he went to visit the oracle of Jupiter Hammon; Diodorus and other authors placing it afterwards, alledging that it so happened. The last-mentioned historian says, that it was seated very commodiously by the haven of Pharos; that the streets were wisely contrived, so as to admit the cooling breezes, which mightily refreshed the air. In point of strength, he ordered a broad and high wall to be drawn round it, so as to have the sea close on one side, and a great lake on the other, and a narrow pass at each end. Its form resembled that of a soldier's coat. One large beautiful street passed from gate to gate, being in breadth a hundred feet, in length forty furlongs, or five miles. It became in after-times so rich and famous, that our author tells us, in his time there were on its rolls three hundred thousand freemen. Plutarch affirms, that he was directed to the choice of this situation by Horus in a vision; and, according to his account of the matter, a more pleasant, or more convenient place, could not have been chosen (34). Alexander himself was a prince of great taste; he looked upon works of this kind as the noblest monuments, and therefore spared neither pains nor cost in completing them. The architect he employed here was the celebrated Dinocrates, who had raised himself an immortal reputation by rebuilding the temple of Diana at Ephesus; to him he consigned the care of this work, which did the highest honour in succeeding times to its founder and his architect (35)

(34) Diodor. ubi supra. (35) Plin. l. v. c. 10 Ammian. Marcell. l. xxi. c. 10. l. c. 3. l. xvi. p. 59.

mind to take for his father Jupiter Hammon<sup>c</sup>. Maximus Tyrius informs us, that he went to discover the fountains of the Nile <sup>d</sup>. Diodorus tells us in few words, that he went to consult the oracle <sup>e</sup>. Plutarch is as concise <sup>f</sup>. Justin assigns a very singular reason; he says there had been always great jealousies about Alexander's birth; that Philip was never thoroughly convinced of his being his son; that a little before his death, he had openly declared, that he was satisfied he was not; that Olympias herself had confessed as much, pretending, that she conceived him by a monstrous large dragon. To silence all these reports, to clear up his mother's character, and to get himself the reputation of being the son of a god, were his motives, if we may believe this author <sup>g</sup>. Whatever they were, certain it is, that he hazarded himself and his troops in the highest degree, there being two dangers in this march; which, with the example of Cambyfes, who lost the greatest part of his army in it, might have terrified any body but Alexander. The first was the want of water, which, in the sandy deserts surrounding the temple, is no-where found; the other, the uncertainty of the road from the fluctuation of the sands, which, changing their situation every moment, leave the traveller neither track to march in, nor mark to march by. From these impending mischiefs, all authors agree, that Alexander was miraculously delivered; for when the water brought on camels backs was spent, there fell a prodigious shower of rain, wherewith they filled all their vessels; and when their guides could no longer distinguish the road, they were directed by supernatural harbingers; tho' as to them authors do not agree. Ptolemy the son of Lagus affirmed they were two monstrous dragons, which went with a mighty noise before them, Alexander giving strict orders to his officers to follow these leaders. But Aristobulus, with whom the current of historians go, asserts, that they were led by crows, who, as often as they deviated from the way, by their croaking and fluttering before them, set them right. These are certainly strange stories, yet there is all imaginable authority for them, which made so strong an impression on Arrian, that he gives us his judgment of the matter in these words: I am fully convinced, that Alexander was conducted by some divine power, from the testimony of all who speak of his journey, notwithstanding the diversity of senti-

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 3.
l. xvii.

<sup>d</sup> In vit. Alex.

<sup>e</sup> Serm. xxv.

<sup>f</sup> JUSTIN. l. xi. c. 11.

<sup>g</sup> DIODOR.

ments among these authors hath greatly obscured the truth of this story <sup>k</sup>.

Where he consults
the oracle.

THIS arduous march once over, Alexander arrived at the temple of Hammon, seated in the midst of a barren thirsty waste, in a narrow spot of ground, the utmost extent of which exceeds not forty furlongs, curiously planted with olive-trees and palm-trees, and watered with dews, which fall no-where else in all that country. A fountain also has its rise here, different in its nature and properties from all the fountains upon earth ; for at mid-day it is cool to the taste, but to the touch intensely cold; towards evening it begins to be warm, which warmth increases by degrees from thence till midnight ; after midnight it waxes cool by little and little ; in the morning it is chilly, at noon excessive cold ; and it receives all those various alterations regularly every day. This country naturally produces a kind of fossile salt, which, being put into little boxes of palm-tree, some of the priests of Hammon carry into Egypt, and bestow on the king, or some great men, as a present. It is dug out of the earth in large oblong pieces, some above three fingers in length, transparent like chrystal. This kind of salt the Egyptians and other nations, who are curious in their worship, use in their sacrifices, it being much purer than that produced from seawater. Arrian tells us, that Alexander himself consulted the oracle, and was well satisfied with its answer ; but as to what he consulted it upon, or what the answer was that he received, that author is silent. Strabo concurs with him, asserting, that the king entered in his royal robes, consulted the oracle, and received its answer, none being let into the secret. Diodorus distinguishes three things which passed at this meeting <sup>l</sup>. First, the salutation of the priest, whereby Alexander was acknowledged for the son of Jupiter Hammon. The second, a promise to the king, that he should subdue the whole world. The third, an assurance that he had fully punished the murderers of Philip <sup>m</sup>. Plutarch's account corresponds pretty well with this, and he tells us besides, that Alexander, highly pleased with what had passed, made mighty presents to the priests. He likewise acquaints us, that some were of opinion Alexander's title to divinity was founded in a blunder of the high-priest, who being desirous to salute him in Greek with these words, my son, instead of paidion, pronounced paidios, which the Greek flatterers understood pai dios, i. e. son of Jupiter. The same author adds, that Alexander, in a letter to his mother Olympias, told her, he had received some secret answer from the god, which he would reveal to her at his return<sup>n</sup>. But Olympias, who was a woman of spirit and sense, was so little pleased with the king's propagating these vain stories, that she sent to desire him to forbear embroiling her with Juno. As to Alexander's return there is also a good deal of uncertainty, Aristobulus affirming, he came back the same way he went; and Ptolemy asserting, that he returned a nearer, which brought him directly to Memphis.

<sup>k</sup> ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 3. DIODOR. l. xvii. CURT. l. iv. <sup>l</sup> ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 4. <sup>m</sup> DIODOR. l. xvii.

Alexander, on his return to Memphis, received there embassadors with congratulations from most of the states of Greece, as also recruits both of horse and foot; all which was very acceptable to him, as he testified by his kind reception of every body, by his making great feasts, and exhibiting pompous shews. These solemnities over, he began to think of settling the province, and of returning to the prosecution of the war. As he intended the Egyptians should live under their own laws, he made choice of Doloaspis and Petisis, eminent Egyptians, to be joint presidents of the province; but Petisis desiring to be excused from such a burden, Doloaspis was made sole president. Into all the places of strength, however, he put garisons, and those garisons were under the command of such officers as he thought he could confide in. Thus Memphis was committed to the care of Pantaleon, Pelusium to Polemon, the troops were under Lycidas, that is, the foreign troops; for as to the rest, they were commanded by Peucestas and Balacrus. The fleet had for its admiral another Polemon. Thus he established several independent commanders in Egypt; a policy imitated by the Romans: For considering the nature of the people, the situation of the strong places, and the vast consequence of the province, it was thought too great a charge to be committed to a single person, or to be trusted in the hands of men of high quality, it being always held a mark of superior policy to prevent insurrections, rather than be obliged, with the hazard of war, to quell them. Alexander, as we have shewn, was not only aware of this, but in his conduct set an example to others. These regulations took up a good deal of time; so that the winter was spun out before all things were compleated; and then Alexander made the necessary dispositions for marching with his army into Phœnicia, that he might open the campaign in good time °.

He settles the government of Egypt.

<sup>n</sup> In vit. Alex.

Samaritans punished.

Tyre was the place appointed for the general rendezvous of the forces, and thither Alexander with all convenient speed shaped his march. In the way he received an account of a very unhappy accident which gave him much concern. Andromachus, a great favourite of his and a deserving man, had been appointed superintendant of Syria and Palestine. This officer, going to Samaria to collect the tribute, was not only opposed in the execution of his office, but a mighty tumult suddenly arising, the people set fire to the house wherein he lodged, and burnt him and his retinue. To avenge so horrid a fact, the king ordered a strict inquisition to be made after the murderers, directing, that all who were any ways concerned should, without mercy, be put to death; but this was not all, he established a colony of Macedonians in their city, and gave part of its territories to the Jews. Such of the Samaritans as escaped this slaughter repaired to Sechem, which has been ever since, and still is, their capital. The ground of this quarrel in all probability was Alexander's slighting their request at the time he so highly favoured the Jews; a thing which sunk deep into their breasts, and, if possible, heightened that implacable aversion they had conceived against the Jews. From this fact of theirs Alexander took such a distaste to this people, that he dismissed eight thousand of them who had served in his troops ever since the siege of Tyre, sending them as far as the Upper Egypt, where he commanded they should have certain lands divided amongst them P.

Statira the wife of Darius
dies.

WHEN he arrived at Tyre, he there met with Athenian ambassadors, who came to renew the request formerly made him, to pardon such of their citizens as he had found serving the enemy. The king, being desirous to oblige so famous a state, yielded to their request, and sent also a fleet to the coast of Greece, to prevent the effects of some commotions which had lately happened in Peloponnesus. These, with some private affairs, once settled, he directed his march to Thapsacus, a city on the Euphrates. There he found a broken bridge, which Darius had made use of in his flight after the battle of Iffus; as also a great body of horse, under the command of Mazæus, who had orders to obstruct his passage; but so it was, that, either from a notion of policy, or through downright cowardice, Mazæus, having burnt the country, slighted the post, and retired ; whereupon the king, having repaired the broken bridge, passed the Euphrates, marching on to seek Darius. A little before that the wife of the last-mentioned prince paid her last debt to nature in child-bed. Alexander caused her to be buried at a prodigious expence, though he had been so cautious of injuring either her reputation or his own, as not only to forbear seeing her, but also forbid the commending her beauty in his presence. Tyræus, an eunuch who attended on her person, escaped soon after, and carried Darius the tidings of his queen Statira's death. He was extremely moved at the news, and no less so at the recital of the honours paid her by Alexander when living, and the mighty respect shewn her at her death ; which, on account of the youth of Alexander, he attributed in his mind to some sinister cause ; but when the eunuch, with most solemn asseverations, had convinced him, that there was not the least colour for his suspicions, he, in a great transport of mind, prayed to God to restore the kingdom of Persia to its antient glory, that he might thereby be enabled to testify his gratitude to Alexander ; or if its fatal period was come, he prayed, that this generous victor might sit next on the throne of Cyrus<sup>1</sup>. After passing the Euphrates, the Macedonians marched through Mesopotamia, having the river on their left, and, by a round-about road, which they took to avoid defiles, and for the easier procuring of provision, arrived at length at Babylon. On the road Alexander was informed, that Darius, with all his army, lay encamped on the river Tigris, in order to dispute his passage. The current of this river is so rapid, that nothing can be imagined more difficult than attempting to pass it with an army, even without an enemy in view. If Darius therefore had really drawn his troops down to the banks of this river, we may be confident that Alexander never could have passed it ; but he had committed the care of defending it to Mazæus, who, it seems did not love fighting ; for he burnt the forage here too, and then withdrew ; however, Alexander passed it, though not without great difficulty, many of his soldiers being born off their feet, and carried down with the stream ; so that at last he commanded them to march in close order, so that they resisted the water like a wall ; notwithstanding which expedient a great deal of time was spent in getting them over, and they were so much fatigued with the passage, that he was forced to let them rest a whole day. If therefore, as we said before, Darius, or any general of his, with a competent body of troops, had been possessed of the opposite shore, how is it possible they should have got over at all? But these precautions being wanting, and Alexander once on the other side, there remained nothing now but a battle to decide the issue of the war, and to determine who should be lord of Asia.

• ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 5.

P JOSEPH. Antiq. Jud. l. xi.

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vita Alex.

An eclipse of the moon astonishes the Macedonians.

As the king continued his march directly towards the enemy, an accident happened that caused some confusion in the army. This was no more than an eclipse of the moon. If we were to believe Curtius, we must suppose, that the Macedonians were on the very point of breaking out into rebellion, taking this for an evident sign that heaven was against them; but it is so much that author's custom to exaggerate, and the account he gives us of this eclipse shews him to have written after such indifferent memoirs, that we may very well justify our preferring Arrian's account; which as it is more moderate, so it is also much more probable. He says, the king caused sacrifices to be offered to the sun, moon, and earth, as the authors of eclipses; and that Aristander, having inspected the intrails, had declared, that all things would be fortunate to the Macedonians; that a battle would happen within the month, and that they would carry the victory. Curtius says, that the king called for Egyptian astronomers, who concealing the causes of eclipses from the vulgar, of which causes, by the way, Curtius himself knew very little or nothing, told the soldiers, that the Macedonians were under the government of the sun, the Persians of the moon; and therefore, that a diminution of light in the latter shewed, that those who were under her dominion should shortly be destroyed. This is certainly improbable; for nothing is more notorious, than that the Persians were held to be under the dominion of the sun, and not of the moon; besides, there can be no reason shewn, why the king should have recourse to the Egyptian sages, and not to Aristander. On the whole therefore we may justly conclude, that having, by a proper compliance with their notions, resettled the minds of his soldiers, and filled them with the hopes of victory, Alexander made them continue their march, that they might fight while they remained full of this persuasion.

The armies meet.

It is unnecessary to detain the reader here with a long account of the strength of the Persian army; we shall content ourselves with observing, that it is hardly possible to guess at its real strength. Arrian himself seems to have been misled, if his text is not corrupted in this passage, wherein he tells us, that Darius had forty thousand horse, and a million of foot. Diodorus says, there were two hundred thousand horse, and eight hundred thousand foot. Plutarch, that the horse and foot made up together a million. Justin gives us exactly half of Diodorus's number. With this vast army he remained encamped near the village Gaugamela. Alexander chose a strong camp within about fifteen miles of the same place, where he left his baggage, with his sick and wounded soldiers, and with the rest marched on till he was within sight of the enemy<sup>a</sup>. Then a council of war was called, wherein it was debated, whether it would be more adviseable to fight that evening, or to encamp where they were that night. Most of the members of that council were for the first, Parmenio almost alone for the second; but when the king had heard his reasons, he gave orders that the troops should encamp. Alexander then, with a chosen party of horse went and viewed the field of battle, examining every part thereof with the greatest diligence; and, when he had done this, he returned to the camp, where, in a second council, he gave the necessary directions for the engagement, encouraged all who were present to do their duty, and, above all, exhorted them to be extremely careful in preserving order; after which he dismissed them to their rest. When all things were quiet, Parmenio came again to the king's pavilion, and earnestly entreated him to attack the enemy in the dark, assuring him, that it would be the best way to prevent his soldiers from being discouraged by the disparity between themselves and the Persian troops. To which Alexander calmly replied, I will never steal a victory; which has been by some cried down as a puerile expression; by others as unreasonably extolled as a mark of Alexander's grandeur of mind; whereas it was in truth no more than the wise resolution of a consummate general, who suffered not himself to be dazzled by appearances, penetrating all things to the bottom, and chose, without hesitation, that measure which was best. The reader will easily discern this, if he will be pleased to consider on what the two kings relied. Darius plainly placed his hopes in numbers; for this reason he chose a plain country, every mole-hill of which, in comparison, he caused to be demolished. Alexander depended on the valour and military skill of his veteran troops. In the dark then numbers would still have been numbers, valour would have signified little, and military skill would have been lost; besides, a hundred accidents might have snatched a victory from Alexander, confidering the disproportion between his army and that of Darius; whereas we can scarce figure to ourselves an accident which would have been favourable to him. More than all this, Darius was now of opinion, that his last defeat was wholly owing to the disadvantage of the ground; had he been beaten again in the night, he would have imputed that to the darkness, and still have entertained hopes; whereas Alexander sought to convince the Persians, that their fighting was to no purpose: He answered therefore wisely, and like a great captain, as he really was, I will not steal a victory; an expression which ought not to surprize us as sublime; but ought to convince us, that he who spoke it was a soldier, and knew well what he said and did*.

<sup>r</sup> ARRIAN. l. iii c. 7. DIODOR. ubi supra.
ubi supra.      <sup>r</sup> CURT. l. iv.

<sup>r</sup> ARRIAN.

<sup>a</sup> ARRIAN. I. iii. c. 8.

The battle
of Gaugamela.
Year of
the Flood,
2668.
Before
Christ,
331.

THE vast army of Darius continued all night under arms, which must have fatigued them very much, and have given great opportunity for their fear to work upon them. Their king, it seems, was apprehensive that Alexander would attack him in the night; which was the reason that he kept his troops upon so hard a duty. They were drawn up in very exact order, as appeared by many memoirs of their disposition, which, after the battle was over, were found in their camp, and which doubtless had been distributed to their principal officers, to prevent confusion and mistakes. Darius himself was in the main body, surrounded by his relations, some choice troops of horse, certain chariots and elephants, and round all these were posted the Greek mercenaries, on whose courage and skill he chiefly depended. When Alexander marched to the engagement, his right wing was composed of his royal brigade of horse, commanded by Clytus, of several other corps of cavalry, besides a large body of auxiliary horse, commanded by Philotas the son of Parmenio. The first line of the phalanx, which joined these, was commanded by Nicanor the son of Parmenio, the next by Cleus the son of Polemocrates. The third corps was under Pediceas. The fourth was commanded by Meleager. The fifth by Polyphercen. The last was the battalion of Amyntas, commanded by his brother Simmias, Amyntas being gone into Macedonia to raise recruits. On the left were the troops commanded by Craterus, consisting of several battalions of foot; a body of auxiliary horse commanded by Erigyus; the Thesalian horse under the command of Philip. The whole wing was commanded by Parmenio. This was the disposition of the middle line of the army; for before both wings and the centre there were light-armed troops for forlorns, and behind each division of the army there was a corps of reserve. To the battalions of foot that composed these, Alexander gave orders, that they should bear their spears so as to face about immediately in case the enemy should surround any part of his army. He likewise ordered, that they should open whenever the armed chariots were driven upon them, so as to give them a clear passage ; which dispositions and directions proved of the highest consequence. The forces brought at present into the field are computed by Arrian at seven thousand horse and forty thousand foot. Alexander's right wing charged first upon the Scythian horse, who, as they were well armed and very robust men, behaved at the beginning very well, making a vigorous resistance ; and that this might answer the more effectually, the chariots placed upon the left wing bore down upon the Macedonians. Their appearance was very terrible, and threatened entire destruction ; but Alexander's light-armed troops, by their darts, arrows, and stones, killed many of the drivers, and more of the horses, so that few reached the Macedonian line ; which opening, as Alexander had directed, they only passed through, and were then either taken or disabled by his bodies of reserve. The horse continued still engaged, and before any thing decisive happened there, the Persian foot near their left wing began to move, in hopes of falling on the flank of the Macedonian right wing, or of penetrating so far as to divide it from its centre. Alexander perceiving this, sent Aretas with a corps of troops to charge them, and thereby compel them to keep their posts. In the mean time he remained where he was, and prosecuting his first design broke their left wing, and pursued it till it was fully routed. He then charged the Persian foot in flank, and they being intimidated made but a feeble resistance. Darius, perceiving this, gave up all for lost, and fled himself. Then the Macedonians following their victorious monarch, made a vigorous pursuit. The battalion commanded by Simnias only did not stir, that officer being informed, that not only the left wing was in great danger, but that a great body of Persian and Indian horse, taking the advantage of the king's absence, had penetrated through the centre, and were fallen in upon the Macedonian baggage. This misfortune was quickly followed by another ; the Barbarian prisoners mutinied thereupon, and fell on the Macedonians in their camp ; but the corps of reserve facing about, and being supported by Simnias's battalion, the Persians, after a smart engagement, were routed, and great numbers slain. Parmenio, on the left wing, in the mean time was almost enveloped, the cavalry in the Persian right being both excellent and very numerous ; in all probability the Macedonians, notwithstanding their courage and military skill, would have been overborne at last and totally destroyed, if Alexander, on the first intelligence of this misfortune, had not immediately returned from the pursuit, and charged the enemy in flank and rear ; yet did they not then fly, but facing about continued to defend themselves against Alexander, and pressed hard upon Parmenio at the same time. Hephestion, Cœnus, and Menedas were wounded in this conflict, which was very long and bloody, but ended at last in the total defeat of the Persians ; whereupon Alexander continued the pursuit of Darius about ten miles, and then passing the river Lycus, encamped his troops that they might take some repose. Parmenio in the mean time and the troops under his command secured the enemy's tents, baggage, elephants and camels. Such was the end of this battle, which decided the fate of Asia <sup>o</sup>.

* ARRIAN. ubi supra. DIODOR. PLUT. &c.

OR

The loss sustained in this battle.

ACCORDING to Arrian, the Persians lost here three hundred thousand men, and the field of battle, and much more than that number taken prisoners <sup>w</sup> ; but how this should be done by an army short of fifty thousand men, is not easy to be conceived, and therefore, not without reason, some corruption hath been suspected in the number. Diodorus is more moderate ; for he says there were only ninety thousand killed. Prisoners, to be sure, there were at least as many as Alexander's army knew what to do with. With respect to the loss of the Macedonians, Arrian puts it at one hundred horsemen and a thousand horses ; which is surely beyond all bounds of belief, if we consider how hardly this battle was fought, and that the Persians were once masters of the Macedonian camp. About midnight Alexander obliged his soldiers to continue the pursuit, in hopes of overtaking Darius ; but tho' he failed in this, yet at Arbela he took all the heavy baggage and all the rich equipage of that monarch. This great victory, as Arrian observes, was obtained within the space of time fixed by Aristander, which gave him great reputation <sup>x</sup> (O).

Alexander

<sup>u</sup> ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 13, 14, 15. DIODOR. ubi supra. CURT. l. iv. c. 46, & seq. <sup>w</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. <sup>x</sup> Idem ibid.

(O) Diodorus, in his account of the battle of Arbela, (for so most historians call it, tho' it was fought near Gaugamela) differs in some circumstances from Arrian in the account he gives us of the order

Alexander receiving certain intelligence, that Darius was retired into Media, thought it at that time unnecessary, and indeed Alexander enters Babylon.

order of battle; but if we consider, that Arrian wrote from the memoirs of eye-witnesses and persons of great quality, we cannot but suppose, that in these particulars he must have been well informed. In other respects it is fit that we should set down what Diodorus hath recorded. By him then we find that success which for a time attended the Persian troops, intirely ascribed to the conduct and valour of Darius. It unfortunately happened, that Alexander, attacking his guards, threw a dart at Darius, which, tho' it missed him, struck the charioteer who sat at his feet dead; and he tumbling forwards, some of the guards raised a loud cry, whence those behind them conjectured, that the king was slain, and thereupon fled without looking behind them, which created such a confusion, that Darius found himself obliged to follow their example. The dust raised by the flight of so vast a multitude, gave Darius room and leisure to retire to a place of safety; for he knowing well that the Macedonians could not perceive what rout he took, turned off immediately with the troops under his command, and, marching with convenient speed, took post in some villages that were directly behind the Macedonian army; from whence he safely departed, while Alexander by forced marches endeavoured to overtake him, on a vain presumption that he fled strait forwards. According to this author, the Persians lost ninety thousand, and the Macedonians five hundred, men; however, he owns, that a great number of the latter were wounded (36). Plutarch, Diodorus, and many other authors agree, that the evening before the battle, when Alexander had given the necessary directions, he went to bed, and slept so soundly, that Parmenio and the rest of the generals were forced to do many things in the morning, according to their own sentiments, because they did not care to awake him. At last Parmenio was constrained to go to his bed side, where he called him several times before he answered. At length he rose, and dressed himself with great serenity; while he was doing this, Parmenio could not help saying, I wonder, Sir, considering you are to fight the most important of all your battles, that you could sleep as soundly as if you were already victorious. Why, so I am, my good friend, returned the king, since I shall no more be obliged to follow Darius hither and thither, through a country already destroyed by the length of the war (37). We have another instance in Plutarch of the wonderful coolness and penetration of this great prince. When Parmenio perceived that the Macedonian camp was in danger, he sent to recal the king from his pursuit. When Alexander heard the message, Parmenio, said he, is certainly beside himself; if I am vic-

(36) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. Hist. l. xi. c. 13.

(37) Plutarch. in Alex Justic.

deed impracticable, to follow him. He determined to march directly to Babylon, which accordingly he did. Mazeus commanded torious over these enemies, we shall have their baggage and our own too ; whereas if I lose this advantage, we shall have nothing to fight for but our lives. But when Parmenio sent again to inform him, that himself and the troops under his command were in the utmost danger, the king came immediately to his relief ; but, says our author, suspicions began to arise, that either the vigour of Parmenio was diminished by his age, or that out of envy he sought to diminish his master's greatness (38). The truth seems to be, that Parmenio had too much concern for him. Philip of Macedon confessed him the only general he knew ; and we find nothing recorded of him in history, which doth not speak him a most consummate, tho' at the same time a very cautious, commander. If the wing under his command had been beaten, that corps of Persians would have been able to keep the field, and would have been quickly joined by most of those who fled before. Such a multitude, encouraged by a taste of success, would have quickly swallowed up the Greeks, and recovered all they had conquered. Alexander, who fancied himself the son of a god, had his head full of nothing but victory where ever he appeared ; but to Parmenio, who was a mere man, conduct seemed as necessary as courage, and the preservation of half the army essential to the whole. It is true, we are not, properly speaking, bound to enter into the characters of those whose history we write, yet sometimes it is necessary ; for what is history without truth ? Or to what end do we read, but to be acquainted with things as they were ? There were in the court of Alexander many who hated Parmenio and his family ; of these some wrote, and from the memoirs of these writers Plutarch had his informations : We do not therefore presume to blame him for transmitting what he read to posterity ; but we take the liberty of doing the same thing : And because Arrian, who copied Aristobulus and Ptolemy, says nothing of Parmenio's envy, we report the suggestion as doubtful, that a character which seems to have the fairest title to honour, may not, at this distance of time, be sullied by insinuations once thought too idle to deserve mention. Aristander, during the battle, rode by his master's side, covered with a white mantle, and with a crown of gold upon his head. He it was, who, in a great measure, contributed to fix the victory, by shewing the Macedonians an eagle hovering over the king's head. After the battle, the king sacrificed in a magnificent manner, and sent presents of the spoils to all the Grecian states (39). Justin says, that few battles had been so bloody as this ; that Darius, when he saw the battle was lost, endeavoured to throw himself into the thickest of the fight, that there he might be slain ; but, against his will, was commanded there in chief, the same person who had been intrusted to defend the passages of the rivers Euphrates and Tigris. He acted here just as he had done there ; that is, at the sight of Alexander's army, he put the place into his hands <sup>1</sup>. The Babylonians were very glad of this revolution, and therefore, with great joy, came out to meet Alexander, with presents of great value. This joy of theirs proceeded from their excessive hatred of the Persians, as again that excessive hatred took birth from their principles of religion ; for the Persians being deists had pulled down all their temples, and in every other respect curbed that propensity to idolatry, which was so extravagantly warm in this nation. Alexander, on the other hand, answered all their expectations ; for he immediately commanded, that every one of their temples should be rebuilt, particularly the famous temple of Belus. He sent also for their priests, conversed with them, and left to their care the decree he had made in favour of their religion <sup>2</sup>. He offered sacrifices himself to Belus, left Mazæus in possession of the government ; but removed Bagophanes, who had put the citadel and the royal treasures into his hands, yet he entertained him in his court, and treated him with marks of confidence and esteem <sup>3</sup>. As he was a prince of great learning, he enquired after the astronomical memoirs of the observations which were said to have been made in that city for a long tract of time, and caused the best account that could be got of them to be transmitted to his tutor Aristotle ; so desirous he was that the republic of letters should reap some advantage from his labours and victories <sup>b</sup>. On the whole, however, his stay at Babylon did him no good ; for he and

(38) Plut. in Alexand.(39) Ibid.

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. DIODOR. CURT. ubi supra.
<sup>2</sup> ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 16.
 Simplic. l. ii. de cælo.

<sup>3</sup> DIODOR. ubi
<sup>b</sup> PORPHYR. ap.

forced to fly by those who were about him. Being persuaded by these to break down the bridge on the river over which he passed, that it might prevent the enemy's passage, he answered, I will never purchase safety to myself, at the expence of so many thousands of my subjects, as must by this means be lost ; or take from them that passage which has preserved me (40). Indeed all authors agree, that Darius behaved very honourably in this action ; and we shall see hereafter, that he loved his subjects so well, as to be satisfied with dying by their hands, rather than to owe his safety to the fidelity of strangers.

(40) Justin Hist. l. xi. c. 14.

his officers began there first to taste of luxury, and to fall in love with that magnificence and delicacy which had enervated and destroyed the Persians <sup>c</sup>.

The conduct of Antipater in Greece.

IT is now time for us to turn our eyes a little towards Greece; for though the main hopes of the Macedonians followed their royal leader through the great continent of Asia, yet were they not asleep as to their interests in Europe, where several attempts were made to lessen their power. While Memnon lived, the Persians were not only lords of the sea in name, but in reality also. He retook many of the islands which had fallen under the power of Alexander; he sent ships of war to cruize on the coasts of Macedonia; and, if he had lived, he would have made a descent on Eubæa, where questionless he would have been joined by a great number of the Greeks. After his death, things were in a languishing condition till the battle of Iffus, when new efforts were made to stir up troubles in Greece. Those, however, were rendered abortive by Antipater, who kept such a fleet at sea and made such dispositions of his land-forces, as rendered it not safe for any of the Greek states to declare against his master <sup>d</sup>. However, when advice arrived of this last victory, these smothered dissensions broke out into an open flame. The Greeks in general began to be afraid that if they made no attempt before the Persian empire was absolutely destroyed, all they could do afterwards would be to no purpose. As soon therefore as they had news that Memnon governor of Thrace had rebelled, and that Antipater was making great preparations to march against him, they took arms, Agis king Lacedæmon being declared their general. Antipater being informed of this, immediately drew together an army, and, having composed matters in Thrace, marched into Greece. It was not long before the armies met; that of Agis consisted of twenty two thousand foot and two thousand horse; Antipater had about forty thousand men; for when he came with a well-disciplined army out of Macedonia, many of the Greeks joined him out of fear, who would otherwise have been neutrals, or have fought against him. The engagement that ensued was very obstinate and bloody; but at last Agis was killed, and the army he commanded routed, with the loss of five thousand three hundred men. Antipater himself lost three thousand five hundred; but it put an end to the war, for the Greeks seeing the fatal issue of this business, and that the Athenians sided with the conqueror, they were constrained to forget their resentments, and to implore mercy<sup>e</sup>. Such was the state of Greece.

<sup>c</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra.
PLUT. in vit. Demost.

<sup>d</sup> ARRIAN. l. ii. DIODOR. ubi supra.

AFTER thirty days stay at Babylon, Alexander continued his march to Susa, which had been already rendered into the hands of Philoxenes. Here the king received the treasures of Darius, amounting to fifty thousand talents, or upwards of nine millions sterling, as also curiosities and furniture of an immense value<sup>f</sup>. It was delivered up to him by Abulites, to whose care Darius had committed it; yet it is said, that what the Persian did was by order of his master, who was in hopes, that while Alexander was employed in taking great cities and heaping up riches, he would not march so speedily as hitherto he had done, but afford him time to collect a fresh army<sup>g</sup>. Among other things that were found in the treasury of Susa, were the brazen statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which Xerxes had carried away when he plundered Athens. These Alexander very carefully sent back, and having taken a view of the fair palace and other things of note at Susa, he began to think of quitting the province. Abulites he left in possession of his command as governor of Susa; but the care of the citadel he committed to Mazæus. The command of the forces he left for the defence of the province he gave to Archelaus. Menetes he constituted president of Syria, Phœnicia, and Cilicia, to whom, at his departure, he gave three thousand talents of silver, with orders to send over as much of it as should be necessary to Antipater, that he might the better preserve the peace of Greece, and carry on his designs there. About this time arrived the recruits under the command of Amyntas. They consisted of five hundred horse and six thousand foot, all Macedonians; six hundred Thracian horse, and three thousand five hundred Trallian foot; about a thousand horse and four thousand foot from Peloponnesus; in all about two thousand horse, and thirteen thousand five hundred foot. These he incorporated into his veteran army, without forming any new corps. He dealt also very kindly by them all, taking care to let them have pay in advance, procuring for them good quarters, and being present himself at the reviews, and as often as they were exercised<sup>h</sup> (P).

AT

<sup>e</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra.
ODOR. ubi supra.

<sup>f</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra.

<sup>g</sup> DI-

<sup>h</sup> CURT. l. v.

(P) Authors vary a little as to the money which Alexander seized at Susa. Arrian says it was fifty thousand talents (41), with him

(41) Arrian. l. iii. c. 16.

He reduces
the Uxian

AT last he thought of prosecuting the war ; and so moving from Susa he passed the Pasitigris, and entered the country of the Uxians. Those who inhabited the plain country submitted without giving him any trouble ; but the mountaineers were foolish enough to send a deputation, to inform him they expected a sum of money by way of tribute for passing through their country, pretending, that the Persian monarchs

Curtius agrees (42). Diodorus Siculus says there were forty thousand talents in bullion, and nine thousand coined ; so that he comes within a thousand talents of the sum (43). Plutarch tells us there were but forty thousand talents ; yet his account rises higher than any other historian's, which seems not to have been well observed ; for these forty thousand talents, he says, were in coined gold, and distinguishes it from the rest of the treasure, of which he does not give us the particulars ; only he says, there was purple to the value of five thousand talents, which was fresh and lively, though it had been laid up a hundred and ninety years. He says too, on the authority of Dion, that vessels filled with water from the Nile and the Danube, were set in this treasury, as monuments of the mighty extent of the Persian empire (44). Justin says expressly there were but forty thousand talents ; which agrees well enough with Diodorus, whose steps he is observed to follow ; yet this author hath a very curious passage, which, for the sake of brevity probably, Justin omitted (45). Alexander, as he informs us, coming in person to take an account of these treasures, sat down on the royal throne, which, it seems, was so high, that his feet did not come near the foot-stool. One of his pages observing this, took up Darius's table, and placed it upon the foot-stool, for which Alexander, who now sat at ease, commended him ; but one of the eunuchs of the old court, fixing his eyes on the table, fell a weeping. Tell me friend, said, Alexander, what it is you see here that moves you to grieve so much ? O king, answered the eunuch, I was once Darius's servant, as I am now thine. As I loved and honoured my master while I served him ; so I cannot even now behold, without extreme disquiet, that table at which he sat, placed under thy feet. Alexander, moved at the blunt honesty of the man, commended him, and ordered it to be taken away. But Philotas interposed ; As this table, Sir, said he, was not placed here by your command, there is nothing of insolence in the use you have put it to. To me it appears to be a thing ordained by providence, to shew the mutability of empire. The king then ordered it to remain where it was (46). This Philotas was the son of Parmenio ; and we shall hear quickly of his being tortured and put to death, on a suspicion that he bore no good will to the glory of his master.

(42) Curt. l. v. c. 2.
Plut. in vit. Alex.
dor. Sicul. ubi supra.

(43) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii.
(45) Justin. l. xi. c. 15.

(44)
(46) Dio-

had always paid it them. Alexander answered coldly, That they would do well to come to the passage to receive it<sup>i</sup>. As soon as they were gone, he dispatched Craterus to seize the tops of the mountains, while he, in the mean time, with a body of horse and light-armed troops, entered the country by night, through private and troublesome roads; so that he was in the midst of the Uxian villages before the inhabitants knew any thing of the matter. These he plundered and burnt, and continuing his march seized the pass, whither numbers of people were crowded, in hopes of receiving the money. They pretended at first to make some defence; but before they could form themselves into any order, Craterus with his soldiers appeared over their heads, and began to push them in clusters over the precipices. They then fell into confusion, and fled into holes and caverns; however, Sisygambis interposing and sending to intreat Alexander to pardon them, he readily acquiesced on the following terms, viz. that they provided for the army a hundred horses of war, five hundred baggage horses, and thirty thousand head of cattle<sup>k</sup>.

As we have mentioned the mother of Darius, we will Alexander take this opportunity of speaking of Alexander's conduct towards her, and of her behaviour towards him. From the time she was taken at the battle of Iffus, Alexander afforded her not only the title, but the obedience due to a mother, left the children of Darius under her care, and omitted nothing which might contribute to lessen, or even to obliterate, her misfortunes. In the late engagement it is said, that when the Persian horse broke into Alexander's camp, they came to the tent where she was, and would have persuaded her to make her escape; but she constantly refused, saying, That she would not quit Alexander with his fortune<sup>l</sup>. The king, when he purposed to pursue the war, left her at Susa, having assigned her and her grand-children a tutor, that he might have the pleasure of conversing with them without an interpreter; and hence it was that she sent to intreat him to pity and spare the Uxians, who, through rashness and folly, had incurred his displeasure. And we have seen what deference Alexander paid to her mediation<sup>m</sup> ( Q ).

AFTER

<sup>i</sup> ARRIAN I. iii. c. 17.

DIOBOR. ubi supra.

<sup>k</sup> AR.

RIAN. ubi supra.

<sup>l</sup> DIOBOR. ubi supra:<sup>m</sup> ARRIAN.

ubi supra.

( Q ) There is nothing in the life of Alexander which hath afforded the rhetoricians, who have made their actions his theme, so happy

He forces a passage to Persepolis, and destroys it.

AFTER chastising the Uxians, Alexander ordered Parmenio to march with the Thessalian horse, the royal brigade, the mercenary foot, with the carriages and baggage, through the ordinary open road against the enemy. In the mean time, he with the Macedonian foot, and the light-armed troops, and a body of horse and archers, marched over the mountains to happy an opportunity of exerting their genii, as his tenderness to the family of Darius. Plutarch and Curtius are particularly fond of these passages, and have taken all possible care to set them out to the best advantage. The last mentioned author hath inserted in his work a very extraordinary relation of an interview between Alexander and Sisygambis at Susa. We were afraid of swelling the text too much, otherwise it had been inserted there; yet considering the manner in which it is told, perhaps it will appear with greater propriety in a note, by way of appendix. Alexander having received from Macedon several pieces of purple and other rich vestures, he ordered them to be sent to Sisygambis, together with the persons who had wrought them, with a compliment, as he intended it, that if the fabricature of these garments pleased her, she might let her grand-children be taught how to make them for their diversion; but working in wool being then held in Persia a very mean and dishonourable thing, Sisygambis shed tears when she heard the message. The person who carried it returned therefore in haste to Alexander, and acquainted him, that Sisygambis was much displeased; whereupon the king went instantly unto her apartment, in order to console her, and to remove any misconception she might have put on his message. “ Dear mother, said he, the robe, in which you see me “ arrayed, was not only presented me by my sisters, but is also the “ work of their hands; be convinced, madam, from thence, that “ I meant not to offend you, but as I was led into an error through “ the custom of my country, impute what is amiss to my ignorance, “ and not to any fault in my will. Hitherto I have made it my “ study never to transgress any of your customs. As soon as I was “ informed, that it was held disrespectful in Persia for a son to sit “ before his mother, till licensed so to do by her, I made it a rule “ with me never to sit before you, till I received your commands.

“ As often as you have offered to prostrate yourself before me,
“ I have taken care to prevent it; and as the last and highest token
“ of my esteem, have always stiled you mother, a title, strictly “ speaking, belonging only to Olympias (47) ”. Curtius concludes his chapter here without telling us more than that Sisygambis was satisfied. In all probability, she could not but be well pleased at an explanation which took from her all apprehensions of Alexander’s prejudice towards her family; but that this is the very speech which Alexander made to her, will perhaps not easily be credited on account of its rhetorical quaintness.

(46) Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra.

(47) Curt. lib. v. c. 9.

the Persian streights. These he found effectually fortified with a strong wall, flanked with towers, and Ariobarzanes, with an army of forty thousand foot and seven thousand horse, posted behind to dispute his passage. The king trusting to his usual fortune, immediately stormed the wall; but after a long and bloody conflict, in which he lost abundance of men, he was forced to sound a retreat, having been able to effect nothing<sup>a</sup>. He then began to inquire for some other way, and having met with a man who had been formerly a prisoner, his father a Lycian, his mother a Persian, so that he spoke both tongues; this man told him, that having long kept sheep on these mountains, he could lead him to another pass, but that in truth it was difficult enough too. Alexander thereupon left Craterus in his camp, with orders, that as soon as he perceived that himself had passed the other streights, and was about to attack the Persian camp, he should scale the wall<sup>b</sup>. Then following his Lycian guide, he marched that night an hundred furlongs, and by an intricate road arrived at last at the streights; and though he met with a river in his way, yet he passed it, and advanced so speedily, that by day-break he surprized the first guards, whom he cut all to pieces, as he did most of those in the second post, whereby Ariobarzanes received no intelligence of his passage, till Alexander attacked him in his camp. Craterus, as soon as he heard the trumpet sound, attacked the wall; this so distracted the Persians, that they would have fled, but it was impossible. Ptolemy seized the wall with three thousand foot. Alexander charged them before, Craterus behind, when they fled to the wall, Ptolemy drove them back. Thus distressed, they knew not what to do, and the far greater part of them were put to the sword. Ariobarzanes himself with a few horse escaped into the mountains. Alexander then returning in haste to the river, strengthened the slight bridge he had thrown over it, and passed over all his army; then by long marches he sought to reach the capital of Persia; at Pasargadæ he seized the treasures of Cyrus, and appointed Phraortes governor of Persia. Diodorus and other historians tell us, that when he was near Persepolis, he met eight hundred Grecians, all of whom had their bodies grievously mangled, and that they with one voice cried out on the barbarous treatment they had met with from the Persians, among whom they were prisoners. In compassion to which miserable tale, the king generously relieved them, promised to send them safe back to Greece,

<sup>a</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 18.<sup>b</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. invit. Alex.

and vowed destruction against Persepolis ? Arrian and Plutarch have not a word of this tale ; without doubt they had heard it, and their not inserting it seems to carry in it a strong indication of its being fabulous. In all probability, it was calculated, like another story we shall mention presently, to excuse a fact that never can be excused. However it was, the king came at last to Persepolis, and meeting with no opposition, he made war on the royal palace, and under colour of revenging what Xerxes had done at Athens, most barbarously destroyed the most magnificent pile, this, or perhaps any other, part of the world could boast. Parmenio, the friend of Philip, a man always of moderate counsels, interposed in vain. In vain he represented to Alexander, that the destruction of this most noble palace would make him appear a barbarian to the Asiatics, and put them in doubt whether he intended to keep Asia, or only to plunder it ; that besides it was no revenge upon the Persians to raze what was no longer theirs, but his<sup>9</sup>. The king was positive, as indeed he generally was ; the city of Persepolis was given up to the plunder of the soldiers, and then the palace set on fire and destroyed. Diodorus tells us, that Alexander having assembled his troops, made them a long speech, wherein he set forth the reasons, such as they were, of his proceeding in this cruel manner ; he charged this city with having caused innumerable mischiefs to Greece, with implacable hatred towards her, and with growing rich by her spoils, and to avenge all those injuries, he gave it up to them, to do with it, the inhabitants, and their estates whatever they thought fit. Upon this the Macedonians rushed into the place, and put to the sword, without mercy, all they could lay hands on, plundering and tearing away all the wealth, jewels, rich furniture, and gorgeous vestments, with which the houses were full ; and though they every-where loaded themselves with silver, gold, and purple, their thirst of spoil did but so much the more increase, every one thinking himself had too little, and others had too much, so that quarrels ensuing, many had their hands cut off, as they endeavoured to snatch and tear away prizes, and others were killed. Women of all ages and conditions they seized for the sake of their cloaths and ornaments ; such as their beauty made desirable, they ravished, stripping all alike they sold them for slaves ; so that in the same proportion, whereby Persepolis excelled all other cities before the Macedonians approached it, she was by them depressed in misery and calamity below

<sup>p</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. CURT. lib. v. c. 5.
iii. c. 18.

<sup>9</sup> ARRIAN. lib.

the most wretched village on the earth<sup>r</sup>. In the palace, Alexander seized to his own use a hundred and twenty thousand talents, which he immediately ordered to be transported on mules and camels, for he had such an extreme aversion to the inhabitants of Persepolis, that is, even to the miserable remains of them, that he would leave nothing valuable with them, nor trust any thing near them. Many authors tell us, that the palace of Persepolis was not destroyed through any design but from an accident; that Alexander having made a great entertainment therein, whereat himself, his friends, and their mistresses were present, one Thais an Athenian courtesan, who lived with Ptolemy the son of Lagus, when they were well heated with wine, said, It would be a glorious thing to sacrifice to the honour of Greece this proud palace, the habitation of its implacable enemies; this being approved by the company, they cried out, Come on, bring us fire-brands; and the king, taking upon him to lead them, they with songs, pipes, and flutes, marched to execute this glorious proposal; Thais acting as lieutenant-general, and throwing the next fire-brand to the king<sup>f</sup>. The reflection of Diodorus on this story is very singular. It was, says he, very observable, and a thing deserving admiration, to see the sacrilege and impiety of Xerxes king of Persia, in his outrages committed in the citadel of Athens, so signally revenged so many years afterwards through the advice of a courtesan of the same city<sup>r</sup>. As there is not a word of Thais, or this drunken entertainment, in Arrian, there are just grounds to suspect that the whole story is a forgery, the intent of which is explained to us by this remark: The destruction of Persepolis had in it a barbarity unbecoming a Greek, and most unworthy of Alexander. To resolve therefore that destruction into a judgment from the deity, and to make the execution thereof the sudden effect of some irresistible inspiration, is certainly a good way of taking off the load from Alexander; but where then is it to be laid? Why, upon heaven! a practice no sober historian will ever countenance, or presume to favour a prince at the expence of providence.

DURING the time that Alexander continued at Persepolis, Alexander he received advice, that Darius remained still at Ecbatana in Media. He determined to march after him, which he did folloꝝ Darius. in a most precipitate manner, for in twelve days he reached Media, moving near forty miles a day; in three days more

<sup>r</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvii. <sup>f</sup> PLUT. in vita Alex. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. CURT. lib. v. <sup>r</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra.

he reached Ecbatana, where he was thoroughly informed of Darius's condition, that he had not with him above three thousand horse and six thousand foot, and that with these he had retired five days before, with an intent to pass into the remotest provinces of his empire. This put some stop to his rapid progress, and, perceiving that there was no necessity for thus hurrying himself and his soldiers, he began to give such orders as were necessary in the present situation of his affairs<sup>u</sup>. The Thessalian horse, who had deserved so well of him in all his battles, he dismissed according to his agreement, gave them their whole pay, and ordered two thousand talents over and above to be distributed among them. He then declared, that he would force no man, but if any of them were willing to serve him longer for pay, he desired that they would enter their names in a book, which a great many of them did; the rest sold their horses, and prepared for their departure. The king named Epocillus to conduct them to the sea, and assigned him a body of horse as an escort; he likewise sent Menetes with them to take care of their embarkement, and that they were safely landed in Eubæa without any expence to themselves. Parmenio he directed to see all the several sums of money, which had been collected throughout Persia, delivered to his treasurer Harpalus at the castle of Ecbatana, to whom he assigned a guard of six thousand Macedonian foot, and a considerable corps of horse. This Harpalus was one of Alexander's principal favourites, and as he was a monarch remarkably steady in his affections, so this man had experienced his clemency as well as his kindness; for having, after the battle of Granicus, been appointed treasurer, he had by degrees got large sums into his hands, and being terrified by some artful people with stories of the king's rigid temper, he fled, and carried away great sums with him. Alexander, inquiring thoroughly into the matter, entertained a favourable opinion of the man, notwithstanding all this, and therefore sent to invite him back again, assuring him, that he would forget all that was past, which he not only performed, but restored him to his favour and former post. The reason of all this was, that Harpalus had been his friend and confident in his father's time, and at that time too, when to be well with Alexander was no way to be well with Philip; he had even been banished on his account, and durst not return to the court of Macedon, till Alexander had assumed the crown<sup>w</sup>. Hence the gratitude of this prince appears, who, in the midst of victories, and after conquering so many provinces, could remember and reward those who sided with him, when he was but the second person in the little kingdom of Macedon.

<sup>u</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 19. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vita Alex. CURT. lib. v.

ABOUT this time the king received advice from Greece, The affairs of Greece, and of the royal family of Macedon. that all troubles there were happily ended through the extraordinary care and conduct of Antipater, who had reduced the Lacedæmonians so low, that they were constrained to accept any terms of peace which he was pleased to afford them; and, on the other hand, Antipater, to do his master honour, would come to no agreement, but on condition that they sent deputies into Asia to beg pardon of Alexander, and to implore his favour<sup>x</sup>. These services gave him a great interest in the heart of his prince, who as yet had not learned to distrust his servants, or to conceive jealousies of those, who, by their important services, had shewn the extensiveness of their capacities. He sent therefore instructions to that minister to keep always a guard about his person, made him such remittances as were sufficient to pay his army regularly, and to support the expence necessary for preserving the tranquillity of Greece; he likewise sent immense sums to his mother and relations, as also most magnificent presents to his old friends and acquaintance. This bountiful temper of his Olympias looked on as extravagance, and on this topic she wrote him long and frequent letters, telling him, that though it was fit he should give, and give like a king, yet that some bounds should be set even to royal munificence. That his rewards did not render men grateful, but rather made them independent: That his favourites were so rich, they were continually studying how to engage new dependants, so that while they were obliging all men to their service, he was like to have few servants left<sup>y</sup>. The king read these letters, and, knowing the temper of his mother, laid them by carefully, without ever speaking of their contents; only one day it happened, that he opened an epistle from Olympias, when Hephestion sat behind him. Alexander perceived that he read over his shoulder, yet he forbade him not; but when himself had read the letter out, he took his signet off his finger, and clapped it on his favourite's mouth. But the great ground of expostulation between Olympias and her son was the king's steady refusal to permit her to have any hand in the regency. But he knew her too well, and was afraid to suffer a woman of her intriguing spirit to intermeddle with the government. On the other hand, Antipater wrote often in the same stile, lamenting his condition, as being continually exposed to the artifices and malice of Olympias. When Alexander one day had read a very prolix letter of this nature, and which was written with more than ordinary spirit, he could not help saying; I wonder Antipater does not know, that one tear of a mother can blot out a thousand of these letters<sup>2</sup>. Thus in the midst of all the favours of fortune, while he was seizing crowns in Asia, and had them sent after him from Europe, Alexander found his head little the easier, and himself as uneasy in his private family, as any man within the bounds of the numberless provinces he had subdued. It may be, these cares contributed to make him more ready to enter on new expeditions, in hopes of burying private disquiet in public disorder, and make the loud tumult of war drown those smaller and harsher noises which forbade him rest.

<sup>w</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. PLUT. in vita Alex. & in vita Demosth.

<sup>x</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. <sup>y</sup> PLUT. in vita Alex.

The death
of Darius.

ON new informations, as to the posture of Darius's affairs, the king with a body of horse and light-armed troops set out once more on the pursuit, marching as far as Rhages, a city one day's journey from the Caspian streights; there he understood that Darius had passed those streights some time before, which information leaving him again without hopes, he halted for five days. Oxidates, a Persian whom Darius had left prisoner at Susa, was appointed governor of Media, as the king departed on his Parthian expedition. The Caspian streights he passed immediately without opposition, and then gave directions for collecting provisions sufficient to serve his army on a long march through a wasted country. But before his officers could accomplish his commands, Bagistanes the Babylonian, and Antibelus the son of Mazeus came from Darius to acquaint him, that Bessus governor of Bactria, Barzaentes, president of Arachosia, and Nubarzanes a general of horse, had conspired against and made that prince prisoner<sup>3</sup>. Alexander, as soon as he heard this, marched with his horse and a few chosen foot without intermission, except a few hours at noon, so that the next morning he entered the camp, from whence these noblemen came; there he was farther assured, that Darius was bound in his chariot, that Bessus had assumed the imperial title, and that all the army had submitted to him, except Artabazus, and his sons, and the Greek mercenaries, who, not being able to hinder what had past, left the great road and retired into the mountains. He also received advice, that those who had the king in custody had determined, if Alexander continued his pursuit, to deliver him up, and consult their own safety; but if he left it off, they would raise as great an army as they could, and share the empire among them. That Bessus was declared general of the army at present, as well because of the great necessity there was for him about Darius's person, as because he was taken prisoner in his province. Alexander hearing this resolved to continue his march with all possible speed; and though his men as well as their horses were harassed with incessant labour, he nevertheless proceeded, and travelling hard all that night and till noon the next day, arrived at a certain village, where they who led Darius about had pitched their tents the day before; and being there farther assured, that they designed to march by night, he inquired of the inhabitants, if they knew any higher road than that by which they fled, that he might the sooner overtake them? they told him they did; but that it led through a country desert, and destitute of water. He notwithstanding ordered them to be his guides, and when he understood that the foot could not possibly keep pace with the horse in so hasty a march, he commanded about five hundred horse-men to alight, and the captains of foot, and others of their best men, such as were heavy armed, to mount their horses. He also ordered Nicanor captain of the targeteers, and Attalus commander of the Agrians, to march with those who were light-armed along the great road, which Bessus and his companions had taken. The rest of the foot were left to follow in order. He set forwards at the close of the evening, and proceeded with the utmost vigour; and having marched four hundred furlongs that night, early the next morning came up with the Barbarians, who were flying all in disorder and unarmed. A few of them drew up in ranks, as if they had designed to defend themselves; but the greatest part at the first sight of Alexander turned their backs without striking one blow; and when a few of those who betook themselves to their arms were cut off and fled, Bessus and his companions still carried Darius about in a chariot; but perceiving Alexander at hand, Satibarzanes and Barzaentes, after having given him several grievous wounds, there left him, and with a party of six hundred horse halted away; soon after which Darius, before Alexander had yet seen him, died of his wounds <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>3</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 21. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

<sup>b</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra.

This is the account of Arrian. But Plutarch relates it somewhat differently; he informs us, that the king had not with him above threescore horse when he came up with the Barbarians; that they trampled over heaps of rich booty, and even large quantities of silver and gold, without offering to alight, that they might if possible come up with the foremost of the party who were about the chariot of Darius; which at last they did, one Polystratus being the first that perceived him; he making up to the chariot, saw the unfortunate king stretched at his full length, mortally wounded and gasping for breath. However, he earnestly desired some drink. The Macedonian presenting him with a cup of water, Darius tasted a little of it, and then said, That to receive such a benefit, and not have it in his power to make any return, was the last and severest stroke of his ill fortune; however, continued he, Alexander, whose kindness to my mother, wife, and children may God recompense, will doubtless gratify thee for thy humanity towards me: When therefore thou shalt give him an account of this event, tell him that I gave him my right hand in testimony of my sense of his kindness: Saying this he gave his hand to Polystratus, and breathed his last. Alexander when he saw the dead body, covered it with his own cloak, and ordered it to be sent to Sisygambis, that it might be interred in the royal sepulchre of the Persian kings.

Hyrkania reduced by Alexander.

As soon as Alexander had collected his forces together, and had settled the government of Parthia, he entered Hyrkania, and having, according to his wonted custom, committed the gross of his army with the baggage and carriages to the care of Craterus, he at the head of a choice corps of horse and foot passed through certain craggy roads, while the army took an open and easy passage, and before their arrival struck all the province with such terror, that all the principal places were put into his hands. Nabarzanes, who was one of the conspirators against Darius, surrendered himself here, so did Phradaphernes, governor of Hyrkania and Parthia. Artabazus and his sons arrived shortly after, and were all graciously received; Alexander testifying a high respect for them on account of their fidelity to Darius. Then the Greek mercenaries, who had fled into the mountains, sent deputies to desire that he would pardon what was past, and admit them to his service; but the king would not hear of any treaty, because, as he said, they were infamous persons, who had taken up arms against their country,

• PLUT. in vit. Alex.

†

try, and had obstinately persisted in their rebellion ; yet, in consideration of their behaviour towards their late master, he consented to receive them as prisoners at discretion ; to which terms they at last submitted, beseeching the king to send somebody to conduct them to his camp. The king thereupon sent Andronicus and Artabazus for that purpose, and on their arrival treated them with great lenity, receiving them not long after into his service <sup>d</sup>.

THAT burning desire which Alexander had to become The Mardi the lord and master of every nation, of whom he had the reduced. least intelligence, induced him to enter the country of the Mardi, merely because its rocks and barrenness had hindered any body hitherto from making a conquest of it, or even from attempting it ; however, he succeeded very happily by dint of a stratagem ; for giving the necessary directions for the march of his forces, he suddenly turned back with a body of light-armed troops and chosen horse, with which he acted so vigorously, that the Mardi, astonished at an expedition they so little expected, fled to inaccessible rocks and caverns, a few only pretending to take up arms, and they to very little purpose ; for where-ever they appeared in the plains, the king drove them with his horse ; and when-ever he discerned them encamped on the tops of mountains, he ordered all the passages to them to be so well guarded, that the Barbarians, finding it impossible to subsist, were constrained to surrender. While he was thus employed, it happened, that a party of the Mardi seized and carried off his favourite horse Bucephalus. No accident could possibly have disturbed the king more than this, for he had an extravagant love for this creature, on account of its singular properties and the long service it had done him. He therefore began to hew down all the trees in the neighbourhood of his camp, and to burn whatever huts and houses could be found, causing proclamation to be made in the language of the country, whereby he signified, that if his horse was not restored without injury, he would burn and destroy all things that were capable of feeling the effects of his indignation ; which so terrified the Mardi, that they sent back Bucephalus immediately, accompanied with a deputation laden with presents, and vested with full authority to submit the whole nation to the king's pleasure <sup>e</sup>. Alexander then appointed Autophradates, president of the Tapuri, to be governor also of this country, and, well satisfied with this conquest, returned to the main body of his army, where many things required his care, and where the soldiers impatiently expected his return, in hopes of having some bounds set to their labours, and the end of the war talked of at least with some degree of certainty <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 23. <sup>e</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvii. PLUT. in vit. Alex. CURT. lib. vi. c. 5.

Satibarzanes submits, but afterwards revolts, and is defeated.

Alexander at his arrival found not only the Grecian mercenaries brought safe to his camp by Andronicus, but also four Lacedæmonian ambassadors, with Diopithes the Athenian ambassador, and many others, cloathed with the like character, who, till he was made a prisoner, had attended on Darius; the Lacedæmonians and Athenians he ordered to be kept in safe custody; as for the ministers of such states as had been subject to the Persians, these he dismissed, for he thought it but just that while any state owned a dependence to another, it should send ministers to recognize that dependence, and to receive instructions from the sovereign. As to the Greek mercenaries, he distinguished them thus; such as had been in the service of the Persian before the Greeks entered into the general alliance for carrying on the war, he set at liberty, and left them free to act as they thought fit; but for such as had entered into the Persian service afterwards, and had knowingly and avowedly fought against their country, these he ordered to be enlisted and enrolled among his own troops, allowing them, however, the same pay which they had heretofore received from Darius, appointing at the same time Andronicus, who had negotiated their surrender, to be commander in chief of that body which he had taken into his pay <sup>g</sup>. After this he marched to Zeudracarta, the capital of Hyrcania, where for fifteen days he celebrated solemn games, and sacrificed with great magnificence to the gods of Greece; afterwards he entered Aria, and coming to the chief city thereof, Satibarzanes, the governor thereof, came and submitted to him; upon which Alexander continued him in his government, and assigned him a guard of Macedonian archers on horseback commanded by Anaxippus. Here he received advice, that the traitor Bessus had caused himself to be proclaimed king of Asia by the name of Artaxerxes; this exceedingly provoked the king, who instantly prepared to march after him into Bactria, in order to call him to a severe account, for his former treachery and for this new act of insolence. He was scarce, however, out of the province of Aria before advice came to him, that Satibarzanes, immediately on his departure, had massacred Anaxippus and all the Mace-

<sup>f</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 24.

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid. CURT. lib.

donians, and having assembled a great body of forces in the neighbourhood of the chief city, which was called Aritoana, was about to declare either for himself or for Bessus, according as he should be encouraged by the success of his enterprise; but Alexander was not a prince of a temper capable of allowing time for the ripening of such designs; for, as soon as he was told this, he marched instantly with a body of horse and light-armed troops, and, travelling seventy miles in two days, arrived in the neighbourhood of Aritoana before Satibarzanes had the least intelligence of his march. Then it was this Persian discovered how unfit he himself was for the management of such an undertaking; for though he had with him a very considerable body of forces, yet, instead of attacking Alexander and his troops, fatigued with such an excessive march, or of intrenching himself in order to defend the army under his command, he instantly quitted the field with a body of horse, and fled with all the expedition he was able to Bessus, who willingly received him <sup>h</sup>. Curtius tells us, that thirteen thousand Arians retiring to a high rock, which was absolutely inaccessible, refused to treat with Alexander, in hopes that, seeing it impossible to come at them, he would, when he quitted the country, leave them as he found them. The king, however, took quite a contrary course; for, while he with his horse pursued Satibarzanes, Craterus with the foot surrounded the bottom of the rock, and held the Arians in a manner prisoners till Alexander's return. As soon as the king came into the camp, he ordered wood of all sorts to be cut, and having laid a foundation of large billets, reared up a vast pile, till it was even with the rock; the same thing being done on the opposite side, and at each corner, according as the wind served, they set these piles on fire, and the flames being driven violently upon the rock, the people were compelled to throw themselves from thence, some half burnt, others naked; some few who cried out for mercy were saved. Throughout the whole province, Alexander made it his business to search out the chiefs and the accomplices in the rebellion, all of whom he either put to death, or sold for slaves; then he appointed Arfames the son of Artabanus governor of Aria, thence marched with his army against the Zarangæ, who, under the command of Barzaentes, one of those who had conspired against Darius, were up in arms, and threatened to make an obstinate defence ; but their hearts failed them when Alexander drew near, insomuch that numbers daily falling off, Barzaentes, being afraid they would purchase their own safety at the expence of his, privately withdrew from his camp, and crossing the river Indus, sought shelter among the nations beyond it ; but they, either dreading the power of Alexander, or detesting the treachery of this Persian towards his former master, seized and delivered him up ; whereupon Alexander immediately ordered him to be put to death, as well for the sake of his own safety, as that he might seem to revenge that perfidy which had been used towards his unfortunate predecessor<sup>1</sup>. But it is now time to quit for a short space the story of foreign wars, in order to turn our eyes on the dissensions, factions, and conspiracies, which began to deform that victorious army, wherewith in so short a time the greater part of Asia had been over-run.

<sup>h</sup> ARRIAN lib iii c. 25. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

Dissensions in the Ma-      THE first and indeed the grand source of those troubles
cedonian      which embittered Alexander's victories was, the immense army, their      treasure acquired by them, and the beneficent temper of causes and      Alexander himself. For, while with a lavish hand he be-effects.      stowed all things on all who were near him, many made a wrong use of his bounty, and foolishly indulged those vices by the practice of which the former possessors of that wealth, which was now theirs, had lost it. Among other instances of Alexander's favourites, Plutarch informs us, that Agnon
the Teian wore silver nails in his shoes ; that Leonatus employed several camels in transporting powder from Egypt, which he used when he wrestled. Hephestion wore very rich garments, and affected in every thing the Persian manner of living ; but above all Philotas is said to have been nice in his dress, his table, his equipage, and most munificent to his friends ; one of whom asking him to lend him a sum of money, he instantly ordered it to be given him by his steward ;
but the steward affirming there was no money in his coffers, Philotas replied warmly, Have you not then plate and cloaths of mine, turn them into money rather than let my friend want<sup>k</sup>. Alexander himself began to be very sensible of the mischiefs that would be produced by the introduction of luxury among his people ; he therefore sought to extinguish it by discouraging the most eminent of his courtiers, whom he saw giving into this way of living ; he told them, that he was surprized that they, who had experienced that solid satis-

<sup>1</sup> CURT. lib. vi. c. 25.    ARRIAN. ubi supra.
Alex. & in Orat. de Fortuna Alex

<sup>k</sup> PLUT. in vit.

faction which results from an industrious and laborious course of life, should sink into that supineness and indolence which had destroyed the Persians, and which without question would enervate and enfeeble themselves; he told them, that to possess wealth and use it was great and noble; but to make it the instrument of riot and luxury was base and effeminate; he expostulated with them on the impropriety of such a conduct in men who were still soldiers; he asked them, how it could be expected that a man should keep his arms bright, and exercise them with activity, who would not so much as employ his own hands in doing things necessary about his own body, but would rather call in the aid of a servant, as if by gaining riches he had lost the use of his limbs. By his own behaviour also, he to the utmost discouraged this sort of lazy and inactive pride; for when at any time he relaxed a little from the toils of war, he diverted himself with hunting, in which he could endure not only all the rigour of the season, but would also fast sometimes throughout the whole day. Once when he was engaged in this exercise, a lion of a prodigious size attacked him: the king defended himself with great courage, and at last, though with much ado, he slew the beast, upon which the Lacedæmonian embassador made him a well-turned compliment: You have, Sir, said he, vindicated your title to royalty, even against the lion. Craterus was so much pleased with this adventure, that he caused the whole of it to be expressed in figures of brass by the hands of Lysippus and Leochares, which noble piece he dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Yet neither Alexander's discourses nor his actions prevailed; the manners of his courtiers proceeded from bad to worse, in spite of all he could say or do to prevent it; and at last they proceeded so far, as to censure his conduct, and to express themselves with some bitterness on the subject of his long continuance of the war, and his leading them constantly from one labour to another. All this at first drew no harsher language from Alexander than this: That to do well and to be ill spoken of, was becoming the royal dignity. But by degrees, as things went farther, he was obliged to alter his behaviour: For when the whole army was split into factions, and the soldiers were ever only inveighing against his administration, Alexander was under a necessity of reproving them, talking to them severely, and of taking other methods to oblige them to keep their speech within the bounds of decency, and their actions within the limits of their duty<sup>1</sup>. Curtius tells us, that to eradicate this spirit of mutiny,

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in loc. citat.

mutiny, and to restore the antient Macedonian discipline, he was forced to cause fire to be set to the spoils collected by the soldiers, and reduce them all to ashes<sup>m</sup>, which, however, is very incredible ; and therefore we prefer Plutarch's account of this matter. He says, that when he led his army out of Hyrkania, he perceived in them an unwillingness to follow him, that is, he first perceived in them that sullen disrespectful humour which generally precedes mutiny. Upon this occasion he had not recourse either to harsh words or severe usage ; but having summoned the soldiers to an assembly ; he in a long and eloquent harangue gave them to understand. “ That hitherto the Barbarians had seen “ them no otherwise than as it were in a dream ; and if they “ should think of returning when they had only alarmed A- “ sia, and not conquered it, those Barbarians would set up“ on them and destroy them like so many women. Howe“ ver, he would detain none of them against their will, but “ give such as desired it free liberty to return ; but withal “ protested against those who should be so mean-spirited, as “ to desert him and his friends, and those who were willing “ to fight under him still in an enterprize so great and glori“ ous, as it would be to make the Macedonians lords of the “ habitable world”. What the result of this exhortation was, the same author informs us from a letter written by Alexander to Antipater, wherein it is thus expressed : “ That “ when he had spoken to them after this manner, they una“ nimously cried out, they were ready to go with him whi“ thersoever he should be pleased to lead them<sup>n</sup>”. From this time forward, however, Alexander began to alter his conduct, and, by giving himself a little into the customs of the orientals, endeavoured to secure that obedience from his new subjects, which he found it so difficult to preserve among his old ones ; he likewise endeavoured to blend the customs of the Asiatics and the Greeks by various methods. The form of his civil government resembled that of the antient Persian kings : In military affairs, however, he preserved the Macedonian discipline ; but then he made choice of thirty thousand boys out of the provinces, whom he caused to be instructed in the Greek tongue, and directed to be brought up in such a manner, as that from time to time he might with them fill up the phalanx. The Macedonians saw with great concern these extraordinary measures, which suited very indifferently with their gross understandings ; for they thought after all this fighting to be absolute lords of Asia, and to possess

CURT. lib. vi. c. 6.

<sup>n</sup> PLUT. in vit. Alex.

possess not only the riches of its inhabitants, but to rule over the inhabitants themselves. Whereas they saw plainly, that Alexander meant no such thing ; but that, on the contrary, he conferred governments, offices at court, and all other marks both of confidence and favour indiscriminately on Persians and Greeks. Plutarch has taken great pains to inculcate a notion of Alexander's doing this from a principle of exalted virtue, and from an earnest desire of uniting, as it were in marriage, the people of the two great continents, Europe and Asia. Of this he speaks every-where in raptures, as of the most sublime and glorious kind of philosophy, invented and practised by Aristotle's royal pupil, that he might spread peace, plenty, and politeness over the face of the whole earth ; with this single proviso, however, that the earth own no master but him. But it may be, that Plutarch thought more of this matter than Alexander, since, without having recourse to any such sublime principles, we can account for his conduct in as satisfactory a manner. Wealth and pleasure were the ends for which the gross of his army had undergone such excessive fatigues ; and now when those were in their power, they did not greatly care to fight any longer. Dominion and fame were what Alexander had in view, and finding that these could scarce be secured by an army already full of dissension, he began to turn his eyes on those whom he had subdued, and to expect from them as much as had been performed hitherto by his Macedonians, as if all men were capable of all things under his auspice<sup>o</sup>.

WITH all these mighty designs in his head, a conspiracy was formed in his camp in order to take him off, before any of them could be carried into execution ; this conspiracy, like most others, was by those who were concerned in it, involved in such obscurity, that few were able to know what to make of it even at the time it broke out ; and authors have related its circumstances so variously, that it is very difficult to give a tolerable and consistent account of it from the lights they afford us. Our old guide Arrian was as much in the dark as the rest, and as we shall see hereafter, met with different relations under the hand of the same author. In so perplexed a business, we shall draw out as clear and distinct a detail of facts as we can, and, having furnished the best materials in our powers, shall leave our readers to decide for themselves. One Dymnus a Macedonian, of no great rank in the army, having determined in his mind to kill Alexander,

<sup>o</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. CURT. lib. v. vi. JUSTIN. lib. xi. PLUT. in orat. de fortun. & virt. Alexand. communi-

communicated his design to one Nicomachus, a young man for whom he had a great love, earnestly inviting him to bear a part in the action; the lad, terrified at the very mention of it, revealed it to Cebalinus his brother, whom Plutarch calls Balinus; and he, eager to save his brother and himself, was resolved to make a discovery; but inasmuch as Dymnus had told Nicomachus, that those who were concerned in this plot would execute it in three days, Cebalinus went to court out of an apprehension, that if his brother was seen there, it might alarm the conspirators, and engage them to execute their purpose before proper measures could be taken to prevent it. When Cebalinus came to the royal quarters, the first person of distinction he met with was Philotas, to whom he disclosed this matter, and begged him to bring him to the king. This was easy for him to have done, because he was twice a-day admitted to the royal presence; however, he omitted it, though he had a very long conference with the king that very day. The next day Cebalinus solicited him again, when Philotas told him, that he had no opportunity of speaking of it to the king, but promised him that he would do it speedily; yet he omitted it throughout this day also; whereupon Cebalinus, growing impatient, and doubting with himself if this should come to the king's ear any other way, his own and his brother's life would be in danger, applied himself to one of the king's pages, and having intimated to him what the discovery was which he was desirous to make, received directions from him to hide himself in the armoury, together with a promise, that the king should be acquainted with it when he was in the bath; which was accordingly done. When Alexander had heard all the page knew, and was farther acquainted, that Cebalinus himself was in the armoury, he sent for him, and heard from his own mouth, not only all that Nicomachus's brother had told him, but also how Philotas had trifled with him, and had for two days together concealed this matter from his knowledge. The king, extremely offended, ordered Dymnus to be seized, and Philotas to be sent for to him. The former, as soon as he was apprehended, stabbed himself so desperately, that he died just as he was brought into the king's presence, or, as others say, was killed in his own tent by him who went to apprehend him, because he stood on his defence: However it was, he died without being examined, or making any confession, which gave the king great disquiet, who fancied, that if the man had been brought to him alive, he might one way or other have drawn from him the whole secret. As it was, he sent for Philotas, and taxed him with perfidy, for not informing him of Cebalinus's discovery: Philotas excused himself, by affirming that the story seemed to him altogether improbable, and that he was unwilling to fill his head with needless fears and suspicions; as he said this, he threw himself at the king's feet and embraced his knees; and it is said the king gave him his hand in token of forgiveness. Indeed it is very probable, that Alexander thought himself bound to pass by such a neglect, in a person who had served him faithfully, whose father had done such important services to his father and himself, and who had lost two brothers in fighting his quarrels<sup>9</sup>. At supper Philotas was invited, and the king talked to him as familiarly as he was wont to do; but it seems he retired early, and went to bed. When he was gone, some who were about the king, Curtius mentions expressly Craterus for one, began to infuse it into Alexander's head, that Dymnus could never be the prime author of so extraordinary an attempt, but must have been influenced thereto by persons of superior rank. That it looked very suspicious in Philotas never to disclose any thing of this matter, nor to take any measures for seizing the conspirators. That in things of less importance pity and tenderness might interfere; but that where the king's life lay at stake, and in him the fortune of Macedon, compassion was no virtue, but rather a kind of treason, it being the duty of every loyal subject to sacrifice all private considerations to the peace and safety of his prince. By such discourses they extorted, as it were, from the king an order to seize Philotas, and put him to the question. Which when they went to execute, they found him fast asleep; however, they awaked him, and put him in irons, at which he is said to have burst out into this exclamation; O! my prince, the malice of my enemies hath overcome thy inclination to mercy. When he was first put to the rack, he denied every thing; but at last, unable to bear the pain, he impeached many, and amongst the rest his father. In all likelihood, he said any thing that he thought would deliver him from his torments<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>P</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

Curtius gives us a fuller, and we should say a better account of this matter, if we could at all rely on the harangues inserted in his writings; but these have evidently so rhetorical a turn, that it is difficult to conceive how they should have proceeded from the mouths of persons so strongly agitated by their passions. It is, however, probable and consistent with the best historians, that Philotas was brought to an open trial according to the laws and customs of the Macedonians, wherein he was charged by the king with having a hand in Dymnus's conspiracy. Against this charge he made a long and laboured defence; he said, that his father and himself, with his brothers, Nicanor and Hector, who were now no more, had often hazarded their lives in the king's service, and had some share in the victories purchased by the valour of the Macedonians: That the conspiracy of Dymnus no ways reached him, his name having never been mentioned by any of the accomplices impeached by Nicomachus; he observed, that it was highly improbable, if he had any concern in the plot, that he should suffer Cebalinus to remain two days at court at full liberty to apply himself to others; he acknowledged his offence in not acquainting the king sooner with the discovery, and then addressing himself, as it were, to Alexander, whom he conceived to be within hearing, though he affected not to be present, he put him in mind that he had immediately implored his clemency, that he had given him his hand as a pledge of his pardon, and had invited him to his table; his own innocence and the king's assuring him of mercy had so quieted his mind, that, as he remarked, those who came to seize him had much ado to awake him; he therefore conjured the king not to abandon him to his enemies, nor to suffer them to triumph at once over an innocent man, and the word of a merciful prince. Alexander, however, pretended to leave all things to the assembly, and they, managed by the capital enemies of Philotas, adjudged him to the torture, and afterwards, upon the confession extorted from him by the pains he then endured, to death<sup>c</sup>, which he suffered, as Arrian informs us, by being struck through with darts by the soldiers<sup>c</sup>. Curtius says, that according to the manner of the Macedonians they stoned him<sup>u</sup>. Diodorus tells us, that he was punished as a traitor according to the custom of his country<sup>w</sup>. All agree that he was put to death, and that his execution was attended with many conjectures and suspicions, that he fell rather through the effects of private malice, than by the stroke of public justice.

Philotas first tortured, then put to death.

<sup>9</sup> CURT. lib. vi. Arrian. lib. iii. c. 25. ARRIAN: DIODOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

The certainty of this plot did.

Those who have sought to excuse Alexander from the imputations which the death of Philotas and its consequences

<sup>c</sup> Corn. lib. vi. c. 19—33.

<sup>c</sup> ubi supra.

<sup>u</sup> ubi supra.

<sup>w</sup> ubi supra.

drew upon him, have suggested in their accounts many things, which, if they were true, would certainly prove that Philotas was an indiscreet and ambitious man at least, if not a traitor. They alledge, that he affected a pomp in his manner of living, a splendor in his equipage, a nicety at his table, a complaisance for his friends, a large and swelling retinue, and in fine many other things inconsistent with the moderation which ought to be observed by a subject. They say, that many years before he had discovered a contempt of the king, and a very high idea of his father's merit and his own ; that after the battle of Iffus, growing passionately enamoured of one Antigona of Pydna, a very handsome woman, who, as a prisoner fell to his share ; he said to her in his cups, What was Philip, but Parmenio ? What is Alexander, but Philotas ? Which, being talked of by the woman, came at last to Craterus's ear, who introduced Antigona to Alexander, to whom she told this and many other things, and received a strict charge from the king to continue a spy on Philotas's words and actions. It is likewise alledged, that Parmenio himself was not a little displeased with his conduct, and would often give him this caution, My son appear less <sup>y</sup>. But these tales carry their refutations in themselves ; if Philotas's behaviour had been so generally offensive, he would not surely have held his command, and with it the confidence of the king, till this business of Dymnus. If Antigona could bring herself not only to impeach a man who loved her, but to remain with him in order to extract his secrets, she must have been of a disposition unworthy of belief. Besides, Craterus was the capital enemy of Philotas, and her being brought by him to the king renders the whole business very suspicious : If Parmenio's caution to his son reflects at all upon his conduct, it certainly justifies the father, and yet we shall see he escaped no better than his son. On the whole, Arrian tells us from Ptolemy, that Philotas was once tried and acquitted ; but that upon some new discoveries he was a second time impeached and convicted <sup>z</sup>. However it was, after putting him to death, the king thought it not fit to let Parmenio survive him long ; he therefore dispatched letters by Polydamas, one of his friends, to Cleander, Sitalces, and Menidas, who commanded under Parmenio in Mædia, with orders to take him off, which accordingly they did ; and, if we may believe Gartius, in a very extraordinary manner. He says that Polydamas, who undertook the management of this matter, was Parmenio's dearest and most intimate friend ; he carried with him not only a letter from the king to that general, but also another written in a hand like that of Philotas, and sealed with his seal. When he arrived in Media, and had communicated the king's orders to Cleander and his associates, they concerted all things together, and the next day presented Parmenio with his letters as he was walking in his park, where while he was commending the king, and looking on the letter which he supposed came from his son, Cleander stabbed him in the side, then in the throat, his companions afterwards shamefully mangling the dead body ; at last Cleander cut off the head and sent it to Alexander, the miserable remains being mournfully interred by the soldiers <sup>a</sup>.

* Plu. in Orat. de virtut. Alex.

<sup>y</sup> Id. in vit. Alex.

<sup>z</sup> Arrian. ubi supra.

Consequences of these proceedings.

THESE executions made way for more discoveries, or pretended discoveries. Amyntas the son Andromenes, Attalus, and Simmias, all brethren, were seized on account of their intimacy with Philotas, and because their fourth brother Polemon had fled to the enemy ; they were brought to an open trial, and Amyntas defended himself so well, that they were all acquitted ; after which Amyntas desired Alexander's leave to go and search for his brother, which was granted him, and he accordingly brought him back, which was thought a convincing proof that they were all innocent ; this is Arrian's account, Curtius carries the matter still farther ; he gives us the defence of Amyntas at large, and informs us, that while he was in the midst of it, Polemon was brought in prisoner by those who were sent in pursuit of him. When he came to speak, he told the assembly very frankly, that his intimacy with Philotas was the reason that he fled ; that he was so terrified with the thoughts of the tortures that unfortunate person had suffered, that he left the camp ; and that having lost his companions on the road, while he deliberated with himself whether he had best proceed or return back, he was taken. Demetrius, one of the king's guards, fell also into suspicion, and orders were dispatched into Macedonia, directing, that Alexander Lyncestes, who had been some years a prisoner, should be put to death ; his friendship with Antigonus had hitherto preserved his life, but now he was given up to slaughter <sup>b</sup>. These things disturbed the army very much, especially the Macedonians, who though they adored the royal virtues of Alexander, did not think themselves obliged to be in love with his vices ; they therefore did not content themselves with speaking very freely, but wrote home to their friends their thoughts of the present state of affairs, the king's suspicions of his friends, and his inclination to hunt out enemies at the very extremities of the world. Alexander, having intercepted these letters and taken the best informations he could, picked out these dissatisfied people, and having disposed them into one corps, gave it the title of the turbulent battalion c, and appointed Leonidas to command it ; hoping by this means to stop the contagion, and to prevent this spirit of disaffection from spreading through the whole army.

<sup>a</sup> CURT. lib. vi. ARRIAN. ubi supra.
ubi supra.

<sup>b</sup> ARRIAN. CURT.

As a further precaution against any future conspiracy, Alexander thought fit to appoint two generals of the auxiliary Having provided horse, being apprehensive, that if this authority was lodged against fu- in the hands of a single person, it might prompt him to dan- ture conspi- gerous undertakings, and at the same time furnish him with racies, he the means of carrying them into execution. Hephestion and pursues his Clytus were therefore appointed joint commanders of these former horse, nor can the king be justly blamed for this caution, if it designs. be supposed, that Alexander Lyncestes, and Philotas were justly punished d. To keep his forces in action, he suddenly marched into the country of the Euergetæ, i. e. benefactors. This is an instance of that strange way of writing, into which, out of fondness for their own language, the Greeks constantly ran ; it is impossible that this nation should have been really called by this name ; the truth is, that it is no more than a translation of a Persian name bestowed upon them by Cyrus, and it would have been well, if any of the Greek historians or geographers had preserved this Persian name. Arrian tells us, that they were before called Agriaspæ, and Diodorus calls them by two different names ; such differences are common in Greek writers, nor is it easy to discover which is the true or the best reading. These people were celebrated for their wisdom, beneficence, and politeness. When Cyrus the founder of the Persian empire marched this way against the Scythians, his army was grievously distressed for want of provisions, inasmuch, that they were compelled to eat each other ; from this deplorable state they were relieved by the kindness of this nation, who brought thirty thousand loads of provision of all sorts into the camp. Cyrus, in consideration of this extraordinary act of generosity, honoured them with some Persian appellation equivalent to the Greek term Euergetæ. Alexander found their successors full of the same kind and hospitable disposition ; he therefore treated them with great respect,

c Ἀτάκτον τάγμα.

d Arrian lib. iii. c. 27.

and staying among them some small time in order to celebrate a festival to Apollo, he at his departure added to their dominions some lands, which lay contiguous, and which for that reason they had requested of him *. Turning then to the east, he entered Arachosia, the inhabitants of which submitted without giving him any trouble; whereupon he appointed Memnon to be governor of these provinces, as Arrian assures us, though Diodorus affirms that he appointed Teridates. While he passed his winter in these parts, the king received advice, that the Arians, whom he had so lately subdued, were again up in arms, Satibarzanes being returned into that country with two thousand horse assigned him by Bessus. Alexander instantly dispatched Artabazus the Persian with Erigyus and Caranus, two of his commanders, with a considerable body of horse and foot; he likewise ordered Phrataphernes, to whom he had given the government of Parthia, to accompany them. These, with all convenient speed, marched back into Aria, where Satibarzanes met them with a well-appointed army; a general engagement ensued, wherein the Arians behaved very well, as long as their commander Satibarzanes lived; but he engaging Erigyus, the Macedonian struck him first into the throat, and then, drawing forth his spear, again through the mouth, so that he immediately expired, and with him the courage of his soldiers, who instantly began to fly, so that Alexander's commanders made an easy conquest of the rest of the country, and settled it effectually under his obedience † (R)

THE

* ARRIAN. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. CURT. lib. vii. c. 9. JUSTIN. lib. xii. c. 5. † ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 28. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. CURT. lib. vii. c. 17.

(R) There is nothing more warmly complained of by the critics, than the vast mistakes and insuperable difficulties, which occur in the descriptions of rivers, mountains, provinces, &c. in antient authors. Without question, these complaints are not altogether groundless, and yet, from a strict comparison of the antients with each other and with the relations of modern travellers, we are induced to believe, that there is not always sufficient authority for those vehement declamations, which some, in order to pass for great geographers, have made, not only against Curtius, but against Arrian and Diodorus, on account of their supposed errors in these matters. To touch on this subject, as often as we meet with these complaints in the commentaries of late writers on those who have lived ages before them, would lead us into a prolixity, alike troublesome to ourselves, and tedious to our readers; to say nothing on this

THE king, notwithstanding the inclemency of the season, advanced into the country of Paropamisus, so called from the Continues his marches in the most rigorous seasons, and through the most barren countries.

this head at all, might betray our own want of care, and leave them in great perplexity. We shall therefore once for all lay down the reason which have induced us to pay a greater regard than is usually done to the descriptions met with in antient authors, and the motives which have led us to pass this sentence on those who have treated the antients in another manner. Arrian, in his account of Alexander's march through Paropamisus, tells us, that it was performed with the utmost toil and difficulty, his soldiers passing through deep snows, and enduring all the extremities of want (48). Diodorus speaks more largely of these difficulties (49); but as we have inserted what he says in the text, there is no necessity of repeating it here. Curtius has followed Diodorus exactly (50): Strabo in his geography (51) agrees very well with what the rest say, and yet it has been surmised, that they are every one mistaken; and on account of this province lying between the thirty-fourth and thirty-seventh degrees of latitude, it has been asserted, that the cold could not be greater there than in Italy or Greece; yet Tavernier (52), and in general all the travellers that speak either of this province, or of places near it, agree, that in the winter it is excessive cold; that the snow renders it almost impassable, and that it is to this very time as barren of wood, as it is described to be by the before-mentioned authors. Perhaps it might be very possible to assign the natural causes of such severe winters in these parts, but there is no necessity of doing that; for if the matter of fact be, as the antients have described it, it fully justifies them, and us in following them. To say the truth, the moderns have been too assuming, and without proper grounds; it is but very lately that we knew either the true form or the exact situation of the Caspian sea, and yet the mistakes of the antients about it have been censured long ago, and with great quickness. The source of all this is too great a dependence on theoretic knowledge, and an absurd affectation of not believing what we cannot bring to square with our hypothetic notions. One would have thought, that an error of the antients might have taught us to have acted with greater caution and modesty in this way; we know, that the most learned men of all sects and ages were of opinion, that the torrid zone was absolutely uninhabitable, and very fair and plausible reasons they produced for their opinion; and yet experience has convinced us, that they were absolutely mistaken; and if they were, why may not we? In matters of fact, the evidence necessary to conviction is of a different nature than in matters of speculation; and therefore the mountain Paropamisus, which the soldiers of Alexander called Caucasus. We are told by Diodorus, that he found the country for the most part open and plain, without trees, covered with snow, having large open boroughs scattered here and there. The houses in which the inhabitants dwelt were covered with tiles ; the roof rising up like a spire, but open at the top, whereby they received light, and let out the smoke ; the walls of these houses were so well built, and the mortar made use of for them so excellently tempered, that they had in them no flaws or cracks, but were perfectly secured from the inclemencies of the air. In them therefore the people dwelt all the winter, having store of all sorts of provisions laid up, and having previously secured their vines and other fruit-trees, by covering them with matts, from the effects of the frost. In their marches through this melancholy plain, the Macedonians were exposed to vast inconveniences, the reflection of the light from the snow and ice grievously affecting their eyes, and the excessive cold seizing such as, through weariness, either walked slow or sat down : many of them perished. Alexander, however, pleasing himself with the thoughts of having reached Caucasus, in sixteen days marching cross Paropamisus, came at length to an opening leading into Media, which finding of a sufficient breadth, he directed a city to be built there, which he called Alexandria, as also several other towns about a days journey distant from thence ; and in these places he left seven thousand persons, part of them such as had hitherto followed his camp, and part of the mercenary soldiers, who, weary of continual fatigue, were content to dwell here. Having thus settled things in this province, sacrificed solemnly to the gods, and appointed Proexes the Persian president thereof, with a small body of troops under the command of Niloxenus to assist him, he resumed his former design of penetrating into Bactria <sup>s</sup> (S).

(48) Arrian. lib. iii.(49) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.(50) Curt. lib. vii. c. 3.(51) Strab. Geogr. lib. xiii. p. 723.(52) Voyag de Tavernier, Vol. I. Tit. Histoire de Candabar.

Bessus,

<sup>s</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 28, 29. DIODOR. ubi supra. CURT. lib. vii. c. 15.

it was, and will be everlastingly, wrong to exclude authentic relations, because they do not concur with our favourite theories.

(S) We have omitted in the text a very remarkable instance of the inequality of Alexander's temper, and of that savage cruelty which in spite of his many virtues still lurked in his breast. The reason of our omitting it was, because we find nothing of it in Arrian ; the reason of our inserting it here is, its having been approved

Bessus, who with the imperial ornaments had assumed the title of Artaxerxes, when he was assured that Alexander was marching

Alexander reduces Bactria and Sogdia, Bessus being taken.

Year of the Flood 2670. Before Christ, 329.

proved by the best compilers of history, though it is found in Curtius. It must be owned, that there is a chasm in Diodorus, wherein for ought we know this story might have been inserted. However it be, the reader ought to find it somewhere, and therefore we have made it the subject of a note. “ While the king expected Bessus to be brought to him, he came to a little town inhabited by the Branchidae. These were a family of Milesians, removed thither by Xerxes on account of their putting into his hands the sacred treasures reposed in the temple of Apollo Didymæus. They had not quite forsaken the customs of their antient country, but their language was a sort of medley, made up of their own, and that of the country they now inhabited. They expressed a great deal of joy at the king’s arrival, and readily surrendered both themselves and their town to him. Hereupon Alexander called together the Milesians that served in his army. Now we must observe, that the Milesians bore an old grudge to the Branchidae. The king therefore referred it to them, whether they would consider their extraction, or revenge their former injury; and as they varied in their opinions, he told them he would advise with himself what was best to be done in the matter. The next day, when the deputies from the Branchidae came to meet him, he commanded them to attend him, and being come to the town, he entered the gates thereof with part of his army, and ordered the phalanx to surround the place, and, upon the signal given, to pillage the receptacle of traitors, and put them all to the sword. These poor wretches, being in a defenceless condition, were every-where butchered, and neither conformity of language, the humble posture of suppliant, nor the most fervent intreaty could put a stop to their authorized cruelty. The very foundations of the walls were dug up, that there might not be the least footsteps left of the town. Their fury did not stop here, for they not only cut down the consecrated woods, but also grubbed up the very roots thereof, that there might be nothing left but a barren waste solitude. Now, had their cruelty been practised on the first transgressors, it might have been thought a just punishment of their crime; but here posterity is punished for the sins of its forefathers, without ever having so much as seen Miletum, far from being able to betray it to Xerxes (53)”. There is a passage in Strabo which seems to confirm what is here related by Curtius; he is describing Bactria, and from thence takes occasion to speak of Alexander’s exploits there and in Sogdia; and amongst other things relates this:

(53) Curt. lib. vii. c. 21.

marching towards him, immediately began to waste all the country between Paropamisus and the river Oxus, which river he passed with his forces, and then burnt all the vessels he had made use of for transporting them, retiring to Nautaca a city of Sogdia, fully persuaded that, by the precautions he had taken, Alexander would be compelled to give over his pursuit. This conduct of his, however, disheartened his troops, and gave the lye to all his pretensions; for he had affected to censure Darius's conduct, and had charged him with cowardice, in not defending the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, whereas he now quitted the banks of the most defensible river perhaps in the whole world. As to his hopes, though it cannot be said they were ill founded, yet they proved absolutely vain; for Alexander continuing his march, notwithstanding all the hardships his soldiers sustained, reduced all Bactria under his obedience, particularly the capital Bactra and the strong castle Aornus; in the latter he placed a garison under the command of Archelaus, but the government of the province he committed to Artabazus <sup>h</sup>. He continued his march then to the river Oxus, on the banks of which when he arrived, he found it three quarters

<sup>h</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 30.

“ Finding hereabouts the city of the Branchidæ, he demolished
 “ it. These people had followed Xerxes out of their own country, “ after having betrayed to him the treasures of Apollo Didymæus;
 “ but Alexander to express his abomination of their sacrilege and “ treason, razed their city (54).” In several other places this author assures us, that the Branchidæ did betray these treasures into the hands of Xerxes, and followed him into Asia. Yet Herodotus seems to give another account of this matter, for he ascribes the plundering of this temple, and reducing it to ashes, to Darius the father of Xerxes; and tells us farther, that all the Milesian prisoners were conducted to Susa, from whence Darius, without any other ill usage, sent them to inhabit the city of Ampe, seated near the mouth of the river Tigris (55). Perhaps the Branchidæ were at this time left behind, and, after the temple was repaired, and the oracle restored, betrayed the treasures to Xerxes on his return from the Grecian war, when he seized all the wealth laid up in temples, to indemnify him for the loss he sustained in that unsuccessful expedition. However, if Alexander really massacred the people, as well as demolished their town, Curtius had reason to reflect, as he does, on the proceeding, which was flagrantly cruel and unjust.

(54) Strab. Geogr. lib. xiv. p. 518.

(55) Herodot. lib. vi.

of a mile over, its depth more than proportionable to such a breadth, its bottom sandy, and its stream so rapid, as to render it almost unnavigable ; neither boat nor tree in its neighbourhood, so that the ablest commanders in the Macedonian army were of opinion, that they should be obliged to march back. The king, however, having first sent away under a proper escort all his infirm and worn-out soldiers, that they might be conducted safe to the sea-ports and from thence to Greece, devised a method of passing this river without either boat or bridge. He ordered the skins of which the Macedonians made their tents, to be made into a kind of bags, and to be stuffed with certain light and buoyant matter ; then they were rolled and strongly stitched to prevent the water from breaking in ; by the help of these he passed over his whole army in five days, and marched directly towards the camp of Bessus, where when he arrived, he found it abandoned ; but received at the same time letters from Spitamenes and Dataphernes, who were the chief commanders under Bessus, signifying, that if he would send a small party to receive him, they would put Bessus into his hands. Alexander thereupon dispatched Ptolemy the son of Lagus with three squadrons of the auxiliary horse, a party of archers, the battalion of foot which had been commanded by Philotas, and a considerable corps of light-armed troops to receive the prisoner ; and Ptolemy having in four days passed over as much ground as might have taken up ten, arrived within an ordinary days march of Spitamenes. There he received advice, that Spitamenes and Dataphernes were not thoroughly resolved whether they themselves should put Bessus into his hands ; whence he, rightly judging that they would be glad to have that done by force, which by fraud they were afraid to do, put himself at the head of his horse, and by a quick march surrounded the village in which Bessus had been left with a few soldiers. As soon as he had done this, Ptolemy ordered proclamation to be made, that the inhabitants of the place had nothing to fear, if they delivered up Bessus. This had the wished-for effect, the people resolved not to suffer for the sake of so wicked a person ; they therefore opened their gates, and Ptolemy entering seized Bessus<sup>1</sup>. Curtius has given quite another account of this matter ; and there are other accounts which differ from his ; but it seems to us impertinent to trouble the reader with any but this, because we are convinced that it is the true one <sup>k</sup>. Ptolemy the son of Lagus took him : From the memoirs of this Ptolemy we have the account before given : To what end therefore should we have recourse to other memoirs, the materials of which must have been collected at second hand ? When Ptolemy had him in his power, he sent advice thereof to the king, and desired to know after what manner he should be brought to him. Alexander returned for answer, that he should be brought chained and naked, and that in this condition he should be placed on the right hand side of the road, by which he was to march with his army. This being accordingly performed, Alexander, as he passed by him, ordered his chariot to stop, and with a loud voice asked him, What could induce you to seize upon Darius, your sovereign and friend, who had always deserved well at your hands ? and what, after you had seized and led him about prisoner, could tempt you to murder him in so base a manner ? To whom Bessus answered, That it was not his act, nor done by his advice alone ; but was performed by the joint consent of all who were present, from an opinion, that it would procure them the favour of Alexander. The king ordered him to be whipt ; directed the question he had asked to be proclaimed aloud throughout the army, and then commanded that Bessus should be conducted prisoner into Bactria <sup>l</sup>. A supply of horses being now arrived, the Macedonian cavalry were remounted, Alexander continued his march to Maracanda, the capital of Sogdia, from whence he advanced to the river Iaxartes, called by Arrian and the rest of the historians who have written his life, Tanais, but doubtless without any foundation ; for besides a very large tract of land on this side, and a much larger on the other, the whole breadth of the Caspian sea is between that part of the river Iaxartes, to which he came, and the fall of the Tanais into the Palus Mæotis. It is true, that Arrian distinguishes between this Tanais and that, which shews he had more skill in geography than the rest ; but we still want a proof, that the Iaxartes was ever called Tanais by any but Alexander's soldiers, who were fond of imposing false names to flatter their own vanity, and amuse the rest of mankind. On the side of this river, as some of his troops were foraging, they were surprized by the Barbarians, and a considerable number of Macedonian horse slain. After which exploit between twenty and thirty thousand of these rude people betook themselves to a high rock, the ascent of which was on all sides steep and rugged, in hopes that there they should be safe from Alexander's soldiers. But the king, as soon as he received advice of what had happened, marched thither with his horse and light-armed troops, and notwithstanding the danger and difficulty of the attack, led his troops in person to ascend the rock. The Barbarians, having so great an advantage from the situation of the place, and fighting also for their lives, repulsed the Macedonians more than once ; at last, however, notwithstanding the king himself was wounded in the leg, so as to have the smaller of his shin-bones broken, the Macedonians carried it, compelling numbers of those unhappy wretches to throw themselves over the rock, slaying without mercy those that fell into their hands, so that of the multitude retiring thither not above eight thousand escaped <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. 30.

<sup>k</sup> CURT. lib. vii. c. 22. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex.      <sup>l</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra.

WITHIN a few days after, the Abii, a famous Scythian Subdug people, sent ambassadors to Alexander to desire peace ; with certain re- them came ambassadors from the European Scythians ; to bels. these he gave fairwords, and sent some of his own people home with them, under colour of concluding the negotiations ; but in truth to bring him advice of the situation of the country, the nature of its inhabitants, their force, and after what manner they made war. The Scythians having some notion of what he designed, that is, the Scythians whom he had already subdued ; and being also informed, that he had projected the building of a city to keep them in awe, they at once took up arms, cut off his garisons, and joined with the discontented Bactrians and Sogdians. As soon as Alexander was informed of this, he directed his several battalions of infantry to furnish themselves with ladders, which as soon as they had done, he marched instantly towards Gaza, the nearest city of seven which the Barbarians had seized. At the same time he dispatched Craterus to Cyropolis, the greatest of those cities into which most of the Barbarians had retired, commanding him to encamp nigh the walls, to draw a ditch and rampart round the city, and plant his engines where-ever he thought convenient ; so that the citizens there, finding employment enough to defend themselves at home, might not be able to secure other places elsewhere. As soon as he approached Gaza, he ordered the wall, which was but of mud, and low built, to be assaulted, and his scaling-ladders every-where got ready. Then his slingers, and archers, and darters, mixed with the foot, beginning the attack, incommoded the besieged with missive weapons, and at the same time galled them with darts from their engines, infomuch that the walls were deserted by the Barbarians, and the ladders being immediately fixed, the Macedonians mounted, and entering killed all the men they met, for so Alexander had commanded; but the women, and children, and the riches of the place, were given as a spoil to the soldiers. Thence he moved to another of those cities, which was built and fortified like the former; which he assaulted and took the same day, and disposed of the captives in the same manner. Thence proceeding to the third city on the next day, he took it at the first attack. In the mean time, while he at the head of his troops of foot was busied in reducing those places, he dispatched his horse to two other cities not far off, with orders to take care that the citizens, when they heard of the storming of their neighbour towns, and his nigh approach, should not betake themselves to flight, and so render it a difficult task for him to overtake them. And as he judged, so it happened, that the dispatch of these troops thither was necessary; for the Barbarians, who held the other two cities not yet taken, seeing the smoke of that over-against them, which was then on fire, and besides some who had escaped out of that calamity bringing them the news, they fled out of both the cities as fast as they could; but, falling in among the horse posted for that purpose, were most of them slain. These five cities thus taken and destroyed in two days, he hastened to Cyropolis, the greatest and most populous of the whole country. It was surrounded with a wall much higher than any of the rest, and was built by Cyrus; and as many of the Barbarians, both stout and well armed, had fled for shelter thither, it was not to be supposed that the Macedonians should gain it at the first assault. Wherefore Alexander, having planted his engines in places convenient, determined to batter the wall, and where-ever he made a breach to storm the place. But finding the channel of the river, which usually ran through the town like a torrent, at that time dry, and the wall disjoined, so as to afford an entrance for his soldiers, he with his body-guards, his targeteers, his archers, and Agrians, while the Barbarians were employed in guarding themselves from the engines and the assailants, privately entered the city at first with a few men through that channel, and having burst open the gates nigh that part, gave an easy admittance to the rest. The Barbarians then, notwithstanding their perceiving their city taken, falling upon the Macedonians, a sharp battle ensued, wherein Alexander himself received a blow on the head and neck with a stone, and Craterus, and many more of his captains, were wounded with missile missive weapons. However, the Barbarians were at last driven out of the market-place. In the mean time those, who battered the wall, seeing it void of defendants, took it, and, at their first entrance, slew about eight thousand of the enemy. The rest (for the whole number there gathered together was eighteen thousand) retired into the castle: But these, when Alexander had continued his siege but one day, being destitute of water, surrendered the place. Thence moving to the seventh city, he took it at the first assault. Ptolemy indeed says, it was delivered up without fighting; but Aristobulus, on the contrary, affirms, that it was taken by storm, and all who were found therein slain. Ptolemy tells us, that the captives were dispersed throughout the army, and kept chained till he should depart out of that country, lest any of those who had occasioned the revolt should be left<sup>n</sup>. The Scythians in Asia, laying hold of this opportunity, came down in great bodies to the river's side, to watch when they might attack Alexander advantageously; this interruption was followed by an account, that Spitamenes had besieged the garrison left in Maracanda, and that the Macedonians were in great danger. Alexander, however, would not abandon a design he had once formed; having therefore dispatched relief to the city before-mentioned, he proceeded to mark out the city he had formerly projected, to serve for a fortress against the Scythians. In twenty days he walled it round; the soldiers vying with each other in the performance of the tasks assigned them. This once done, he gave the city to such of the Barbarians as had served in his troops, to the mercenaries who were desirous of settling there, and to such of the Macedonians as, being unfit for service, were willing to have houses and lands allotted to them in this place<sup>o</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iii. c. ult. CURT. lib. vii. c. 26, 27.

THE king having accomplished all that he intended in these parts, and being no ways desirous of entering into a war with the Scythians, from whom he knew there was nothing to be got but blows, prepared to march away. The Scythians, having notice of this, came down in vast numbers to the river's side, upbraided him and his soldiers, called them cowards and bullies, who, proud of having subdued the effeminate Persians, were afraid of attacking men, and durst not engage the antient conquerors of Asia. Alexander was exceedingly nettled at these reproaches, and yet was at a loss how to pass the river in the sight of so daring an enemy; however, he ordered Aristander to offer sacrifices, which he

Defeats the Scythian, but with difficulty.

<sup>n</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 2, 3. CURT. lib. vii. c. 26.
 RIAN. ubi supra.

<sup>o</sup> AR-

did again and again, but constantly assured the king, that the omens were altogether inauspicious; this gave him great concern, but could not engage him absolutely to drop his design. On the contrary, when he reflected on the dishonour which Darius the father of Xerxes had sustained from his unfortunate war with this people, he began to fancy that his own fame would be no less injured; wherefore he at last determined at all events to pass the river, and to attack the enemy, having first put them into some disorder by the darts and stones thrown from his engines, which, doing great execution cross the river, were new to the Scythians, and amazed them very much. The Macedonian horse being few in comparison of the enemy, the Scythians repulsed them at the first attack, and disordered them pretty much; but Alexander taking care to support them with light-armed troops, they charged again, and made some impression on the enemy, which as soon as the king perceived, he brought up the heavy-armed troops, and the weight of their charge determined the matter; for the Scythians, being unable to sustain it, broke and fled, leaving a thousand men dead upon the spot, among whom was one Satracus an eminent general, and a hundred and fifty were made prisoners; much more execution would have been done in the pursuit, if the Macedonians, through excessive heat, and violent thirst, had not been hindered from continuing it. Alexander, who was always among the number of the most forward and vigorous soldiers, finding himself very faint, drank freely of some standing water, which threw him into such a flux, as endangered his life, which was held an accomplishment of Aristander's prediction<sup>p</sup>. It may be truly said, that this was a hard-fought battle, and that the Macedonians bought their victory much dearer than they were wont to do, losing one hundred foot, and sixty horse, upon the spot, having a thousand wounded. The king ordered the prisoners to be released, and some days after, when ambassadors arrived from the Scythian king, excusing the business, and assuring him that the late proceedings were against his orders, Alexander took all in good part, received them into his protection, and being by no means willing to have any thing farther to do with them, granted them a peace on their own terms, and began to turn his head to the care of his other affairs, which were indeed in no little disorder; the war reviving when he least expected it, the troops under Spitamenes seeming to be beat at last both into discipline and courage<sup>q</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 4. CURT. lib. vii. c. 7.
lib. xii. c. 5.

<sup>q</sup> JUSTIN.

WE have before mentioned the relief sent by Alexander to the garrison in the castle of Maracanda ; it consisted of sixty donians auxiliary horse commanded by Andromachus and Menedemus, under eight hundred mercenaries under the command of Caranus, Pharnaces and fifteen hundred foot led by Pharnaces the interpreter, defeated by who, though a Lycian by birth, yet was perfectly skilled in Spitamenes the language of those countries, and could therefore upon occasion treat with the Barbarians, in case they sought to avoid farther mischiefs by submitting themselves. While these troops were upon their march, the Macedonians in the castle made a desperate sally on Spitamenes, and drove him and his forces from their works. The loss sustained on this occasion, and the news of Pharnaces's march engaged that general to raise the siege, and to retire towards Sogdia. Pharnaces pursued him, and in his march meeting with a body of the Nomades, he attacked them ; whereupon they retired, and joined Spitamenes, who elated with so sudden and unexpected a reinforcement, determined no longer to avoid, but rather to seek the Macedonian army. There are two relations of the subsequent engagement, both in Arrian, one taken from Ptolemy, the other from Aristobulus ; they agree in the main, that the defeat and slaughter of the Macedonians was owing to the ill conduct of their officers. Pharnaces was a man void of military skill, of which he was very sensible, and offered to resign the command of the troops ; but this the Macedonian generals would not yield to ; for they foresaw that this business would be attended with great loss, and therefore were not willing to make themselves accountable for an unfortunate battle, and for exceeding their commission at the same time. The issue of the matter was, that while they were full of doubts and confusion, the Scythians attacked them, supported by Spitamenes and his forces. The Macedonians behaved with great bravery, and in all probability would at least have made a good retreat, if they had either had a good general, or if the officers they had, had acted in concert. But Caranus with his squadron of horse, without consulting the rest, entered the river, upon which the greatest part of the foot followed, not his command, but his example, and with much ado gained a little island not far from the shore. This shadow of safety proved their utter destruction ; for the Barbarians cut off many as they entered the water, more when they were in it, and for all those who got into the island, they shot them to death with their arrows ; so that of two thousand three hundred and sixty men, horse and foot, there did not escape above forty of the former, and three hundred of the latter ;

their officers being all slain, after having shewn much more courage than conduct <sup>r</sup>.

Alexander causes the siege of Maracanda to be raised. As soon as Alexander received the news of the defeat, which Pharnaces and the troops under his command had sustained, he determined to revenge it ; with this view he took half his auxiliary horse, all his light-armed foot, and a battalion of the Macedonian phalanx ; with these he marched (if there be no mistake in the numbers) fifteen hundred furlongs in three days ; on the fourth he drew near to Maracanda, which Spitamenes had again besieged ; but on the news of Alexander's approach, he raised the siege with great precipitation, and retired with all the celerity imaginable. Alexander pursued him, not only to the edge of, but even a good way within the desert ; when he found it was impossible to overtake him, he returned and buried all the soldiers who had fallen in the late engagement with honour. Then he caused all the country thereabouts to be burnt and wasted, putting to death the inhabitants of such villages as he had been informed had not only refused shelter to the flying Macedonians, but had also mal-treated, and even murdered them. After this the king marched to Zariaspa, where he put his army into winter quarters. Thither came Phrataphernes, governor of Parthia, and Staasanor, who had been dispatched into Aria to seize Arfanes, who had begun to raise some disturbances there ; him they brought bound, and with him Barzaentes, whom Bessus had made governor of Parthia ; a short time after arrived the Macedonian officers who had been sent to take care of the recruits, as also those who had conducted such as were discharged to their embarkation <sup>s</sup>. Thus the army was again restored to a formidable greatness, and at the same time the court of Alexander shone with extraordinary splendor from the resort of the nobility of the adjacent provinces, and the arrival of so many illustrious persons from Greece. The king therefore took this opportunity of calling a great council, into which he ordered Bessus to be brought ; where having reproached him with his infidelity and treachery, his cruelty and treason, towards his sovereign Darius, he ordered his nose and ears to be cut off, and then sent him under a guard to Ecbatana in Media, that he might abide his trial according to the laws of the Medes and Persians. Arrian, who is otherwise very sparing of his reflections, censures in warm terms this severity towards Bessus ; he says, it was a sign the king was departing from the maxims of his ancestors, and leaving the generous

<sup>r</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 5. CURT. lib. vii. c. 36.
lib. iv. c. 7. CURT. lib. vii. c. 38.

<sup>s</sup> ARRIAN.

notions of the Greeks, to take up the proud, cruel, and execrable customs of those Barbarians whom he had lately conquered, and whose vices he now suffered to conquer him; as to the subsequent fate of Bessus, the relations of authors are so contradictory, that, to avoid confusion, we have digested what they say into a note (T).

IT

(T) Diodorus tells us, that Bessus at a great feast, to which he had invited his friends, growing warm with liquor, grievously insulted one of them whose name was Bagabrat, and even attempted to kill him; that this man, flying in the night to Alexander, the rest of the counsellors of Bessus were exceedingly alarmed, fearing on the one hand the cruelty of this usurper, and on the other, dreaming of great rewards, if they put him into the hands of Alexander; which at last they resolved to do, and to that end seized and bound him. They were not disappointed in their expectation; the king rewarded them bountifully; as for Bessus, he delivered him to the brother of Darius and the rest of his relations, who, after offering him all the indignities they could think of, and exercising on him variety of torments, cut his flesh into small pieces, and hurled it bit by bit out of their slings (56).—Curtius informs us of a quarrel Bessus had with a friend of his, but he calls him Cobares, a Median, and one of the Magi. This man, after Bessus had been vilifying Darius, and exalting himself, told him plainly, it was in vain to think of flying from such an enemy as Alexander; and that the only method he had to take was submitting himself, and trusting to the mercy of the victor; this put Bessus into such a passion, that Cobares was forced to retire out of the room for his immediate safety, and afterwards fled to Alexander. Spitamenes is characterised by this author as an envious and ungrateful traitor; that he told Bessus, two of his best friends had conspired against him, and that he, having discovered the conspiracy, had caused them to be apprehended; for which Bessus thanked him, and desired they might be brought into his presence. Upon this Dataphernes and Catenes, who concurred with Spitamenes, were brought in with their hands tied, surrounded by eight chosen men, as if they had been their guards. But no sooner did Bessus rise and approach them, than the pretended guards seized him, pinioned him, took his crown from his head, and tore his robes; whereupon he cried out, that they justly revenged Darius, but were too propitious to Alexander. Spitamenes afterwards led him with a halter about his neck into the presence of Alexander, who delivered him to Oxathres, Darius's brother, with directions to see him crucified, after having his nose and ears cut off, and then shot to death with arrows, which Oxathres accordingly undertook to do; Catenes being to fulfil the last part of his punishment, which was to guard his body, that no part of it might be interred in the bowels of

(56) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii.

*Affects the Persian
customs.*

It is certain, that about this time Alexander began to throw off in a great measure the manners of a Macedonian prince, and to affect those of a Persian king. Authors vary not a little in the accounts they give us of this matter. Arrian says expressly, that he laid aside the Macedonian for the Median habit, adding, That to him it appeared wonderful, the king did not blush when he changed the modest covering of his head, which he had worn in so many battles, for the Persian tiara. Yet Plutarch as positively affirms, he did not follow the Median fashion, that he neither wore their breeches, long vest, birds. He afterwards tells us that he was sent to Ecbatana, there to suffer death (57). — Plutarch relates, that, by the direction of Alexander himself, Bessus was fastened to a couple of tall strait trees, which were bound down so as to meet; and then being let loose with a great force returned to their own places, each of them carrying that part of the body along with it which was tied to it (58). — Justin acquaints us in few words, that Alexander delivered Bessus to the brother of Darius, that he might crucify him (59). It is impossible that he should die all these deaths, and, amongst this great variety of sentiments, it is as impossible to determine what death he died; that he lost his nose and ears by the command of Alexander may be esteemed certain; and that he afterwards suffered capital punishment is also certain; as to the manner in which he suffered it, nothing can be positively affirmed. In all probability, Bessus might have escaped all this severity, if he had taken the advice of Cobares, and submitted himself, and the provinces under his power, to Alexander; for there is good reason to believe, that his assuming the imperial title was at least as heinous in the sight of Alexander, as his murder of Darius; and therefore, if he had not joined this to his former crime, he might have escaped better. The answers given by Bessus, as they are recorded in Arrian and Curtius, hint plainly at this; for he told the king, First, That Darius was murdered to obtain his favour; and, Secondly, That he was not the sole author of the murder, but that all who were present concurred in it. Among these was Satibarzanes, who, on his submitting himself to Alexander, was not only well received, but had his government restored to him. As for the other conspirator Barzaentes, he indeed was put to death, in revenge, as it was said, of the treason he had committed against his master; but then he had always continued in arms against Alexander, and flying to the Indians for safety was delivered up by them (60). On the whole therefore we may safely conclude, that this extraordinary severity, this laboured scene of doing justice on Bessus, was altogether affected, and had nothing of that spirit and generosity which Alexander had shewn at the opening of the war

(57) Curt. lib. vii. c. 20. (58) Plutarch. in vit. Alexand.
(59) Justin. lib. xii. c. 5. (60) Arrian. lib. iii. c. 29, 30.

or tiara, but made choice of a garb inclining to the Persian habit, more pompous and magnificent than the Macedonian vesture, yet not so rich or gaudy as that worn by the Persian kings. But it may be, Alexander proceeded by degrees in the alteration of his habit, as we know he did in the use of it; for at first he only dressed himself in this manner, when he had business to transact with his new subjects; but when he conversed with the Greeks and commanded the Macedonians, he wore his own country cloaths: If therefore this conjecture of ours be right, Plutarch and Arrian may be reconciled; and indeed it is very probable, that in this great council, wherein he imitated the oriental severity, he appeared in habit as a Persian king; that is, as the lord of Asia, or, as the Greeks were wont emphatically to style him, as the Great King † (U).
This

† ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 7. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

(U) Curtius gives us a very extraordinary story in relation to the revolt of the Sogdians, which, on account of its length and its having so strong a mixture of the wonderful, we thought more proper for a note, than for the text; where if it had been curtailed, it would not have been clear, and if inserted at full length, it would have interrupted the current of the narration. “ Among the captive Sogdians, he says, there were thirty of the chiefest nobility of the country, who were remarkable for their prodigious strength of body. These being brought before the king, and understanding by the interpreter, that his majesty had ordered them to be executed, they began to sing and dance, and by other wanton motions of their body endeavoured to express the chearfulness of their mind. Alexander, being amazed at their unusual alacrity on such an occasion, commanded them to be brought back, and asked them the cause of their excessive joy, when they beheld death before their eyes? To which they answered, that if any other than himself had sentenced them to die, they should have been concerned; but since they were to be restored to their ancestors by so great a king, who had conquered all the world, they looked upon their death to be so honourable, as even to deserve the envy of all brave men, which made them so transported when they understood his pleasure. The king then asked them, if they would be his friends hereafter, if he should give them their lives? They replied, that they had never been his enemies, but had only defended themselves when they were attacked in a hostile manner by him: And that if any body would make trial of them by good offices, instead of injuries, they would willingly contend in the generous strife, and use their utmost endeavours not to be overcome. He asking them afterwards, What pledge they would give him for their fidelity? They answered, their lives, which they received through

This mightily grieved his Macedonians, and this very grief shewed that they were still loyal and affectionate to him ; for men of traiterous or rebellious principles do not grieve for the errors of their prince, but magnify them into crimes ; and, as if they were conscious of the enormity of their own guilt, endeavour to transfer a part of it to their hated sovereign. When therefore Alexander perceived this disposition in his army, he ought certainly to have soothed them, and endeavoured either to convince them of the rectitude of his behaviour, or to have quieted them by yielding in some measure to their desires. But this was not in the nature of Alexander, or at least was no longer in his nature after he had visited the temple of Ammon. Besides, he had about him a multitude of sycophants, who, as Arrian well notes, are, and ever will be, the bane of princes ; he might have added, and the curse of nations. These, by complying with his humours and heating his passions, carried him daily into new extravagancies, and brought him to be a proper instance of the truth of another of Arrian's observations ; that an ability of conquering vast provinces, and of acquiring supreme dominion is of little consequence to a man's happiness, unless he preserves a philosophic constancy and moderation of mind ; however specious appearances may deceive a deluded world, and make them conceive gilded misery true felicity ; whereas no two things in nature are farther removed. But to return to the series of our history, for which these reflections are to make way.

*Murders
Clytus at a banquet.*

THE Greeks, and especially the Macedonians, observed an anniversary festival to Bacchus. This year it seems the king, omitting Bacchus, transferred the honour of this festival to the Dioscuri, i. e. Castor and Pollux ; and, not satisfied therewith, strictly commanded, that for the future to them, and not to Bacchus, these solemn rites should constantly be dedicated. These sacrifices were followed by a magnificent banquet, to which all the principal commanders in the army were invited, and Clytus the son of Dropidas, who stood as “ through his bounty, and which they would at all times be ready “ to restore to him whenever he required them. Nor were they “ worse than their words : For those of them who were sent home “ kept their country-people in due subjection to Alexander, “ and four of them being received into his body-guards, were “ inferior to none of the Macedonians in their sincere affection to “ the king (61).

high in the king's favour as any of them, among the rest. At supper the discourse turned on the heroes to whom they had sacrificed : and a question was started, With what propriety they were stiled the sons of Jupiter, when it was notorious that Tyndarus was their father ? It may be, this was introduced to give some ingenious flatterer an opportunity of reconciling things, which hitherto the Macedonians could never understand, how Alexander could be at once the son of Ammon and the son of Philip. Some who sat near the king laid hold of this fair opportunity to magnify his actions above those of Castor and Pollux ; and when their hands were in, they laid hold of the fame of Hercules too, and set that a step lower than the glory of Alexander. To give these things a colour, they insisted on the natural envy of men towards their cotemporaries, and how unwilling they were to worship those virtues in the living, which, with the utmost readiness and the most profound respect, they adored in the dead. Clytus took fire at these expressions ; he said, he could not bear to hear such indignities offered to the gods, or the credit of antient heroes depreciated, to tickle the ears of a living prince. As to Alexander's actions, he allowed that they were great and glorious, but he affirmed that they had nothing in them supernatural ; besides, they were not performed by him alone, but by his army ; and that therefore all the Macedonians had a right to share in the praise due to those deeds, in which they, as well as he, had exerted themselves. These reflections made Alexander very angry. To sooth this anger, some of his flatterers began a discourse about his father Philip, in which they sought to lessen his actions, and to represent him as a prince who had done nothing extraordinary ; which provoked Clytus so far, that he began to detract from the merit of Alexander, and to suggest, that nothing he had done deserved to be compared with what had been performed by his father. Upon this the king lost all patience, and when Clytus proceeded to upbraid him with the preservation of his life at the battle of Granicus, stretching out his arm, and saying, This hand, O Alexander, saved thee ; the king leaped upon him, and endeavoured to kill him, but was prevented by the interposition of his friends, who caught hold of him, and with much ado got between them : Clytus in the mean time continued his reproachful expressions ; whereupon the king called for some of his guards ; but none appearing, he began to bemoan himself exceedingly, saying, That he was now in the same condition with Darius, when in the hands of Bellus : That he had the empty name of king, and nothing more. His friends upon this retiring and leaving him to himself, he snatched a lance, lance, or, as some say, a long Macedonian pike, and therewith struck Clytus through, and killed him. In this account we have followed Arrian closely; for to have collected into one relation what different authors have delivered, could have only served to perplex the reader. What may be wanting to his farther information, and could be had from other authors, he will find below <sup>u</sup> (W). Here let us pursue

<sup>u</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 8.

(W) The detail given us by Plutarch of what happened at the death of Clytus differs so much from what has been inserted in the text from Arrian, and is in itself so curious, that it well deserves the reader's perusal. He informs us, that “ the king having a present of Grecian fruit brought him from the sea coast, so well prepared, that it seemed to be but just gathered, sent for Clytus that he might see and partake of it. Clytus was then sacrificing, but he immediately left off, and went to wait on the king, followed by three of the sheep, on whom the drink offering had been already poured, in order for the sacrifice. Alexander, being informed of this accident, consulted his two diviners, Aristander and Cleomantes the Spartan, and asked them, What was portended by it? They assuring him that it was an ill omen, he commanded them in all haste to offer sacrifices for Clytus's safety; forasmuch as three days before he himself had seen a strange vision in his sleep of Clytus all in mourning, sitting by Parmenio's sons, who were all dead. Clytus, however, staid not to finish his devotions, but came strait to supper with the king, who the same day had sacrificed to Castor and Pollux. And when they had drank pretty hard, some of the company fell a singing the verses of one Pranichus, or as others say, of Pierion, which were made upon those captains who had been lately worsted by the Barbarians, on purpose to disgrace and turn them to ridicule; which so offended the grave antient men, that they reproved both the author and the singer of the verses, though Alexander and the blades about him were mightily pleased to hear them, and encouraged them to go on: Till at last Clytus, who had drank too much, and was besides of a froward and wilful temper, was so nettled, that he could hold no longer; saying, It was not well done thus to expose the Macedonians before the Barbarians and their enemies, since though it was their unhappiness to be overcome, yet they were much better men than those who laughed at them. To this Alexander replied, That sure Clytus spoke so tenderly of cowardice, when he called it misfortune, only to excuse himself. At which Clytus starting up, This cowardice, as you are pleased to term it, said he to him, saved your life, though you pretend to be sprung from the gods, when you were running away from Spithridates's sword; and it is by the expense of Macedonian blood, and by this wound, that you are enabled to reach an height, as to despise pursue the history without entering into any debates upon the question which has risen upon the fact, Whether Clytus's indiscretion

“ and

“ and disown your father Philip, and adopt yourself the son of Jupiter “ Ammon. Thou base fellow, said Alexander, who was now thoroughly exasperated, dost thou think to utter these things everywhere of me, and stir up the Macedonians to sedition, and not be punished for it? We are sufficiently punished already, answered Clytus, if this be the recompense of our toils; and esteem those happiest who have not lived to see their countrymen ignominiously scourged with Median rods, and forced to sue to the Persians to have access to their king. While Clytus talked thus at random, and the king in the bitterest manner retorted upon him, the old men that were in company endeavoured all they could to allay the flame, when Alexander, turning to Xenodolus the Cardian, and Artemius the Colophonian, asked them, If they were not of opinion that the rest of the Grecians behaved among the Macedonians, like so many demi-gods among savages? All this would not silence Clytus, who calling aloud to Alexander, bid him, if he had any thing to say, to speak out; or else, why did he invite men who were free-born, and used to speak their minds openly without restraint, to sup with him? He had better live and converse with Barbarians and conquered slaves, who would not scruple to adore his Persian girdle and white tunic. Which words so provoked Alexander, that not able to suppress his anger any longer, he took one of the apples that lay upon the table, and flung it at him, and then looked about for his sword. But Aristophanes, one of his life-guards, had hid that out of the way, and others came about him, and besought him to stay his fury, but in vain; for breaking from them, he called out aloud to his guards in the Macedonian language, which was a certain sign of some great disturbance in him, and commanded a trumpeter to sound, giving him a box on the ear for delaying, or rather refusing, to obey him, though afterwards the same man was commended for disobeying an order which would have put the whole army into tumult and confusion. Clytus continued still in the same quarrelsome humour, till his friend, with much ado, forced him out of the room; but he came in again immediately at another door very irreverently, and insolently sung this passage out of Euripides's Andromache. Ye gods, what an ill custom have you introduced into Greece! When an army has erected a trophy upon the defeat of the enemy, it is never considered that the victory is owing to the valour of the troops who fought, but the general puts in for all the honour of it; though he had exposed himself to no more danger than many thousands besides, and had done no more than a common soldier, yet he only is celebrated in the songs of triumph, and robs the rest of their share of the glory. Then Alexander, snatching a spear from one of the soldiers, met Clytus as he was putting by the curtain

VOL. VIII. Z “ that

discretion could excuse Alexander's intemperance and cruelty. As soon as the king came to himself, his brains were perfectly cool, and he began to remember what had passed, he fell into a fit of excessive grief. He accused himself, as indeed well he might, of having slain his father's brave soldier, his own faithful friend, the constant companion of his toils, his foster brother, and him to whom he owed his life : It was then, that in the bitterness of his soul, he disclaimed all kindred to the gods, and with a laudable sorrow mourned like a man, for having done a base and cruel act unworthy of a man. It was then he cried out on Clytus, on his sister Hellanice, whose breasts he had sucked, and inveighed against himself as one forgetful of the bond of gratitude, the ties of friendship, and the laws of nature, depriving his friends of life, and executing those as evil-doers who could not patiently hear or see him do ill. For three days he refused meat, neglected his apparel, and, as some say, with the pike that “ that hung before the door, and ran him through the body.

 “ He fell immediately, and, after a few piercing groans, expired.
 “ In the very instant the king's indignation cooled, and he came “ perfectly to himself ; but when he saw his friends about him all “ in a profound silence, as seized with horror at the fact, he pul“ led the spear out of the dead body, and would have turned it a“ gainst himself, if the guards had not held his hands, and by “ main force carried him away into his chamber (62)”. The relation of Curtius agrees pretty well with that of Plutarch, only he attributes more moderation to the king at the beginning (63). Justin tells us in few words, that at a debauch Alexander killed his friend Clytus for extolling the actions of his father Philip ; but this author insists very largely on his repentance, attributing his recovery from that state of dejection and grief, as Curtius does, to the advice of Callisthenes (64). If we had Diodorus's account of this business, in all probability we should find it correspond with Curtius and Justin ; but, as we have heretofore remarked, these authors, when they differ from Arrian, frequently agree with him ; the reason is, that among a multitude of writers, who undertook to transmit the actions of Alexander to posterity, the collectors of general history followed, at their pleasure, sometimes one, and sometimes another, and not seldom mixed several relations together. Authors of abridgments copied from these indiscriminately, as the later writers of particular histories did frequently too, adding such embellishments, inserting such descriptions, and framing such speeches for the amplifying and adorning their works, as they thought fit.

(62) Plutarch. in vit. Alexand.
 (64) Justin. lib. xii. 6

(63) lib. viii. c. 2, 3, 4.

killed Clytus, would have slain himself. The army in the mean while were disconsolate to the highest degree ; their regard to Clytus is said to have given way to their love and loyalty to Alexander, insomuch, that to sooth their afflicted prince, they condemned Clytus, and prohibited his interment, seeking thereby to colour the fact, or at least to comfort Alexander by seeming to think his resentment just. This was excusable in soldiers. The priests and philosophers went greater lengths. The former told the king, that what he did was not the error of his own will, but the effects of a fury inspired by Bacchus on account of his festival being transferred to the Dio/curi. Thus did these execrable dissemblers seek to transfer a crime unworthy of a man to him they worshipped as a god, and most impudently called that a divine fury, which at best was beastly drunkenness ; all flatterers are detestable, because they insult human nature ; but these spiritual flatterers are doubly so, because, as far as in them lies, they prostitute the gods to please the worst of men. Anaxarchus of Abdera, whom most historians stile a philosopher, but Arrian rightly a sophist, was the next who undertook to moderate the king's grief ; and finding him upon his bed sighing and dejected, thus he addressed him : “ Is this “ the Alexander whom the world looks upon with such ad“ miration ? Behold him extended on the ground, and weep“ ing like an abject slave for fear of the law and reproach of “ men, to whom he himself ought to be a law and the mea“ sure of equity, since he conquered for no other end but “ to make himself lord of all, and not to be a slave to a “ vain idle opinion : Do you not know, that Jupiter is re“ presented sitting on his throne, with law assisting on one “ side, and justice on the other, intimating thereby, that let a “ sovereign prince do what he will, all his actions are just “ and lawful ” ? These were admirable doctrines, tending not only to set the king's mind at rest, as to the murder he had committed, but to prevent any more qualms, in case rage, envy, or drunkenness, should plunge him again into the same circumstances. Callisthenes, the scholar and relation of Aristotle, sought to settle his mind by honest and moral discourses. Arrian says, that the suggestion of the priests, in relation to Bacchus, did not displease the king. Both Ph-arch and the last-mentioned author say, that Anaxarchus allayed the king's grief at the same time that he corrupted his manners ; but Curtius ascribes the king's recovery to Callisthenes ; we may well suppose that they had all a hand in it, though the subsequent history will shew, that in all probability the last had the least w.

Alexander
aspires to divine honours.

IF the tragical death of Clytus had brought Alexander to a right way of thinking, perhaps posterity, like the Macedonian soldiers, would have drawn a veil over this dark scene, and have chosen rather to commend the king's compassionate concern, than to have censured his drunken cruelty. But no sooner was his sorrow for the death of this worthy man alleviated, but he began again to give up himself to the management of those sycophants, whose poisonous speeches had wrought that mischief; and still they were dinning his ears, that in their opinion he was something more than man, and that it was injustice and disloyalty in other people not to think him so too. The result of all these discourses was, that a god he should be, or at least have divine honours paid him, as heretofore had been given to Persian kings; and Anaxarchus the sophist, Agis a miserable poet, Chærilus, Agnon; and other parasites, undertook to bring this great matter to bear, and to engage the Greeks as well as the Asiatics, to pay him adoration *. Alexander was mightily pleased with this, and a great banquet was appointed, at which this hopeful scheme was to be carried into execution. At this entertainment, Anaxarchus proposed the adoring Alexander in a set oration; he insisted, that Bacchus was a Theban, and though he admitted that Hercules was a Greek, and without reproach, yet he affirmed, that Alexander's being descended from him was at once the most certain, and the greatest honour which could be attributed to him; hence he inferred, that if Bacchus and Hercules were worthily worshipped, so without doubt would Alexander be, whose actions so far exceeded theirs, at some distance of time; but inasmuch as that worship would be of small consequence to him then, he alledged, it would be more rational, as well as more obliging, to offer it him now, while he was living, and could take pleasure in it. The Macedonians, who were not in the secret, were stunned at the speech, and knew not either what to think of its author, or what answer to afford themselves to what he had propounded; so a long and deep silence ensued. Callisthenes at last broke through it, and, as Arrian tells us, delivered himself in these words: “Indeed, Anaxarchus, I count not Alexander unworthy of any honour, * ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 9. PLUT. in vit. Alex. CURT. lib. viii. c. 7. & 8. JUSTIN. lib. xii. c. 6.

* ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 11. PLUT. in vit. Alex. CURT. lib. viii. c. 18. JUSTIN. lib. xii. c. 7.

“ how

“ how great soever it be, that is fit to be ascribed to man ;
“ but there are prescribed differences amongst men between “ divine and human honours ; amongst many others, in the “ building of temples, and erecting of statues ; for to the “ gods we consecrate oratories, offer sacrifices and drink-of“ ferings : To the gods are sung hymns ; men are praised,
“ but not adored : kisses in salutations are given to men, “ but the gods are placed on high, and 'tis not lawful to “ touch them, and therefore they are worshipped with ado“ ration. Solemn times of dancings are performed to the “ gods, and pæans sung to them ; neither is it to be won“ dered at, inasmuch as the honours given to the gods are “ various ; some sort of honours given to one, and others to “ another, especially those honours of later times ; nay, “ those honours given to some of the heroes differ from di“ vine honours. 'Tis not therefore fit to confound these “ things, nor to advance men above themselves and all man“ kind besides, and to degrade the gods by worshipping “ them with the same worship wherewith we adore men.
“ Alexander himself would not suffer any private man to “ usurp the regal dignity and honours due to himself, though “ he gained 'em by the unjust suffrages of the people ; much “ more justly therefore may the gods be angry, if any mortal “ man assume to himself divine honours, or accept of them “ from others. However, let Alexander be esteemed, as in “ truth he is, by many degrees the most valiant of them “ that are valiant, the greatest king among all other kings, “ and amongst generals the most worthy to command. But “ as for thee, Anaxarchus, 'tis thy duty above any other
“ to instruct Alexander in those things that have been spoken, “ and to deter him from the contrary ; for thy conver“ sation he daily makes use of in order to improve in “ wisdom and in learning. Neither does it become thee
“ to be the beginner of this discourse, but rather to re“ member, that thou art not advising Cambyfes or Xerxes, “ but the son of Philip, descended from Hercules and Achil- “ les, whose ancestors came out of Argos into Macedonia, “ and maintained their empire, not by arbitrary power, but “ by ruling according to the laws and customs of the Mace- “ donians. But divine honours were not conferred upon “ Hercules himself by the Grecians while he was living ; nay, “ nor when he was dead, before the oracle at Delphos com“ manded that he should be worshipped as a god. But if “ there be but few that are in the country of the Barbarians, “ we ought to entertain the same sentiments with them. And “ I earnestly intreat thee, Alexander, to remember Greece ;
“ for

“ for whose sake this expedition was undertaken by thee, in “ order to add Asia to Greece ; and now consider, whether,
 “ when you return thither, you can be able to compel the “ free people of Greece to adore you as a god, or, excepting “ them of Greece, you can impose this dishonour and slavery “ upon the Macedonians only, or whether it be fit that quite “ different honours be there allowed you, seeing the Gre- “ cians confer only those that are human, according to the “ custom and manner of the Greeks, when, at the same “ time, only the Barbarians worship you as a god, after the “ manner of Barbarians. But if it be objected, that Cyrus “ son of Cambyfes was the first of all mortal men that was “ adored by men as a god, and that, since that time, this “ adoration has continued amongst the Medes and Persians ; “ yet you are to consider, how his pride was curbed by the “ Scythians, a poor and indigent people ; and how other “ Scythians again reduced Darius to more sober thoughts of “ himself ; and the Athenians and Lacedæmonians Xerxes ;
 “ and Clearchus and Xenophon Artaxerxes, only with ten “ thousand men ; and Darius now overcome by Alexander, “ at a time when no divine honours were decreed him <sup>b</sup>. ”

Alexander was highly provoked at this speech, and the more for that the Macedonians could not forbear applauding it ; however, he ordered the business to go on, and settled the ceremonial of his adoration thus : When he drank to a person, it was expected, that the guest should immediately rise up, adore him, and, having received a kiss from the king, should depart. The eldest and most considerable of the Persians complied first ; in doing which they followed their old custom, and were perhaps not displeased at the embarrassment of the Greeks (X). Leonatus, one of the king's friends, as Ar-
rian

<sup>b</sup> ARRIAN. I. IV. C. 2.

(X) All who have treated this subject agree, that the Persians were as ready to comply with Alexander's motion for adoring him, as the Greeks were averse to it ; yet we are not to suppose from thence, that the former were as prone to idolatry as the latter ; if we should, it would be a very great error : And therefore, to preserve that consistency which is necessary between the several parts of this work, we have thought fit to add this note, in order to explain the conduct of the Persians, and to acquit them of that gross adulation which has been charged upon them by some rash and inconsiderate writers. Bowing down to, and even prostrating one's self before a prince, ever was, and still is, held in the east an act of civil

rian has it ; or, as Curtius reports, Polysperchon, observing a Persian touch the floor with his chin, laughed at it, and bid him hit it a little harder ; for which Alexander caught hold of him, threw him from his couch, and, as he lay on civil reverence, and no more. The Persians therefore, as deists, paid these profound marks of submission to their king, not as supposing him a deity, but from a persuasion that he derived a supreme authority from God. It may be, and indeed it is probable, the Persians did not explain this matter, either to Alexander or those about him ; but contented themselves with satisfying the king by their actions, and themselves by their thoughts (65). The Greeks proceeded upon notions directly opposite. They were poly-theists, and tho' they every day did a thousand ridiculous things in their public worship, yet, to pay divine honours to a man, was too gross for them ; and therefore, as is frequently the case, they acted right upon wrong principles ; for with respect to the ground of this submission, the king and they were agreed in their sentiments. He sought to be taken for something more than man, and they, with good reason, refused to acknowledge him such. As the Persians could not but have the highest contempt for their idolatry in all its shapes, so, without question, they were well pleased to see their zeal for idols embarrass the Macedonians with their natural prince, which so strongly tended to put him into their hands. There is one objection which may possibly be made to this account, and ought therefore to be answered. It is this ; There are various instances in scripture, where bowing down to, or, as it is usually phrased, worshipping, a man, is prohibited as idolatrous (66 ; whence it might be inferred, that amongst the Persians, who were deists as well as the Jews, this practice was not, strictly speaking, lawful ; but, if we consider, that these prohibitions never extend to the case in question, but are always directed against worshipping private men, on a supposition of their being clothed with some divine character, we shall easily perceive, that these marks of civil respect to supreme magistrates were always accounted innocent, and very conformable to the divine law. Thus Daniel complied with all the customs of the Persian court, bowed himself when he entered the royal presence, and saluted with the usual compliment. O king, live for ever (67) ! In a word, as the intent of the mind renders all actions either good or evil, so, in the present case, the Persians did that without idolatry, which was flat idolatry in those Greeks that did the same thing ; because the former honoured Alexander only as a man, the latter, whatever they conceived of him, paid him that respect which they thought only due to a god.

(65) Univ. Hist. Vol. II. p. 502. (66) Acts xiv. 14. Rev. Vol. 6. (67) Dan. vi. 21.

the floor, told him, he made as ridiculous a figure as him whom he had despised. When it came to the turn of Callisthenes, he pledged the king, and then came for his kiss. Alexander being deeply engaged in discourse with Hephestion, did not perceive he had missed any part of the ceremony ; but Demetrius one of his friends told him, that the philosopher had not adored him. The king thereupon put him back with his hand ; and Callisthenes going out was heard to say, So then, I have only lost a kiss. But the king afterwards revenged himself more severely, as we shall shew immediately, that we may not again interrupt the thread of our narration (Y).

W H I L E

(ARRIAN. l. iv. c. 12. CURT. l. viii. c. 20. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

(Y) Arrian represents Callisthenes as a man exceeding proud of his knowledge, and, in point of vanity, very little behind Alexander himself. His temper was morose ; but he had a vehement and persuasive elocution (68). Aristotle made a right judgment of him and his abilities, when he said, He was an excellent orator, but had no judgment. The same great man foresaw what would one day be the fate of this philosopher ; for, hearing him treat Alexander with that unbecoming harshness which was too natural to him, he could not help repeating what Thetis in Homer says to Achilles,

Metbinks I see thee dying, see thee dead.

He is reported to have been a great declaimer, and that on this account he was chiefly admired by Alexander. Once at an entertainment the king commanded him to make an extempore oration in praise of the Macedonians, which he did with such facility, in terms so just and proportionate to their achievements, that all who were present, in token of their approbation, threw their garlands upon him, excepting Alexander, who contented himself with repeating these lines from Euripides ;

*Without surprize I hear thy language flow ;
For happy subjects pleasing words bestow.*

He then commanded Callisthenes to point out the errors and mistakes of the Macedonians, that they might the better know how to correct them. The orator, laying hold of this opportunity, immediately entered into a long and bitter invective against the Macedo-

(68) Arrian. l. iv. c. 10.

WHILE the minds of men were yet warm, the murder of A new Clytus forgot, and the king's affectation of foreign manners conspiracy continually provoking his natural subjects, a new conspiracy against him. was discovered, which very narrowly missed taking effect. The king had nearest his person fifty Macedonian youths of the first quality, who, according to the rules of waiting, continually attended him in the field, at his exercises, when at table, and when he retired to his rest. Among these there was one Hermolaus the son of Sopolis, who had contracted a violent antipathy to his master; the occasion this: One day, when he attended Alexander in the chace, a boar crossed him as he rode before the king; whereupon the young man, eager in his sport, struck the boar with a spear, and killed him on the spot. Alexander, provoked at losing an opportunity of shewing his dexterity, ordered the boy to be whipped in the sight of all his companions, and his horse taken from him. Hermolaus, almost distracted with the deep sense of the disgrace he had suffered, complained of it in the most moving terms to Sostratus the son of Amyntas, one of his companions, alledging, that he should never be at peace till he had revenged on Alexander the injury that had been done him. Sostratus, who loved him tenderly, came easily into his measures; and they two having formed the design, afterwards drew in Antipater, Epimenes, Anticles, and Philotas, all youths of quality like themselves and squires of the body to the king, to be concerned with them. The event of their consultations was, that when it came to be Antipater's watch, nians in general, and against Philip of Macedon in particular, to whose greatness he applied these lines;

*When civil broils declining states surprize,
There the worst men to highest honours rise.*

This imprudent declamation lost him the hearts of his auditors; to which also the king's observation contributed not a little. Callisthenes, says he, has not shewn so much of his eloquence, as of his ill-will to the Macedonians, in this speech (69). But, however, he might lose himself on this occasion, when he came to oppose the king's assuming divine honours, he was again cried up, and all the Macedonian youth followed him as the patron of liberty and the teacher of true philosophy; so much does a man's character depend on his going with, or going against, the people's humour.

(69) Plut. in vit. Alex.

they should kill Alexander in his sleep. It does not appear that any of the conspirators relented when the very day came ; nor is it probable that the king could possibly have escaped, if an unforeseen accident, or, as some would have it, a miracle, had not interposed and defeated all their purposes. Aristobulus in his memoirs relates it thus : There was a certain Syrian woman who attended the camp of Alexander, and who frequently acted and spake as if beside her senses. This woman pretended to foretel future events ; but she delivered her predictions in so odd a way, that, till their accomplishments compelled people to take notice of them, she was laughed at and ridiculed ; but when by degrees the falling out of things she had foretold had gained her some degree of credit, the king, who had always a leaning to these sort of things, directed that she should never be restrained from entering his presence. It happened, that the night the conspirators had fixed on for the execution of their design, Alexander drank pretty late with his friends. As he was retiring from the place where they were drinking to his own apartment, this woman threw herself in his way, and, in one of her frantic fits, bid him go back and drink all night, in which, 'tis said, he obeyed her. However it was, so it fell out, that he did drink all that night, which rendered the conspirators scheme abortive. The next day Epimenes the son of Arfeas, who was one of the number, discovered the whole to Chariclus his friend, and this Chariclus communicated it to Eurylochus the brother of Epimenes ; Eurylochus immediately addressed himself to Ptolemy the son of Lagus, who informed the king of it ; upon which directions were immediately given, that all who were named by Eurylochus should be immediately apprehended and examined apart. They did not make any difficulty of confessing the whole design ; and each of them named those who were in it. Some time after, Hermolaus, according to the Macedonian constitution, was brought before the army, and there charged with intending the murder of his sovereign. Instead of a defence, the young man, with great serenity of mind and cheerfulness of countenance, said, “ That a man “ of spirit, who was born free, could never tamely support “ the indignities which had been offered him by the king.
“ He alledged also, that not himself only, but his country, “ had been grossly injured ; that Philotas had been murdered “ without proof ; Parmenio assassinated without pretence ; “ numbers put to death on slight suspicions ; Clytus butcher“ ed in drink ; the Median habit and customs preferred to “ those of Macedon ; edicts issued to esteem a man a god, “ while

“ while that man plunged himself in drunkenness, luxury, “ and other vices, scandalous to himself and detrimental to “ the state. From all which, by giving him death, he sought “ to set himself and the Macedonians free.” His speech ended, himself and his accomplices were stoned by the army<sup>d</sup>.
 As all the Macedonian youth were auditors and admirers of Callisthenes, and Hermolaus his particular friend, he was charged with this conspiracy and apprehended. Arrian seems to be in some doubt, whether the apprehension of Callisthe- nes was founded on any proofs, which, however Ptolemy, in his memoirs affirmed, or was seized merely from the malice and spite of Alexander. We have a better authority on this head, than either Arrian or Ptolemy, which yet is not sufficient to determine it. This authority is a passage in a letter from Alexander to Antipater, as follows, “ The young “ men were stoned to death by the Macedonians; but for the “ sophist, i. e. Callisthenes, I will take care to punish him, “ and them too who sent him to me, who harbour those in “ their cities who conspire against my life.” Plutarch tells us, that Aristotle was threatened by these insinuations; however, certainly the king grew very inexorable, and at the same time very suspicious. As to Callisthenes, what became of him it is impossible to determine. Aristobulus, who was an eye-witness of all he wrote, affirms, that he was carried about in chains, till he died of a natural death. Ptolemy, who was also an eye-witness of all he recorded, asserts, that he was first rack’d, and then crucified. Besides these we have many other stories about him, which, as they are all uncertain, we think, we may safely omit, especially, as we shall have occasion to speak of him again in another place<sup>e</sup>.

WHEN the season of action approached, ambassadors from Scythia arrived; whose errand was to inform the king, that their monarch, to whom he had sent ambassadors, was dead, and that his brother had succeeded him, that this new prince was willing to receive his commands, would give him his daughter in marriage, if he thought fit, and, if he desired it, would come to wait upon him in person. Alexander answered them in terms of friendship, but declined a Scythian alliance. Pharaimanes, king of the Chorasmeni, came about the same time to Alexander’s camp, with a body of fifteen hundred horse. He informed him, that his territories bor-

He forms new designs.

<sup>d</sup> ARRIAN. l. iv. c. 13. 14. PLUT. in vit. Alex. CURT. l.
 viii. c. 23. <sup>e</sup> ARRIAN. l. iv. c. 15.

dered on the Euxine sea, and offered his service, both for providing his army with necessaries, and furnishing himself whatever quota the king should think fit, in case he intended to turn his arms on that side. With this Alexander was perfectly well pleased, commended the king, entered into an alliance with him, and recommended him to Artabazus, president of the provinces bordering on his dominions; however, as to the expedition proposed, he declared, that his intentions were first to reduce the Indians, and then to return into Greece; after which he proposed to make use of this prince's offer, and with his whole forces to invade the countries bordering on the Euxine sea. With this answer he dismissed Pharaimanes, and immediately prepared for the carrying his own projects into execution †, though they were far from being pleasing either to his council or to his army (Z).

He re-enters Sog-dia.

HE first directed his march to the banks of the river Oxus, and then determined to enter the country of the Sogdians, on account of their refusing to yield obedience to the governor he had appointed over them. Polyspherchon, with some other generals and a considerable body of forces, he left in Bactria, The rest of his army he divided into five columns; the first under the command of Hephestion; the second under Ptolemy

† ARRIAN. l. iv. CURT. l. viii.

(Z) Whoever peruses the critical notes in the best editions of Arrian and Plutarch, will perceive, that some mistakes are imputed to the former, and many to the latter, in the accounts they give us of these marches, and other transactions of Alexander, yet whoever reads Strabo's geography, wherein these matters are treated more largely, though, generally speaking, with conformity enough to the descriptions of the writers above-mentioned, and compares them with authentic relations of the state of the Usbeck-Tartars, and of the north-east provinces of the present Persian empire, will find, that these censures are, for the most part, very indifferently founded; and that these antient writers are very far from being in the wrong. This deserves particular regard in respect of the transactions we are now coming to; for it is certain, that the countries are well described, and that what is said of fortifying rocks, and making granaries under ground, are not either dreams or fictions. On the contrary, if an European army were again to make war in these countries, the history of their actions would not only transcend any thing recorded by Arrian, but, in all probability, appear more romantic to us than any of the stories of Curtius himself, who, on a careful and impartial perusal, will appear not to have erred so much in facts, as in his manner of relating them, attending more to the method and elegance, than to the certainty and accuracy of his history.

Lagus;

Lagus; the third was commanded by Perdiccas; the fourth by Cænus and Artabazus; the last he led himself. The rest of the corps spread themselves over the country, reducing all the castles and other fortresses they met with, and which were held by the enemy. The body commanded by Alexander marched on to Maracanda, where shortly after the rest of the columns arrived; the whole province being reduced under his subjection. Spitamenes, however, who was at the head of the revolted Sogdians, retired towards Scythia, and having procured a supply of six hundred horse, he suddenly entered Bactria, surprized a castle, where he put the governor and garison to the sword, and then advanced to the very suburbs of Zariaspa; but, not having a force sufficient, he could not besiege the town. However, some Macedonian horsemen, who had been left there sick, finding themselves now a little better, immediately mounted, and followed him. The Scythians were so terrified at their approach, that they abandoned all their booty; but while the Macedonians were employed in collecting it together, Spitamenes prevailed on his Scythians to take post in a wood behind them, from whence perceiving the victors to return carelessly, and without order, they suddenly issued, and cut them off to a man. As soon as the news of this defeat came to Craterus, he immediately marched against the Massagetae, who, when they heard of his approach, fled towards the desert; but were hotly pursued by him; and they, and others of the same nation, to the number of about a thousand horse, were overtaken just at the edge thereof, and a sharp conflict happening thereupon, the Macedonians were victors. Of the Barbarians about one hundred and fifty were slain; the rest escaped into the desert, Craterus and his soldiers not being able to pursue them farther. In the mean while Artabazus, begging to be discharged from his government of Bactria, by reason of his advanced age, his petition was granted; and Alexander substituted Amyntas the son of Nicolaus to succeed him, and having left Cænus there, with his own and Meleager's troops, besides four hundred of the auxiliary horse, all the pikemen on horseback, and the Bactrians and Sogdians under Amyntas, the chief command over all those was given to Cænus, who ordered them to winter in Sogdia, partly for garisons to defend the country, and partly to encounter Spitamenes, if he should attempt to make any inroad there during the winter. But Spitamenes, understanding that all places were filled with Macedonian garisons, and that it would be a difficult matter for him to make a retreat, if he had occasion, resolved at once to turn his whole power against Cæ-

nus and his forces, imagining he would penetrate the most easily into the country that way; and when he approached Gabæ, a fortified place belonging to the Sogdians, seated on the borders between them and the Massagetæ-Scythians, he drew in four thousand Scythian horse to join his forces, that they might make an irruption into Sogdia. These Scythians being extreme poor, as having neither cities, nor fixed and certain habitations, nor possessing any thing which they were afraid to lose, were easily induced to join their forces with any nation. Cænus, having intelligence of Spitamenés's approach, marched forth with his army to meet him; and a sharp battle thereupon ensued, in which the victory fell to the Macedonians. The Barbarians lost above eight hundred horse, and Cænus about twenty five horse and twelve foot in this conflict. The Sogdians who survived this day's action, as also many of the Bactrians, leaving Spitamenés in his flight, came to Cænus, and, having surrendered themselves into his power, swore fidelity to him. But the Massagetæ, and other Scythians, after the loss of the battle, having seized upon the baggage of the Bactrians and Sogdians their allies, accompanied Spitamenés in his flight into the desert; but when they came to understand, that Alexander was preparing to scour these places, they slew Spitamenés, and, having cut off his head, sent it as a present to Alexander, hoping by this action to make him cease his pursuit after them. This is Arrian's account; as for that of Curtius, it is so little consistent therewith, that we are under a necessity of giving it by itself, and leaving it to the reader, whether he will credit the foregoing very probable, or that very surprizing story<sup>8</sup> (A).

AT

<sup>8</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 18.

(A) Spitamenés had a wife on whom he doated, and as the dangers and fatigues she was exposed to in accompanying him wherever his misfortunes drove him, were become troublesome to her, she employed all her charms to prevail with him to desist from flying any farther; and as he had already experienced Alexander's clemency, to try to appease the anger of an enemy he could hope no otherwise to escape. She had three sons by him, who were pretty well grown up. These she brought to his embraces, and begged he would at least take pity of them; and, to enforce her prayers, she told him Alexander was not far off. But he thinking he was betrayed, and not advised, and that it was the confidence she had in her beauty, which made her not care how soon she came into Alexander's power, drew his sword, and would have killed her, if her brothers had not happily interposed. However, he commanded her to be gone out of his sight, threatening her with death

it

AT the opening of the spring, the king marched into Sogdia, in order to besiege a fortress built on a rock, to which Oxyartes the Bactrian had conveyed his wife and family, The Sogdian rock besieged and taken.

if she offered to come into his presence ; and that he might not be sensible of her absence, he passed the night with his concubines ; yet as his passion for her was great, it was the more inflamed by the distaste he took to their company. He therefore gave himself intirely again to her, conjuring her never to speak to him more on that account, but willingly undergo with him whatever fortune did allot them ; since, for his own part, he had rather die than surrender himself. Hereupon she excused herself, telling him, that she had advised him only to what she thought was most for his interest, and, admitting she had talked like a woman, yet it was with a faithful intention ; however, for the future she would conform to his pleasure. Spitamenes, won by this counterfeit complaisance, gave a great entertainment on account of their reconciliation, where, having loaded himself with wine and good cheer, he was brought half asleep into his apartment. As soon as his wife perceived he was in a sound sleep, she drew a sword she had under her garment for the purpose, and cut off his head, and, all besmeared with the blood, gave it to a servant who was privy to her crime ; and, being attended by him, came in this bloody condition to the Macedonian camp, where she sent word to Alexander, she had something of importance to communicate to him, and which he must hear from her own mouth. The king immediately ordered her to be introduced, and observing her to be stained with blood, imagined she came to complain of some affront offered her ; he therefore asked her what she had to say ? Hereupon she called for the servant that waited in the entry, who, having Spitamenes's head under his garment, gave the guards a suspicion, and, upon their searching him, he pulled out the head, and shewed it ; but the bloodless paleness had so disfigured its features, that it was a hard matter to distinguish whose it was. Alexander being informed, that it was a man's head that he brought, went out of his tent, and inquired into the matter ; which he accordingly told him. The king's mind was now perplexed with variety of thoughts ; for, on the one hand, he looked upon it as a considerable piece of service, that he who was first a refugee, and had afterwards proved a traitor, and was like to have delayed the execution of his great designs, was killed ; but then again he detested the barbarous action of her having thus treacherously murdered her husband, who had deserved well of her, and by whom she had several children. At last the foulness of the fact got the better of the service it did him, so that he sent her word to be gone from the camp, lest the Greeks more humane minds and gentler manners should be corrupted by the example of so barbarous an action (70).

as to a place impregnable. It was indeed the last resource of the rebels, and Alexander rightly judged, that unless he could reduce it by force, it would afford them a constant retreat, and so spin out the war to an excessive length. When he arrived at the place, he found it strong beyond his apprehension ; for the rock was not only rugged and steep, but so slippery also, that it was almost impossible to ascend it ; besides it was covered with snow, which melted afforded the besieged plenty of water, their granaries being filled with corn ; so that there was as little probability of starving them by a blockade, as reducing them by a siege ; yet Alexander resolved to attempt it by the method last-mentioned. To this he was the more strongly urged by the answer sent him, when he summoned the place ; for the commandant then told him, That when he had a corps of soldiers with wings, he might expect to take the place. In order to push matters as far as they would go without loss of time, of which the Macedonians were always frugal, he caused a proclamation to be made, offering the soldier who should first gain the rock twelve talents, and prizes of an inferior, but still great, value to those who should mount after him : The last being to have three hundred darics, which amounted to about three hundred pounds. On the publication of this reward, no less than three hundred of the Macedonians offered themselves for this service. These men taking with them their tent pins and strong ropes, went to make their attempt on that side of the rock which was least accessible, on a supposition, that there they should find the least opposition. In this conjecture tho' they were not deceived, yet in the very getting up they lost thirty of their number, whose bodies were never found, being, by the height of their fall, deeply interred in the snow ; for the manner in which they ascended the rock was thus : They struck their iron-pins into such places as would afford them fastening, and having fixed ropes to these pins, they ascended by those ropes ; whenever therefore either the pins or the ropes gave way, the Macedonians fell, and, as we observed before, were lost in the snow. Those who got up safely making the appointed signal from the top of the rock, Alexander summoned the place a second time, giving the besieged to understand, that he had now a corps of winged soldiers. The Macedonians above, in compliance with the signal from below, making a loud shout and clattering their weapons, the garrison were so much affrighted, that, without making any inquiry as to the number of those who were got up, they surrendered the place at discretion.

Oxyartes

Oxyartes was absent when this fortress fell thus into the hands of the king, who entertained his wife and family with that civility and honour for which he was so justly famous. The daughter of Oxyartes, whose name was Roxana, was esteemed the most beautiful woman in Asia, after the death of the wife of Darius ; and she had the good fortune to subdue the heart of Alexander, who hitherto had not given any signs of an amorous disposition. Some writers say, that he saw this lady at a feast, and that he was so taken with her beauty, that he immediately ordered bread to be divided between them, according to the Macedonian method of espousing ; but Arrian says nothing of this. He only tells us, that Alexander, falling violently in love with his captive, was yet a man of so much honour and temperance, that he would not make use of the privilege of war, but openly and generously espoused the lady ; of which Oxyartes having advice, he instantly came and rendered himself, and was received with all the testimonies of kindness and respect <sup>b</sup>.

AFTER the reduction of Sogdia, Alexander determined to march into the country of the Paratacæ, where there was another fortress on a rock held to be absolutely irreducible. This was called the rock of Chorienæ, because one of the principal noblemen of the country of that name had retired thither for shelter, and had with him a very numerous garrison, well stored with all sorts of provisions. The sloping height of this rock was near five miles, its circuit near fifteen ; but it was every-where so steep and craggy, that, except by a narrow way wrought by art, it was absolutely inaccessible. The whole was surrounded by a deep and broad ditch. These difficulties served only more strongly to determine Alexander to overcome them ; he therefore provided instantly for the siege, by cutting down a vast number of trees, of which ladders were made for descending the ditch, it being dry. One half of his army was employed all day in this labour ; the other half, by three divisions, wrought all night in the ditch itself, where they began to drive huge piles, and to cover them with hurdles, and other proper materials for establishing a solid bridge, over which the army might march to the assault. At first those in the fort derided their attempt ; but when they saw them proceed briskly in it, and found, that themselves, with all their advantage of situation, were not able to injure them with their missile weapons, by reason of their contrivances to cover themselves in the ditch, they began to be dismayed ; so that at length Chorienes sent to desire that Oxyartes would come and confer with him ; which was accordingly granted. Oxyartes having assured him, that nothing was inaccessible to the spirit and industry of the Macedonians ; and that, on the other hand, there could not be a more generous or merciful enemy than Alexander, he so wrought on Chorienes, that, with some of the principal persons who were with him, he descended the rock, and went to wait on Alexander in his camp. The king received him so obligingly, that he presently sent back some who accompanied him, to direct the garison to yield up the place ; which was performed without delay. Alexander then ascended with five hundred armed foot, to take a view of the place, which afforded him great satisfaction, on account as well of its capaciousness and conveniency, as of its extraordinary strength. However, in respect of Chorienes, he left no garison there ; but having enrolled him in the number of his friends, committed it again to his charge. This nobleman, to give some testimony of the sense he had of such honourable treatment, finding Alexander's army was much distressed for want of provisions, distributed corn, wine, and salt-meat, for two months to all his soldiers, and at the same time declared, that he had not exhausted the tenth part of his own stores. This made the favour appear still greater in the king's eyes, since it demonstrated the surrender of Chorienes to have proceeded solely from the sense of Alexander's generosity, and not of any necessity he was under <sup>1</sup> (B).

<sup>b</sup> ARRIAN. l. iv. c. 20,—24. CURT. l. viii. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

Catanes

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN l. iv. c. 24, 25.

(B) The accounts given us by Curtius of the Sogdian rocks are really irreconcilable to probability, or to themselves. The commander of the first rock he calls Arimazes. He describes the rock itself as if it were hollow within ; and as he is fond of any opportunity of digressing, describing, and exercising his talent in rhetoric, so on this occasion he introduces Alexander making a speech to those who were to mount the rock, obliges us with their answer, and afterwards enters into a long and pompous detail of the difficulties surmounted by them in scaling of this rock. Last of all he tells us, that when Arimazes came down and submitted himself to the king, with thirty of the principal persons who had taken shelter with him, he ordered them to be first whipped, and then crucified, notwithstanding that he was in great doubt of their throwing his handful of men down who had scaled the top of the rock ; a proceeding directly opposite to common sense and reason (71). In the province of Naura he tells us, that Alex-

(71) Curt. l. vii. c. 11.

ander

Catenes and Austanes were now the only rebels remaining in this country. Against these Craterus was dispatched, with a considerable body of horse and foot; and a battle ensuing, the barbarians were entirely routed, Catenes slain, and Austanes taken alive, and put in chains. All things being now in a state of quiet, Alexander advanced over mount Caucasus, as his soldiers called it, and in ten days time reached the city of Alexandria, which he had founded. There he displaced the governor, because he had been wanting in his duty; and leaving here such of his Macedonian foot as were unfit for further service, he, after pompous sacrifices to Minerva, advanced to the river Cophenes. Thence he dispatched a herald to Taxiles and the other princes on this side the river Indus, directing them to come forth and meet him, as he advanced towards their territories; which they accordingly performed, bringing with them the most valuable presents which their dominions would afford; Taxiles, in the name of the rest, making him a promise, that they would present him with twenty-five elephants*. Curtius tells us, that this In-ander besieged another prodigious rock, of which Sifimithres was governor. This man, he says, had two sons by his own mother; which, he informs us, was a thing customary in that country; and that this wife and mother of his with-held him, by her arguments, from surrendering the place, when his friend Oxyartes had taken pains to come and treat with him. At last, however, Sifimithres yielded himself, his family, the people under his command, and the rock, to Alexander, who treated him with great humanity (72). A little after Curtius tells us of the king's entering into a province governed by one Cobortanus, who treated the king with great magnificence: and that his daughter Roxana coming in at this feast, the king fell passionately in love with her, and being immediately betrothed to her afterwards married her (73). Here are a multitude of mistakes, if we credit the best Greek authors; for Roxana was not the daughter of Cobortanus, but of Oxyartes; nay, this Cobortanus is met with no-where else. In all probability he was the same with the Choriænes of Arrian. As for Sifimithres, he is mentioned by Plutarch, who tells us, that Alexander asked Oxyartes, if this man was a man of courage? To which he answered, No. Then, said the king, the rock is our own, if it were indeed impregnable in its nature (74). These passages are evidently discordant, and therefore we have not inserted them in the text, that they might not perplex or impede the reader in his prospect of Alexander's conquests.

The war transferred towards the Indus.

* Idem ibid.

(72) Idem l. viii. c. 2.

(73) Idem ibid. l. viii.

c. 4. (74) Plut. in vit. Alex.

dian king, or his son, whom he calls Omphis, presented Alexander with fifty-six elephants, and three thousand bulls, a crown of gold, and a considerable sum of coined silver ; which presents, as they bespoke the respect and kindness of the giver, had such an effect on the mind of the conqueror, that he not only restored the king his own presents, but added a thousand talents to them <sup>1</sup>. Plutarch has the same story with respect to these thousand talents ; but, in all probability, they were extracted from some of the memoirs of Alexander, written rather to surprize and amaze mankind with fictitious adventures, than really to inform them of what he did <sup>m</sup>. Hephestion, with part of the army, was sent, with king Taxiles and the rest of the Indian Princes, absolutely to reduce the country as far as the river Indus ; and on their coming thither, they were directed to make the necessary preparations for the king's passing over with all his forces. Hephestion executed this commission with little trouble, only one of the petty princes in the country presuming to make any resistance ; and he being slain, and the city, where he had fortified himself, taken by storm, it struck such a terror as kept all the adjacent country in great quiet. Alexander, in the mean time, bent his march, with the rest of his forces, towards the river Choe, by some called Choaspes, on the banks of which he found a rough and barbarous people, whose cities he prepared to reduce. The first he attacked was surrounded by a double wall ; and yet the people therein were so hardy, that they issued out into the field and offered him battle. Alexander, with his horse and light-armed troops, immediately engaged them, and, after a short and smart conflict, compelled them to take shelter in the place ; he was, however, slightly wounded in the shoulder. Ptolemy son of Lagus, and Leonatus, two of his principal captains, shared the same fate. He then caused the place to be invested, and the next day attacked the first wall where he thought it weakest. The inhabitants made a vigorous defence ; but finding it absolutely ineffectual, they at last retired within the inner wall, and while the Macedonians were preparing to attack that also, they opened their gates on the other side towards the mountain, whereby many of them made their escape, tho' numbers were slain by Alexander's soldiers, who were so enraged at his being wounded, that they gave no quarter. The king then ordered the city to be razed, and afterwards proceeded to Andaca, a most considerable city in those parts. This was rendered to him upon terms, and he left Craterus there with the heavy-armed forces, to reduce all the rest of the country and to settle it. Himself, with the horse and light-armed troops, continued their march to the river Euaspla, where the chief strength of the Aspii, the principal nation in those parts, was assembled. After two days hard march they drew near the city, which the enemy immediately fired and withdrew towards the mountains, whither, however, the Macedonians pursued them, and cut off great numbers in their rear. Here it was, that Ptolemy the son of Lagus gave a shining proof of his bravery; for he attacked the general of the Aspii, who was posted on a little hill, and in a single combat slew him. The barbarians, on the other hand, fought desperately to preserve his body, till that Alexander, at the head of some dismounted horse, ascended the hill, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire without carrying off their dead general. He passed next over one of these mountains, and advanced to the city Ariganus, which he found burnt and deserted; but Craterus having now rejoined the army, he left him there with orders to repair it, and people it with such of the inhabitants of the country as were willing to dwell therein, and such invalids as were glad to have a place to dwell in. The king still advanced, till encamping at the foot of a mountain, Ptolemy the son of Lagus informed him, that he discerned a great camp of the barbarians, and a multitude of fires therein. Alexander thereupon divided his army into three bodies; the first under the command of Leonatus; the second under Ptolemy; and the third commanded by himself. All three advanced towards the enemy; which when the barbarians perceived, trusting to their numbers, they rushed into the plain; but their violence putting them into confusion, tho' they behaved bravely, and fought stoutly, yet the Macedonians had the victory in the centre, where Alexander commanded, after putting vast numbers to the sword. Ptolemy was constrained to attack a considerable body of the enemy posted upon a hill. He, marching up that side of it which was most accessible, without attempting to surround it at the bottom, constrained the enemy to fly, and, by leaving them an open passage, tempted them to fly the sooner. Leonatus on his side also prevailed; but the victory was bloody every-where. According to Ptolemy's memoirs, the enemy lost forty thousand men, and two hundred and thirty thousand head of cattle; which Alexander perceiving to excel those of Greece, both in size and beauty, he caused the largest and fairest to be chosen out and sent them into Macedon, where they might serve to mend the breed, and to perpetuate the memory of his conquests. After this battle he continued some time encamped, that Craterus might have time to join him ; which when he had done with the heavy-armed foot, Alexander began immediately to project a new expedition for reducing the Affaceni, who were said to have twenty thousand horse, thirty thousand foot, and thirty elephants, ready to take the field <sup>n</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> CURT. l. viii c. 12.      <sup>m</sup> PLUT. in vit. Alex.

to

The city of Mazaga with much difficulty
taken.

IN order to reach these Affaceni, Alexander was forced to pass through the territory of the Guræi, which he did with his horse and light armed troops, and crossed a very rapid river in that country, not without much difficulty, on account of the swift current of the water, and round slippery stones at the bottom, whereon neither man nor horse could tread with safety. The Affaceni, when they were well assured of this, retired into the city, and abandoned all thoughts of defence of the plain and open country. This capital of theirs is by Curtius called Mazaga, by Strabo Magosa, by Diodorus Massaca, by Arrian Massaga. It was certainly a well fortified city, from the pains that it cost Alexander to reduce it ; and if Curtius took the description he gives us from any author who had really seen it, we might reasonably esteem the siege thereof one of the boldest enterprizes that Alexander ever undertook. The government of this country, at the time Alexander invaded it, was in the hands of a woman, as Plutarch, Curtius, and Justin agree ; the latter calls her Cleophes. She was according to them the wife of Affacenus, but Arrian says nothing of her, though he seems to acknowledge that the fact was so <sup>o</sup>. This lady had very providently entertained a body of seven thousand mercenary Indians, who, from the upper India, came to put themselves into the place, and, as Plutarch tells us, they also hired themselves out for the defence of other cities. These Indians, perceiving that the army of Alexander was far from being numerous, persuaded the garrison to issue out, and try their fate in the field, that so, if it were possible, a siege might be avoided. This was accordingly done, and Alexander rightly conceiving, that if the battle was fought immediately under the walls of the city, the enemy would reap great advantages therefrom, drew up his phalanx a mile behind his horse and archers, causing these to advance before the enemy, and then, as if amazed or dismayed, to retire towards those. His stratagem had its desired effect, the Indians, conceiving highly of their own valour, followed the Macedonians, as if they had already defeated them ; but when they drew near the hill where Alexander had posted his phalanx, the horse and archers attacked them in both wings, and the king with his foot charged in the centre. Thus the Indians were broke at the first shock, and exposed to great slaughter in their retreat to the city, though they behaved with great bravery, and taught Alexander to conceive better of them, than of any of the nations he had yet met with. Immediately after this victory, Alexander caused the city to be invested, and going to take a view of the works which he had ordered to be erected before it, he had the misfortune to be wounded in the leg. Curtius enlarges mightily upon this accident; he informs us, that the king, notwithstanding this wound, continued his observations on horseback, without suffering it to be bound up; that afterwards, feeling himself exceedingly pained, he was forced to have it dressed, but continued, however, giving the necessary directions, till all things were done that he desired; being, however, so sensible of pain, that he could not help saying, Though I am called the son of Jupiter, I feel like other men the smart of wounds, and the pain of diseases <sup>r</sup>. Arrian tells us, that he was wounded indeed, but that the very next day he ordered his engines to be brought to batter the place. A bridge being made, the king gave directions that it should be immediately assaulted, which was accordingly performed with that vigour and vivacity shewn by the Macedonians upon all occasions. The Indians, however, repulsed him with considerable loss. The next day the city was stormed again with the like ill success. On the third day Alexander caused a large wooden tower to be drawn before the breach, and a draw-bridge to be let fall from thence, that his men might pass over the more easily. This was a good contrivance, and answered the end; but, the soldiers rushing forwards in too great numbers, the bridge broke, and they fell all into the ditch, where the defendants from the wall plied them with stones, arrows, and darts, so that Alexander was forced to send Alcetas with a fresh body of troops to bring them off. The fourth day a new bridge was made, and the soldiers again attempted the place, but to no purpose. The mercenary Indians, as long as their general survived, behaved themselves so gallantly, that Alexander was not likely at all to gain the city; but he being killed by a dart from one of the engines, and many of the soldiers disabled by their wounds, the rest were desirous of treating with Alexander, which they did by a herald; and for the sake of avoiding unnecessary effusion of blood, the king granted them these terms, as Arrian affirms, that they should safely march out of the city, and serve under him upon the same terms they did there. On these conditions they accordingly marched out, and, armed as they were, encamped on a hill at some distance from Alexander's camp. In the evening Alexander received advice, that these Indians were determined to march off in the night, that they might not be obliged to serve amongst the Macedonians against their brethren. Upon this he surrounded their camp with his own soldiers, and cut them all to pieces<sup>9</sup>. Diodorus Siculus gives us a very distinct account of this business, and treats it as the blackest act of perfidy that ever was committed; he does not indeed say, that the Indians were to be taken into the service of Alexander, but that they had leave to march out of the place, and that when they were marched out, the king followed them, and fell upon them. This engaging them to cry aloud, that he had violated his oath, and to call upon the gods to revenge it; he equivocally answered, that he had given his oath that they should come safely out of the city, but not that they should remain friends to the Macedonians; in consequence of which impious distinction, he killed them and their wives too, who bravely fought to defend their husbands<sup>r</sup>. Plutarch allows, that this barbarous action left an indelible stain upon his memory<sup>s</sup>. The city of Massaga was soon after taken, and therein, according to Arrian, the mother and daughter of Assacenus; according to all other authors, his widow. Curtius says, that she went out at the head of a procession of noble ladies, carrying golden goblets of wine in their hands; and that she procured to herself not only pardon, but the continuance of her dignity, rather from her excellent beauty, than from her eloquence, or from any inclination of pity in the king. He adds, that she had some time after a son, who, whatever father he had, was called Alexander<sup>t</sup>. Justin is still more plain, he says that she procured this indulgence by prostituting herself to Alexander, and that the Indians ever after were pleased to stile her the royal whore<sup>u</sup>; so far, it seems, Alexander travelled to find a more steady and settled virtue, than was known in the schools of Greece.

<sup>n</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra.      <sup>o</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 26. CURT. lib. viii c. 10 JUSTIN. lib. xii. c. 7. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

<sup>r</sup> JUSTIN. lib. xii c. 7. CURT lib. viii c. 10.

Ora taken, THE next undertaking of Alexander was the siege of Ora, and Bazi- in order to which he detached Attalus, Alcetas, and Deme- ra. trius, to invest it, while in the mean time Cænus marched to

<sup>9</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 27.<sup>r</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvii.<sup>s</sup> In vit Alex.<sup>t</sup> CURT. lib. viii. c. 10.<sup>u</sup> JUSTIN. ubi supra.

besiege

†

besiege Bazira, another strong city. Neither of these places surrendered on the arrival of the king's forces, as it had been supposed they would ; but on the contrary, made all the necessary preparations for a vigorous defence ; so that Cænus was forced to turn his siege into a blockade, and the king himself was constrained to go in person to the siege of Ora. This city was surrounded with a strong wall, and had in it a considerable garison of mercenary Indians ; yet Alexander quickly reduced it, seizing all the elephants therein for the use of his army. The inhabitants of Bazira, when they were informed of this, took the advantage of a dark night to pass by the troops left by Cænus to block up the city, and escaped to the mountains behind them. From these hills the inhabitants of Bazira, associating themselves with such as were willing to defend their liberty to the last, withdrew to a certain rock, which, if not impregnable by its situation, they thought might be rendered so by their own skill and courage<sup>w</sup>.

THE rock of Aornus was in circuit two hundred furlongs, or not much less than twenty five of our miles. Its height even in its lowest parts eleven furlongs, the way leading to it artificial, and very narrow : On the top of it there was a fine plain, part of which was covered with a thick wood ; the rest arable land with a fountain, furnishing abundance of excellent water. There was a report among the inhabitants of the adjacent country, that Hercules himself had besieged this place in vain. Arrian delivers it as his opinion, that this report was without foundation ; but it is more than probable, that the report itself was raised after Alexander had taken it, in order to magnify his exploit. However it was, after making the necessary dispositions for preserving the country in peace behind him, he marched to Embolina, the nearest city, from whence he afterwards advanced to the rock itself. While he was preparing all things for the siege, an old man and his two sons, who had long lived in a cavern near the summit of the rock, came to offer their services to Alexander, to shew him a private way of ascending it ; which proposition was readily embraced, and Ptolemy with a considerable body of light-armed troops, were sent with him ; with orders, in case they succeeded, to intrench themselves strongly upon the rock, with the wood which the old man was to direct them to, before they attempted to attack the Indians. Ptolemy exactly executed all that had been given him in charge, and when he had so done, caused a lighted torch to be erected in his camp upon a pole, as a signal to Alexander that they were safely got up.

The siege of Aornus resolved on.

<sup>w</sup> ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 27—28. DIODOR. ubi supra. CURT. lib. viii. c. 11. JUSTIN. lib. xii. c. 7.

The rock of Aornus reduced.

THE king gave immediate orders for a body of troops to attempt the passage, whereby the rock was ordinarily ascended, from which, however, they were repulsed by the Indians with great slaughter. Then the king sent an Indian, whom he could trust, with letters to Ptolemy, directing him at such time as he attacked the rock next, to issue from his camp, and fall upon the enemy behind. But in the intermediate space, those who defended the rock attacked Ptolemy with great vigour, and were, though with much ado, at last repulsed. This, however, did not hinder that general from obeying the orders that were sent him ; for when Alexander renewed the attack the next day, he on his side came out of his camp with a part of his soldiers, and attacked the enemy in the rear : the Indians repelled the Macedonians on both sides, and though Alexander did himself ascend as far as Ptolemy's post with a detachment of chosen men, yet still all they could do was ineffectual, so that the king was forced to turn his thoughts another way ; he saw clearly, that the great advantage of the Indians was the straightness and declivity of the way by which they were attacked ; in order therefore that his forces might fight upon more equal terms, he caused a vast quantity of trees to be cut down, and with them filled up the cavities between the plain where the enemy was encamped, and the highest of his advanced posts. When the Indians understood his design, they despised it as a thing impracticable ; but when they saw with what ardor this work was carried on, and felt the effects of it from the missive weapons which were now thrown among them by the engines, they began to change their sentiments, insomuch, that they sent deputies to propose terms of surrender, which when Alexander had heard, he presently suspected their true design was to amuse him till they made their escape ; upon which he withdrew his guards from the avenues, and as soon as he knew that the Indians were descended, he with seven hundred light-armed foot from Ptolemy's post, took possession of the deserted rock, and then made a signal for his forces to fall upon the flying Indians. They, setting up a loud shout, so terrified the fugitives, that numbers of them fell from the rocks and precipices, and were beat to pieces ; of the remainder, the greater part were cut off in the roads. Thus, as Alexander's soldiers boasted, that rock was taken, before which Hercules himself had been foiled. Certain it is, that the king sacrificed there with great pomp, and left a garrison under the command of Syllectus, who had formerly served Bessus ; but had now for some time been in Alexander's army, and behaved with much fidelity *. From hence he marched again into the territories of the Assaceni, where the brother of the deceased king had taken up arms; however, when he came he found the cities deserted, and the country totally abandoned. Finding therefore that little could be done there, he made it his business to find out and seize such elephants, as the Indians had been forced to leave in the plain country; and after a march of sixteen days he arrived at the river Indus, where Hephestion and Perdiccas had already provided a bridge of boats for the passage of the army † (C).

Arrian is very nice in his account of Alexander's passing this river; but neither the importance of the thing, since he passed it without opposition, or the nature of this work, which would be rendered tedious thereby, allow us to dwell here upon matters which must be retouched, when we come to the history of India. The king refreshed his army for thirty days in the countries on the other side of the river, which were those of his friend and ally Taxiles, who at this time performed all that he had promised to the king giving him thirty elephants, and joining his army now with seven hundred Indian horse, to which, when they were to enter upon action, he afterwards added five thousand foot; the true reason of this seems to have been his enmity to Porus, a famous Indian prince, whose territories lay on the other side of the river Hydaspes. During this recess, the king sacrificed with great solemnity,

Alexander passes the rivers Indus and Hydaspes.
Year of the Flood, 2672.
Before Christ, 327.

* ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 28. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvii. CURT. lib. viii. c. 11. JUSTIN. lib. xii. c. 7. † ARRIAN. lib. iv. cap. ult. DIODOR. ubi supra. CURT. ubi supra.

(C) Diodorus Siculus informs us, that, after the taking the rock of Aornus, the king was advised that one Aphrices, an Indian, lay not far distant with an army of twenty thousand men and fifteen elephants, in order to oppose his passage. But before the king had time to think of reducing him, the Indians themselves, whether out of hatred to their general, or in hopes of Alexander's favour, our author pretends not to determine, put their commander to death, and brought his head and armour as a present to the king (74). Curtius calls him Eryces; but he varies little in the rest of the story; it should seem that he was the general of some mercenary Indians, (75). How Arrian came to omit this event, we cannot pretend to say, unless we suppose that he doubted the truth of it, because it was omitted in the memoirs of Aristobulus and Ptolemy.

(74) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii.

(75) Curt. l. viii. c. 12.

receiving also embassadors from Ambisurus, a very potent prince, and from Doxareas, who was also a king in those parts, with tenders of their duty and considerable presents (D).

(D) There is not the least notice taken in Arrian of the Taxiles here spoken of, being another Taxiles than him mentioned before. Diodorus Siculus and Curtius, however, are positive that it was the son of him heretofore mentioned, and that the name of this man was Mopbis or Ompbis (76); and that he refused to take upon him the name of Taxiles, which was common to all the kings of the country, till Alexander commanded him so to do, and put the crown upon his head, which he did with great willingness, being extremely pleased with this extraordinary mark of submission (77). Strabo tells us, that the city of Taxila, which was the capital of this kingdom, was seated between the rivers Indus and Hydaspes; that it was extremely well built, governed by good laws, the country round about being extremely fruitful and well planted; the same author tells us, that this kingdom was as large as Egypt (78), which is also confirmed by Plutarch; he adds, that at the first interview between Alexander and Taxiles, the latter, who was reputed a very wise man, addressed him thus: To what purpose should we destroy the subjects of each other, if it be not your design to deprive us of our fruits and our water, which as they are the only things necessary to preserve the lives of men, are only worth fighting about? As to what the world calls riches, if I am better provided than thee, thou shalt share with me with all my heart; but if thou art already richer than I, I am not so proud as to refuse being obliged to you, or so base as to think of being ungrateful for your favours. To which Alexander replied, Do not think, Taxiles, that by these fair speeches you shall avoid contending with me; I will no more be overcome in civility than war; and therefore, do what you will, I will oblige you still more. Which promise of his he accordingly made good, not only by bestowing on the king great presents, but also by making large additions to his dominions (79). After this, Arrian and indeed all other authors agree, that Alexander proceeded to reduce Nysa, a famous city, said to be built Bacchus, at this time governed by its own laws, and living in a state of freedom: We did not think fit, however, to enter into a detail of what passed between Alexander and the deputies from this city in the text, because Arrian himself, though he has related it at large, seems to doubt very much of the fact, or rather to look upon it as a fable (80). To say the truth, there are so many things of importance belonging to the history of Alexander, that we are willing to pass by, as briefly as we may, such romantic stories as these, that we may not omit things at once more pleasing and more profitable to the reader.

(76) Diodor. l. xvii. (77) Curt. l. viii. 12. (78) Strab. Geogr. l. xv.
 (79) Plut. in vit. Alex. (80) Arrian. l. v. Diodor. Curt. Justin.
Plut. &c.

These ceremonies over, Alexander appointed Philip governor of Taxila, and put a Macedonian garison into the place, because he intended to erect an hospital there for the cure of his sick and wounded soldiers. These things once performed, he ordered the vessels, of which his bridge had been composed when he passed the Indus, to be taken to pieces, that they might be brought to the Hydaspes, where he was informed, that Porus, with a great army, lay encamped to hinder his passage. When he approached the banks of this river with his army and the auxiliaries under the command of Taxiles, he found that the people he had to do with were not so easily to be subdued, as the Persians and other Asiatics. The Indians were not only a very tall and robust, but also a very hardy and well-disciplined, people ; and their king Porus, a prince of high spirit, invincible courage, and great conduct. It was about the summer solstice when Alexander reached the Hydaspes, and consequently its waters were broader, deeper, and more rapid than at any other time ; for in India the rivers swell, as the sun's increasing heat melts the snow, and subside again as winter approaches ; Alexander therefore had every difficulty to struggle with. Porus had made his dispositions so judiciously, that Alexander found it impossible to practice upon him, as he had done upon others, and to pass the river in his view ; wherefore he was constrained to divide his army into small parties, and to practice other arts, in order to get the better of so vigilant a prince <sup>2</sup>. To this end he caused a great quantity of corn and other provisions to be brought into his camp, giving out, that he intended to remain where he was till the river fell, and, by becoming fordable, should give him an opportunity of forcing a passage : This did not, however, hinder Porus from keeping up very strict discipline in his camp, which when Alexander perceived, he frequently made such motions as seemed to indicate a change of his resolution, and that he had still thoughts of passing the river. The main thing the Macedonians stood in fear of was the elephants ; for the bank being pretty steep on the other side, and it being the nature of horses to start at the first appearance of those animals, it was foreseen, that the army would be disordered, and incapable of sustaining the charge of Porus's troops. But after some time, that the kings had amused each other, Alexander, who hated inactivity, determined to pass at all events.

<sup>2</sup> ARRIAN. lib. v. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. ALEX. JUSTIN. lib. xii. c. 8. CURT. lib. viii. c. 13.

yet, before he took that resolution, he contrived a method of passing with the least danger possible, which was this: There was at the distance of one hundred and fifty stadia from his camp, a rocky promontory projecting into the river, thick covered with wood, and over-against this promontory there lay a pretty large uninhabited island almost overgrown with wood. The king therefore conceived within himself a project of conveying a body of troops from this promontory into that island, and upon this scheme he built his hopes of surprizing Porus, vigilant as he was. To this end, he kept him and his army constantly alarmed for many nights together, till he perceived that Porus apprehended it was only done to harass his troops, and therefore no longer drew out of his camp, but trusted to his ordinary guards: Then Alexander resolved to put his designs in execution. A considerable body of horse, the Macedonian phalanx, with some corps of light-armed foot, he left in his camp under the command of Craterus; as also the auxiliary Indians, giving these orders to be observed in his absence. That if Porus marched against him with part of his army, and left another part with the elephants behind in his camp, Craterus and his forces should remain where they were. But if it so happened, that Porus withdrew his elephants, then Craterus was to pass the river, because his cavalry might then do it safely. Alexander having marched half the way, or about nine of our miles, ordered the mercenary troops, under the command of Attalus and other generals, to remain there; and directed them, that as soon as they knew he was engaged with the Indians on the other side, they should pass in vessels provided for that purpose in order to assist him. Then taking a round-about road, that the enemy might not perceive his design of reaching the rock, he marched as diligently as he could towards that post. It happened very fortunately for him, that a great storm of thunder, lightning, and hail, rose in the night, whereby his march was perfectly concealed, his vessels of thirty oars put together, and his tents stuffed and stitched, so that they passed from the rock into the island, without being perceived, a little before break of day; the storm ceasing just as he and his soldiers were ready for their passage. When they had traversed the island, they boldly set forward to gain the opposite shore in sight of Porus's out-guards, who instantly posted away to give their master an account of this attempt. Alexander landed first himself, and was followed as expeditiously as possible by his forces, whom he took care to draw up as fast as they arrived. When they began their march again,

again, they found that their good fortune was not so great as at first they esteemed it ; for it appeared now, that they had not reached the continent at all, but were in truth in another island much larger than the former. They crossed it as fast as they could, and found that it was divided from the terra firma by a narrow channel, which, however, was so swelled by the late heavy rain, that the poor soldiers were forced to wade up to the breast ; when they were on the other side, the king drew them up again carefully, ordering the foot to march slowly, they being in number about six thousand, while himself with 5000 horse advanced before. As soon as Porus received intelligence that Alexander was actually passing the river, he sent his son, with two thousand horse and one hundred and twenty armed chariots, to oppose him. But they came too late, Alexander was already got on shore, and even on his march. When the Macedonian scouts perceived them advancing, they informed the king, who sent a detachment to attack them, remaining still at the head of his cavalry in expectation of Porus. But when he found that this party was unsupported, he instantly attacked them with all his horse, and defeated them with the slaughter of many, and the loss of all their armed chariots, the son of Porus being slain in the fight. The remainder of the horse returning to the camp with this disastrous account, Porus was in some confusion ; however, he took very quickly the best and wisest resolutions his circumstances would allow, which were, to leave a part of his army with some of his elephants to oppose Craterus, who was now about to pass the river also, and with the rest to march against Alexander and his forces, who were already passed. This resolution once taken, he marched immediately out of his camp at the head of four thousand horse, thirty thousand foot, three hundred chariots, and two hundred elephants. He advanced as expeditiously as he could, till he came into a plain, which was firm and sandy, where his chariots and elephants might act to advantage ; there he halted, that he might put his army in order, knowing well that he need not go in quest of his enemy. Alexander soon came up with his horse, but he did not charge Porus ; on the contrary, he made a halt, and put his troops in order, that they might be able to defend themselves in case they were attacked. When he had waited some time, his foot arrived, whom he immediately surrounded with his horse, that after so fatiguing a march, they might have time to cool and breathe themselves before they were led to engage. Porus permitted all this, because it was not his interest to fight, and because he

he depended chiefly upon his order of battle, the elephants covering his foot, so that the Macedonians could not charge them. When Alexander had disposed his foot in proper order, he placed his horse on the wings, and observing that he was much superior in them to the enemy, and that the cavalry of Porus were easy to be charged ; he resolved to let the foot have as little share as possible in this battle. To this end, having given the necessary directions to Cœnus who commanded them, he went himself to the right, and with great fury fell upon the left wing of Porus. The dispute, though short, was very bloody ; the horse of Porus, though they fought gallantly, were quickly broken ; and the foot being by this means uncovered, the Macedonians charged them. But the Indian horse rallying, came up to their relief, yet were again defeated. By this time the archers had wounded many of the elephants, and killed most of their riders, so that they did not prove less troublesome and dangerous to their own side than to the Macedonians ; whence a great confusion ensued, and Cœnus, taking this opportunity, fell in with the troops under his command, and intirely defeated the Indian army. Porus himself behaved with the greatest intrepidity and with the most excellent conduct : He gave his orders, and directed every thing as long as his troops retained their form ; and when they were broken, he retired from party to party as they made stands, and continued fighting till every corps of Indians was put to the rout. In the mean time Craterus had passed with the rest of the Macedonian army ; and these, falling upon the flying Indians, increased the slaughter of the day excessively, insomuch that twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse were killed, all the chariots hacked to pieces, and the elephants not killed were taken : two of Porus's sons fell here, as also most of his officers of all ranks. As for himself, Alexander gave strict directions that no injury might be done to his person ; he even sent Taxiles to persuade him to surrender himself, and to assure him, that he should be treated with all the kindness and respect imaginable ; but Porus disdainig this advice from the mouth of an old enemy, threw a javelin at him, and had killed him, but for the quick turn of his horse. Meroe the Indian, who was also in the service of Alexander, succeeded better ; he had been the old acquaintance of Porus, and therefore, when he entreated that prince to spare his person, and to submit himself to fortune and a generous victor, being weary and almost choaked with thirst, Porus stopped his elephant, alighted, and, having refreshed himself with a little water, water, desired his friend to conduct him to Alexander. As soon as the Macedonian knew that Porus was coming, he went with some of his friends to meet him. At this interview, Alexander was greatly surprized ; the Indian king was seven foot high, exactly proportioned, of a noble aspect, and in his air and behaviour preserved such an unconquered spirit, that Alexander was charmed with him, insomuch that he desired Meroe to ask him, How he would please to be treated? Porus answered, As a king ; which when it was reported to Alexander, he said, That for my own sake I shall do. And therein, returned Porus, is comprehended all that I can ask. This so well suited the genius of his conqueror, that we may say, the condition of this Indian king suffered nothing by the loss of the battle. Alexander gave him his liberty immediately, restored him shortly after to his kingdom, to which he also annexed provinces almost equal to it in value. Neither was Alexander a loser by his munificence, for Porus remained his true friend, and constant ally <sup>a</sup>.

Alexander, to perpetuate the memory of his victory, ordered two cities to be erected, one on the field of battle, which he named Nicæa, which seems to have been the same which Plutarch says was built to the memory of his famous dog Peritas ; the other on this side of the river, where his camp had been, which he called Bucephala, in honour of his horse who died there, as Arrian says, of mere old age, being on the verge of thirty. All the soldiers who fell in the battle he buried with great honours, offered solemn sacrifices to the gods, and exhibited pompous shews on the banks of the Hydaspes, where he had forced his passage. After this short recess from war, he, at the head of his horse and light-armed troops, entered the territories of the Glauxæ, in which there were thirty seven good cities and a multitude of populous villages ; all which were delivered up to him without fighting ; and as soon as they were given up to him, he presented them to Porus ; and having reconciled him to Taxiles, he sent the latter home to his own dominions. About this time ambassadors arrived from Abissarès, professing, that himself and his kingdom were at his devotion ; among these ambassadors was his brother who brought a large present and forty elephants. Alexander directed Abissares to repair to him in person, and having given orders to Philip to march with a body of troops to reduce the Affaceni who were revolted, himself with the rest of his army marched to the river Acesines, which being fifteen furlongs broad, extremely rapid, having great rocks in the midst of its channel, he passed it with much difficulty, making use both of his vessels and his skins. However, those on the latter escaped best, for when they struck against the rocks, the very force of the blow threw them off again; whereas the like accident dashed the vessels to pieces. On the other side of this river lay the territories of another Porus, whose conduct had been very fluctuating during the course of this war; for at some times he had thoughts of submitting himself to Alexander, at others he determined to oppose him, at last he abandoned his dominions, and led away with him those soldiers who ought to have defended them. Alexander in pursuit of him passed the Hydraotes, another Indian river, and having now conquered the whole kingdom of this other Porus, he gave it to Porus his ally <sup>b</sup>.

His proceedings in the conquest of India.

<sup>a</sup> ARRIAN. lib. v. c. 14, 15, 16. PLUT. invit. Alex. CURT. lib. viii. JUSTIN. lib. xii.

The Indians confederate against him.

IN the midst of all this success, Alexander received advice that the Cathei, Oxydracæ, and the Malli, the most warlike nations in India, were confederated against him, and had drawn together a great army. The king immediately marched to give them battle. In a few days he reached the city of Sangala, seated on the top of a hill, and having a fine lake behind it. Before this city the confederate Indians lay encamped, having three circular lines of carriages locked together, and their tents pitched in the centre. It was evident enough to the Macedonians, that the forcing of these people would be a work of great difficulty; however, Alexander resolved immediately to attack them; in pursuance of which resolution, he encamped as near as possible to their first intrenchment of carriages, and having taken a view of it, chose out a place which he thought the most proper for an attempt to be made on. The Indians made a noble defence, but at last the first line of their carriages was broken, and the Macedonians entered. The second was stronger by far, yet Alexander attacked that too, and after a desperate resistance, forced it; the Indians without trusting to the third, retired into the city, which Alexander would have invested; but the foot he had with him not being sufficient for that purpose, he caused his works to be carried on both sides as far as the lake, and on the other side of that, ordered several brigades of horse to take post; he likewise commanded the engines to be brought up for battering the walls, and in some places employed miners. The second night he received intelligence

<sup>b</sup> ARRIAN. DIODOR. JUSTIN. CURT. PLUT. in vit. Alex.
that

that the besieged, knowing the lake to be fordable, intended making their escape through it. Upon this he ordered all the carriages which had been taken on forcing their camp to be placed up and down the roads in order to hinder their flight, giving directions to Ptolemy, who commanded the horse on the other side of the lake, to be extremely vigilant, and to cause all his trumpets to sound, that the forces might repair to that post where the Indians made their great effort. These precautions had all the effect he could wish; for of the few Indians who got through the lake, and passed the Macedonian horse, the greater part were killed on the roads; but the gross of their army was constrained to retire through the water again into the city. Two days after the place was taken by storm, in which seventeen thousand Indians were killed, seventy thousand taken prisoners, with three hundred chariots, and five hundred horse. Alexander is said to have lost but a hundred men in the siege, but he had twelve hundred wounded, and amongst them many persons of distinction. This done, he sent Eumenes his secretary with a party of horse to acquaint the inhabitants of the cities adjacent of what had befallen the Sangalans, with a promise that they should be kindly treated, if they submitted; but they were so much affrighted at what had happened to their neighbours, that all Eumenes's good words and promises were lost upon them, inso-much that, abandoning all their cities, they fled into the mountains, chusing rather to expose themselves to wild beasts, than to those invaders, who treated their countrymen so cruelly. When the king was advised of this, he sent detachments of horse to scour the roads, and these finding aged, infirm, and wounded people, to the number of about five hundred, put them to the sword without mercy. Perceiving that it was impossible to retrieve the inhabitants of this country, he razed Sangala, and gave the territory to the few Indians who had submitted to him. These points once settled, he prepared to pass the river Hyphasis, having nothing in view, as Arrian tells us, but still to seek out new enemies, when he had subdued the old ones.

THE chief reason which induced the king to think of this expedition was, the informations he had received of the state of the countries beyond this river. He was told, that they were in themselves rich and fruitful; that their inhabitants were not only a very martial people, but also very civilized; that they were governed by the nobility, who were themselves subject to the laws ; and that, as they lived in happiness and freedom, it was likely they would fight obstinately in defence of those blessings. He was farther told, that among these nations there were the largest, strongest, and most useful elephants bred and broke ; he was fired with an earnest desire of reducing such bold and brave people under his rule, and of attaining to the possession of the many valuable things that were said to be amongst them. As exorbitant as his personal ambition was, he found it impracticable to infuse any part of it into the minds of his soldiers, who were so far from wishing to triumph over new and remote countries, that they were highly desirous of leaving those they had lately conquered, and returning to their own. When therefore they were informed of the king's intentions, they privately consulted together in the camp on the situation of their affairs ; at this consultation, the gravest and best of the soldiery held down their heads, wept and lamented their misfortune, that the king should make use of them, not as lions, who fall fiercely on those by whom they are injured, but as mastives to fly upon and tear such as were shewn them for enemies by their master ; the rest were not altogether so modest, they expressed themselves roundly against the king's humour of leading them from battle to battle, from siege to siege, and from river to river ; protesting that they would follow him no farther, nor lavish away their lives any longer to purchase fame for him. Alexander was a man of too much penetration not to be early in perceiving that his troops were very uneasy ; he therefore harangued them from his tribunal, and, if we might depend upon them, Arrian and Curtius both have given us the substance of that harangue ; but they differ widely from each other, and the frame of each of the speeches agrees exactly with the genius of the author, in whose works we find it. That in Arrian is grave, solid, and at the same time very specious ; whereas that in Curtius is copious, florid, and full of strong rhetorical figures, which serve rather to amaze than to persuade : We may therefore reasonably suppose, that Arrian and Curtius composed each his harangue ; as to that of Alexander, it turned probably on the same general heads with theirs, and consisted in a warm representation of the glory that would redound to them, if, after conquering Asia, they went on to subdue the habitable world ; a recapitulation of the victories they had already gained, and large promises of vast rewards and gratifications, if they continued to be the companions of his labours, and enabled him to maintain the character of invincible, which as the son of Jupiter the oracle of Hammon had bestowed upon him. His eloquence was great, and the love his army had for him was yet very strong ; however, they did not relent, but remained sullen and silent, and at last turned their eyes on Cænus, an old experienced general, whom Alexander loved, and in whom the army confided. He had generosity enough to undertake their cause, and to tell Alexander frankly, that men endured toil and labour in hopes of repose ; that the Macedonians were already much reduced in their numbers ; that of those who remained, the major part were invalids, and that they expected, in consideration of their former services, he would now lead them back to their native country ; an act which of all others would contribute most to his own great designs, since it would encourage the youth of Macedon, and even of all Greece, to follow him in whatever new expedition he should please to undertake, whether to the north or to the south, against the Indians beyond Hyphasis, or the unknown nations bordering on the Hyrcanian sea. The king was far from being pleased with Cænus, and much less satisfied with the disposition of the army, which continued buried in a deep silence. He therefore dismissed the assembly ; but the next day he called another, wherein he told the soldiers roundly, that he would not be driven from his purpose, that he would proceed in his conquests with such as would follow him voluntarily ; as for the rest, he would not detain them, but leave them at their liberty to go home to Macedon, where they might publish that they had left their king in the midst of his enemies. Even this expedient had no success, his army was so thoroughly tired of long marches and desperate battles, that they were unanimously determined to go no farther, either for fair speeches or foul. The king thereupon retired to his tent, where he refused to see his friends, and put on the same gloomy and discontented temper which reigned among his forces. For three days things remained in this situation ; at last the king suddenly appeared, and as if he had been fully determined to pursue his first design, he gave orders for sacrificing for the good success of his new undertaking. Aristander reported after the sacrifices were over, that the omens were altogether inauspicious ; upon which the king said, That since his proceeding farther was neither pleasing to the gods, nor grateful to his army, he would return. When this was rumoured among the army, they assembled in great numbers about the royal tent, saluting the king with loud acclamations, wishing him success in all his future designs, giving him him at the same time hearty thanks ; For that he, who was invincible, had suffered himself to be overcome with their prayers <sup>d</sup> (E).

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. lib. v. c. 25. DIODOR. PLUT. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

the

Alexander,

<sup>d</sup> ARRIAN. lib. v. c. 25—29. DIODOR. lib. xvii. Olymp. cxiii. 2. PLUT. in vit. Alex. CURT. l. ix. c. 5—10. JUSTIN lib. xii. c. 8.

(E) Diodorus Siculus insists largely on the battle between Alexander and Porus ; he tells us, that king was so wounded, that he fell from his chariot to the ground, that he lost in the engagement twelve thousand men, and that of the Macedonians there fell two hundred and eighty horse and seven hundred foot : After this he describes the countries through which Alexander passed, and the singularities observable in them. He asserts the Hyphasis to be seven furlongs over and six fathoms deep ; and he tells us, that Alexander was informed, that if he continued his march, he would meet with a desert twelve days journey over, and then the river Ganges, the largest and deepest in India ; on the other side of which, he would find Xandranes king of the Gangarides at the head of an army of twenty thousand horse, two hundred thousand foot, two thousand chariots, and four thousand elephants. The king, looking upon this story to be a mere romance, sent for Porus, and charged him to tell him the truth, who assured him, that the thing was so, and that he was not imposed on. These accounts, joined to the hardships they had endured, induced the Macedonians to refuse to be led farther, which at first exceedingly displeased the king ; but when he found they could not be moved, he consented to return, having first given orders that they should first erect twelve altars, each fifty cubits high, to draw a trench round his camp fifty foot broad and forty deep, casting up out of the earth, which was dug from thence, a very strong retrenchment on the inside ; every foot soldier was likewise directed to provide two beds of five cubits ; and all the cavalry, besides these beds, were ordered to put up a manger twice as big as the ordinary size ; these things were done to amuse posterity, and to make them believe that Alexander had led an army above the common standard of men into India (81). — Plutarch says expressly, that the battle with Porus took off the edge of the Macedonian courage, and made them unwilling to meddle any more with the Indians, especially when they heard that beyond the Ganges the kings of the Gangarides and Præfians had assembled eighty thousand horse, two hundred thousand foot, eight thousand armed chariots, and six thousand fighting elephants. Our author assures us, that this was no vain report ; for that Andracottus, who was then a youth, and

(81) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.

Alexander, having once resolved to make the Hyphasis the limits of his conquests, divided his army; and having prevailed ordered on to return.

saw Alexander in his camp, lived afterwards to conquer all these countries with an army of six hundred thousand men, and made Seleucus a present of five hundred elephants at once; which prince was often heard to say, that if Alexander had pursued his design, he would in all probability have succeeded, the king then reigning in those parts being hated for his cruelty, and despised for the meanness of his birth. We have also from Plutarch an account of Alexander's causing arms of an extraordinary bigness, mangers of an excessive largeness, and bits for bridles of unusual size to be left behind in his camp, when he was compelled by his soldiers to think of returning (82).—Strabo in his description of India agrees very well with Diodorus, relating almost the same things which he does: We have in both stories of venomous serpents, of a nation putting children to death for want of comeliness and well-proportioned limbs, and dogs so strong, and of such spirit, that they encounter lions, with many other tales of the like nature taken from Onesicritus, who was indeed the captain of Alexander's galley, but had the honour also to outlye every author that meddled with his history, which was in truth no ordinary performance (83).—Curtius in the main agrees pretty well with the authors mentioned in this note; however, he differs in certain circumstances; some of no great moment, and some which deserve notice. He makes the distance from the Hyphasis, which he stiles Hypasis, and the Ganges, eleven days journey; he calls the king of the Gangaridæ, Aggrannes, and says he had twenty thousand horse, two hundred thousand foot, three thousand chariots, and three thousand elephants. In relating the sedition in the Macedonian camp, he hath inserted rhetorical speeches of excessive length; as to the extraordinary altars, arms, and beds, he agrees with Diodorus and Plutarch (84).—Justin gives a short, but very magnificent detail of the battle with Porus, whose character he has raised more in a line or two, than many authors in pages; he places the Gangaridæ amongst the nations conquered by Alexander, and says, that when he came with his army to engage the Cupbites, the Macedonians perceiving they were to fight with two hundred thousand horse, intreated him to spare the small remains of the forces his father had made use of, and allow them the moderate favour of carrying home their mangled carcases to be buried in the sepulchres of their ancestors, to which reasonable request he at length with much ado assented (85).—Polyænus

(82) Plut. in vit. Alex.(83) Strab. Geogr. lib. xv.(84) Curt. lib. ix. c. 2. & seq.(85) Justin. lib. xii. c. 8.

ordered twelve altars to be erected equal in height, and exceeding in breadth redoubts of an ordinary size, he caused sacrifices to be offered on them; and having exhibited public shews after the Grecian manner, he added all the conquered country to the dominions of Porus, and then began his march towards the river Hydraotes; from thence he marched on to the Acesines, where he found the city which he had directed Hephestion to build, to which he invited all the inhabitants of the adjacent country, and left also therein such of his mercenaries as were infirm, and desired to reside there. Abissares, a petty king, who had submitted to him in his march this way, and whom the king had ordered to repair to him, sent deputies to excuse himself on account of sickness, which excuse the king was pleased to accept, because that prince had sent the thirty elephants which he had promised, and offered to submit to what-ever terms the king should impose. Alexander therefore ordered Arfaces, president of the province adjoining to his dominions, to inspect his conduct; and having settled the tribute he should pay, marched on to the river Hydaspes, where finding the new cities, Nicaea and Bucephala, somewhat damaged by the great rains which had fallen in his absence, he ordered his foldiers to repair them, gave the necessary directions for the security of his conquests, and then addressed himself to the care of the preparations necessary for passing down the river Indus into the ocean * (F).

THE

* ARRIAN. lib. vi. c. 1—3.

amongst many instances of Alexander's wisdom and military skill mentions several which happened in his Indian war, amongst others the passage of the river Hydaspes and the battle with Porus; the success of the former of which he attributes to the king's invention, and the victory obtained over the latter to the masterly disposition Alexander made of his troops before the engagement (86). This we have fully explained in the text, and it is without question one of the noblest acts which stands recorded of this conqueror.

(F) Alexander's design was to sail down the Hydaspes to its junction with the Acesines, and then through the Acesines into the Indus, and through the last mentioned river to the ocean. As the king was a diligent inquirer into whatever regarded natural history, when he first arrived in these parts, he from general informations took up a very odd opinion; it was this, that he had found

(86) Polyæn. Stratagem. lib. iv. c. 3, 4, 5, 9.

†

THE care taken by Alexander for the execution of this project, shewed much more prudence than the project itself, he had ordered vast quantities of timber to be felled in the neighbourhood of the Hydaspes, through which he was to sail Embarques his army.

found out the source of the Nile. The grounds of this mistaken notion were these: Alexander had seen in the river Indus crocodiles, and on the banks of the Acasines such beans growing as in Egypt; putting these things together, he fancied that this great river, rolling on into vast deserts, lost in them its name; but entering again the well inhabited country of Ethiopia, was there called the Nile, and thence rolled down with the same name into Egypt. He was confirmed in this odd conjecture by Homer's calling the Nile, from its entering Egypt to its fall into the sea Egyptus; for this seemed to imply, that the same river running through different countries, acquired different names. At last he became so confident, that amongst other things which he wrote to his mother Olympias, he set down this; that he had found the springs of the Nile. But inquiring farther, and receiving full satisfaction that the Indus did not lose itself in any desert, but by two large mouths entered the ocean, he caused the passage before-mentioned to be struck out. It may to some seem strange, that we have insisted so largely upon a point which at first sight may seem trivial; our reason is this: Many have erred in the like manner with Alexander, though few have had the good sense to retract their errors like him, even when they have discovered them. The matter here stated is a fact, and a fact attended with very curious circumstances, sufficient to direct us in all cases of a like nature, and to engage us not to depend too much on the conjectures of the greatest men, and the greatest travellers, but to rely on them only for facts (87). A little before this his embarkation died Cænis, Alexander's old captain, and who had dared to take upon him the arduous employment of being the army's orator against the will of their prince; Curtius tells us, that Alexander was afflicted at his death, but that he could not help saying, That he had made too long a speech, considering the short time he had to live, with other things to the same purpose; However, he was interred with great solemnity, and if Alexander's sorrow was not over sincere, we may be sure that of the army was unfeigned; for they had now lost their best friend, as well as a most experienced general Diodorus (88) and Curtius, in what they say of the king's passing down these rivers, vary in some respects from Arrian, and in others contradict him; but there is no need of troubling the reader with particular accounts, because they are matters of small importance, and such as have in them more of the wonderful, than of the credible or the useful (89).

(87) Arrian. lib. vi. c. 1.(88) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvii.(89) Curt. l. ix. Arrian. l. vi. c. 2.

into the Indus ; he had caused the vessels with which he had passed over rivers to be brought thither ; and had assembled a vast number of artificers, capable of repairing, rebuilding and equipping his fleet, which, when finished, and in a condition to be launched, consisted of eighty vessels of three banks of oars, and of lesser ships and transports about two thousand. As for those who were to manage this fleet, he collected them out of the Phœnicians, Cyprians, Carians, and Egyptians following his army, and who were held to be perfectly well versed in all the branches of the nautic art. As for the disposition of the army, it was settled thus ; the archers, Agrians, the light-armed foot, and some horse, he took on board the fleet ; Craterus, with a body of horse and foot, marched on the right-hand bank ; Hephestion, with the major part of the army, and two hundred elephants, on the left-hand. Nearchus was admiral of the whole fleet ; and Onesicritus captain of the royal galley. When all things were ready, the army embarked about break of day, the king, in the mean time, sacrificing to the gods, according to the rites used in his own country, and to those of that country where he now was. Then he himself went on board, and causing the signal to be given by sound of trumpet, the fleet began to move. Craterus and Hephestion had marched some days before. From the third day, we are informed by Arrian, Alexander came to that part of the river which was over-against their camps. Here he had information, that the Oxydracæ and the Malli were raising forces to oppose him ; whereupon he determined to reduce them, for he made it a rule with him in the course of this voyage, to compel the inhabitants on both sides the river to yield him obedience ; but, before he arrived on the coasts of the people before-mentioned, he himself sustained no small danger ; for coming to the confluence of the Acesines with the Hydaspes, from whence both rivers roll together into the Indus, the eddies, whirlpools and rapid currents rushing with tremendous noise from the respective channels of those rivers into the great one formed by them both, at once terrified those who navigated his vessels, and actually destroyed many of the long vessels, with all who were aboard them ; the king himself being in some danger, and Nearchus the admiral not a little at a loss. As soon as this danger was over, and the fleet and army had once more joined, he went himself on shore, and having ordered his elephants, with some troops of horse and archers, to be carried a-cross, and put under the command of Craterus, he then divided his army on the left-hand bank into three bodies ; the first commanded by himself self ; the second by Hephestion ; the third by Ptolemy. Hephestion had orders to move silently through the heart of the country five days march before the king, that if, on Alexander's approach, any of the barbarians should attempt to shelter themselves, by retiring into the heart of the country, they might fall into the hands of Hephestion's forces. Ptolemy Lagus was commanded to march three days behind the king, that if any escaped his army, they might fall into Ptolemy's hands. As for the fleet, it had orders to stop at the confluence of this river with the Hydraotes, till such time as these several corps should arrive †.

Alexander himself, at the head of a body of horse and light-armed foot, marched through a desert country against the Malli, and scarce affording any rest to his soldiers, arrived on the third day at a city into which they had put their wives and children for security, and a good garison for their defence. These people having no apprehension that the king would attempt to march through a barren country, were all unarmed and in confusion. Many of them therefore were slain in the field ; the rest fled into the city, and shut the gates. But this only protracted their fate for a small time ; for the king having ordered the city to be invested by his horse, attacked it, and, with some loss, took both it and the castle by storm, putting all he found therein to the sword. He sent at the same time Perdiccas with a considerable detachment, to invest another city of the Malli at some distance ; but when he arrived, he found it abandoned ; however, he pursued the inhabitants, who had but lately left it, and slew numbers of them on the road. After this the king took several other cities, not without considerable resistance ; for the Indians sometimes chose to burn their houses, and themselves therein, rather than surrender. He seems, in respect to this nation, to have acted with more than ordinary resentment, hunting them rather as beasts, than fighting with them as men, and taking pains to cut off not only such as resisted him, but those who fled into woods and deserts to escape him. At last he marched to their capital city, and, finding that abandoned, he proceeded to the river Hydraotes, where he found fifty thousand men encamped on the opposite bank. He hesitated not to enter the river, though he had with him only an inconsiderable party of horse ; and the Indians were so affrighted at his presence, that even with all these troops they retired ; but when they saw how few accompanied the king, they returned, and charged him ; but the Malli.*

*He reduces

† ARRIAN. l. vi. c. 6, & seq. DIODOR. ubi supra.

by this time the rest of his forces were passing the river, so that the Indians were constrained to retire to a city which lay behind them, which Alexander invested that very night. The next day he stormed the city with such violence, that the inhabitants were compelled to abandon it, and to retire to the citadel, where they prepared to make a very resolute defence. The king instantly gave orders for scaling its walls, and the soldiers prepared to execute those orders as fast as they could; but the king, who was impatient, catching hold of a ladder, clapped it against the wall, and mounted it himself, covering his body with his shield, Peucestas following him, after him Leonatus, all by the same ladder. Abreas, a man of great courage, who, on that account, had double pay allowed him, mounted by another. The king, having gained the top of the battlements, cleared them quickly of the defendants, killing some of them with his sword, and pushing others over the walls; but, when he had done this, he was in more danger than ever, for the Indians from the adjacent tower, galled him with their arrows, though they durst not come near enough to engage him. His own battalion of targeteers mounting in haste to second him, broke the ladders; which when Alexander perceived, he threw himself down into the castle, as did also Peucestas, Leonatus, and Abreas. As soon as the king was on the ground, the Indian general rushed forward to attack him, whom the king slew presently with his sword, as he did several of those who followed him; upon which the rest retired, and contented themselves with throwing stones and darts at him at a distance. Abreas was struck into the head with an arrow, and fell upon the spot, and shortly after another struck through the king's breast-plate into his body. As long as he had spirits he defended himself valiantly, but, through a vast effusion of blood, losing his senses, he fell upon his shield. Peucestas then covered him with the sacred shield of Pallas on one side, as did Leonatus with his own shield on the other, though they were themselves dreadfully wounded. The soldiers on the out-side, eager to save their prince, supplied their want of ladders, by driving large iron pins into the walls. By the help of this contrivance many of them ascended, and threw themselves over, where some covering the body of the king, compelled the Indians to retire, and others having pulled down the bars, broke down a gate between two towers, and thereby gave admittance to their companions. The soldiers, in the heat of their resentment, put all that they found to the sword, women and children not excepted. Then they took up the king, and bore him away upon his shield to the camp. There he continued, continued for some time in so weak a state, that his recovery was very doubtful. The news of this accident having reached the camp on the river side, where was the head quarters of the whole army, it struck such a panic, that they scarce knew what to do; for they immediately reckoned that he was dead; and when, from time to time, they were informed that he grew better, they attributed this to the arts of the general officers who were about him, nor would they suffer themselves to be convinced, even when they received advice that he was returning to the army. The king was perfectly sensible of all the mischiefs which might attend these fears and apprehensions of his soldiers: As soon therefore as his health would permit, he caused himself to be put on board his galley, and rejoined his forces. When he came to the camp, and shewed himself, both on horseback and on foot, the soldiers gathering round him, eagerly kissed not only his hands and his knees, but his feet and his robes, and resumed in a moment that courage and alacrity which had hitherto rendered them invincible. The officers, however, of the first rank, who were Macedonians by birth, after the first compliments were over, did not spare to tell the king, that he had done very much amiss in hazarding his person after such a manner. At which Alexander, who was no longer a lover of truth, was very much displeased; but received into his favour, and ever after treated with the greatest kindness, an old Bæotian, who told him, to sooth his vanity, that such extraordinary attempts became a hero <sup>6</sup> (G).

THE

<sup>6</sup> ARRIAN. lib. vi. c. 12, 13. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. CURT. l. ix c. 14, & seq. JUSTIN. l. xii. c. 9.

(G) Arrian, speaking of the king's misfortune, vindicates his own credit, and that of his history. He tells us, that it is not certain, whether a physician or Perdiccas opened the king's wound, and drew out the arrow; but he assures us, that a great effusion of blood happened at that time, and that the king's fainting saved his life; for the blood then stopping, gave them time to apply medicines and bandages, for want of which he must otherwise have perished. He then acquaints us, that many strange things relating to this accident are to be found in historians, who, drawing their materials from romantic memoirs, were in danger of deceiving posterity, if no stop were put to that way of writing. He proceeds to give many instances of the flights of such kind of writers, and then returning to the fact before us, takes notice, that it was the vulgar opinion, that Alexander received his wound before the

*The Malli
and Oxy-dracæ submit.*

THE Malli being by this time convinced, that nothing but submission could save the small remainder of them, sent their deputies to beseech Alexander to forget what was past, and to accept of the dominion of their country, which they offered him. At the same time arrived deputies from the Oxydracæ, to tender their submission. They had formerly entered into an alliance with the Malli, to oppose Alexander, and put a stop to his conquests; and, in order thereto, they assembled a great army, with which they proposed to have joined the forces of the Malli; but Alexander's marching through a desert, and thereby entering the country of the last mentioned people, when they did not in the least expect it, rendered this project impracticable; and the ruin which then fell upon the Malli, induced this other Indian nation to seek their safety by a timely compliance with the king. Their deputies therefore acquainted him, that, not out of any disrespect to his person, but merely from the love of liberty, they had hitherto declined submitting to him; but that now they were ready to accept of such terms as he should please to give them. Alexander commanded, that they should send him no less than a thousand of the principal men among them to serve in his army, and to remain as hostages for the fidelity of the rest. As for the Malli, he added them to Philip's province, commanding him to have a strict eye over them. While he continued in this camp at the confluence of the Hydraotes with the Acesines, for the recovery of his health, and in expectation of Perdiceas, the thousand men he

the capital of the Oxydracæ (90). It is not easy to pronounce what was Diodorus's opinion; for in many copies we have Syracusians instead of Oxydracians. However, it is most probable, that he held that which Arrian (91) calls the vulgar opinion, in which he is followed by Curtius (92). Plutarch is right as to the place; but he is among the number of those authors, who report, that the king received a blow with a club upon his helmet, which so stunned him, that a mist seeming to fall over his eyes, he fell down; but, recovering his spirits, rose again, and continued fighting till he was shot in the breast (93); yet Ptolemy, who could not but be well informed, wrote expressly, that he was only wounded in the breast (94). We might insist here on many other particulars, which, to avoid prolixity, we chuse to omit. These are sufficient to shew what care ought to be taken in writing the history of Alexander, and how dangerous it is to trust any author too much.

(90) Arrian. l. vi. c. 2. (91) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. (92) Curt. l. ix. (93) Plut. in vita Alex. (94) Arrian. ubi supra.

had demanded of the Oxydracæ arrived, together with five hundred chariots of war, properly harnessed and equipped; which being over and above his demand, and a free gift of the people, he was so pleased therewith, that he gave the whole thousand men leave to return home, adding, that the faith of so generous a nation was a full security for their obedience. These affairs settled, he employed his thoughts first about augmenting his fleet, to which end he caused several new vessels to be built, as also in erecting a city; to which he was led from the commodious situation afforded by the confluence of two great rivers. Oxyartes, the father of his wife Roxana, came hither to pay his respects to him, and was kindly received, having the government of Paropamisus bestowed upon him, the old governor having been displaced for male-administration. To this province, that he might further gratify his father-in-law, the king joined all the country, from the falling of the Acesines into the Indus to the sea, joining Python with him in commission; then having transported Craterus and his forces cross the river, and giving him such directions as he thought fit, Alexander, with a larger part of his army than before, embarked on board his fleet, and continued his voyage. He had received information, that the kingdom of Musicanus, which lay at no great distance, was one of the richest and most populous in India. He was therefore highly incensed, that this prince should neither have sent ambassadors to make his submission, nor have taken any other method to bespeak his favour; and for these reasons would not hear of making any stop or stay till his fleet arrived on the coasts of this kingdom. Musicanus, surprised at his sudden visit, immediately went forth to meet him, with all his elephants in his train, and, having offered him presents of the highest value, delivered himself and realms into his hands, and acknowledged his offence; which kind of behaviour always weighed much with Alexander towards obtaining whatever was requested. Having therefore pardoned him, and admired at the wealth and beauty of his kingdom and capital city, he delivered the government of both again into his hands; but, lest he should attempt any innovation when he was at a distance, he ordered Craterus to build a castle in the city, and himself tarried there to see it finished. This done, he left a strong garison therein; because this fort seemed extremely commodious for bridling the neighbouring nations, and keeping them in subjection. Then, with his archers and Agrians, and all the troops of horse which he had on board his navy, he marched against a neighbouring prince named Oxycanus, and invaded his dominions; because he neither came forth to meet him, nor sent embas-

sadors

sadors with the surrender of himself and country. He took two of his chief cities at the first assault, in one of which the king himself was taken prisoner. Alexander gave the spoils of them to his soldiers, and carried away his elephants; whereupon all the other cities belonging to Oxyconus immediately submitted without blows. So much did the courage and fortune of Alexander prevail against the Indians in those parts. After this he led his forces against Sambus, whom he had before declared governor of the Indian mountaineers; but who had fled, when he heard that Musicanus was dismissed in a friendly manner, and had his dominions restored; for he was at enmity with Musicanus. When Alexander approached the capital city of his province, called Sindomana, the gates being set open, the friends and domestics of Sambus came forth to meet him, with presents of money and elephants, assuring him, that Sambus did not retire out of his territories by reason of any sinister designs against him, but for fear of Musicanus after his enlargement. Having then received the homage of these, he attacked, and won a city which had revolted from him, and put to death as many of the Brachmans as fell into his hands, having charged them with being the authors of this rebellion. About this time he received advice, that king Musicanus was revolted; whereupon Python the son of Agenor was dispatched with a body of troops sufficient to reduce that kingdom again, which he performed effectually, distributing garisons throughout all the country, and bringing with him, on his return to the camp, Musicanus in chains. Alexander directed that prince to be carried back into his own dominions, and there crucified, together with all the Brachmans who were about him, and had instigated him to this revolt <sup>h</sup> (H).

THE

<sup>h</sup> ARRIAN. l. vi. c. 15, & seq. DIONOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vita Alex.

(H) Diodorus, from the embarkation of Alexander to his entering the territories of Sambus, hath abundance of passages which are not to be found in Arrian. The reason seems to be, because they are either ill-founded or trivial (95). Curtius, however, hath transcribed the same tales very carefully, and, as usual, with some improvements (96). But, what is not a little odd, neither of these writers have obliged us with any distinct account of Alexander's war with Musicanus, though they have both mentioned it slightly. Strabo treats of it accurately, as indeed he does of every thing, of which.

(95) Diodor. ubi supra(96) Curt. ubi supra.

†

THE king of Pattala, a noble island in the river Indus, Alexander came and submitted himself to Alexander, who restored him his dominions, promising to come shortly and visit him, and directing him to furnish his army and fleet with provisions. The king then dispatched Craterus with a considerable body of horse and foot to escort the invalids through the countries of Arachosia and Drangia into Caramania, where they were to embark for Macedon, the elephants being also committed to his care. As to the rest of his army, part of it, under the command of Pytho, marched on one side of the river; another part, under Hephestion, on the other side; the rest remained on board with the king, who, as soon as his affairs would permit him, continued his voyage to Pattala. When he came thither, he was exceedingly surprised to find that the prince, who had lately submitted to him, was fled with almost all his subjects, leaving the cities empty, and the fields destitute of husbandmen. The king thereupon dispatched some which, by his subject, he is led to treat at all. He informs us, that the subjects of this prince were a very wise and polite people; and therefore we need not wonder, that they could not long brook slavery (97). As to Oxycanus, Diodorus and Curtius are also very concile; however, they differ with Arrian, for they expressly affirm that the king was slain; whereas, he says, he was taken prisoner. Diodorus calls him Porticanus, and he is called so likewise in the best editions of Curtius. As to Sambus, whom Diodorus calls by the same name, but who is called by Strabo Sabutas, by Plutarch Sabbas, Curtius, who calls him Sabus, insists very largely (98), all authors agree, that the revolt of this prince was, by Alexander, charged upon the brachmans, whom he punished most severely for it, till such time as he became acquainted with their wisdom and generous notions; for then, if we may believe Plutarch, he revered and used them kindly, especially on account of an excellent maxim in government taught him by Calanus, one of the principal philosophers of the country; which happened thus: Calanus, through the intreaty of Taxiles, came, contrary to the custom of the Indian sages, to visit the king; and when Alexander desired to receive from him some mark of his extraordinary science, he called for a dry hide, and throwing it upon the floor, he first trod on this side, and then on that, which made it continually rise in one place, as it became flat in the other. At last he set his foot in the middle, which made the whole hide lie even; thereby instructing Alexander, that to keep so great an empire quiet, he ought to reside in its centre, and not make expeditions into remote countries, to endanger the rest of his dominions (99).

(97) Diodor. Curt. ubi supra. Plut. in vita Alex. Strabo Geogr. l. xv. (98) Ubi supra. (99) Plut. ubi supra.

light-armed troops, in order to make prisoners; which having done, and brought them to the camp, the king kindly dismissed them, ordering them to tell their countrymen, that they might safely return to their habitations; for that he would do them no injury whatsoever. Perceiving that, at the point of the island Pattala, the river Indus divided itself into two vast branches, he ordered a haven and convenient docks to be there made for his ships; and when he had careened his fleet, he sailed down the right-hand branch towards the ocean. In his passage however he sustained great difficulties through the want of pilots, and at the mouth of the river Indus very narrowly missed being cast away; yet all this did not hinder him from pursuing his first design, tho' it does not appear that he had any other motive thereto, than the vain desire of boasting he had entered the ocean beyond the Indies; and this is confirmed by what he performed when he did enter the ocean; for, having consecrated certain bulls to Neptune, and thrown them into the sea, performed libations out of golden cups, and thrown them also into the ocean, he came back again, having only surveyed two little islands, one at the mouth of the Indus, and one seated farther in the ocean<sup>1</sup> (I).

ON

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. l. vi. c. 18, 19. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

(I) When Alexander sailed down the right hand branch of the Indus, he found its mouth to be there two hundred furlongs broad. Here the flux and reflux of the sea, with which himself and his principal commanders were unacquainted, exceedingly amazed them (100). Curtius has described their surprize in too rhetorical a manner, and for it has been severely censured (1). At this mouth of the river there lay an island, called by Arrian Cillutas; by Plutarch Scillustis (2). Curtius has given it no name. Here his fleet anchored, while himself sailed out farther to sea, and took a view of another island; after which he returned to his fleet, offered sacrifices on that island where he had left them, and afterwards sailed again beyond the other island, that he might boast of his daring exploits in the ocean. He then sacrificed once more to the gods, and besought them, says Plutarch, that no other man might exceed the bounds of his expedition (3); which carries in it little probability. What is said in the text of his sacrificing for the safety of Nearchus, who was to sail from thence through the Persian gulf to the mouth of the river Euphrates, is reasonable and just. It is said, when this design was first undertaken by Nearchus, that Alex-

(100) Arrian. l. vi. c. 19. (1) Curt. l. ix. c. 31. (2) Plut. in vit. Alex. (3) Idem ibid.

On his return to Pattala, he found, that the commands he had issued when he left that place, were, in a great measure, complied with ; that the fort was in a defensible condition, and the dock capable of being made use of. He then resolved to sail down the other branch of the Indus into the ocean, that he might see whether it were safer and more commodious for his fleet than that which he had already tried ; nor did he fail of offering very plausible reasons for his conduct in this respect. He was informed, that the season of the year would not permit a favourite design of his to be executed ; which design was this : He had resolved to send Nearchus with his fleet by the ocean, through the Persian gulf, up the river Tigris, to meet him and his army in Mesopotamia ; but the possibility of this voyage depending on the ceasing of the Etesian winds, there was a necessity of laying up the fleet, till the season should prove favourable. Alexander therefore sailing through this branch of the Indus, sought on the sea-coasts for Bays and Creeks, where his fleet might anchor in safety ; he caused also pits to be sunk, that they might fill with fresh water for the use of his people, and took all imaginable precautions for preserving them in ease and safety, till the season would allow them to continue their voyage. In this he succeeded to his wish ; for he found this branch of the river Indus at its mouth, spread over the plain country, and formed a kind of lake, wherein a fleet might ride without any danger ; he therefore appointed Leonatus, and a part of his army, to carry on such works as were necessary, and cause them to be relieved, as occasion required, by fresh troops. Then having given his last instructions to Nearchus, he departed with his army, in order to march back to Babylon by land.

Alexander affected a degree of coldness. He who feared nothing for himself, had a mind to pass for one who was apprehensive of all things for his friends, and who could scarce think of exposing them to the peril of such a voyage, when he was not to share with them their dangers in person. But Nearchus overcame all these real or pretended scruples, by assuring the king, that he believed it very practicable for him to fulfil all that had been proposed ; and, on the other hand, Alexander was himself extremely cautious in providing for the safety of his fleet, by all the methods that human wit could devise, or human labour execute, as we have shewn in the text, therefore need not expatiate further on it here. The curious and inquisitive reader may, if he pleases, inform himself further on this head, from the authors mentioned at the bottom of the page (4).

(4) Strab. Geog. l. xv. Arrian. Hist. Ind.

Before his departure, there wanted not some who had so much love for him, and concern for his army, as to inform him that nothing could be more rash or dangerous than this resolution. They acquainted him that the country through which he was to travel was a wild uncultivated desert, where his soldiers would be doubly exposed to the danger of dying for hunger, and to the peril of being lost through heat and thirst; they added, that Semiramis, when she fled out of India, endeavouring to lead her army this way, brought but twenty of them home; and that Cyrus doing the same thing, escaped with but seven. This was so far from having the desired effect, that it more than ever determined Alexander to this very method; for it was his peculiar vanity to desire not only to overcome all nations, but even nature herself, and to attempt and perform those things which none but himself would have dared to think of. He remained therefore fixed to his first purpose, and as soon as he had put things in order, marched at the head of a convenient body of troops to reduce the Oritæ, who had been hitherto free, and who had never vouchsafed either to make submission, or to court his friendship; their territories lay on the other side the river Arabis, which river Alexander crossed so speedily, that they had no intelligence of his march, and so made an easy and quick conquest of the whole country, though not of the inhabitants, for most of them fled into the deserts. Their capital he found to be so well situated, that he resolved to take it out of their hands, and to cause a new and noble city to be erected there, the care of which he committed to Hephestion; then he received the deputies of the Oritæ, and the Gadrosi, and having assured them, that if the people returned to their villages, they should be kindly treated, and having appointed Apollonphanes president of the Oritæ, and left a considerable body of troops under Leonatus to secure their obedience, he began his arduous march through Gadrosia. The most sober writers of the affairs of Alexander find themselves constrained to launch out a little into rhetorical descriptions of this more than Herculean labour, which the king imposed upon himself and his soldiers, merely that he might have the reputation of surpassing all the heroes of antiquity; we shall, as the nature of our work requires, give as distinct, but at the same time, as short an account of it as we may *.

The miseries sustained by the Macedonians.      THE road itself was exposed to many inconveniencies: For, first, it was very uncertain; secondly, it was extremely

* ARRIAN. I. vi. c. 21----27. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alex.

ly troublesome on account of its lying through deep and loose sands, rising in many places into hillocks, which forced the soldiers to climb, and at the same time sunk under their feet : Thirdly, there were no towns, villages, or places of refreshment to be met with, so that after excessive marches, they were forced to encamp among these dry sands. As to provisions, they hardly met with any during their whole march ; the soldiers were therefore forced to kill their beasts of carriage ; and such as were sent to bring some corn from the sea-side, were so grievously distressed, that though it was sealed with the king's signet, they cut open the bags, chusing rather to die a violent death for disobedience, than to be famished. But Alexander, when he was informed of the matter, freely pardoned them, conceiving that his own commands were dispensed with by the necessities of nature ; he was likewise forced to overlook the excuses that were daily made him for the loss of mules, horses, &c. by excessive heat, which were in truth eaten by the soldiers, and their carriages broke in pieces to avoid farther trouble. As for water, their want of it was a great misfortune, and yet their finding it sometimes in plenty was a greater ; for as by the first they perished thro' thirst, so by the latter they were burst, thrown into dropxies, and rendered incapable of travel. Frequently they met with no water for the whole day together ; sometimes were disappointed of it at night, in which case, if they were able, they marched on, so that it was common with them to travel thirty, not seldom they were forced to march forty, sometimes they were constrained to go fifty, nay, and sixty miles without encamping ; numbers through these hardships were constrained to lag behind ; and of these, numbers, not to say few, for indeed scarce any ever joined the army again, but were left behind, and perished ; so that of all others, this was the most dreadful misfortune that had ever befallen them, which however they sustained with the more patience from the example of their king, who not only supported all these evils with invincible patience, but even carried his courage and self-denial farther, and performed such things as nothing but the authority of the authors who relate them could engage us to credit (K).

When

(K) These extraordinary acts of Alexander are recorded by Arrian after this manner. As the forces continued their march through these sands, which reflected the burning rays of the sun upon them, it was necessary that they should send out parties daily to seek for water ; the king though ready to faint away with thirst, marched

When he arrived at the capital of Gadrosia, he allowed his fatigued army some rest. Here he removed Apollonhanes for non-execution of his orders. Thoas was the successor assigned him, and he dying soon after, Sibyrtius had the government given to him. About this time Alexander was informed that Philip, whom he had left president in India, had been murdered by the mercenary soldiers, but that most of these had been put to death by the Macedonians; which occasioned his writing to Endemus and Taxiles to take upon them the administration of affairs there, till such time as he should send another president. The king then began his march into Caramania, a very plentiful country, where the troops made themselves amends for the hardships and fatigue they had sustained. Here the king again halted to give time to those who were appointed to meet him to come thither. Craterus first joined him with the troops and elephants; then came Stasanor, president of the Arrians, and Pharissmanes the son of Phrata-

on foot at the head of his troops, that his officers and soldiers, as is usual in such cases, might the more patiently endure those hardships which their general shared in common with them. In the mean while, some light-armed soldiers, who were dispatched to search for water, found a small quantity not far from the army in the channel of a brook almost dried up, but it was very muddy: However they drew it up, and bringing it in a shield, presented it to the king as a choice gift: He received it, and returning due thanks to those who brought it, poured it immediately upon the ground in presence of the army. This action of his encouraged the soldiers, as much as if every man had drank a share of that water, which he refused to taste; and his extraordinary self-denial is no less praise-worthy than the noble example he shewed of a wise and consummate general. Another accident happened here, which, if it had not been speedily remedied, might have occasioned the loss of the whole army; for the sands being moved to and fro by the winds, and all the surface reduced to a level, their guides themselves were at a loss how to conduct the army any further. In this difficulty Alexander was forced to proceed as chance directed him. However, he ordered his army to turn to the left, and himself with a few choice horse, went before to point out the road; but their horses quite spent with heat, were most of them left behind; insomuch that only he, with five of his followers, pass'd through the sands to the sea-shore safe on horseback. However on their arrival there, they dug nigh the coast and found plenty of water sweet and clear; whereupon he ordered the army thither, and after that travelled seven days along the sea coast, and always found plenty of water. Then his guides assuring him they knew the way again, they left the sea, and led the army into the inland parts (95).

phernes, governor of Parthia; they brought with them camels, horses, and other beasts of burthen in vast numbers; for they foresaw, that the king's march through Gadrosia would be attended with the loss of most if not all the cavalry, and beasts belonging to his army. Their care in this respect was highly commended, as also that of Craterus, who seized Ordones a Persian nobleman, who had been practising to raise a rebellion<sup>1</sup>.

THE king's return into Caramania made a vast alteration in the affairs of his empire; for as from the moment he entered it, he heard and redressed all grievances, so the people from all the neighbouring provinces, who had been grievously oppressed in his absence, came readily to inform the king of their griefs. Clitander, Sitalces, and Heracon, who had since the death of Parmenio commanded in chief the forces quartered in Media, came hither with their troops; and were hardly arrived, when they were accused of many flagrant crimes, such as suppressing the Persian religion, extorting vast sums of money from the people, ravishing women, and in short giving a loose to their passions in all things. Clitander, and Sitalces being fully convicted, were immediately put to death; but Heracon, baffling his accusers, was acquitted, yet the inhabitants of Susa preferring a new charge against him, he was seized, convicted, and executed; which effectually fixed the affections of the people in all the provinces to Alexander, and at the same time obliged all the magistrates acting under him to behave as became them. The king after a short recess continued his march through Caramania, not with a Bacchanalian solemnity, as some authors, and particularly Plutarch, have reported, but gravely, and in good order; as Arrian assures us from Ptolemy and Aristobulus, who in their memoirs contradicted the vain relations which others took pains to propagate (L). In his march, Nearchus his administration of governors punished by the king.*

*The male

admiral

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. lib. vi. c. 27. DIODOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

(L) Diodorus Siculus, after having given us a dreadful picture of the miserable condition of Alexander's army, when it returned out of India, tells us expressly, that as soon as they entered a rich and plentiful country, the king caused them to celebrate a feast to Bacchus, himself leading the dance, and the army following dressed in the Bacchanalian mode, seven whole days being spent in rioting and drunkenness (96). Plutarch heightens this scene a good deal, and runs into a long description of the pomp and splendor of this admiral joined him, and gave him an account that all under his command were in perfect safety, and in an excellent condition ; with which the king was mightily pleased, and having treated him with singular marks of favour and respect, sent him back to the navy. Some informations having reached the king's ear of great disorders committed in Persia during his absence, he immediately set out with a body of horse, and light-armed troops, for Passargadæ, where was the tomb of Cyrus. It was a small, but neat pile of building, with a fine plantation about it ; and near it a convenient house for some of the magi, who were appointed to take care of it. In the tomb itself lay the body of Cyrus in a coffin of gold; placed on a bed of state, the apartment being in every respect royally furnished. This place to his great con-

(96) Diodor. lib. xvii.

romantic cavalcade (97): Curtius exceeds Plutarch, and displays his rhetoric in a very pompous detail of this Dionysian festival. At the close of his account he has added some political reflections, which do indeed shew that such a march was excessively foolish and ridiculous, but at the same time bear so hard on the probability of the fact, that one would think they were sufficient to overthrow it. He observes, that if but one thousand men of courage had attacked this drunken and dissolute rout, they must at least have defeated, and might have easily cut them all to pieces (98). Arrian however assures us, that Ptolemy and Aristobulus, who accompanied the king in his march, said nothing in their memoirs of the celebrating any such festival (99). The great Sir Walter Raleigh (100), and the learned dean Prideaux, (1), both mention this march, without giving their readers the least notice, that there is reason to doubt what some authors have delivered about it. Nay, the latter actually quotes Arrian in support of this passage, which however he flatly contradicts. This shews the necessity of separating the relations of different authors ; if we intend to instruct, and not to confound readers ; and this shews too the use of a history written truly from what is delivered by the antients, and not after the collections of the moderns, who are too apt to regard the symmetry and beauty of their own works, to intersperse those doubts which necessarily arise from the consideration of divided authorities. We thought this no less necessary to be said in defence of our own work, than proper for the information of the reader, since we presume not to dissent from the opinions of men of so great worth as Raleigh and Prideaux, but for the sake of siding with truth and justice, which no authority ought to overbear.

(97) Plut. in vit. Alex. (98) Curt. lib. ix. prop. fin. (99) Arrian. lib. vi. c. 23. (100) History of the world, Book II. sect. 22.
 (1) Connection of the Old and New Testament. P. 1. B. 8. A. A. C. 325.

cern and amazement he found rifled, all things valuable taken away, except the coffin, which was strangely battered and bruised. All the enquiry he could make produced no discovery of the authors of this villainy; for the magi either could not or would not declare by whom it was done. All that in such a case therefore the king could do, was to direct that every thing should be restored to the state it was in before this accident, which accordingly was done, and Aristobulus was appointed to see those orders executed. Orsines a Persian acted at this time as governor of Persia, not by any appointment from the king, but of his own head, the governor settled there by Alexander dying while he was in India; this Orsines was charged by the people with many grievous crimes, particularly with putting many persons of distinction to death, merely to gratify his own resentments. Upon which accusations, after due proofs exhibited, he was condemned to be crucified. This story by some authors is related in a very different manner, as if not he, but Alexander himself, had been the criminal; however, there seems to be no just grounds for any such charge, and therefore we may justly wonder that modern writers of great credit have given into it, and thence taken occasion to charge Alexander with a vice which the best authors tell us he vehemently detested (M). Peucestas, who had had saved the king's life when he fought against a whole garrison, was appointed governor of Persia. Which dignity was no sooner conferred upon him, than he laid aside the Macedonian garb, and put on the Median habit, being the only one of Alexander's captains, who, by complying with the manners of the people he governed, acquired their affection. Baryaxes a Mede, who had put on the royal tiara, and assumed the regal style, being brought prisoner hither by Atropates, governor of Media, with those who had counselled him to revolt, was with them by order of the king put to death: After which Alexander marched to Persepolis, the ruins of which when he had a while considered, he is said to have expressed great concern for what he had done. In these marches, Calanus the Indian, who had accompanied Alexander at his intreaty, finding himself declining in health by reason of a flux which hung upon him, besought the king that a funeral pile might be prepared, which with some difficulty was granted. The sage, now so weak as to be carried in a litter, caused himself to be placed therein on the top of the pile, after having taken an affectionate leave of the Macedonians, particularly of Lyfimachus, who was his disciple, and stretching himself at full length, remained without voice or motion in the midst of the flames<sup>m</sup>.

(M) Curtius tells us, that Orsines the Persian was lineally descended from Cyrus; that he met the king with a most prodigious train of carriages filled with all sorts of provisions and refreshments; to which he added presents of great value, and four thousand talents in ready money. He was also, as the same author tells us, extremely liberal to Alexander's friends; but passed by Bagoas the eunuch, whom this author makes Alexander's catamite, without affording him any taste of his bounty. Nay, when he was put in mind of him by his friends, he answered, that he loved the king, and honoured his counsellors and captains; but as for such infamous fellows as Bagoas, he contemned and despised them; upon this the eunuch determined to destroy him, and for that purpose hired certain mean wretches to forswear themselves by vouching upon their oaths certain stories which he taught them. Himself took pains to poison the king's mind with the most malicious tales, and the most cruel suggestions against this innocent and worthy man, whom at length he took this opportunity to destroy: The king going to visit the tomb of Cyrus, which we have elsewhere described, found it robbed of every thing valuable. Bagoas, seeing Alexander surprised, immediately said, he wondered not at all at it, for that some governors were so rich, that their houses would not contain their wealth; and that in all probability Orsines would not have parted with his money so freely, if he had come by it very honestly.

Endeavours to unite the Macedonians and Persians.

THE king having dispatched Atropates to his government, marched himself to Susa, where Abulites and his son Oxathres honestly. Then Bagoas put his false witnesses upon accusing Orsines, and on their testimony he was condemned and executed. Curtius tells us, that as he went to death, Bagoas struck him; and that thereupon Orsines said, I have heretofore been informed that the Persian empire hath been governed by women; but that it should be ruled by an eunuch, is a new thing (2). We are not able to trace any part of this story in any of the histories remaining of Alexander's life, excepting this of Curtius. Arrian says expressly, that Orsines was put to death for sacrilege, oppression and cruelty (3). Plutarch speaking of the robbery committed in Cyrus's tomb, says, that Alexander put to death Polymachus, a man of quality, and native of Pella in Macedonia (4). As to the fact, we can say no more; but as to the dying words, they certainly belong to Curtius, for Orsines could not possibly use them. He must have remembered the empire ruled by a namesake of this very eunuch; nay, he must have remembered this very eunuch in the highest favour with Darius. Let the reader decide of the rest as he thinks fit.

<sup>m</sup> ARRIAN. lib. vii. c. 3, 4, 5. DIOBOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

(2) Curt. lib. x. (3) Arrian. lib. vi. cap. 30. (4) Plutarch. in vit. Alex.

being charged with great crimes in the administration of public affairs, were put to death. Afterwards the king gave an extraordinary loose to pleasure, resolving to make himself, his officers, and soldiers, an amends for the difficulties they had hitherto undergone, purposing at the same time so effectually to unite his new-conquered with his hereditary subjects, that the jealousies and fears which had hitherto tormented both should no longer subsist. With this view he took himself two wives of the royal blood of Persia, Barsine, or Statira, the daughter of Darius, and Parisatis the daughter of Ochus. Drypetis, another daughter of Darius, he gave to Hephestion; Amastri the daughter of Oxyartes, the brother of Darius, married Craterus; and to the rest of his friends, to the number of eighty he gave other ladies of the greatest quality. All these marriages were celebrated at once, Alexander himself bestowing fortunes on them; he directed likewise that the numbers of his officers and soldiers who had married Asiatic wives should be taken; and though they appeared to be ten thousand, yet he gratified each of them according to his rank. He resolved next to pay the debts of his army, and thereupon issued an edict, directing every man to register his name, and the sum he owed; with which the soldiers complying slowly from an apprehension that there was something else behind, he ordered tables heaped with money to be set in all the quarters of the camp, and caused every man's debts to be paid on his bare word; without so much as making any entry of his name; though the whole sum came to twenty thousand talents. On such as had distinguished themselves in an extraordinary manner, he bestowed crowns of gold. Peucestas had the first; Leonatus the second; Nearchus the third; Onesicritus the fourth; Hephestion the fifth; and the rest of his guards each of them one. After this he made other dispositions proper for conciliating, as he supposed, the differences among all his subjects. He reviewed the thirty thousand youths, whom at his departure for India he had ordered to be taught Greek, and the Macedonian discipline; expressing high satisfaction, that the fine appearance they made rendered them worthy of the appellation he had bestowed on them, viz. Epigoni, i. e. successors. He promoted also, without any distinction of nation, all those who had served him faithfully and valiantly in the Indian war. When all these regulations were made, he gave the command of his heavy-armed troops to Hephestion, and ordered him to march directly to the banks of the Tigris, while in the mean time a fleet was equipped at the Eulæus for carrying the king and the troops he retained with him down to the ocean<sup>n</sup>.

*The Macedonians
mutiny.*

IT is clear from this short expedition, that Alexander began to have a great taste in maritime affairs, which had been too much neglected by his predecessors, his father Philip only excepted. It is said, that he meditated a voyage to the coasts of Arabia and Ethiopia, and thence round the whole continent of Afric to the streights of Gibraltar. However, of this there seems to be no great certainty; but that he really intended to subdue the Carthaginians, and make some attempt on Italy, is more than probable. When he arrived with his fleet in the ocean, he directed his course to the mouth of the river Tigris, which he entered, and sailed up to the camp of Hephestion, without meeting either with any extraordinary obstacle, or himself performing any thing worth recording, except that he directed certain engines to be removed, which the Persians had placed in the river to render it less navigable; for he conceiving this to be a cowardly and scandalous practice, worthy of the old masters of the river, though not of him, would not permit these incumbrances to remain any longer, and therefore set the river free. When the king came to Opis, a city seated on the Tigris, he issued an edict, purporting that such of the Macedonians, as through infirmity or wounds, were incapable of serving longer, or who through the hardships they had undergone, were unwilling to make any more campaigns, might have their discharges, and return home; but that such as chose rather to remain with him, should receive so great encouragement, that those in their own country should envy their condition; this was certainly intended to please the soldiers, and to make them perfectly easy: It had however a quite contrary effect; for as soon as the army was informed of his intent, they began immediately to clamour in an unusual manner, and to transgress all the bounds both of reason and duty; insomuch that when the king mounted his tribunal, they assembled round it, demanded, That they might all be discharged, reproached the king with the favours he had done to the Barbarians, bid him take his dancing boys and conquer nations; and some of them had the insolence to tell him, That his father Hammon and he might go and subdue the world by themselves. It was upon this occasion that the King performed the most shining action in his whole life; he leaped from his tribunal, and calling to his guards, made them seize one by one thirteen of the ring-leaders, whom he pointed out, and ordered to be put to death upon the spot ; this struck such a terror into the rest, that they were all silent ; whereupon the king remounted his tribunal, and in an eloquent speech, shewed the justice of his own conduct, and the folly of theirs. When he had done speaking, he leaped again from his tribunal, and retired to his palace, where he neither put on his robes, nor admitted any of his friends for two days ; on the third he called the Persian nobility round him, promoted them to the principal commands in the army, and permitted such of them as were become his relations by marriage to kiss him. In the mean time, the Macedonians stood most of them about the tribunal like statues ; but when they were told that the king was forming a Persian army after the Grecian manner, and that he intended to give the title of the royal regiment to a Persian corps of horse, they ran like distracted people to the palace ; and surrounding it laid down their arms, offered to deliver up the authors of the sedition, and protested that they would remain there day and night, till the king had pity on them. When Alexander was informed of this, he came to the gate in order to speak to them ; but when he saw their arms upon the ground, and their dejected looks, he melted into tears, and lost the power of speaking. A quarter of an hour past in deep silence ; at last Callines, an antient man, who had served in an auxiliary troop of horse, broke it : Thy Macedonians, O king! said he, are full of grief, because you have stiled the Persians your kindred, and have suffered them to kiss you, while they were excluded. The king answered, I now make you all my kindred, and henceforward will have you reputed so. Callines thereupon stepping forward, kissed him, as did every one of the Macedonians. After this Alexander gave a solemn feast, at which were present nine thousand persons. The Macedonians sat next the king, next them the Persians, and after them persons of all nations. This vast company eat together, and drank all out of one golden cup, to the prosperity and perpetual affection of all the nations over whom Alexander was king °.

<sup>n</sup> ARRIAN. lib. vii. c. 6. DIODOR. ubi supra PLUT. ubi supra.
CURT. lib. x.

THE Macedonians, who were sent home as invalids, a- Alexanmounted to ten thousand : they had each of them their pay, der and a talent apiece given them over for their expences ; Cra- marches terus was appointed their commander, and Polysperchon no- into Me-minated to assist him ; orders were likewise sent into Mace- dia.
donia, directing that these old soldiers should have great respect paid them, and themselves and their children enjoy large privileges ;

° ARRIAN. DIODOR. PLUT. CURT. & JUST. ubi supra.

privileges ; their sons however by Asiatic women the king retained, appointing them schools and masters at his own expence. The severity with which he punished such of the governors as had offended during his absence, as it extremely pleased the people in general, so it frightened such as were guilty, as those who were executed, insomuch that many of them fled. Amongst the rest, Harpalus, who had done so once before ; but now, to secure himself effectually, he took five thousand talents out of the king's treasury, and having collected about six thousand mercenary soldiers he left them at Tænarus, and went himself to Athens ; from whence, after some time, being obliged to withdraw, he returned to his troops, and was killed by Thimbro, one of his intimate friends. As for Alexander, having cured the army of sedition, he was plagued with disputes among his friends. Hephestion his favourite especially presumed too far on his kindness towards him, and had once the insolence to remove Eumenes, the king's secretary, and the man of the clearest head in his whole army, out of his lodgings, for the sake of a musician belonging to himself ; whereupon Eumenes went to the king, and in the height of his passion told him, That the way to be in his favour now was to lay down their arms, and turn fiddlers. The king was very angry with Hephestion, and after having reproved him sharply, obliged him against his will to be reconciled to Eumenes. Then the king continued his march through Media, in which as Arrian informs us, it was said that he received from Atrobates a troop of female warriors, who were supposed to be Amazons ; but the same author tells us, that no author of any dignity had presumed to publish such a story in his writings ; he therefore rejects it as a fiction, as we also do, nor shall we trouble the readers with what other authors relate of Thalestris, her corps of female warriors, and her desiring Alexander to get her with child ; tales fitter for a romance, than for any thing which bears the name of history, much less the history of Alexander, the most prosperous captain of the Greeks, once the most eminent and deserving people in the world. The cause of the king's march this way is not expressed by Arrian, or indeed by any other author ; but it may with probability be imputed to Harpalus's flight, and the danger there was, that the rest of the royal treasures might be dissipated ; however it was, the king continued his rout to Ecbatana by pretty quick marches <sup>P</sup>.

<sup>P</sup> ARRIAN. lib. vii. c. 13. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xviii. PLUT. in vit. Alex. JUSTIN. lib. xii.

ON his arrival at that noble capital, he offered sacrifice to the gods, and exhibited solemn sports and plays, making also a royal banquet on that occasion; but the joy and mirth, as well of the king as of his army, was very shortly interrupted by Hephestion's falling suddenly very ill, and appearing to be in great danger of death. Authors are not agreed as to the occasion of his sickness; some expressly affirming that he overdrank himself; others, that he took a surfeit; however on the seventh day of his illness mortal signs appeared, of which when the king had notice, he immediately quitted the place of exercise, where he was at that time, and went to see him; but he came too late, for before he reached his lodgings, Hephestion was dead. It is said, that his physician having prescribed him a low diet, he refused to comply with it, eat a boiled capon, and drank freely of some wine which he liked that day; whereupon his fever, returning with greater violence than ever, carried him off. The king expressed very deep concern for the loss of his friend, and did him all the honours that he could possibly devise. Plutarch says, he ordered ten thousand talents to be spent on his monument; Arrian mentions the same sum spent in his obsequies at Babylon: As for what Ælian tells us, that he razed the castle of Ecbatana, crucified Hephestion's physician, and forbade the sound of the flute, or any other musical instrument in his camp, it really deserves no credit<sup>9</sup>. One thing Arrian informs us relating to this business, which is more probable, and at the same time more curious and better worth relating, viz. that all the great officers in Alexander's army devoted themselves and their arms to Hephestion at the motion of Eumenes, who took this method of shewing, that, far from being pleased at the death of a man who had differed with him, he was deeply concerned at it<sup>r</sup>. In the neighbourhood of Ecbatana dwelt the Cossians, a race of rude and barbarous people, sheltering themselves in the Median mountains, and whom some writers affirm never to have been subdued by the Persian kings. Against these people on account of their having committed some new robberies, Alexander, though it was winter, resolved to march, which accordingly he did, dividing his army into two bodies, one under his own command, the other under that of Ptolemy Lagus. The Cossians, as soon as they entered their country, fled to their old hiding places, supposing they would be now, as they had been heretofore, so many inaccessible fortresses; but they were quite mistaken, for

<sup>9</sup> ÆLIAN. Hist. Var. lib. ii. c. 41.
supra.

<sup>r</sup> ARRIAN. ubi

Alexander and Ptolemy continually pursued them, and at the head of the light-armed foot clambered up the rocks, and either compelled those who had taken shelter there to come down, or blocked up the mouths of their caves, and left them to starve. Whereupon the Cossians in despair sent deputies to submit themselves to Alexander's mercy. Some authors have affected to call this expedition man-hunting, and tell us, that Alexander, having slain many thousands of these poor people, called it offering a sacrifice to the manes of Hephestion. But if, as all authors agree, the Cossians were no better than a race of highland robbers, who, presuming on the natural strength of their country, thought to plunder such as passed through the skirts of it with impunity, with what propriety can the king's punishing these criminals be styled man-hunting? as to his sacrificing to the manes of Hephestion, we are told, that at Babylon he offered ten thousand beasts of different kinds to him; yet even this is taken from romance-writers; for neither Ptolemy nor Aristobulus mention any such thing; what credit then ought we to give this story of sacrificing men? If we may be indulged a conjecture, we can offer some account of the origin of this tale. It is highly probable, that some of Alexander's officers might propose the undertaking of this expedition to cure his grief, and in all likelihood some rhetorical flourish, in his memoirs after Alexander's death, took from thence a hint of calling this a sacrifice to the manes of Hephestion, and, as is natural enough, some dull writer or other transcribed this flourish for truth. Arrian often complains of such things, and Eratosthenes had before exposed them; we may therefore justly wonder when we find modern writers transcribing these improbable stories without giving their readers the least caution, or putting them in mind that they are taken from writers of doubtful credit. If the following a different method hath something lengthened this history, the judicious peruser will not complain, since it is certainly of equal importance to be acquainted with the authority on which facts are founded, as to be told the facts themselves<sup>c</sup>. But to return to Alexander; while he was at Ecbatana, he gave orders for felling a great quantity of timber in the mountains for building a navy, with which he designed to examine the Hyrceanian or Caspian sea, and to make himself as thoroughly acquainted therewith, as he now was with the coasts of the ocean, and the passage into the Tigris by the Persian gulph. These directions given, and the necessary orders distributed for the quiet administration of affairs in the province, he set out for Babylon.

<sup>c</sup> ATHEN. Deipnosoph. lib. x. PLUT. in vit. Alex. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

IN his march from Ecbatana to the last mentioned city, he Alexander gave directions for collecting whatever Grecian statues or o- marches to ther curiosities had been brought by Xerxes or any of his offi- Babylon. cers in any of their expeditions out of Greece into the Persian dominions, and ordered they should be carefully sent back. He likewise gave audience to many ambassadors, not only from the states of Greece, but also from Barbarian princes, who came to congratulate him on his safe return from his Indian expedition, giving them not only courteous and obliging answers, but also gratifying them in whatever requests they made him. When he drew near Babylon, the magi are said to have sent a deputation, requesting the king not to enter that city, because they foresaw that it would be fatal to him. Others say, that they were afraid to deliver the message they were charged with to the king himself, but that they applied themselves to Nearchus, who was then at court, and informed him of the king's danger; however it was, all agree that the king had notice of these predictions of the magi, and that at first they made great impression on him; but that when he had heard the Grecian philosophers reason upon this subject, he began to slight such things, and to return to his first resolution of marching directly to Babylon. When the Chaldeans found this, they offered the king another piece of advice, which was this; that if he would needs enter Babylon, he should march round it, and so enter it with his face towards the east. To this the king assented; but when he attempted to put it in execution, he found it impracticable, for the country, on the other side of Babylon, being a deep impassable marsh, he was constrained to return, and to enter it with his face to the west. This with some other presages, and unlucky omens, some of which fell out, and others were remembered about this time, gave the king great uneasiness (N). However, when he

(N) The presages referred to in the text are thus related by Arrian. Aristobulus tells us a strange story which happened to one of Alexander's men in this manner: When Apollodorus the Amphipolitan, one of the king's friends, who had been deputed to preside over the army, which was left for the security of the province, Mazeus being then governor, met him at his return from India, and perceived how severely he had treated several governors of provinces, he wrote to his brother Pythagoras, one of those augurs who gave answers by inspecting the entrails of beasts, and consulted him about his own safety. Pythagoras asked him in an-

he had been some time in Babylon, he resumed his former spirit, and began to bend his thoughts to the execution of certain vast designs he had formed, such as the conquest of the Arabians, the draining the Babylonian fens, and making a basin at Babylon capable of containing a thousand gallics. As to the first of these designs, he directed proper inquiries to be made concerning the country, people, and most proper answer to his letter, of whom he principally stood in fear, that he might divine accordingly? and when he replied, that he chiefly dreaded Alexander and Hephestion, and when he saw the laps or fillets of the liver wanting, he wrote a letter, and sent it sealed to his brother Apollodorus then at Ecbatana, wherein he assured him he need not stand in fear of Hephestion, for he would shortly be taken off by death. And Aristobulus tells us, that Apollodorus received this letter the day before Hephestion's decease: Then Pythagoras again consulting for Alexander, and finding the fillets of the liver wanting thereto, wrote to the same purpose a second time to Apollodorus. He never so much as endeavoured to conceal the matter, but freely communicated the whole story to the king, as a testimony of his sincere good will towards him; and intreated him to beware of the danger which threatened. Alexander hereupon commended him for his fidelity, and when he entered into Babylon, he demanded of Pythagoras by what means he was informed of those things which he had written to his brother concerning him? and being answered, that the livers of the sacrifices offered for that purpose were defective; he again enquired what that portended? to which the augur replied, some great mischief. However, the king was so far from being offended at him, that he respected him the more for relating the whole matter to him simply and sincerely. Aristobulus tells us, that he received this story from Pythagoras's own mouth, who also afterwards inspected the intrails for Perdiccas and Antigonus, and gave the same responses, and the events happened accordingly; for Perdiccas was slain making war against Ptolemy, and Antigonus lost his life in a battle against Seleucus and Lyfimachus, at the river Ipsus. A strange story is also related concerning Calanus the Sage, to this effect: When he was carried towards the funeral pile, immediately before his death, he kissed all his friends, and took his leave of them, except Alexander, and when he drew near the king for that end, he refused to kiss, and take his leave of him then; but told him, he would find him again at Babylon, and do it there. These words were not at all regarded at that time by those who heard them; but the decease of Alexander afterwards at Babylon brought them fresh into their memories, and they then looked upon them as a prophecy of his death (5).

(5) Arrian. lib. vii. c. 18.

proper time for invading Arabia. For his third project, he instantly assigned a number of ship-builders, architects, and labourers to carry it on ; and as to the second, he went in person down the Euphrates, about fourscore of our miles, to examine the canal called Pallacopas, by which the waters of the Euphrates were let out, in order to judge the better of the proposals he should receive for remedying those evils which fell so heavy upon Assyria. From thence he passed to the mouth of the canal, and so to the Arabian confines, where, finding an agreeable situation, he built a new city, and left in it a colony of Greek mercenaries. Then he determined to sail back through the marshes, having the city on his left hand. To shew the skill he had acquired in naval affairs, he directed the royal galley himself ; but as he was upon deck for this purpose, his tiara and fillet, which, according to the eastern mode, he wore to denote his regal dignity, were blown off by the wind. The tiara by its weight was carried to the bottom of the river ; but the fillet was borne by the winds to the sepulchre of one of the Assyrian kings, and there it stuck upon the reeds. A sailor seeing this, and being desirous to shew his zeal and courage in his master's service, jumped into the water, swam to the monument, and recovered the fillet. But being afraid that it might be wet as he swam back again, he put it upon his head, which was believed to increase the presage already held ominous enough <sup>a</sup>. Some writers have informed us, that this sailor on his coming on board had a talent given him as a reward for his boldness, but that he was immediately put to death ; but what Aristobulus says, besides the credit it derives from his saying it, is much more probable, viz. that he was rewarded with a talent for saving the fillet, and scourged for his indiscretion in putting it on his head. When the king returned to Babylon, he found there Peucestas who was come from Persia with twenty thousand regular troops, besides a considerable corps of Cossians and Tapurians, nations lately reduced. Philoxenus also arrived with an army out of Caria, Menander with a body of troops from Lydia, and Menidas with several squadrons of horse. Embassadors from Greece also arrived, who approached the king with garlands on their heads, and presented him with golden crowns, intending thereby to offer him divine honours, a thing which had been fatal to his father, and proved no less so to the son. He was extremely desirous of forming the Persian troops on the Ma

<sup>a</sup> ARRIAN. lib. vii. c. 22. DIODOR. Sic. ubi lib. xvi.

cedonian model, and having first appointed them officers of that nation, he next determined to incorporate them into his grand army. For this purpose, having directed a review, he assisted thereat for some time with great pleasure ; but finding himself on a sudden very dry, he quitted his throne to go and take some refreshment. A mean fellow, who was a prisoner, but sometimes permitted to go without chains, seeing the royal seat empty, passed briskly through the eunuchs, and sat himself down on the throne. When the king was informed of this, he ordered the man to be seized, and examined whether any body put him upon this, or what was his motive, if he did it of his own accord. The man answered, that himself only was to blame, and that he did it from a levity of mind, for which he could not account. On this account the thing was held still the more ominous, and the unhappy wretch for his unaccountable presumption, immediately put to death. A few days after this, when he offered the accustomed sacrifices for the success of his affairs, and had added some new ones, by the advice of his soothsayers, he feasted his friends, and continued the banquet till late at night. He is also said to have given the flesh of the sacrificed beasts to his army, and ordered wine to be distributed among them, according to their numbers in each troop and company. Some authors add, that he was then willing to have retired from the banquet to his bed-chamber, but was met on his way by Medius, one of his friends at that time in high favour, who intreated him to go and make merry with him that night, for that the sports and entertainments in his apartment would not displease him. The royal diary gives us an account that he eat and drank with Medius, and then retired to rest, and when he awaked, and had washed and refreshed himself, he again supped with Medius, and drank till late at night. When he retired from the banquet, and had washed, he eat a little, and lay down there, because he had some symptoms of a fever. Afterwards he was carried in a chair to the temple, and there sacrificed after his usual manner, and this he repeated several days ; and when the sacrifices were performed, he lay in an apartment prepared on purpose for him, till the evening. In the mean time he issued out orders to the captains of his troops to make ready for a march in four days time, and even nominated those who should travel on foot ; but those that were to go on board the fleet with him were to prepare themselves gainst the fifth day. After this he was carried to the river, and being put on board one of his galleys, gallies, was conveyed to some pleasant gardens on the other side, where, after he had washed, he went to rest. The next day he again bathed, and performed his accustomed sacrifices, which done, he entered his chamber, and held discourse with Medius, having given orders to his officers to attend him in the morning. He then supped moderately, and being conveyed to bed, had a continued fever upon him all that night. However, the next morning he again washed and sacrificed, and ordered Nearchus and the rest of his captains to prepare for sailing the third day. The next day he washed and sacrificed as before, but his fever still continued; notwithstanding which he again called his captains to him, and ordered all things to be made ready for a voyage, and having bathed, his fever increased towards the evening. The next day he was carried into a house adjacent to the bath, where he performed his usual sacrifices, and once more called his chief officers about him, to give orders concerning the intended voyage. The day following he was with great difficulty carried to sacrifice; however, he still continued to renew his orders, and notwithstanding he grew manifestly worse, could not be restrained from sacrificing the day after. He then commanded his chief officers to remain with him in the hall, and the inferior ones to wait at the gates, and growing still worse he was conveyed from the hall in the garden, where he then was, into the palace; and his chief officers approaching near to pay their attendance, he made signs, that he knew them, but was not able to speak, nor pronounce any thing articulate; and thus he remained all that night. The day following his fever still increased, and all that night and the next day continued strong and violent. The army by this time began to suspect that the king was dead; and as all crowds are violent in the pursuit of whatever they believe, they openly published this opinion of theirs, and when it was contradicted by those about his person, some of the soldiers had the assurance to force into the royal apartments, and even into that where the king lay. He was by this time speechless, and scarce able to stir; however he raised himself up, and made shift to extend his hand for them to kiss; which when they had done, they retired. A little after Python, Attalus, Demophon, Peucestas, Cleomenes, Menidas and Seleucus came in. They had watched all night in the temple of Serapis, and had proposed the following question to the god, Whether Alexander should be brought into his temple to recover his health? To which the oracle answered, That it would be best best for him to remain where he was. They had been in the room but a small time when the king expired, so that it was conjectured the oracle meant death was best for him: This is Arrian's account. As for those of other writers, the reader will find them in a note, it being absolutely necessary to let whatever is said upon that subject rest on the particular credit of him who writes it * (O).

WE

* ARRIAN. lib. viii. c. 24, 25, 26.

(O) Diodorus Siculus, speaking of the death of Alexander, ushers it in with an account of his losing his Tiara and Fillet, to avert which ill omen, he informs us, the king was enjoined to offer certain sacrifices; which having performed, Medius invited him, on his return, to a banquet, where the king drinking off the Herculean cup, was immediately struck with excessive pains, so that he was carried instantly to his lodgings. His sickness increasing, he began himself to despair of life, and gave his ring to Perdiccas. His friends inquiring to whom he left the kingdom, he answered, To the most worthy. He also intimated his foresight of their broils, by saying, He could already view the funeral games which would attend him. This author mentions the report of Alexander's dying by poison, through the contrivance of Antipater, with the circumstances alledged to support that opinion. But he leaves the reader to judge for himself on the facts and reasons produced (5). Plutarch relates the manner of his death circumstantially. He says, that after having given an entertainment to Nearchus, as he was going from the bath to bed, Medius would needs conduct him to a banquet. There, he says, the king drank all night, and the next day, which threw him into a fever that carried him off. He expressly rejects the story of the Herculean bowl, and of the king's being taken in an extraordinary manner. As to his being poisoned by Antipater's contrivance, he mentions it, and all its circumstances; but openly professes his disbelief of it. He cites the king's diary, as Arrian does; from whence it is clear, that there was nothing hasty or violent in Alexander's death, but that he was taken off by a fever (6). Curtius copies the same authors with Diodorus, but either delivers what they say more at large, or amplifies out of his own head. He tells us, that the king directed his body to be carried to Ammon; that when Perdiccas demanded at what time divine honours should be paid him? he answered him, when you are all happy. He is positive that the king was poisoned, and affirms that this black affair was styled by the power

(5) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. prop. fin. l. xiii. prop. fin.

(6) Plut. in vit. A.

WE have seen from the before-mentioned relation, as also Other relations of the king's death. from what we have noted out of other antient writers, that Alexander died a natural death. There was, however, an opinion propagated very early, that he died of poison; and the story is told thus. Antipater, say they, perceiving that he declined much in the king's favour, that Craterus was assigned him for a successor, and that himself was sent for into Persia, began to be fearful of the event. He therefore first of all sent his son Cassander to apologize for his conduct, with directions, if he found the king inexorable, to take him off; for which purpose, by the contrivance of Aristotle, who was in fear that the king would put in execution the threats thrown out against him when Callisthenes was in prison, Cassander was furnished with some Arcadian water of a deadly nature, put up in a vessel made of a mule's hoof, in which alone it could be contained. This water, it is said, Cassander, when he thought it necessary, gave to his brother Follas, who was the king's cup-bearer, by whom it was mixed with the wine which the king drank at the banquet given by Medius. The whole tale was, in all probability, a contrivance of Olympias, who, to give it the greater colour, would not suffer the body of Follas, who died not long after, to remain interred, but cast out his remains, as if she was satisfied that he had a hand in the death of his sovereign. The hatred

Year of the Flood, 2676.
Before Christ,
323.

of his successors. This is at least very improbable, for the king died at Babylon, Antipater commanded in Greece, a sedition followed on the king's demise, is it not strange none of the contending parties should mention it then (7)? Seneca, speaking of the dreadful effects of drunkenness, expatiates on the death of Alexander. "He who in so many marches (says this elegant writer) so many battles, and so many harsh seasons, had vanquished all the difficulties of time and place; after so many rivers and seas traced in safety, by intemperance in drinking was destroyed, and by the fatal Herculean cup was sent to his grave (8)." Justin writes more clearly than all the rest as to the poisoning, which he takes for an indubitable fact. In other circumstances he agrees with Diodorus and Curtius. He is clear also as to the king's speaking after the soldiers had quitted the room; and yet Arrian and Ptolemy, from the king's diary, seem to agree he was speechless before they saw him. Perhaps he gave his ring to Perdiccas, and expressed his sentiments to his friends just before he lost his speech (9).

(7) Curt. l. x.
l. xii.

(8) Senec. Epist. lxxviii.

(9) Justin.

which Cassander expressed towards the family of Alexander, hath been also used as an argument in support of the probability of this story; but it has little in it, for, as the reader will see hereafter, this antipathy of Cassander may be accounted for as well, if not much better, from later causes. There is another story relating to Alexander's death, which, for its oddity, deserves to be recorded. It is said, that, when he found himself past recovery, he desired to be carried to the Euphrates, that, throwing himself thereinto, posterity might believe, as he came from, so he was returned to the gods; but in this he was hindered by his wife Roxana, to whom, upon that occasion, he said, That she envied him the honour of his divine origin. Arrian, from whom we have this, tells us, that he inserted it in his history, only that it might appear that he was acquainted with such reports, but that, however, he gave no credit to them<sup>a</sup>.

Remarks on his character.

WE are now come to the end of that famous reign, which makes so great a figure in all history; but we shall not take upon us to conclude it with any character of Alexander, because, in the best authors of antiquity, there are many characters of him already. To these we cannot altogether assent, and it would be perhaps setting our own authority too high, should we attempt to censure them: We shall therefore observe, that, in reading these characters, just regard ought to be had to the rank and credit of the several authors who have wrote them. Historians have considered him either as an enterprising and successful prince, the glory of whose great actions scarce suffers the blemishes in his personal conduct to be seen; which is the light Arrian has placed him in; or they make his virtues and vices alike conspicuous, which seems to be the view of Curtius. Philosophers and moral writers have dealt more strictly with him, and have therefore seldom run into high panegyrics, Plutarch only excepted, who, in his orations on the fortune and virtue of Alexander, speaks as a rhetorician. The satyrist Lucian hath depicted him with great spirit, and with consummate judgment; but he seems to have kept his eye too closely on the latter scenes of his life, when his fortune, not his merit, was at its greatest height. However it is considered, his character is always shining, as his actions were in themselves very extraordinary. He died, according to the account of Aristobulus, in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad, when he had lived thirty two years and eight months, and had reigned twelve years and eight months <sup>b</sup>. Plutarch agrees pretty well with this <sup>c</sup>; but Justin asserts, that he was thirty three years old and one month, for which questionless he had some, though we think, not sufficient authority (P).

<sup>a</sup> ARRIAN. I. vii. c. 27.

As

<sup>b</sup> Ap. ARRIAN. l. vii. c. 28.      <sup>c</sup> PLUT in vita Alex. JUSTIN. l. xii. c. ult.

(P) We propose, in this note, to say somewhat of the historians who have written of Alexander's history, and of those especially from whom we have collected it. We will begin with Aristobulus. He was an eminent officer in Alexander's army, and much in his favour, as is evident from his being intrusted with the care of seeing the tomb of Cyrus restored to its first condition (10). He wrote memoirs of what he saw, which are much commended, and in a great measure copied by Arrian, Plutarch, and Strabo; yet they had not the good luck to please Alexander, who, reading in them the story of his engagement with Porus, threw the book into the river Hydaspes. Anaximenes of Lampsacus, who had once been Alexander's tutor, wrote of his actions; but his work, which was not much approved, hath been long lost. Baton, who acted as engineer in Alexander's army, published an account of Alexander's encampments during his expedition (11). Callisthenes the philosopher; the history he wrote of Alexander is said to have been excellent so far as it went; yet it is questionable whether he wrote any history at all (12). Clytarchus, another of his followers, wrote a very fabulous history of his achievements (13). Marsyas, the brother of Antigonus, and who commanded the fleet under his nephew Demetrius, wrote a complete history of Macedon, including the reign of Alexander, which was much esteemed; and another treatise of the education of Alexander, for which he was exceedingly well qualified, because he was educated with him (14). Nearchus, Alexander's admiral, left the journal of his Indian voyage, which Arrian made use of in his Indian history, not without a gentle censure of the author's veracity (15). Onesicritus, the captain of Alexander's gally, writ a history, or rather a romance, in relation to his master's achievements. This man had genius, was a great philosopher, and had a good stile. It is said, that Alexander, having read this performance, said, He should be glad to come to life again after some time, to see what reception that book met with. Its author, it seems, read part of it once, which contained Alexander's war against the Amazons, to Lyfimachus; And where, I pray, was I, said the king, when all these strange things happen-

(10) Arrian. l. vii.      (11) Joseph contra Appion.      (12) Arrian l. iv c. 15.      (13) Curt. l. ix.      (14) Athen. Dipnosoph. l. 14.      Diodor. Sicul. l. xx.      (15) Arrian. hist. Indic. Strabon. Geog. l. xi.

The wives and descendants of Alexander.

As to the issue he left behind him, we shall speak generally here, and more particularly in the subsequent chapter. By Barsine the daughter of Artabazus, and the widow of Memnon, a lady of great beauty and merit, he had a son named Hercules, who was afterwards murdered. By Roxana the daughter of Oxyartes the Bactrian, he had a posthumous son named Alexander, who had for a time the title of king. By Cleophes, queen of part of India, he had a son named Alexander, who succeeded his mother in her kingdom. By Statira, the daughter of Darius, he had no children; nor by Parisatis the daughter of Ochus. As to the former, the very judicious dean Prideaux seems to think, that Arrian mistook her name when he called her Barsine, and that he confounded her with the widow of Memnon<sup>d</sup>; but, upon looking farther into this matter, we find, that Arrian did not confound them, though there is a mistake in the name in the present copies; for it appears from the excerpts in Photius, that she was called by Arrian, not Barsine, but Arsinoe, which, for aught we know, might be her true name<sup>e</sup>. Of these ladies we have reason to suppose, that Roxana was the best beloved, since it appears, that he married her from the dictates of his passion, the rest for reasons of state.

<sup>d</sup> Connection of the Old and New Testament, p. i. b. viii. A. A. C. 325.      <sup>e</sup> Ap. Phot p. 214.

ed (16)? There is still a manuscript history in Latin, which goes under the name of Valerius, stuffed with these romantic accounts, and for that reason never printed. As to authors in better repute, Craterus is said to have written memoirs of his master's victories, which were also recorded in the commentaries of Exmenes, and in the history of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, whom, of all others, Arrian commends, and follows most. On this account it is, that we prefer his history to all that are now extant; and, amongst other reasons, it is valuable for this, that we have it intire, excepting only a passage of no great length in the seventh book. Strabo, as he has occasion to mention the provinces conquered by Alexander, mentions also abundance of passages of his life, and furnishes us with various particulars, which are not to be found elsewhere. Diodorus Siculus hath afforded us much assistance, and would have afforded more, if there had not been so large a chasm in his seventeenth book. Curtius we have all along examined, and, where it was necessary, made use of him, as also of Justin. Ælian, Polyænus, and Frontinus, have been consulted as to particular facts, together with Lucian, Seneca, and many others, whose names it is unnecessary to retail to the reader.

(16) Plut. in vita Alex.

W R

WE have now perfected the history of a reign, which bestowed the epithet of Great on him of whom we have been speaking, and extended his empire, in name at least, over the world. This indeed was rather a flight of Grecian flattery, than any adequate description of his dominions. He was far from being master of the world then known, for he possessed but part of Asia, a small part of Afric, and a still smaller of Europe; yet he was the lord of a multitude of fair provinces, the sovereign of many large and powerful kingdoms, and held an empire more extensive than the world had till that time seen. Macedon was his hereditary kingdom; a great part of Thrace and Illyria he had subdued; all Greece was under his protection, and the protection of so great a prince always did, and always will include sovereignty. His Asiatic conquests reached from the Hellepont to the Indian ocean, including all that the great king possessed, and more. Egypt and Libya were his; and all the Greek islands owned his authority. All these were the acquisition of a few years, and many of them obtained in as little time as he could pass through them. We have, in the course of our history, endeavoured to place all these conquests according to the order of time in which they were made, as also according to their vicinity to each other. For the better understanding of the whole, we have subjoined a map of his dominions, wherein is marked the rout of his army, from his first march out of Macedonia to his last coming to Babylon; and, that this might be still more intelligible, we have, in a note, shewn the value of that map in point of accuracy, and likewise explained its uses (Q). Here then let us quit this subject, with

(Q) The map which we have given our readers, was drawn by the famous M. De Lisle, in the year 1729, for the use of the French king. There is therefore all the reason in the world to believe, from the known ability of the author, and from the design of his work, that it is excellent in its kind, and was performed with all imaginable accuracy. In this map there is a double description of the countries laid down therein. One by M. De Lisle, founded upon astronomical observations; the other according to our modern geographers in general. The reader will have the satisfaction of comparing both, and of seeing all Alexander's marches and conquests, as they are delineated in one and in the other. The situation of places in M. De Lisle's map were, as we have said, determined by observations, where they were to be had, and, where they were not, from the geographical tables of the eastern astronomers, who, by comparison of the situations assigned of places where observations had been made, were judged with this remark, that the foregoing history is not collected from any one author, or with a partial regard to any of those it is collected from. We have compared the best writers of antiquity on this subject, and have from them laid down a regular series of events, distinguishing, as far as we were able, the probable from the improbable, the certain from the doubtful; and, where we were not able thus to distinguish, we have cited the authorities which hindered us from distinguishing, and have placed the evidence before our readers, that they may decide for themselves. Such is this history of the rise, progress, and establishment of the Macedonian empire, which, we hope, will be found consistent with the plan laid down of this work, and very different from any other yet extant in our language.

S E C T. VI.

The Division of the MACEDONIAN Empire.

State of things at the death of Alexander.

THE death of Alexander had well nigh proved the dissolution of his empire; for at first the extreme grief of every body hindered them from paying a proper respect to public affairs; and, when these high transports of affection were over, their feuds and jealousies had almost occasioned the shedding a deluge of Macedonian blood round to come very near the truth. Where both of these were wanting, the distances set down in the relations of travellers in the highest credit were made use of. The inquisitive reader may be further satisfied of the care and nicety with which this map was done, if he will take the trouble of perusing a short, but very full memoir on that subject, written by the author's son-in-law (17). We ourselves have taken some pains in the same way, and have compared the situation of the Caspian sea in M. De Lisle's map, by the chart of the same sea drawn by order of the Czar, and published in the year 1731, and find them to correspond very well. We have also found, that M. De Lisle's map reconciles the descriptions given by antient authors, with those which have been delivered to us by the most judicious modern travellers. On the whole therefore we are well satisfied, that what we have just now said, and also what we have advanced in the text, is agreeable to truth, and no more than what every judicious reader will readily discern; to add more on this head therefore would be tedious.

(17.) Recherches Geographiques sur l'etendue de l'empire d'Alexander, &c. par M. Bauche. Memoires de l'Academie Royale des Sciences, 1731.

the dead body of their king. The want of an historian who might be depended on, and the having many on whose works we cannot so well rely, have concurred in throwing a dark veil of obscurity over this part of our history ; which, from the best materials we have, and in the best manner we can, we will endeavour to remove. A day or two after the death of the king, his friends assembled in the council-room, and summoned thither all the principal commanders of the army ; but the soldiers and people who were not summoned, and who neither ought, nor with any propriety could have any share in such consultations, came in vast crowds, and so blocked up the passages, that many of the great officers could not get in. Proclamation was then made by a herald, that none should presume to approach the assembly, or to remain there, but such as were called by name ; which proclamation however was very little regarded ; and we mention this as a remarkable instance of the difference between authority and power. Those who had commanded this proclamation to be made, had assumed the administration ; but the people presuming on their own power, and knowing that these governors had none but what they should think fit to lend them, gave little heed to their commands ; but, on the contrary, made them give way to their own curiosity, so that numbers of mean rank and little consideration remained at present in the council. Perdiccas, as soon as silence could be obtained, ordered the chair of Alexander to be brought forth, and having placed the robes and regalia upon it, laid upon them the royal ring, declaring, that he most willingly resigned any authority that might be intended him by the king when this ring was delivered to him. However, he proposed it as a thing not only expedient, but necessary, that the empire should have a head ; and when he had demonstrated this by proper arguments, he told them, that Roxana was with child, and that, if she brought forth a son, he ought to be acknowledged his father's successor. Nearchus applauded the design of preserving the regal dignity in the family of Alexander ; but said, it would be too long to wait for Roxana's delivery, especially as it would be attended with uncertainty. He therefore put them in mind of Hercules the son of Alexander by Barsine. The soldiers signified their dislike of this by the clangour of their arms. Ptolemy then propounded, that the chair of Alexander should retain the shadow of sovereignty, and that the state should be governed by a council of officers ; but this being disliked, a motion was made in favour of Perdiccas ; but he, out of modesty, refused it. At last somebody mentioned Arideus the brother of Alexander, who had always accompanied the king, and was wont to sacrifice

grifice with him. The Macedonian phalanx, full of affection, as all brave and honest nations are to the hereditary line of their antient kings, closed immediately with this proposition, and called for Aridæus. Perdiccas, Ptolemy, and most of the horse officers, were extremely averse to this measure; and they carried their obstinacy so far, as to retire from the assembly, and even to quit the city. However, Meleager, at the head of the phalanx, supported vigorously their first resolution, and threatened loudly to shed the blood of those who affected to rule over their equals, and to assume a kingdom which no way belonged to them. Aridæus they arrayed in royal robes, put on him the arms of Alexander, and saluted him by the name of Philip, that he might be rendered more popular<sup>a</sup>. While things remained in this situation, Meleager managed affairs about the new-created king, and Perdiccas transacted all things for the other party. Both pretended vast concern for the public, yet, at the bottom, intended nothing so much as their own private advantage, each having formed a scheme of ingrossing the administration, under colour of serving the interests of those they had drawn, not to favour them personally, but their specious pretences. In order to apprehend these things clearly, let us view all these great ones in their proper lights.

The characters of Perdiccas was a man of high birth, had a supreme command in the army, was much in favour with Alexander, and strongly confided in by the nobility. Meleager had rendered himself formidable by uniting the Macedonians who composed the phalanx in one opinion, and by raising one to the kingdom who was wholly under his direction<sup>b</sup>. Aridæus was, as we have heretofore shewn, the son of Philip by a dancer named Philina; he was of small parts, not by nature, but by the practices of Olympias, who by poisonous draughts had taken care to weaken both his constitution and his mind. He had however for his wife Eurydice his cousin, as we shall see hereafter, by whose assistance he was able to manage pretty well. At present, alone and without counsellors, he acted as the times required, he did what Meleager would have him, but he declared that whatever he did he did by the advice of Meleager, so that he made his minister accountable for his own schemes, and no way indangered himself. The Macedonians besides their affection for the royal house, began to entertain a personal love for Aridæus, now called Philip on account of his mildness and moderation<sup>c</sup>. Besides these who were the principal characters on the stage at this time, there was another who through modesty declined public notice, and was notwithstanding a prime instrument in adjusting the differences which were now on foot, and made a most shining figure in public affairs afterwards. This was Eumenes the Cardian, the late king's secretary. He was, as far as we find, little distinguished by birth, though his father could not have been a waggoner, as some report, because he was Philip of Macedon's host, who taking a fancy to his son, retained him about his person, and having tried his fidelity, at length made him his secretary, in which post Alexander found and continued him. This post alone would have rendered him very considerable, but the king had raised him beside to the highest military commands, he being one of so rare a genius as to be alike suited to a camp or court, and no less capable of commanding in the field, than of giving advice in the closet. When the marriages were made by the king's directions at Susa, Eumenes was in some measure allied to him, for he had then given him Artonis, whom some call Barsine the daughter of Artabazus, and sister to Barsine, who was the mother of Hercules by Alexander. These were the busy actors at this period, Perdiccas full of ambition, Meleager selfish and revengeful, Aridæus or Philip weak and timorous, Eumenes brave, wise, and inviolably attached to the royal house<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> CURT. lib. x DIODOR. SICUL lib. xviii JUSTIN. lib. xiii. OROS. lib. iii PLUT. in vit. Alex. & EUMEN. <sup>b</sup> PLUT. in vit. EUMEN. DIODOR. CURT. ubi supra.

THE foot under Meleager held Babylon, and the king's person in their hands, and were cloathed with his authority, which however Meleager overstretched when he sent some to seize Perdiccas, for that great officer so frightened them with his frowns, and words, that they returned re infecta, and so made the breach the wider. The cavalry under Perdiccas, Ptolemy Lagus, and other generals, invested the city, or rather shut up the passages thereto, so that presently famine began to appear, and even to be felt. The inhabitants of the adjacent villages fled for safety to Babylon, and multitudes, pinched by hunger, issued from the city to seek subsistence in the country. This confusion compelled the phalanx to think of treating, and Eumenes, who, as a stranger by birth, had hitherto affected a neutrality, easily brought about an accommodation by blending both schemes together, allowing Aridæus or Philip the regal title, and vesting the authority in the great officers, of whom Meleager was to be held the third.

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. apud. PHOT. Biblioth. Cod. xcii. JUSTIN. CURT. ubi supra. <sup>d</sup> PLUT. in vit. Eumen. & CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusd.

In consequence of this accommodation, all the great officers of the army came to court, especially Perdiccas and Ptolemy, the former eagerly desiring to assume the sovereignty under the specious title of protector, and the latter secretly aiming at the division of the empire, that under the name of a government he might secure a kingdom to himself. Perdiccas soon gained an ascendancy over Philip, insomuch that he conducted all things according to his own will, though in the name of that prince. The first design of consequence he aimed at putting in execution was the taking off Meleager, in order to which he framed a plot equally subtil and successful ; he put some of his own adherents on complaining openly of Meleager's being made equal to Perdiccas ; this naturally led Meleager to expostulate with him ; upon which Perdiccas with an air of frankness told him, that such incendiaries ought immediately to be punished, and proposed a general lustration of the army, as the only probable method of taking off such disturbers of the public peace. Meleager readily came into this, looking upon it as an indubitable testimony of Perdiccas's friendship. But when the horse and foot were drawn into the field, and the king quitting the phalanx, rode along the first line of the right wing with Perdiccas ; the foot began to be in some terror, and in that terror all their courage forsook them ; sometimes they thought of retiring into the city, at others of opposing force by force. Meleager of all others was least present to himself, so that after deliberating long, and proposing many things, they resolved on nothing, till Perdiccas formed the horse over-against them with the elephants in front. Then taking the king with him, he rode along the first line of the phalanx, and demanded the authors of the late sedition. Meleager and his soldiers answered nothing, yet by the dejection of their countenances, they plainly shewed how low their spirits were sunk ; this encouraged Perdiccas to draw out by force three hundred, who in the late affair had been most active for Meleager, whom without more ado he cast to the elephants, and suffered to be trampled to death in the sight of the army ; the king looking on rather as a surprized spectator, than as the author of so cruel a deed. As no body pretended to lay hands on Meleager himself, he neither spoke nor stirred to save those who had acted by his authority, which answered the end of Perdiccas, for on his return to Babylon every body shunned and was afraid of him, which had such an effect on his mind, already disordered, that he took sanctuary in a temple, vainly hoping that his enemies would not pursue him to the altar ; whereas ambitious men shew no respect to religion, but when it is their tool, and therefore Perdiccas, who thought himself not safe while this man lived, ordered him without ceremony there to be slain, which was accordingly performed; and thus the authority of Perdiccas was for the present established * (A).

To

* DIODOR. CURT. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

(A) In this note we intend to acquaint the reader with the authors on whose authority we build what is delivered in this section. The first of these is Arrian, the same whom we chiefly followed in our history of Alexander the Great. He wrote upon this subject a treatise consisting of ten books, which are all unfortunately lost, and what we quote in their stead is no more than a very brief account of their contents preserved by the famous Photius, who at the end of his extract hath added a character of this author worthy of the service which he has done to the commonwealth of letters. He tells us, that as an historian he knows none who ought to be preferred before him, his stile, continues he, is strong and uniform, his narration seldom interrupted by digressions; those there are alike pertinent and short. His eloquence never misleads him into any thing forced, or hard to be understood, and while he preserves all the dignity of history, he introduces nothing of that unintelligible sublime, which is the bane of writers of warm imaginations, and who have judgments as warm. Yet in point of elegance his work is no less valuable than in point of veracity; his periods are sweet and perfectly well turned; his language so accurately proper, that it is impossible to say he ever rises above, or sinks below his subject. In a word, there is such a harmony, perspicuity, and noble simplicity in the works of this writer, that to add or take away from them, would be doing visible injury both to the author and reader (1). Diodorus Siculus hath written as well and more copiously than any on the matters of which we treat in this section (2). Curtius at the close of his work treats very fully of what happened at and immediately after the death of Alexander, in which he the rather deserves credit, because what he relates agrees very well with Arrian, particularly in the division of the provinces (3). Plutarch in the close of his life of Alexander, in his lives of Eumenes and Demetrius, and in many other treatises of his, hath afforded us frequently materials. To these we may add Justin (4). We have collated them all; and where they differ have selected what was most probable, and most consistent with other parts of the narration. In most of our collections of general history, this period is remarkably distracted and confused, not so much for want of authorities, as for want of using them; as also from a prejudice against

(1) Phot. Bibliothec. Cod. xcii. (2) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii.

(3) Curt. lib. x. (4) Justin. l. xiii.

The empire divided.

To satisfy the ambition of the principal commanders in the army, to provide for the safety of the empire, and to free himself from competitors, Perdiccas quickly called a general council, wherein the following distribution of honours and governments was made. Aridæus, and the son of Roxana now born, and named Alexander, were to enjoy the regal authority. Antipater had the government of the European provinces as general of the army there. Craterus had the title of protector. Perdiccas had in reality the office, with the stile of general of the household troops, in the room of Hephestion. Ptolemy the son of Lagus had Egypt, Libya, and that part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt. Cleomenes, a man of infamous character, whom Alexander had made receiver-general in Egypt, was made Ptolemy's deputy. Lao-medon had Syria, Philotas Cilicia, Pithon Media, Eumenes Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and all the country bordering on the Euxine sea, as far as Trapezus; but these were not yet conquered, so that he was a governor without a province. Antigonus had Pamphilia, Lycia, and Phrygia Major, Cassander Caria, Menander Lydia, Leonatus Phrygia on the Hellepont. In Europe, Thrace, the Chersonese, and the countries adjoining as far as Salmydessus on the Euxine Sea were given to Lyfimachus; the rest of the countries subject to the Macedonians, as far as the Ceraunian mountains, with all Greece, were left to Craterus and Antipater. As to the rest of the provinces not mentioned in this division, they remained under the governors appointed them by Alexander. We have in this account followed our old guide Arrian; what other authors have delivered on this subject, the readers will perceive by a note; for to have inserted in the text the different accounts we have of this matter would have taken up much time, and room, at the same time that it would have the matter itself, as if the wars of Alexander's successors, till such time as the four capital empires, into which his was broken, arose, were of little importance. Whereas the giving a full, distinct, and perspicuous account of such perplexed parts of history, is one of the greatest services a writer can render to posterity; and in support to this observation, we beg leave to remark, that though Arrian wrote but seven books of the life of Alexander, yet he wrote ten of the division of his empire, notwithstanding he carries his history no lower than Antipater's return to Europe; so necessary it appeared to him that the transactions in this period should be well understood. Add to this, that the latter extract in Photius is four times as long as the former (5).

(5) Vide Phot. Bibl. Cod. xci. xcii.

perplexed the reader, and interrupted the thread of our narration <sup>f</sup> (B). THIS

<sup>f</sup> ARRIAN. apud. Phot. ubi supra. CURT. ubi supra.

(B) The division of Alexander's empire, according to other authors, ran thus: Diodorus Siculus affirms, that Perdiccas confirmed the kingdom to Aridæus; gave to Ptolemy Egypt; to Pithon Media; to Eumenes Paphlagonia, with Cappadocia, and the neighbouring countries; to Cassander Caria; to Meleager Lydia; to Leonatus Phrygia upon the Hellespont; to Lyfimachus Thrace, with the adjacent nations as far as the sea; to Antipater Macedonia, with the neighbouring countries; to the rest of the officers he distributed the other provinces in Asia; to Oxyartes Caucasus, and the Paropamisus; to Sybirtius Arachosia and Gedrosia; to Stasanor the Solian, Aria and Drangiana; to Philip the prætor Bactria and Sogdia; to Phrataphernes Parthia and Hyrcania; to Peucestes Persis; to Tlepolemus Caramania; to Atropas Media; to Archon Babylonia; to Arcesilaus Mesopotamia; to Seleucus the command of the royal cavalry, which Hephestion had first, and Perdiccas afterwards; to Taxiles and Porus each their own kingdoms, as restored and augmented by Alexander. The king kept Perdiccas with him, and constituted him captain of the guards, and the forces which attended him (6). According to Justin, the provinces and chief commands were thus divided. Ptolemy had Egypt, Africa, and part of Arabia; Laomedon Syria; Philotas and his son Cilicia and Illyricum; Atropatos, it should be Atropates, Media the greater; Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas Media the less; Scynus Susiana; Antigonus the son of Philip Phrygia the greater; to Nearchus Lycia and Pamphilia; to Cassander Caria; Menantander Lydia; Leonatus Phrygia the less; Lyfimachus Thrace, and the countries adjacent to the Pontic sea; Eumenes Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia; to Seleucus the son of Antiochus the chief command of the forces; to Cassander the son of Antipater the command of the king's guards; Taxiles the countries between the rivers Indus and Hydaspes; Pithon the son of Agenor the colonies settled in India; Parapomenus the borderers on mount Caucasus; Extarches the Argæans; Amyntas the Bactrians; Scythæus the Sogdians; Nicanor the Parthians; Philip the Hyrcanians; Phrataphernes the Armenians; Tlepolemus the Persæ; Peucestes the Babylonians; Archos the Pelasgæ; Archesilaus Mesopotamia. There are other accounts of this division which agree not either with these or with that of Arrian in the text; but in producing those of Diodorus and Justin, we have done enough to put it in the readers power plainly to perceive the sources of these discordances (7). For, first, here are some names mis-spelt, or changed through the ignorance of transcribers, which creates a seeming without a real difference. As for instance, Scynus is undoubtedly put for Antigonus, though there is not the least conformity between them. Extarches is for Oxyartes, and Scythæus, is put for Sybirtius, and in Diodorus the same person is called Ibertius. Se-

(6) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii.

(7) Justin. lib. xiii.

Perdiccas This division of the empire, as well as all other things, had assumes regal power. the sanction of the royal name, and seemed to be done by authority of king Philip ; but in truth, it was the mere act of Perdiccas and his associates, who shared at their pleasure the empire of their deceased master, treating his lawful heirs as pageants and cyphers ; but we need not wonder at this, when we find that Alexander himself was no less slighted, for while these disputes were on foot, his body was altogether neglected, and seven days elapsed before any orders were given for its embalment. It is said that the Egyptians and Chaldeans who were ordered to perform this office, found the royal corps not only perfectly sound, and free from corruption, but with so lively a countenance, that they were afraid to touch it. Some have conceived that this story took rise from flattery, and that those who made it their business to magnify the actions of Alexander, as if they were incompatible with mortality, had a mind to carry their servile panegyrics still farther, by representing his very dead body as incorruptible. But as those who are best versed in these things agree, that without any miracle dead bodies remain sometimes a considerable space without corrupting, the fact may be believed, and the inferences rejected. However it was, Alexander was at length embalmed, and Aridæus, not the king, but a commander so called, was charged with the care of the royal funeral. As they had taken so little notice of his body, they made no scruple of vacating his will, because it contained in it nothing beneficial for them. What we call his will, was a short memorandum of things he would have done ; those were reduced to five points : The first concerned the building of a fleet of a thousand stout galleys to be made use of against the Carthaginians, and other nations, who should oppose the reduction of the sea-coasts of Africa and Spain, with all the adjacent islands, as far as Sicily. The second directed a condly, Justin does not distinguish between the first and second division, neither do Dexippus, Orosius, or other authors ; whence their differences with Arrian. Diodorus indeed mentions both the divisions by Perdiccas, and by Antipater, and is in all respects more correct as well as more copious than the rest.

The author of the first book of Maccabees hath a very short and very expressive account of this matter in the beginning of his work. So Alexander reigned twelve years, and then died, and his servants bare rule every one in his place, and after his death they all put crowns upon themselves, so did their sons after them many years, and evils were multiplied in the earth (8).

(8) 1 Maccab. i. 7, 8, 9.

large and regular high-way along the sea-coast of Africa, as far as Ceuta or Tangier. The third ordered the erecting six temples of extraordinary magnificence at the expence of fifteen hundred talents each. The fourth appointed forts, arsenals, havens, docks and yards for building ships to be settled in proper places throughout his empire. By the fifth he proposed the building in proper situations several new cities in Europe and Asia; those in Asia to be inhabited by colonies from Europe; and those in Europe to be filled with Asiatics, that by blending their people and their manner, that hereditary antipathy might be eradicated, which had hitherto subsisted between such as dwelt in different continents. Lastly, he had projected the erecting a pyramid equal in bulk and beauty to the biggest in Egypt, in honour to his father Philip. All these designs, under pretence of their being excessively expensive, were referred to a council of Macedonians to be held no body knew when or where. The proceedings of the new government, which was entirely in the hands of Perdiccas and Roxana, grew quickly very cruel, and of consequence generally distasteful. Before Alexander was well dead, Roxana dispatched letters under his seal to Statira and Drypetis, the daughters of Darius, directing them in his name to come to Babylon, where when they arrived, she got them into her power, and by the assistance of Perdiccas, murdered them, that no son either of Alexander or Hephestion might give any trouble to her or her son Alexander. As for Syfigambis the mother of Darius, as soon as the news of Alexander's death reached her ears, she resolved to take away her own life, which accordingly she did, sinking under this, though she had born up against many other misfortunes. For her father and a multitude of her brethren had been put to death by Ochus; and her son Darius had lost both the empire and his life through force and fraud. The mercenary Greeks who were disposed up and down the inland provinces of Asia, despairing now of ever seeing their own countries by fair means, resolved to attempt something by force. With this view they chose one Philo to be their general, and assembled an army of twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, marching directly towards the sea. As soon as Perdiccas received advice of this, he made choice of Pithon to command the forces destined to march against these rebels, as he called them. These forces consisted of three thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, all Macedonians; but Pithon carried with him orders to the governors to furnish him with ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, out of the provinces through which he passed, which accordingly they performed. From the moment

moment he was appointed to this command, Pithon had formed a scheme of setting up for himself, by offering the rebels any terms, if they would join with him. Perdiccas was aware of this, and therefore he publicly gave him orders to put the rebels without mercy to the sword, and to distribute all their effects among his soldiers, whereby every man he commanded was made a check upon him. Pithon when he drew near Philo and his troops, found means to corrupt one Lipodorus, who commanded a body of three thousand men. This traitor, in the midst of a general engagement, when the victory was doubtful, retired with his troops to the top of a hill, which so disordered Philo's army, that a general defeat ensued. After this Pithon sent to Lipodorus to come down with his troops and join him, assuring him that he and his should be treated as well as his own soldiers. Lipodorus coming accordingly into his camp, the Grecians were mingled with the Macedonians, and Pithon began to resume his former ideas, when of a sudden the Macedonians conceiving that their new oath was incompatible with their old oath to Perdiccas, cut the throats of the Greek mercenaries, and seized all they had; after which bloody action, Pithon wholly disappointed, returned with his forces to Perdiccas <sup>g</sup>.

A war in Thrace.
Year of
the Flood 2677.
Before
Christ,
322.

ACCORDING to the chronological order of events, we ought now to speak of the Lamian war in Greece; but inasmuch as we shall in the next chapter treat expressly of the affairs of Macedon, we will refer that account thither as to its proper place, and confine ourselves here to the disputes which happened in Asia, and elsewhere, till the governors of provinces assumed the regal dignity. Lyfimachus who was in Thrace, the province assigned him, found himself on a sudden in danger of being entirely stript thereof. For Seuthes, descended of the antient race of the Odryssian kings, had set up a claim to the dominions of his ancestors, and had raised an army of twenty thousand foot and eight thousand horse. Lyfimachus had no more than 4000 foot and 2000 horse, yet he was forced to come to an engagement, wherein as he was not defeated, he may be said to have gained a victory; for he kept the field of battle, and preserved that part of the province which he held <sup>h</sup>.

Eumenes
put in possession of Cappado-
cia.

As for Perdiccas, he was full of great projects, and very industrious in procuring means and instruments to execute them, though as yet he did not think fit to produce them to light. First of all he chose Eumenes for his confident, and prime minister, whose character we have given before. He knew

<sup>g</sup> DIODOR. lib. xviii. Olymp. cxiv. 2.

<sup>h</sup> Id. Ibid.

knew that this man was thoroughly loyal to the kings, and therefore doubted not his friendship to himself, wherein he was by no means deceived ; for Eumenes was as careful of his interests, as if they had been his own ; and, notwithstanding Perdiccas was a man of great parts, understood and would have conducted them better than he himself did. In the first place, it was held requisite to put this man in possession of his government, which, though stiled a province, was in truth an unconquered kingdom ; Alexander, when he first invaded Asia, passing by Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and never had time afterwards to reduce him. This prince knowing well that it would one time or other fall to his lot to fight for the kingdom of his ancestors, made use of that repose, which in the midst of general confusion his territories enjoyed, to lay up great sums of money, and to hire mercenary troops for the defence of them. Perdiccas knowing as well how the matter stood, directed Antigonus and Leonatus by letters in the names of the kings to march against the Cappadocian prince, and to put Eumenes in possession of his province : As to Antigonus, he was now become too haughty to think of paying any respect to the commands of another. Leonatus indeed marched with an army, as if he intended to perform what Perdiccas had directed, and therefore Eumenes was sent to join him. This friend of Perdiccas had not been long in the army before Hecataeus the tyrant of Cardia, his native country, arrived, and began to treat with Leonatus to come to the assistance of Antipater ; to which the latter agreed. Yet he confessed to Eumenes, that his true design was to marry Gleopatra the sister of Alexander the Great, and in her right to seize the kingdom. Eumenes thereupon laying hold of his treasure, which consisted of five thousand talents, quitted the camp in the night with his attendants, and retired to Perdiccas. This was a new proof of his fidelity, and Perdiccas was so pleased with it, that he determined to march in person with an army to execute what Leonatus ought to have performed, which accordingly he did, carrying the kings with him. Ariarathes with an army of thirty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse, met him on the frontiers of his dominions, where a very obstinate battle was fought, in which the Cappadocian was entirely defeated with the loss of one thousand men upon the spot, himself with six thousand more being taken prisoners. Upon which, to prevent any further disturbance, and to secure Eumenes in the peaceable possession of his province, Perdiccas ordered Ariarathes to to be crucified, which was certainly a very arbitrary and cruel act<sup>l</sup>.

Lauranda and Isaurus taken.

THIS expedition over, Perdiccas determined to reduce Lauranda and Isaurus, two cities of Pisidia, because they had slain Balacrus the son of Nicanor, whom Alexander had appointed their governor. Lauranda was not very strong, Perdiccas therefore took it by assault, and dealt with the inhabitants very severely. All who were able to bear arms, he put to the sword; as for the youths, women, and children, he sold them for slaves. He next invested Isaurus, which, being a strong and populous place, held out gallantly for a time, till the number of the defendants being greatly reduced, those who remained resolved not to share the same fate with the Laurandians; but having appointed a sufficient number to defend the walls, they set the city on fire in all quarters, consuming their parents, wives, and children, in their houses, while themselves repelled the Macedonians, who sought to break in and extinguish the flames; and when Perdiccas had drawn off his troops, jumped into the fire. The Macedonian army having collected what gold and silver they could find in the ashes, Perdiccas led them into winter quarters, and left the conquered countries under the care of Eumenes<sup>k</sup>.

The projects of Perdiccas.

AT the first division of the provinces, Perdiccas, to strengthen himself, had proposed to marry Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, and this was so well relished, that her brethren Jollas and Archias now conducted her to him, in order to be present at the celebration of the nuptials. But Perdiccas had other things in his head. Olympias, who had always hated Antipater, had privately solicited him to marry her daughter Cleopatra; this lady was the widow of Alexander, king of Epirus, at whose marriage Philip was slain, and she now resided at Sardis in Lydia. Eumenes strongly persuaded this match, without doubt because he believed it would prove beneficial to the royal family, and his reasons had such weight with Perdiccas, that he was dispatched to Sardis to compliment Cleopatra, and to carry her presents in the name of her new lover. In the absence of Eumenes, Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas persuaded him to marry Nicæa, which he accordingly did to sooth Antipater and his family, and that he might carry on his own designs more safely. These designs tended all to gratify his ambition; for first he resolved to repudiate the wife he had just married : Next he intended to marry Gleopatra ; this he conceived would give him a pretence for altering the government in Macedon ; and as a necessary measure preparative to these, he entered into contrivances for taking off Antigonus. With this view he caused numberless accusations to be set on foot against the last-mentioned person, who was a man not easy to be dealt with ; for he had a spirit not to be tamed, and an understanding too penetrating ever to be imposed on. He therefore put on an appearance of submitting to Perdiccas, and pretended to busy himself in collecting proofs of his innocence against the day of trial ; while he secretly intended nothing less. An accident happened which compelled him to disclose his purpose sooner than he designed. Cynane the daughter of Philip of Macedon by his second wife, who by Amyntas, the true heir of the Macedonian crown, had a child, brought her daughter Ada, who was afterwards called Eurydice to court, in hopes that Arideus or Philip might marry her. Against this lady Cynane, Perdiccas on some political motives conceived such a grudge, that he caused her to be murdered, which made a great noise, the soldiers retaining not only a great love for Alexander her brother, but a high veneration for Philip her father ; this so frightened Perdiccas, that to still the storm he had raised, he promoted the match between king Philip and Eurydice, to prevent which he had taken off her mother. Antigonus liked this short method of proceeding so little, that as soon as he was informed of it, he put himself, his son Demetrius, and all his domestics in whom he could confide, on board of some Athenian vessels, and sailed over to Greece, there to take shelter under the protection of Antipater and Craterus, whom he informed of the designs of Perdiccas ; above all, setting forth the murder of Cynane in the blackest colours !

<sup>l</sup> PLUT. in vit. Eumen. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. <sup>k</sup> ARRIAN. ap. PLUT. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Eumen.

Ptolemy in the mean time remained in peaceable possession of Egypt, which he governed with so much wisdom, clemency, and justice, that all who were willing to enjoy peace, and secure protection, resorted out of Europe and Asia thither, Egypt. and thought themselves happy under his government. Timbro, who, as we have seen, had slain Harpalus, and possessed himself both of his army and his treasure, landed in Cyrene, where at first he had great success ; but at last after a long war, one Ophellus, who had fled into Egypt, and requested succours against this robber, returning into Cyrene,

The success of Ptolemy in Egypt.
Year of the Flood, 2678.
Before Christ, 321.

<sup>1</sup> ARRIAN. DIODOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

fought and routed him, himself being taken prisoner in the battle. He was immediately crucified, as his crimes justly deserved ; and thus the Cyrenians lost their freedom, and became subjects to Ptolemy. He, thus strengthened by so considerable an accession, gave a willing ear to the ambassadors from Antipater and Craterus, who proposed to him a league against Perdiccas to set bounds to his power at least, who plainly set none to his ambition <sup>m</sup>.

The corpse of Alexander conveyed to Ptolemy.

Aridæus, to whose care the funeral of Alexander had been committed, having now spent two years in making preparations for it, much against the will of Perdiccas, set out from Babylon for Damascus, with intent to carry the king's body into Egypt. There was, it seems, a superstitious report, that where-ever his body was laid, that country should flourish most. Perdiccas therefore, out of love to his native soil, would have sent it to the royal sepulchres in Macedon ; but Aridæus pleading the king's express direction, would carry it into Egypt, which Perdiccas could not hinder. That commander therefore executed his intention with all imaginable magnificence, Ptolemy, as soon as he knew of his coming, marched in person to meet the corpse as far as Syria ; he did not, however, convey it to the temple of Hammon, but contented himself with reposing it in a noble temple, which for this purpose he built in the city of Alexandria, and by this respect shewn to his dead master, drew numbers of his veteran soldiers to his service, which proved of mighty consequence to him in his affairs, as we shall quickly see <sup>n</sup>.

Perdiccas makes war on him.

Perdiccas having full intelligence of his enemies designs, and perceiving that he should have to deal with a veteran army out of Greece, and with the numerous forces of Ptolemy at once, he called a council of his friends, in order to resolve on the measures proper to be taken in so nice a conjuncture. In this council it was unanimously determined, that it would be best for Perdiccas to march with the kings, and the gallant army attending on their persons, into Egypt against Ptolemy, while some commander of approved abilities should make head against Antipater and Craterus, who, it was foreseen, would transport an army from Macedonia to make war upon Perdiccas. This captain was immediately found in Eumenes ; him Perdiccas ordered to his government, creating him at the same time captain-general of the countries as far as the Hellepont.

<sup>m</sup> DIONOR. ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. xiii. c. 6.
DIONOR. & JUSTIN. ubi supra.

<sup>n</sup> DIONOR.

Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus the governor of Armenia, had directions to obey the orders of Eumenes, which not a little displeased them. These things settled, Perdiccas began his march towards Egypt °.

Eumenes, when he came to his province, found things in a very uncouth situation ; he had indeed an excellent body of foot, but they were much inclined to mutiny. Neoptolemus, who should have assisted him, began already to betray an inclination to desert him, and Alcetas, as soon as Antipater and Craterus approached, was prevailed on to be neuter in a war made against his brother. Larger offers than had corrupted these two were made to Eumenes, if he would concur with Antipater and Craterus. He answered, That he believed it would be some time before he could reconcile himself to Antipater his old enemy, the rather, because he had a way of treating his friends like enemies. As for Craterus his old friend, he would be glad to be an instrument of reconciling him to Perdiccas, whom he was determined not to desert. During these negotiations, Eumenes had raised a body of three thousand six hundred horse, partly by bestowing horses on the soldiers he could confide in, and partly by encouraging the Cappadocians to addict themselves to military affairs. By this contrivance he gained not only a great body of cavalry on which he might depend, but also struck the phalanx with such awe, that they in some measure left off their old turbulent humour. Neoptolemus earnestly desiring to gain the friendship of Craterus by subduing his old friend Eumenes, contrived to attack him suddenly ; but Eumenes was too quick for him, and falling in the beginning of the engagement on his horse, routed them intirely, compelling Neoptolemus to make his escape with only three hundred men to Antipater and Craterus ; then he fell upon the phalanx of Neoptolemus's army, and, having disordered them, offered to receive them into his own troops, if they would take an oath of fidelity to the kings, which they readily did. This success was far from making Eumenes secure ; he knew very well, that though he had beaten Neoptolemus, and increased his own army, yet he had still to deal with very odd people ; for he was conscious to himself, that if his own army knew they were to fight against Craterus, they would be so far from executing his commands, that they would infallibly desert him. When therefore he had intelligence that Antipater was marched into Cilicia, and that Craterus and Neoptole-

*Eumenes
defeats Neopto-lemus and Craterus.*

° ARRIAN. DIODOR. PLUT. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

mus were in full march against him, he told his own army, that Neoptolemus and Pigris, with some Cappadocian and Paphlagonian horse, were marching to surprize them; wherefore he intended to decamp, and meet them in the night. When they came to engage, he placed a body of foreign horse, over-against Craterus, commanded by Pharnabazus and Phœnix, ordering them to charge home, and not to give the enemy any time to send heralds or messengers. They performed their commission so well, that Craterus, who fought bravely at the head of his troops, was mortally wounded before he was known. Eumenes in the mean time engaged Neoptolemus personally, and both of them falling together from their horses, fought it out afterwards on foot, till Eumenes gave Neoptolemus a mortal wound in the neck, and proceeded to strip him of his arms, inveighing bitterly against him for his vanity and perfidy, whereby so much mischief had been wrought; then returning to the centre of his army, he found Craterus yet living, over whom he wept and lamented, permitting the Macedonian phalanx, after they had taken an oath of fidelity, to retire to their quarters; yet in breach of that oath, they privately stole away to Antipater in Cilicia, leaving Eumenes the reputation of having gained two signal victories in ten days, which, however, was more than ballanced by the envy which other commanders conceived against him, and by the hatred his own army bore him, for making them the instruments of slaying their favourite Craterus. But it is now time to follow Perdiccas 1.

*Perdiccas
slain.*

THE royal army marched as far as Damascus with all imaginable tranquillity; but when they came there, and heard every-where as they passed the character of Ptolemy, they began to grow diffident and uneasy; and when they entered Egypt, they grew more and more turbulent. Perdiccas, being a man of high spirit, treated them with a good deal of haughtiness, and threatened to punish them as rebels. This was so far from mending the matter, that it made it much worse, his soldiers beginning to mutter, that he, who was but tutor to their princes, should never become a tyrant over them who had been allowed all liberty even by Alexander himself; neither was it the private men only who were offended with his conduct, some of the chief officers were no less discontented, insomuch, that they took the first opportunity of deserting him. This brought Perdiccas

1 ARRIAN. DIODOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

to

to a true sense of his error ; he therefore altered his whole conduct, caressed the soldiers, treated the officers familiarly, and encouraged all by fair words and fine promises. Then he brought them to pass the river Nile, and to attack Ptolemy in his retrenchments. The army on this occasion behaved with all the bravery imaginable, and, as they had the advantage in numbers, attacked several times. But Ptolemy, on the other hand, fighting in a fortification, being himself a great captain, exposing his person freely, and having scarce a man in his troops, who was not desirous of losing his life in his cause, maintained his post so well, that Perdiccas was forced to retire ; and, having marched a great part of the night, attempted to repass the river. Part of his forces actually got over by wading up to the chin ; but on a sudden the river grew deeper, and the stream so much stronger, that no more could pass : This accident occasioned a great deal of speculation ; but the true cause was this ; so great a body as at first passed having stirred, and, as it were, digged the loose sand at the bottom of the river, the stream had carried it away. Perdiccas, like an indefatigable officer, had recourse to various expedients ; but they all proved ineffectual ; at last he ordered the forces which had passed to return, which they accordingly did, but with the loss of two thousand men half drowned, and half eaten by the crocodiles. Upon this misfortune the phalanx mutinied, and a hundred principal officers, among whom was Pithon, immediately went over to Ptolemy. A troop of horse following the example mutinied also, and having surrounded the general's tent, some of them entered and murdered him. The next day they held a consultation ; but before they resolved upon any thing, Ptolemy came to them, and brought with him a vast quantity of provisions, which he freely bestowed upon them, kindly saluting every battalion of Macedonians, embracing their officers, and offering them all that was in his power. In this assembly Aridæus and Pithon were chosen protectors of the kings <sup>9</sup>.

Two days after the death of Perdiccas, news arrived in Pithon and the camp of the victory gained by Eumenes, which, had it Aridæus arrived sooner, would certainly have saved that general's succeed life. As it was, it served only to heighten the misfortunes Perdiccas of his friends ; for the soldiers in a rage put all of them to death on whom they could lay hands ; amongst the rest Atalanta, the sister of Perdiccas and wife to Attalus the admiral ; they likewise proscribed Eumenes, and fifty persons

<sup>9</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. JUSTIN. ubi supra.
of

of quality with him : amongst whom was Alcetas, Perdiccas's brother, who had so scandalously sat still at the beginning of the war. Having thus glutted their resentment, they quitted Egypt, and, under the command of Aridæus and Pithon, marched back again into Cælo-Syria. In this march, Eurydice the wife of king Philip began to take pretty much upon her, which Aridæus and Pithon were very much displeased at ; yet finding the army more inclined to favour her than themselves, they were forced to temporize till they come to Trip paradisus, where Antipater joined them. There a grand council was held, in which the new elected tutors of the kings resigned their offices, and Antipater was chosen sole protector with sovereign power. He was no less dissatisfied with Eurydice's behaviour than his predecessors had been, and therefore began to check her, which irritated her so much, that in a set oration she accused him to the army ; and though he made a long and laboured answer, yet such a sedition ensued, that Antigonus and Seleucus were forced to rescue him at the peril of their lives, as well as his. However, after some days the matter was adjusted, and the administration again put into the hands of Antipater. When things were a little quiet, and the army pacified with promises as to their pay, Antipater proceeded to make a new division of the provinces<sup>r</sup>.

Antipater divides the provinces anew.

Egypt, Libya and the parts adjacent, were given to Ptolemy, which could not be avoided ; for he would not have parted with them, if Antipater had given them to any body else. Syria was confirmed to Laomedon. Philoxenus had Cilicia. Mesopotamia and Arbelitis were given to Amphimachus. Babylon was bestowed on Seleucus. Susiana fell to Antigenes, who commanded the Macedonian silver-shields, because he was the first who opposed Perdiccas. Peucestas held Persia. Tlepolemus had Caramania given him. Pithon held Media, as far as the Caspian streights. Stasander had Aria and Drangia. Philip Parthia. Stasanor Bactria and Sogdia. Sybirtius Arachosia. Oxyartes, the father of Roxana, Paropamisus. Python the country-between this province and India. Porus and Taxiles held what Alexander had given them, because they would not part with any of their dominions. Cappadocia was assigned to Nicanor. Phrygia Major, Lycaonia, Pamphylia and Lycia were given to Antigonus. Caria to Cassander. Lydia to Clytus. Phrygia the less to Aridæus. Cassander was appointed general of the horse.

<sup>r</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra.

The

The command of the household troops was given to Antigonus, with orders to prosecute the war against Eumenes, who was now reputed a public enemy. Antipater, when he had thus settled all things, returned home to his own province with the kings, much commended, and highly admired by all the Macedonians <sup>c</sup>.

As for Eumenes, he began to provide for the war, which Eumenes he foresaw was breaking upon him, with all imaginable pru- <sup>prepares to</sup> dence. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas joined him ; so did <sup>defend</sup> Attalus with the fleet. This officer, on the first news of <sup>himself.</sup> the death of his brother and his wife, sailed with the navy <sup>Year of</sup> under his command to Tyre, where Archelaus was governor, <sup>the Flood,</sup> by the appointment of Perdiccas, who had also intrusted him <sup>2679.</sup> with eight hundred talents. This governor retained so grate- <sup>Before</sup> ful a sense of the favours done him by his deceased patron, <sup>Christ,</sup> that he willingly received Attalus, and readily paid him the <sup>320.</sup> money which had been left in his hands. Here also Attalus  collected such of the friends and soldiers of Perdiccas, as repaired to him, with whom he afterwards sailed to Eumenes. Among the principal officers in the camp of the last-mentioned general, there was one Perdiccas, whom he trusted much. This man prevailed on a body of three thousand five hundred horse to desert with him, and with them marched a considerable distance from the camp. Eumenes did not pursue him the first night ; but as the second drew on, he sent one Phœnix, with four thousand choice foot and a thousand horse, through certain by-ways. These surprized the traitor and his soldiers, and brought them all prisoners to the camp of Eumenes, who hanged Perdiccas, and a few of those who were principally concerned, receiving the rest into favour. It was not long before a general engagement happened, wherein Eumenes, through the treachery of Apollonides, general of his horse, was totally routed, with the loss of eight thousand men. However, he performed on this occasion one of the most extraordinary actions that we find recorded in history ; for, with the scattered remains of his army, striking off into a road parallel to that by which the enemy pursued him, he passed by them unperceived, and returned to the field of battle, where gathering all the wood that could be found in the adjacent villages, he burned all the dead bodies of his soldiers in one heap, and those of his officers in another ; covering the ashes of each with a large mount of earth. Then dismissing such of his soldiers as were sick, wounded, or were unable to bear fatigue, he, with six hundred men, retired into the castle of Nora, a place exceedingly strong, by its situation on the top of an inaccessible rock, well fortified, and stored with all sorts of provisions, where he resolved to abide a siege, hoping that Alcetas and Attalus would be able to raise such a body of troops, as might enable them to deliver him before the castle could be reduced. Antigonus immediately caused the place to be invested; but when he was informed how well it was provided, and how resolute those men were who had chosen to be shut up therein, for Eumenes had none with him but such as requested it as a favour, he began to despair of taking it by force. In order therefore to get over this matter as soon as possible, he sent to desire a conference with Eumenes. Eumenes answered, that he had many eminent commanders in his army; but, if himself should be taken off, those in the fort would be destitute of any commander. Antigonus returned, That, as he was the greater man, he expected that he should waive such excuses, and come to him. To which Eumenes replied, That while he had his sword in his hand, he held no man greater than himself. Antigonus thereupon sent him hostages; and Eumenes coming to the foot of the rock, Antigonus went thither to meet him. As soon as they met together, they embraced, having been formerly intimate friends. Then Eumenes demanded to have the provinces restored to him, exhorted Antigonus to act dutifully towards the kings, and behaved in all things as if they had treated upon equal terms. The Macedonians who were near, admired the courage and spirit of the man. Those who could only see him, were charmed with the sweetness of his aspect, and the beauty of his person; for he was one of the handsomest men of his age, the most perfect in his exercises, and absolutely free either from passion or pride. At last the throng of the spectators grew so great, that Antigonus was in pain for his person; finding therefore that no accommodation could be made, he took Eumenes in his arms, and so brought him to the passage of the rock, where they parted. Antigonus perceiving that the siege would much incommode his affairs, ordered the place to be surrounded with a strong wall, and leaving a sufficient body of troops to guard it, he marched against Alcetas and Attalus.

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. & DIODOR. ubi supra.

Alcetas
defeated
and killed.

THE celerity with which Antigonus marched into Pisidia, where Alcetas and Attalus with their army lay, was such, that he surprized them; and tho' their troops behaved very well, yet overcome with numbers, with elephants and the superior skill of the old Macedonian soldiers, they were totally beaten. Attalus, Docimus, and Polemon were taken; but Alcetas, with about six thousand men, escaped to Termissus. Antigonus followed him and invested the city, demanding Alcetas. The magistrates were all for delivering him up; but the people of the city, to whom Alcetas had done innumerable favours, swore solemnly they would live and die with him. In this the magistrates acquiesced; but while the citizens were at their posts, they sent some of their servants to murder Alcetas, who, perceiving their intention, killed himself. His body being delivered to Antigonus, he first used it despitefully, and after two days, when it began to corrupt, caused it to be thrown into the road, whence it was taken by the Termissians, and honourably buried, who were very hardly deterred from burning their magistrates in their houses<sup>r</sup>.

†

superior

Antigonus receiving the news of the death of Antipater, Antigonus and that he had, by his will, appointed Polyperchon tutor to rejoice to the kings, he immediately conceived a great contempt of seize Asia. them all, resolving to make himself lord of Asia. He had now an army of sixty thousand foot and nineteen thousand horse, many elephants, and treasure in abundance. He began therefore to make no secret of his designs; but to remove all the governors of provinces who were not in his interests. In this, however, he had not very great success; for Aridæus governor of Phrygia immediately began to arm, and when Antigonus threatened to deprive him of his province, as one who affected regal authority, he sent him word his own intentions were honest, and that he armed, because he looked upon him, Antigonus, to be a traitor. The next step Antigonus took, was to bring over Eumenes; in order to which he sent a trusty person to confer with that great captain in his castle of Nora, to desire him to forget the battle in Cappadocia, and to assure him, that if he would become his friend, he should be the second person in his court. Eumenes gave a proper reception to these overtures; whereupon Antigonus framed an oath, which he sent to the commanders of the troops forming the blockade of the castle of Nora, with instructions, that on Eumenes's swearing thereto, they should raise the siege. The purport of this oath was, that he should be faithful to Antigonus, and have the same friends and enemies with him. When this oath was tendered to Eumenes, he observed that it was not properly drawn; wherefore, instead of Antigonus, he inserted Cynepias, the kings, and the royal family. This change the Macedonians immediately approved, and on Eumenes swearing, they instantly set him and his friends at liberty. He no sooner regained his freedom than he began to collect forces for the defence of the kings, whose authority, he saw clearly, was on the very point of being extinguished in Asia. But when Antigonus was informed of what had happened, he was extremely angry, and sent to his generals to make war on Eumenes, and, if possible, to secure his person ; but these orders came too late, for Eumenes, having collected about two thousand foot and five hundred horse, quitted Cappadocia, and marched towards mount Taurus <sup>u</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> Diodor. ubi supra.

The kings create Eumenes general in Asia.

Polysperchon finding himself exceedingly distressed, through the wickedness of many, and the extraordinary power of Antigonus, sought out all possible methods to secure himself and the kings from destruction. To this end he invited Olympias, who, for fear of Antipater and his contrivances, had fled from Macedon to Epirus, to return, and take upon her the education of Alexander's young son. He likewise dispatched letters in his own name and hers, to Eumenes, whereby he constituted him general for the kings in Asia, ordering the governors to pay him five hundred talents to indemnify him for his losses, and assigning him a thousand silver shields for his guard. Olympias also wrote to him herself to desire his advice, whether she should remain still in Epirus, or return into Macedonia. She likewise exhorted him to remain firm to the interests of the royal family, for that she and her children put their whole confidence in him. Eumenes in answer wrote her word, that to him it appeared most adviseable for her to remain in Epirus, where she was, till the war was over. As for himself, he promised to be ever observant of the interest of the royal family, and to hazard all things in order to check the torrent of Antigonus's ambition. He said he was the rather inclined to this, because the tenderness of the young Alexander's age, and the all-grasping disposition of his father's captains, left an honest man no part to act, but that of sacrificing his own concerns to the public safety. To shew that his loyalty did not consist in words, when his enemies were retired into Cappadocia, he made a quick turn into Cilicia, where he joined Antigones and Teutamus, who had three thousand of the Argyraspida or silver shields, under their command. They received him with all the marks of deference and respect which they could possibly devise ; but he very quickly perceived, that neither they, nor the rest of the commanders who resort-

<sup>u</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra.

ed to him, esteemed him in their hearts ; but on the contrary, envied him. He therefore applied himself to two things ; first, the lessening of their malice ; and secondly, providing for his own safety. With respect to this he refused the five hundred talents and the title of general, saying, That great wealth and high titles were of no use to a man who sought to serve his sovereign, and not to be a prince himself. As to that, he borrowed large sums of those who hated him most, and thereby made them careful of his safety, lest they should lose their money. With this money he furnished such friends as he could trust, ordering them to raise soldiers, and to give them more pay than was absolutely necessary, rightly conceiving, that numbers would resort to him, in hopes of extraordinary pay, who might afterwards be induced to serve on moderate terms. By these arts, before Antigonus was aware, he had assembled an army of fifteen thousand men. These proceedings raised the admiration of all his contemporaries ; but, however, they were so far from raising him in his own mind, that he contrived therein a scheme for lessening his own authority, and putting himself upon the same rank with all the rest of the captains. He told the officers of the army, that he had in a dream seen Alexander, adorned in his royal robes, sitting on his throne, and giving orders, as he was wont, to all his commanders. He gave it therefore as his advice, that a tent of state should be erected, wherein there should be placed a throne of gold, with all the ensigns of royalty thereon, before it an altar of the same metal, whereon each of the captains should offer incense, after which they should take their seats indiscriminately, and consult for the public safety. By this means he appeased the dissensions among the great, and inspired the common soldiers with enthusiastic bravery. Antigonus in the mean time, sent Philotas with letters to the army, promising the silver shields mighty rewards, if they would deliver up Eumenes. They read the letters, and debated upon them, of which Eumenes having some notice, he went into the assembly, and told them, that the Macedonians were not wont to consult, whether they should obey their prince, or deliver up his officers to traitors ; and that it less became them so to do, whom not Antigonus, but Alexander, had so eminently distinguished. This determined the soldiers at that time to reject the offers of Antigonus. Eumenes then marched into Phœnicia, that he might be near the sea. This province Ptolemy had seized ; wherefore Eumenes made no scruple of conquering it, saying, That all were his enemies who knew not their duty. But when Antigonus had defeated the royal navy, and then marched against him in person, Eumenes thought it more expedient to retire into the higher provinces, which he did safely, notwithstanding that he passed over the rivers Tigris and Euphrates in sight of the enemy <sup>w</sup>.

The govern- Eumenes <sup>w</sup>wintered with his army on the frontiers of the nors of the province of Babylon. Pithon and Seleucus, who were go-upper pro- vernors, one of Media the other of the territory of Babylon, vinces join sought by all means to debauch his soldiers. These attempts him. were, however, still ineffectual, and Eumenes having passed the river Tigris in spite of them, advanced into Susiana, where he was immediately joined by Peucestas, Polemon, Sybartius, Stasander, Androbazus, and Eudamès, with upwards of twenty thousand men and twenty elephants. The first thing that happened after this junction, was a dispute about the command, to which every one of the governors laid claim, and Eumenes was never thought of. At last they were forced to come into his expedient of meeting in a tent.
This was done for the present; for every one of them hoped, by caressing the soldiers, to carry his point in time; and indeed they all carried it in their turns, for the army saluted every one of them general when they were eating at his cost.
But when Antigonus drew near, they called out for Eumenes, saying openly, that, when fighting was the business, they would have no general but him. This, however, occasioned no disturbance, for the generals were as ready to submit to him as the soldiers, none caring to charge themselves with the weight of a command, where the least wrong step would forfeit all their power and their lives into the bargain. Eu- menes then led the army to the Tigris, drawing them up in excellent order on the banks, where he waited for Antigonus.
That ambitious captain marched first to Susa, and finding that castle held by Xenophilus, he left Seleucus with a corps of troops to besiege it, and then marched on to fight Eumenes.
The climate was excessively hot, the soil dry and sandy, so that his troops were prodigiously fatigued. At last he arrived on the banks of the Copares, a very rapid river running into the Tigris about eight miles from the camp of Eumenes. Here, with a few flat-bottomed boats, he passed over six thousand horse and two thousand foot, giving strict orders to the latter to entrench themselves as soon as they were over. As for the horse, they dispersed themselves for the conveniency of forage. The foot had scarce formed themselves, and considered the situation of the place, before they found themselves in danger of being pushed into the river by their own horse, whom Eumenes had surprized, and entirely defeated. They covered them as well as they could, and received bravely the charge of Eumenes at the head of five thousand men, with whom he had passed the Tigris; but finding themselves unable to bear up against these fresh troops, they threw themselves in heaps into the boats, till they sunk, affording Antigonus, and the rest of his army, the melancholy spectacle of four thousand of their companions killed and drowned, and as many taken prisoners, themselves looking on. Antigonus was so effectually checked by this sudden blow, that he immediately retired, and left the army of the kings in possession of the field *.

<sup>w</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Eumen.

THE design of Antigonus in retiring, was not to quit the war, but remove the scene of it to some part of Asia, where he might act with more advantage; with this view he determined to march into Media, to which there were two roads, the one safe and pleasant, the other through the country of the Cossians, the same base and barbarous people, against whom Alexander made an expedition immediately after the death of Hephestion. Pitbon, knowing well the temper of these mountaineers, very prudently advised Antigonus rather to quiet them with a sum of money, than to attempt to pass through their territories by force; but that little suited the haughty disposition of him to whom the counsel was given. Antigonus thought it unworthy of himself, and of the great army he commanded, to pay these highlanders for a passage. He therefore sent Nearchus with the light-armed troops before in order to drive the Cossians from their posts, and directed him, when he had so done, to line the roads with his men. Antigonus led the phalanx himself, Pitbon and a choice body of horse bringing up the rear. The army, however, paid dearly in their march for their rejecting Pitbon's advice. The Cossians attacked them on all sides with equal bravery and resolution, so that for nine days together they sustained the greatest hardships; but at last coming down into Media, they were there so plentifully provided for, and, through the care of Pitbon, the cavalry so well remounted, and the soldiers so effectually indemnified for their losses, that the army resumed its wonted alacrity; whereupon Antigonus determined to penetrate into the higher countries, in order to displace those governors who had sided with Eumenes †.

* DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. & CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Eumen. † DIODOR. ubi supra.

Eumenes marches into the upper provinces. THE confederate lords, understanding that Antigonus again drew near them, were much divided in their counsels; some of them were for retiring to the sea-coasts, where, in case of any misfortune, they might receive aid from Polyperchon. The governors of the upper provinces, mindful of their private concerns were for marching back with the army, that they might secure their friends. Eumenes agreed in opinion with the former, yet sided against his own opinion with the latter, foreseeing that, if he had declared for marching into the maritime provinces, the army would necessarily have been divided, and thereby become too weak to effect any thing any where. His assent therefore having determined the question, they immediately marched into Persis, and, in twenty four days march, reached Persepolis. Here Peucestas made a grand feast for the army, and, having them now in his own province, he loaded them with such extravagant favours, that Eumenes began to suspect he aimed at somewhat more than he ought. As soon as he entertained these suspicions, he struck out an expedient for bringing the army back to their former temper without hurting Peucestas. He caused a letter to be writ in Syrian characters, in the name of Orontes, governor of Armenia, importing that the party of Olympias had killed Cassander, and that the power of the kings being thoroughly settled in Macedon, Polyperchon was about to pass with a great army into Asia. This letter being directed to Peucestas, he readily gave credit to it, and published it in the army; whereupon all the officers paid their court to Eumenes, and those were the forwardest who hated him most. Eumenes took all in good part, and, according to custom, borrowed money of those he feared, and thereby became master of their counsels. The news which Peucestas had received, occasioned more feasting, and Eumenes, contrary to his nature, was forced to drink hard, which threw him into a fever, out of which as he recovered, the generals received advice, that Antigonus drew near them. Immediately the army marched under the command of Peucestas and Antigenes, Eumenes being carried in the rear in a litter. But when they were in the midst of their march, the van of Antigonus's army appeared. Peucestas instantly gave directions for forming a line of battle, but the soldiers absolutely refused to move any way till Eumenes should appear. Hereupon he was brought in his litter with the curtains drawn back, and, after he had thanked the soldiers for their confidence in him, he made the necessary dispositions. When Antigonus drew near enough to perceive in what manner the confederate army was drawn up, he was exceedingly surprised,

ed, for he depended on the sickness of Eumenes. At last perceiving the litter passing through the lines, he burst out a laughing; and, turning to the officers who were near him, said, It is not that army but you litter that bids us battle. However, he ordered a retreat to be sounded, and contented himself with encamping in a very advantageous post <sup>2</sup> (C).

WHILE the armies lay over-against each other, Eumenes received intelligence that Antigonus intended to decamp in the night, he thereupon presently guessed, that his design was to put his army into quarters of refreshment in the rich district of Gabene. To prevent this, and at the same time to gain a passage into that country, he instructed some soldiers to pretend they were deserters, whom he sent into the camp of Antigonus, where they reported that Eumenes intended to attack them in their trenches that very night. But while Antigonus's troops were under arms, Eumenes marched for Gabene, which at length Antigonus suspected, and, having given proper orders to his foot, marched immediately after him with his horse, sending all his baggage to an adjacent city, that it might not incommode him. Freed from all incumbrances, pretty early in the morning, he, from the top of a hill, discerned Eumenes with his army marching below; whereupon he immediately disposed his horse, as if his infantry had

<sup>2</sup> Idem, ibid.

(C) Antigonus, a short time after this, finding the country where he lay excessively wasted, and that it would be very difficult for him to subsist, sent deputies to the confederate army, to solicit them, especially the governors of provinces, and the old Macedonian corps to desert Eumenes, and to join him, which at this time they rejected with the highest indignation. After the deputies were dismissed, Eumenes came into the assembly, and delivered himself in these words: "Once upon a time a lion, falling in love with a young damsel, demanded her in marriage of her father. The father made answer, that he looked on such an alliance as a great honour to his family, but stood in fear of his paws and teeth, lest, upon any trifling dispute that might happen between them after they were married, he might exercise them a little too hastily upon his daughter. To remove this objection, the amorous lion caused both his nails and teeth to be drawn immediately, whereupon the father took a cudgel, and soon got rid of his enemy." This, continued he, is the very thing aimed at by Antigonus, who makes you large promises, till he has made himself master of your forces, and then beware of his teeth and paws (9).

(9) Plut. in vita Eumen. De Mor. Græc. lib. xviii.

been behind the hill, whereby he deceived Eumenes, who would otherwise have marched on. Whereas, believing the whole army of Antigonus to be at hand, he faced about, and disposed his troops in order of battle. By degrees the infantry of Antigonus came up, and, as they came up, formed behind the horse. The whole of Eumenes's forces consisted of thirty five thousand foot, six thousand horse, and one hundred and fourteen elephants. In the army of Antigonus were twenty eight thousand foot, eight thousand five hundred horse, and sixty five elephants. Antigonus charged the troops under Eumenes with great bravery. The battle was most obstinately fought, and the victory won and lost several times by each party. At last, after a whole day's engagement, the stars began to appear, when Antigonus had visibly the worst, yet his officers could not prevail upon him to retire from the field of battle; on the contrary, he encamped there with the troops yet unbroken, and sent several persons well mounted to give notice to those who fled, that it would be their safest way to repair to his camp, which accordingly they did. He then buried his dead, which done, by forced marches he withdrew into Media, where he took up his winter-quarters. If Eumenes had been as absolute in the command of his army as Antigonus was, the latter would not have escaped so well, for Eumenes without doubt would have attacked him again, and, in all probability, would have totally routed him; for whereas Antigonus had almost eight thousand men killed and wounded, Eumenes did not lose in the whole quite fifteen hundred; but the divisions which reigned in the confederate army, and the insolence of the soldiers, hindered any thing more from being done, and even permitted Antigonus to enter the slain, whereby their victory was called in question. However, according to the modern rules of war, Eumenes was the conqueror, inasmuch as he carried his point, and actually brought his forces to winter in the rich country of Gabene, where they were five and twenty days march from the enemy<sup>a</sup>.

Eumenes
last cam- paign.

Year of
the Flood, 2684.
Before
Christ,

315.

As soon as the army was in winter-quarters, and began to taste those advantages which the wisdom of their general had procured for them, they very ungratefully began to despise him, and to pay all their court to the generals who treated best, and, for the greater conveniency of receiving entertainments, spread themselves all over the country. Antigonus had his spies amongst them, and from them he quickly received intelligence of the bad situation of their affairs. As soon as Antigonus received these accounts, he resolved, notwithstanding it was the very depth of winter, to attempt surprising them; of which design he conceived the greater hopes, because he was informed that there lay a passage through the deserts, which, in nine or ten days time, would bring him to Gabene; tho' by the ordinary rout it was twenty five days march from his quarters. Full of this mighty project, he gave out his orders for the soldiers to provide themselves with such provision for ten days as required no dressing, hoping by this contrivance to avoid lighting fires. But this proved ineffectual, for, after five days march, he and his forces found the cold so intense, that, to preserve themselves from perishing, they were forced to make fires in the nights. Some shepherds, who were upon the hills surrounding these deserts, perceiving these fires, dispatched away messengers on dromedaries to carry advice to the confederate generals, who instantly called a council, wherein they shewed all the marks of terror and confusion, and, acknowledging the miserable situation of their affairs, by the troops being quartered at many days march distance, they neither proposed nor resolved on any method for defence. Eumenes observing their distress told them, that he would undertake to retard the march of the enemy for four or five days, if in the interim they would assemble the troops. This promise, which to them appeared impossible to be fulfilled, they readily laid hold of, and immediately transferred to Eumenes the command of the troops which lay in the neighbourhood of the place where they were. As soon as Eumenes could draw them together, he marched directly towards the enemy, and when he was near enough for them to see the fires in his camp, he extended his troops as much in front, as if the whole confederate army had been there, and caused as many or more fires to be lighted than would then have been necessary. When Antigonus perceived this, he concluded that Eumenes, having intelligence of his march, had led all his troops out of fresh quarters to meet him; he therefore quitted the road through the desert and turned through the ordinary one through towns and villages, that his soldiers might receive some refreshment, and not be exposed, after sustaining so great fatigues, to an unequal engagement with troops just come out of quarters. This was exactly what Eumenes foresaw, and consequently by that time Antigonus by the ordinary road arrived on the frontiers, the whole confederate army was assembled, and ready to give him battle, which Antigonus did not decline. In the private councils, held by the generals and governors of provinces, vinces, it was unanimously determined to make use of Eumenes in the approaching battle, and then to rid themselves of him ; for they saw clearly in matters of moment, they neither considered each other, nor were considered by the army ; but his advice and his conduct only were relied on. Eudamus and Phadimus, two principal persons in the army, immediately gave Eumenes notice, not out of any good-will to him, for they hated him as much or more than any of the rest, but because he was very deeply in their debt. As soon as he was acquainted with this treacherous conspiracy, Eumenes retired to his tent, and in the first place put all his papers out of the way, that in case of the worst none of his friends might be prejudiced ; he then considered with himself whether it might not be possible for him to escape into Cappadocia ; but then reflecting that his escape would be abdicating his command, and giving up the cause of Alexander's family, he generously resolved to die, as he had lived, with the glory of never having done a base or unbecoming action. This resolution once taken, he came out and encouraged the soldiers, the major part of whom were well-affected to him, and saluted him with loud acclamations. Eumenes thanked them for those marks of their favour, and disposed all things for a battle, never divulging any part of the information he had received, though he could not help saying sometimes to his intimate friends, that he lived amongst wild beasts, by whom he expected some time or other to be torn in pieces. The battle was fought on the sea-shore, and Eumenes having the advantage in infantry, effectually routed the phalanx of Antigonus ; but his cavalry having the advantage, through the base treachery of Peucestas, Antigonus, who was alike present to himself in all circumstances, perceiving that the engagement had raised a mist of small white dust by the violent tossing of the sand, he made use of the obscurity of the air to wheel round the army of Eumenes, and to possess himself of their baggage, a contrivance which availed him more than a victory would have done. As soon as the forces of Eumenes were returned into their camp, and were acquainted with the loss of their baggage with the women and children, they were ready to mutiny. Teutamus, who commanded a battalion of the silver-shields, and who had long inclined to Antigonus, took this opportunity of sending to him, and demanding of him the booty he had lately taken. Antigonus returned him for answer, that he would willingly restore the silver-shields, the baggage, and all else that belonged to them, and would be ready to do them what farther favours they should request, provided they would do him one, which was to deliver up Eumenes, a stranger, a person once condemned by the Macedonians,

<sup>a</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. PLUT. & CORN. NEPOS, ibid.

Macedonians, and who had since attained power enough to do them considerable mischiefs. The silver-shields immediately closed with this proposition, scandalous as it was, and gathering about their unsuspecting general, seized his sword, pinioned his arms behind him, and in this plight prepared to deliver him up who had so long protected them from their enemies. As soon as that illustrious person perceived what they were about, he most earnestly desired that he might have leave to speak to them, which when he had obtained, he in a very pathetic oration shewed them the folly and ill consequences of such a procedure, besides the disgrace that it would bring upon them; concluding with this petition, that since they were determined to part with their general to regain their lumber, they would have the goodness to put him to death with their own hands, and not to deliver him up to his and their old enemy Antigonus, whom under his command they had so often beaten. The rest of the army wept and lamented, but the silver-shields cried out, Away with him! Let us hear none of his fine speeches, carry him to Antigonus, and bring us again our wives and children. This being accordingly performed, Antigonus, in pursuance of his promise, delivered up the baggage with all the women and children. As to Eumenes when those who had him in custody demanded how he should be kept? As you would keep an elephant or a lion, answered their general. The fate of Asia was now decided, for Eumenes being given up, the governors submitted and made the best terms they could, suffering their troops to be incorporated into those of Antigonus. The only point which remained to be settled was the fate of the captive general. At first he was not only very strictly confined, but loaded with heavy irons; but after some time, Antigonus was prevailed on to command part of the irons to be taken off; to allow him a servant to wait on him, and to permit his friends to visit him. While things continued in this state, Eumenes would often say to those who came to him, I wonder Antigonus protracts my affair thus, and that he has not courage enough to put me to death as an enemy, or by setting me free to make me his friend. There was indeed a party in the army of Antigonus, at the head of whom was Demetrius his son, who would have had him set Eumenes free, supposing that this would have bound him to his interests. But the rest of his friends, and the bulk of the army, earnestly intreated him to put him to death, which, when the army was about to march, he accordingly did. However, he and all his troops assisted with great solemnity at his funeral, and after the body was burnt, he caused the ashes to be put up in a silver urn, and ordered them to be transmitted to his wife and children in Cappadocia. Hieronimus the Cardian, his most intimate friend, was taken by Antigonus into his favour and councils. Antigenes, commander in chief of the silver-shields, was by his order put into a coffin, and burnt alive. Eudamus, Celbanus, and many others of the enemies of Eumenes, experienced a like fate <sup>b</sup>.

He resolves to change the govern- ments in all the provin- ces. Antigonus had now nothing in his head but the executing of his old scheme of making himself lord of Asia; in order to which he resolved to sacrifice all such as he suspected, all who had obstinately opposed him, and all who by the fickleness of their conduct had shewn they were not to be depended on by any party. In the first place he resolved to take off Pithon, who had done him such eminent service; but who while they were in winter quarters in Media, had been tampering with the soldiers. Antigonus, to carry on his design, brow-beat all such as found fault with Pithon's conduct, gave out to his friends that he intended to make him governor of all the upper provinces, and under this pretence drew him out of his own province of Media; but as soon as he got him into his hands, he called a council of War, wherein charging him with treason, those who had been formerly concerned with him were now out of fear most ready to give him up, so that he was presently convicted, and thereon instantly executed. He then appointed Orontobates a Mede governor of Media, but made Hippostratus general of the forces, which he left for the preservation of the province. Such of the governors as he found could not be dispossessed, he confirmed in their provinces. Last of all, he sent for Sybirtius, governor of Arachosia, in whom he confided. To this man he transferred the silver-shields, openly affirming, that they would serve him to awe the barbarous nations; but giving him privately to understand that it was his desire that they should be put out of the way as expeditiously as possible, as a race of seditious villains unworthy of returning to Greece. These things performed, he stripped Peucestas of the government of Persia, where he was prodigiously beloved, and appointed Alepiodorus in his stead. All the money and rich curiosities which were in the treasury of Susa he seized to the value of fifteen thousand talents, and out of the spoils and the treasure he found in other places, he collected ten thousand talents more, with which prodigious mass of wealth, he doubted not to carry all his designs into execution. Being not a little encouraged also from this consideration, that by this time not only the famous captains, but many of the inferior officers who had served under Alexander, were destroyed, and put out of his way.

<sup>b</sup> DIODOR. SICUL., PLUT. & CORN. NEPOS, ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. xii cap. 2.

As soon as the season of the year permitted, Antigonus Antigonus marched with all his army, and with the mighty treasures he had collected, to Babylon, where Seleucus was governor. marches to Babylon. This man had done the highest services to Antigonus, and among these some very late ones; for through him the citadel of Susa, and all the wealth therein, had been delivered up to Antigonus. Upon this occasion too, he did all, or rather more, than could be expected; for he feasted the whole army at his own expence, and seemed to be no less pleased with the success of Antigonus than he himself was. All this, however, could not secure him. The ambitious have no friends; All who pretend to serve them must be absolutely their creatures. When therefore Seleucus had done all that was in his power, Antigonus demanded of him an account of the revenues of the province, which plainly discovered that he looked on him as a mere dependant. Seleucus, however, was very far from making any servile submissions, or even seeking to temporize any longer with a man whom he esteemed no more than his equal. He told him the province of Babylon was conferred upon himself by the Macedonians as the reward of his services, and that therefore he did not conceive he was any more bound to give an account than he had a right to demand one. But when he had considered attentively the great power of Antigonus, and the small capacity he had of resisting him, he began to conceive that he was in no small danger, especially when he called to mind what had befallen Eumenes, Pitbon, and Peucestas; to secure himself therefore from such treatment as they met with, and to escape being either murdered or deposed, he with fifty horse instantly made his escape, in order to fly to Ptolemy. When this was first known to Antigonus, he rejoiced at it exceedingly, being extremely pleased, that by this means he had got the province to himself, without proceeding harshly with his old friend, and a man in high credit with the army, supposing that now he should dispose of every thing according to his pleasure. But when the Chaldean priests informed him that they by their astrological rules were certain, that if Seleucus escaped at present, he would be in process of time not only a formidable, but successful enemy, and that himself would fall in battle against him; Antigonus took it much to heart, remembering how these people had before foretold the death of Hephestion, as well as that of Alexander. Terrified therefore with gloomy apprehensions, he dispatched away some chosen squadrons of horse to seize on Seleucus; but this method was taken too late he had already reached the territories of Ptolemy, where he remained in perfect safety. The chagrin this accident gave Antigonus made him redouble his diligence in disposing of the rest of the provinces to his own advantage. He quickly found how necessary all his care was, for before he had well taken these precautions, Seleucus had raised him such a number of enemies, that, with all his mighty power, he had enough to do to defend himself. Ptolemy, Lyſimachus, Cassander, all leagued with Seleucus, in order to reduce the power of Antigonus, that they might themselves be secure in their possessions: for though Alexander the son of Roxana was still living yet Cassander imprisoned both him and his mother, and treated them only as private persons, of which though Antigonus might be secretly glad, yet conceiving rightly that the putting on a contrary character would be of service to his affairs, he openly inveighed against Cassander's conduct, and alledged, that he took up arms to vindicate the rights of the royal house; whereas in truth he was the first who openly invaded them by assuming sovereign power, though he did not indeed as yet take upon him the title of king<sup>a</sup>.

Antigonus
seizes Syria and Phœ- nicia.

Year of
the Flood 2685.

Before

314.

As Antigonus immediately after the escape of Seleucus had marched into Cilicia, in order to refresh and recruit his army, so as soon as he was thoroughly informed of the confederacy set on foot against him, he determined to proceed first to hostilities, and to secure the provinces of Syria and Phœnicia at present in the hands of Ptolemy. He perfectly well discerned, that, in case of a war against so many princes, his being master at sea would be of the last importance; and he hoped by conquering these countries, not only to have the Syrian and Phœnician ports, but also their shipping, at his devotion. In the former design he succeeded, yet with great difficulty; but in the latter he was totally disappointed. Joppa and Gaza he reduced by force; as for Tyre it sustained a siege of many months; with respect to the shipping, Ptolemy foreseeing what would come to pass, had withdrawn them to Egypt. However, Antigonus persisted in his former resolution of being master of the sea; in order to which, he ordered vast quantities of timber to be cut down in mount Libanus and other places in his dominions, which being sent to the ports respectively nearest to the places where they were cut, he had a vast fleet immediately upon the stocks. The wisdom of his proceeding appeared evidently from an accident which happened

<sup>a</sup> Dionex. Plur. ubi supra.

happened to him at the siege of Tyre, where while he lay with his army on the sea-coast, Seleucus with part of Ptolemy's fleet passed by in spite of him, which exceedingly dispirited his forces; but Antigonus restored their courage by assuring them that before the end of that summer he would have five hundred ships of war at sea, which would be more than sufficient to drive the enemy out of it; and this promise, by his great care and regular payment of all demands, he effectually performed. But as all human abilities are circumscribed, whence it becomes impossible for one man to attend to all things, while Antigonus was intent upon these important affairs, the army of Cassander made a great progress in the Lesser Asia.*

To remedy this evil, Antigonus marched thither with a great part of his army, leaving his son Demetrius with the rest to preserve the conquests he had made in Syria and Phœnice. That prince was not above twenty-two years old, but of abilities far beyond his years; he was brave and generous in the highest degree, well versed in war, and a great despi- Antigonus sers of those arts and shifts by which cunning men pass for wise repels Cal-
ones; he was kind to his friends, gentle to his enemies, and sander.
had an innate clemency, untinged with private designs or future prospects; if with all this his greatness had not supplied him with flatterers, who led him not to pollute, but to plunge himself into the grossest vices, he would have been the worthiest, as well as one of the most remarkable princes of the age in which he lived. His amiable qualities gained him the love of the army committed by his father to his charge, and he became very agreeable to the inhabitants of the provinces over which he presided for the space of a year, while his father made war upon Cassander, and so effectually humbled him, that he was content to make a peace on very indifferent terms, which, however, when he had better considered of it, he presently broke and joined again with Ptolemy and Seleucus, to give Antigonus all the trouble he could†.

THE diversions given by Cassander to the arms of Antigonus afforded Ptolemy an opportunity of making a descent in Caria - recovers
Syria, and afterwards in Galicia, out of which province he car- Syria.
ried great spoils into Egypt. On his return thither, Seleucus instigated him to invade Syria and Phœnicia, shewing how detrimental a thing it was to his affairs for these provinces to remain in the hands of his enemies. Ptolemy, entering readily into the reason of the thing, began instantly to set on foot all the necessary

* DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in DEMETRIO JUSTIN. lib. xiv. † DIODOR. & PLUT. ubi supra.

preparations for a war in those parts. At last, when all things were in readiness, he entered Syria with a gallant army ; but he had advanced no farther than Gaza, when Demetrius put a stop to his progress by offering him battle ; a general engagement ensued, which was very obstinate and bloody ; it ended however, in the total overthrow of Demetrius, who had five thousand men slain, and eight thousand taken prisoners. Among the former was Python, whom his father had assigned him for his colleague ; he had been a principal officer in the army of Alexander, was a man of great abilities, and after the death of Eumenes had been received by Antigonus into the first place of his confidence and esteem. After this rout, Demetrius retired with the remains of his army to Azotus, from whence he sent deputies to Ptolemy to beg leave to bury his dead, which favour was not only granted him, but Ptolemy and Seleucus sent him back his royal pavillion, his whole equipage, and all the prisoners who had any dependence on his family. The rest of the prisoners were sent into Egypt. Demetrius finding it impossible for him to make head against the victorious army, abandoned Phœnicia, Palestine, and Syria to the victor. Tyre indeed made some resistance. Andronicus commanded therein, who not long before had taken it for Antigonus. He was a man of spirit, and therefore absolutely refused to part with a place of such importance tamely. The city therefore was invested, but in a little time the garison mutinied, and Andronicus was forced to give it up to Ptolemy, who therewith recovered all that Antigonus had taken from him. Seleucus took this opportunity of requesting his friend to comply with the promise he had made him, of furnishing him with a body of troops for the recovery of the province of Babylon. Ptolemy very readily agreed to it, and assigned him a thousand foot and three hundred horse, with which inconsiderable assistance, Seleucus not only possessed himself of Babylon, but also of Media and Susiana, after having defeated Nicanor, who was governor of the former province for Antigonus. While Seleucus went on thus triumphantly, Ptolemy had a very unlucky accident ; he had sent Cilles his general with a considerable army to drive Demetrius out of Upper-Syria, where he with the remains of his army still continued. This Cilles, being a bold improvident man, highly contemned in himself an enemy so often beaten ; for Demetrius had been driven from post to post after the battle of Gaza, without being able to make any considerable stand, which was the reason that Cilles doubted not but he would now retire as fast as he should press upon him ; Demetrius having intelligence of this, resolved to repair the false step he had made at

†

Gaza,

Gaza, by a quick proceeding here ; he therefore sent a small party of horse to view the camp of Cilles, and being informed that all things there were in a very careless condition, he instantly determined with himself to fall upon them ; which resolution he executed with such celerity, that he totally defeated the enemy, and took Cilles himself with seven thousand men prisoners. This action, as it contributed much to the glory of Demetrius, and to the interest of his father Antigonus, so it gave the former an opportunity of returning that civility which Ptolemy had done him after the battle of Gaza, in restoring the principal prisoners then taken. Demetrius therefore immediately sent back Cilles and all his friends to the camp of Ptolemy, with the same compliment which had formerly been made to himself ; that he fought not so much for interest as for glory. As soon as Antigonus, who was at that time in Phrygia, received advice of this victory, he instantly passed mount Taurus, and marched with all imaginable speed to join his son, which having once performed, they marched with all their forces against Ptolemy, who clearly perceiving that he should not be able to resist so numerous an army, flushed with victory, demolished most of the cities which were fortified in the provinces he had conquered, and then retired into Egypt with an immense load of spoil, and a vast number of people, not carried prisoners against their will, but who voluntarily followed his fortunes. Thus the provinces of Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea, returned again to their old master <sup>8</sup>.

Antigonus, elated with this high run of fortune, conceived in his mind a desire of subduing the Nabathæans or Arabs, inhabiting the deserts bordering on Judea. Against these he dispatched his general Athenæus, who at first proceeded very warily in his expedition ; for having with him but four thousand foot and six hundred horse, he knew that in attacking so numerous a people, conduct would be of greater use than courage. He had intelligence that most of the Arabs were gone to a mart or fair, where the Syrians and they bartered their commodities, and that on this account their chief city Petra, where they left their wives and children, and their wealth, was but slenderly guarded. Upon this he marched with his forces three days and three nights at an incredible rate ; for, if the numbers are right in Diodorus, they must have gone sixty miles in twenty four hours. This expedition effectually answered their end, for they invaded the place be-

Antigonus
makes war on the Arabs.
Year of
the Flood,
2688.
Before
Christ,
311

<sup>8</sup> DIONOR. SICUT ubi supra. P. C. R. in Demetrio.

fore the Arabs had the least intelligence ; and having cut the guards to pieces, plundered the city, carried away a prodigious booty, besides five hundred talents in ready money ; they then marched back again about twenty miles, when, through excessive fatigue, they were constrained to halt ; and lying in a careless manner, the Arabs, who had by this time intelligence of what had happened, followed them with such expedition, that surrounding their camp, they put all therein to the sword, sixty horse excepted, who made their escape at the beginning of the attack. The Arabs were not satisfied with this ; they sent immediately deputies to Antigonus to complain of the injury offered them by Athenæus, and to shew the necessity they were under of treating him and his troops as they did. Antigonus, knowing that it was not in his power to revenge what had happened at present, sent them for answer, That Athenæus had made this expedition of his own head, and that he was very well pleased at what had befallen him. The Arabs, who knew how to dissemble as well as he, feigned to be perfectly well satisfied of the truth of what he said ; but, in the mean time, they posted advanced guards, at all the avenues into their country, and placed men in all their watch-towers to prevent their being surprized again in the same manner. Their suspicions and precautions were perfectly just ; for Antigonus, as soon as he had recruited his army, sent his son Demetrius, with four thousand light-armed foot and as many horse, to revenge the death of Athenæus. The young prince at the head of his forces passed in three days time through the desert ; but when he arrived at the city of Petra, he found it well garisoned, and that the country being thoroughly alarmed, all the cattle, and whatever else was worth taking away, had been long since secured. However, he caused it to be invested, and afterwards formally besieged the place ; the garison, however, made a glorious defence, and refused to hear of any terms, declaring that if they could have borne slavery, they needed not have retired, as it were, out of the world, and placed all hopes of safety in the strength of a fortress and their own valour. Demetrius therefore finding that this would be a work of time, and knowing that his retreat would be attended with great hazard, gave the besieged to understand, that provided they sent deputies to appease his father Antigonus, made himself certain presents, and sent refreshments to his army, he would be content to leave them. With these propositions they immediately complied, and Demetrius thereupon marched back to the lake of Asphaltus, of which he caused an exact description

description to be made, as also some computation to be framed of the profit of the bitumen taken thence, and of the quantity of balm gathered from the famous plantation not far from that place, so much admired, and prized under the name of balm of Gilead. These things performed, he returned to his father, and gave him an account of his proceedings. Antigonus was very little pleased with the peace he had concluded with the Nabathæans; but he highly applauded his son's discoveries, especially on account of the profit he hoped to make of the bitumen and balm. He appointed therefore Hieronimus the Cardian one of the friends of Eumenes, and now his own, to superintend those he sent to the lake to collect all the bitumen they could find, and to carry it to a place assigned, in order to be sold for the use of Antigonus. Hieronimus, who was now a man in years, executed this commission with all the prudence and fidelity imaginable, neither did he meet with any interruption from the Arabs, till such time as they had collected the bitumen and were carrying it away. Then with six thousand men they came down, and surrounded those who were employed in the work, and having cut most of them to pieces, carried the bitumen clear off. Hieronimus himself escaped, and thus ended all attempts upon the Arabians <sup>b</sup>.

As soon as Antigonus had received advice of the mighty progress made by Seleucus in the east, he determined to send away his son Demetrius with an army to oppose him, which accordingly he did; this army consisted of five thousand Macedonian foot, ten thousand mercenaries, and four thousand horse, with whom the prince immediately marched towards Babylon. Seleucus was at this time in Media, intent on settling his affairs in the upper provinces, and Patrocles, whom he had left president of Babylon, perceiving that his forces would not be able to resist the army of Demetrius, he first of all compelled the citizens of Babylon to abandon the place, and to retire, some into the deserts, some into Susiana, and some to fly much farther; he then withdrew himself and his troops into such fastnesses as he thought would effectually enable them to defend themselves. When therefore Demetrius entered Babylon, he to his great amazement found it deserted, except the castles in which there were good garisons, both of which he besieged; one he quickly reduced, and gave the spoil thereof to his soldiers; but the other holding out till the time was expired, which his father had allotted him for this expedition, Demetrius left five thousand foot, and a thousand horse under the command of Archelaus to carry on the siege, and with the rest of his forces marched away, suffering his soldiers to live, as he retired, at discretion; whereby the hearts of the people were so estranged from himself and his father, that the Babylonians were ever after as firmly attached to Seleucus, as if he had been their natural prince (D).

<sup>b</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in Demetrio.

(D) In this part of our work we make use of two authors, viz. Diodorus and Plutarch, who differ from each other very often; it is therefore but reasonable that we should acquaint our readers where, and upon what reasons we prefer one to the other, and this we shall do in few words. Diodorus had in view the writing a complete body of history, and therefore he is very exact in his chronology, and very nice in his descriptions; with respect to both, using the best authorities that were to be had in his days. Plutarch intended his lives chiefly as a moral performance, and therefore he is more careful in marking out of characters, than in accurately digesting facts. On this account, in the order of time, and in the description of sieges and battles, we mostly follow Diodorus; but as to personal circumstances, and what was either said or done by the kings themselves, we take Plutarch for our guide. On this occasion it may not be amiss to mention a particular fact, wherein these historians do not agree, and wherein we ourselves have taken the liberty to differ from a very judicious writer of our own nation. Diodorus informs us, that when Demetrius quitted Babylon, he left behind him Archelaus, with five thousand foot and a thousand horse, to besiege one of the castles, the other of which he told us Demetrius had taken and spoiled (10). Plutarch in his account of this transaction affirms, that Demetrius put a garison of seven thousand men into the castle which he had reduced, but he says nothing of his leaving an army behind him (11). Dean Prideaux joins these facts together, and makes Demetrius leave a garison of seven thousand men, and an army of six (12). It is expressly said by Diodorus, that his whole army consisted but of nineteen thousand men; it seems to us therefore improbable, that he should leave thirteen thousand behind him, and especially when we consider, that Plutarch says in so many words, he led back the gross of his army. If we might have leave to offer a conjecture, we think it not impossible, that Archelaus, when he found he could not take the other castle, repaired and garisoned that which had been taken, with his corps of between six and seven thousand men. This reconciles both the stories, offers violence to neither, and is perfectly consistent with the rules of good sense, and of war.

(10) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xix.

(11) Plutarch in Demetrio, &

in Joseph. Reg.

(12) Connection of the Old with the New Testament, P. 1. Book viii.

Demetrius, marching with his army into the Lesser Asia, found the city of Halicarnassus besieged by Ptolemy; whereupon he took such measures as obliged that prince to raise his siege, whereby he acquired great reputation, and did his father eminent service; for immediately upon this, the confederate princes entered into a treaty with Antigonus, whereby it was agreed, that Cassander should hold Macedonia, Lyfimachus Thrace, Ptolemy Egypt and its dependencies, and Antigonus all Asia; with a proviso, that the Grecian cities should every-where be free. In this treaty it was also mentioned, that these provinces were held in trust only for Alexander Ægus, the son of Alexander the Great by Roxana, who had now held the regal title seven years alone, that is, from the time his colleague Aridæus or Philip was murdered by Olympias. But very soon after this peace was made, Cassander, who had before put to death the mother of Alexander, caused his wife and son, now about fourteen years of age, to be privately slain also by the keeper of the castle, wherein they were confined. From this time therefore those who had been before governors of provinces were now sovereigns, and we might here very well commence the reign of Antigonus and his son Demetrius in Asia; but inasmuch as they did not assume the title of kings till some time afterwards, we are inclinable to follow the example of Ptolemy, who notwithstanding the death of Alexander Ægus, reckons still by the years of his reign, till Ptolemy Soter assumed the regal title as well as authority. But to proceed; this peace was broke almost as soon as it was made, under pretence that Antigonus had put garisons into some of the Greek cities. Ptolemy then invaded Cilicia, and took several cities, while the rest of his confederates attacked Antigonus elsewhere, all with very indifferent success. Demetrius was sent by his father into Cilicia to recover the cities there lost, which he effectually performed; but in the mean time, Ptolemy reduced the greatest part of the island of Cyprus, which was of great advantage to him. Soon after he made a descent into the Lesser Asia, where he made various conquests, as also in the Archipelago; he likewise entered into a treaty with Cleopatra, sister to Alexander the Great, who resided at Sardis, and who in her turn had been solicited by Cassander, Antigonus, and Lyfimachus, to marriage, but in vain. Yet now either out of regard to Ptolemy, who was every-where applauded for an excellent prince, or out of pique to Antigonus, on account of her being very strictly looked after, she began to listen to the propositions made her, and actually attempted to make her escape to Ptolemy's camp. The governor of Sardis, having intelligence of this, caused her and the ladies who were with her to be arrested, as also the women attending on her person; and to those, in pursuance of the orders of Antigonus, he gave directions that they should put her to death, which accordingly they did. When Antigonus received advice of this, he absolutely disclaimed all knowledge of the fact; and to make his innocence appear the clearer, he ordered the heads of the women concerned to be struck off, and buried Cleopatra with great solemnity. Happy for him, if with her he could have buried the odium, which, in spite of all his artful contrivances, her death brought upon him !

Demetrius
defeats
Ptolemy in a sea-fight.
Year of
the Flood, 2693.
Before
Christ,
306.

AN eager thirst of glory put Demetrius the son of Antigonus on an expedition into Greece: his pretence was the setting the Græcian cities free; his real intent to aggrandize his father and himself by lessening the power of Cassander, who had garisoned many of those cities. We shall not here meddle with that war, because we have elsewhere given a very full account of it *; we shall content ourselves with saying, that he performed very well all he promised, and as he dispossessed Cassander of the cities, so he put no garisons into them himself, but left them intirely at liberty, and, according to his father's commands, prepared to carry on the war against Ptolemy. In the first place he landed in Caria; then he sailed into Cilicia, and having there recruited his army to fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse, and got together a fleet of upwards of one hundred and fifty sail of long ships, besides transports, he made a descent on Cyprus. As soon as he had landed his troops, he, like a wise commander, drew his vessels ashore, and took such precautions for their safety as were necessary, and then besieged the cities of Urania and Carpasia, and took them. After this success he advanced towards Salamis, the capital city, wherein Menelaus the brother of Ptolemy commanded. This man was not only a bold and vigilant, but also a very enterprizing officer. He resolved to fight before he was shut up, that he might have some trial of the invader's forces, and also diminish them a little before they undertook a siege. With this view having collected twelve thousand foot and eight hundred horse, he presented himself to Demetrius, as he was marching to Salamis in order of battle. This young captain, no less fond of fighting than he, immediately engaged and routed his forces, killing a thousand on the spot, and taking three thousand prisoners, whereupon Menelaus fled with the rest into Salamis, and prepared to make an obstinate defence. Demetrius instantly invested the city, and, as he piqued himself particularly on being a great engineer, carried on his attacks with much skill and wonderful vigour, insomuch, that Salamis was on the point of falling into his hands, when Ptolemy being informed of its condition, came in person to save it. He arrived with his fleet at Citium about twenty miles from Salamis, and immediately sent to desire his brother to send sixty ships which lay in the harbour to join his fleet; but that was found impracticable, for Demetrius on the first intelligence had equipped his fleet, and blocked up the mouth of the haven therewith. Ptolemy, notwithstanding this disappointment, weighed anchor and stood for Salamis, having with him one hundred and forty ships of war, and ten thousand men on board two hundred transports. Demetrius had but a hundred and eight ships of war, besides ten which were left to guard the mouth of the haven; however, he resolved not to shun an engagement. By way of precaution, he drew his cavalry down to the strand, that they might cover any vessels compelled to run ashore, and receive such as might be driven to swim for safety. The battle was very obstinate and bloody: Ptolemy broke that wing against which he fought in person; but Demetrius, chiefly through his own courage and skill in naval affairs, broke through the centre, and entirely defeated his enemies fleet. Just as the fight was over, and Demetrius returning in triumph, the sixty sail of ships broke out of the haven of Salamis, but were constrained to sail back again for fear of Demetrius. This was reputed the most glorious action of his life; for here he took forty ships of war, and sunk fourscore; he also took a hundred transports, with eight thousand soldiers on board, which proved of the last consequence to him, for he incorporated most of them into his army. The largest ship in the fleet he caused to be fitted up after the best manner possible, in order to send in it certain lords to carry the news of his victory to Antigonus, which, however, he delayed, till Salamis surrendered, whereby his prisoners were increased to seventeen thousand; among whom were Menelaus the brother, and Leontiscus the son of Ptolemy, both of whom he immediately discharged, and sent home to Egypt, with all their friends and dependants, desiring them to acquaint Ptolemy that he had not forgot the kindness done him in Cilicia. While Demetrius was settling his affairs in Cyprus, the messengers on board the galleon sailed to the coasts of Syria; and Arctodemus, who was the chief chief of them, went on shore, and with great parade informed Antigonus of the complete victory gained by his son. It was upon this occasion that the old man conceiving it of no longer use, laid aside his modesty, and took the title of king, putting a crown upon his head, and sending another to his son with a letter of congratulation, thus addressed, To the excellent majesty of king Demetrius. As soon as this was known in Egypt, the people, to shew their love for Ptolemy, compelled him to accept the same title ; upon which Lyfimachus also assumed it, as did likewise Seleucus ; and Cassander suffered it to be given him, though he did not make use of it in any of his writings <sup>k</sup>.

* DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PRUT. in Demetrio. JUSTIN. lib. xiv. * See Vol. VI. p. 205.

State of Antigonus's court.

It may seem strange that so politic, as well as so ambitious a prince as Antigonus was, should thus associate his son in the empire, and permit him not only to wear the title of king, but to share also in the administration ; but if we consider attentively this transaction, we shall agree, that in this he was more happy, than either in his titles, or in his kingdoms. For Demetrius was not only dutiful and loyal to his father, but had so warm an affection for his person, that he was, in the strictest sense of the word, Antigonus's best friend. As all degrees of bliss are either heightened or lessened by comparison, so the happiness of Antigonus in this respect appeared with the brighter lustre on account of the family dissensions in the courts of his several rivals ; of which he was so sensible, that having given audience one day to the ambassadors of Cassander, Ptolemy, and Lyfimachus, and they being withdrawn, he ordered them to be called back, because his son Demetrius coming in warm from hunting, went into his father's apartment, kissed him, and then sat down with his javelins in his hand. When the ambassadors demanded what his pleasure was, Tell your masters, said Antigonus, besides what I before mentioned to you, upon what terms my son and I live. The sense the father had of the son's inviolable attachment to him, made him so readily compliment him with the regal dignity ; we shall see this old politician mistaken in many instances, but never in this, in which so many fathers have erred. But these events we reserve for the following section <sup>l</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> DIODOR. PLUT. JUSTIN. ubi supra.
JUSTIN. ubi supra.

<sup>l</sup> DIODOR. PLUT.

S E C T VII.

The History of the reign of Antigonus, and his son Demetrius, in Asia.

AS we are for the future to speak of Antigonus and Demetrius as kings, it is fit that we should open this section with some account of their family. Antigonus was the son of Philip a nobleman; he espoused Stratonice the daughter of Correus, a lady of remarkable beauty; by her he had two sons, Demetrius and Philip, the former named after his uncle, the latter after his grand-father. We have seen, after what manner he rose from being an officer in Alexander's army, to be lord of many of the fairest provinces of which his empire was composed; but hitherto we have spoke but slightly of the manner in which he ruled them. Ambition was his capital vice, and indeed it led him into a multitude of very bad actions; he had, however, several great qualities, and some good ones. In the midst of his prosperity, he was wiser than his master. For when Hermadatus a Greek poet, not contented with making him a god, stiled him also the offspring of the sun, I can't tell how that is, said Antigonus; but he that empties my close-stool, never said any thing of my celestial origin. At another time when he was complimented upon his recovery from sickness, This disease, said he, was sent to put me in mind, that being a mortal, I should not grasp at any thing above a mortal. In his disposition he was rough and boisterous, and as he was a great soldier, so he trusted too much to arms; for though by them he acquired large territories, yet he could not keep them so easily as Ptolemy and Seleucus did their dominions, who made use of beneficence and clemency as the main pillars of their government. Of this Antigonus, when he grew old, became sensible; and therefore when he was told that men wondered his government grew milder, as he grew in years, It is, said he, because I would keep through good-will what I got by force. When his necessities required it, he would sometimes fleece his subjects severely, and when he was put in mind that Alexander did not so, True, said he, for Alexander reaped Asia, and I do but glean. In private matters he was strictly just: Marস্য as his brother would have had him heard a cause, in which he was party, in his chamber. No, my dear brother, answered Antigonus, I will hear it in the open court of justice, because I must do justice. After all, his chief felicity was the 2695.

The character of Antigonus
Year of the Flood,
Before Christ,
304.

manner in which he lived in his family; where, as he loved his wife and children, his wife and children really loved him: as for his second son, he died young, but not till he had performed things worthy of his descent; and there is a saying of his father's with respect to him mentioned by Plutarch, which shews at once the good sense and good humour of Antigonus. It happened on a march, that Philip was lodged at the house of a widow, who had three fair daughters; his father being informed of it, called for the quartermaster; Hark ye, friend said he, pray deliver my son out of these streights. Thus much, as to the character of Antigonus; with regard to that of Demetrius, we have already spoken copiously in the foregoing section, and in the Athenian history. The father was now in the zenith of his glory, and the son in the very prime of his age; we need not wonder therefore at their so readily accepting the alluring honours of the kingly state<sup>a</sup>.

The Egyptian expedition.

To adorn the crowns they had put on, an expedition into Egypt was immediately resolved on, not with a design of carrying war into the enemy's country, or of streightening Ptolemy so much as to oblige him to accept of peace, but with a view to drive him intirely out of his dominions, that they might be annexed to those possessed by Antigonus already. The mighty land-army raised for this purpose was commanded by Antigonus himself; the fleet which was to accompany it had Demetrius for its admiral; both fleet and army were suitable to the design itself, and those by whom they were conducted; the former consisted of a hundred and fifty stout gallies, and a hundred smaller vessels; the latter of eighteen thousand foot, eight thousand horse, and fourscore and three elephants. The general rendezvous of the land-forces was at Antigonia, a new city built by Antigonus in Syria; the fleet anchored on the coast; the kings expressed an earnest desire to be gone, but the ablest seamen in the fleet were very desirous of remaining where they were till the setting of the Pleiades, dreading the ill weather, which till then is frequent on the coast of Egypt; but Antigonus would not be detained; he therefore caused provisions of all sorts for ten days to be provided for his army, and having got together camels and other beasts of burthen sufficient, as he thought, to transport these necessaries and their baggage, he began his march through the deserts, which lie between Gaza and Egypt; in his passage his army was miserably fatigued, and the spirits of the people excessively broke. At last, having coasted mount Cassius, he perceived his fleet lying at anchor; but in a very indifferent state, many ships lost, more driven back to Gaza, and all the rest sorely shattered by the storm they had sustained. Demetrius intended to have sailed up one of the mouths of the Nile; but Ptolemy had so effectually secured these, and had disposed his troops on the coasts so judiciously, that no impression could be made; and if Antigonus had not supplied those on board with water and provisions, they must have perished in sight of the shore. This was a melancholy beginning; however, Antigonus marched on, hoping to rectify all things by his success in a battle; but Ptolemy was in no such haste; he had fortified all the fords of the Nile, and had considerable bodies of troops in these posts. He had besides an army of observation, with which he held Antigonus at bay, while in the interim he offered by proclamation every common soldier two minæ, (about six pounds five shillings English) and to every officer a talent, or one hundred and eighty-eight pounds, if they would come over to him. He had practised the same thing when Perdiccas invaded Egypt, and he had the same success now as then; for numbers deserted to him; and if Antigonus had not posted some choice troops on the road, the greatest part of his army would have gone over; the rather, because they were terrified with the dreadful punishments inflicted on those who were seized as they were going off. At last tumults arising, Antigonus saw plainly that it would not be for his interest to remain any longer there; wherefore, to avoid farther mischiefs, he retired with the army, as Demetrius sailed back with the fleet towards Syria. To repair the credit of their arms, the kings immediately resolved on a new expedition, which was the reduction of the island of Rhodes: For this some pretence was wanting; it was therefore demanded of the Rhodians, that they should enter into a close alliance with Antigonus and Demetrius against all their enemies; this, as it was foreseen, they refused, because, carrying on a great trade with Egypt, it was impossible for them to break with Ptolemy; however, fear engaged them to offer all that was in their power, which, however, Demetrius refused; and, making a descent, besieged the capital of the island, which cost him a great deal of trouble to no purpose, except that he gained here the reputation of the greatest engineer of his time, in consequence of his contriving such machines as had never been seen before, and that he likewise gave a new instance of his generosity and clemency. For, whereas the Rhodians having taken a vessel, on board of which were some rich hangings for his tent, as also certain letters from his wife Philla, sent all to Ptolemy; yet, when they afterwards intreated Demetrius to spare the celebrated picture of their patron Jalyfus, which had cost Protogenes seven years, and was esteemed his master-piece; that prince answered, I would sooner destroy the statues of my father, than offer the least injury to so exquisite a piece. As for Protogenes himself he worked as usual in his house in the suburbs, and when Demetrius sent for him, and asked him, How he came to be so fearless? I know, Sir, said the painter, that you make war against the Rhodians, but not against the sciences: Whereupon the king smiling, assigned him a guard. The siege of Rhodes had lasted long, and the spirits of Demetrius's soldiers were almost exhausted, when, happily for him, ambassadors from Athens arrived to implore his assistance against Cassander; this gave him a pretence to make peace with the Rhodians on these terms, that they should serve Antigonus against all his enemies except Ptolemy king of Egypt. Then Demetrius, sailing with three hundred and thirty galleys, and a great army on board, steered for Attica, where he landed, having constrained Cassander to retire towards Macedon; but when he came near Thermopylae, Demetrius fell upon his rear, and gave him so rude a shock, that his troops seemed rather to fly, than to march, through Thessaly afterwards. Upon this a corps of six thousand Macedonians left in Greece revolted to the victor, and Demetrius returned in triumph to the sea-coast of Peloponnesus. This extraordinary flow of success bore down before it almost all the virtues of Demetrius; for he began now to exceed Alexander in vanity, styling himself king of kings, drinking the healths of Seleucus, Cassander, Lysimachus, and Ptolemy, as great officers of his state and household. In debauchery he sunk far below the dignity of human nature, indulging himself not only in sensual pleasures, but in a vice which ought to want a name; he likewise deviated into gross impiety, that never-failing road to ruin; and, forgetting his father's former moderation, would needs be stiled a god, and the younger brother of Minerva. It may indeed be said in his excuse, that he had kept his senses, if the wits of Athens had not seduced him; however it was, from this time forwards his affairs declined, and though sometimes the prospect cleared, yet the storm which now began to rise did not blow over, till it had wrought his as well as his father's ruin<sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Diogen. Sicul. lib. xv. Plut. Apophthegm. Reg.

<sup>b</sup> Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. PLUT. in Demetrio.

Cassander,

Cassander, fearing that Demetrius would pursue the blow A new con- he had already given him, and, after compelling him to leave federacy a- Greece, follow him into Macedonia, sent deputies to Antigo- gainst An- nus in Syria, in order to treat of a peace; but Antigonus Antigonus. would hear of no other terms than his submitting himself and Year of his dominions to his pleasure, so that these negotiations came the Flood, to nothing, and Cassander was forced to send to his old con- 2697. federates, in order to engage them in a new alliance against Before this formidable conqueror; they readily listened to his propo- Christ, sal, for they perfectly well discerned, that when once Mace- 302. donia was subdued, Antigonus would fall upon them next. To prevent this, they entered into a treaty with Cassander; and Lyfimachus, having obtained from him a part of his army, resolved to pass over into Asia, and fall upon Phrygia, Lydia, and other provinces; which accordingly he did, and proceeded with such success, that Antigonus was not a little alarmed when acquainted therewith, as he was celebrating shews and gymnastic sports at his new city of Antigonia. He did not, however, lose his courage when he was made acquainted with this formidable confederacy; on the contrary, he behaved himself with more alacrity and spirit than could have been expected from a man of his years, and in his condition; for he was now upwards of eighty, and excessively corpulent. His ambition, however, was still so strong, that he could not help saying publicly, That he would scatter the confederates, as easily as boys do birds among the corn, by throwing a stone amongst them. In order to make good his words, he began to draw together his forces immediately; and, as soon as he had assembled a sufficient army, he crossed mount Taurus, and came down into Cilicia, where, having taken a considerable sum out of the treasury of Quinda, he made use of it to recruit his troops, which were soon in a condition not only to recover the places that had been lost, but even to offer Lyfimachus battle. That crafty old captain did not, however, press on an engagement, but, on the contrary, kept on the defensive, knowing well, that if he lost a battle, he lost all; but that Antigonus in such a case had many provinces to retire to. Lyfimachus therefore proposed an accommodation, but Antigonus would hearken to nothing; so the winter was spun out in preparations on both sides, and early in the spring Selaucus, with his own and Ptolemy's forces, began his march, in order to join Lyfimachus; of which, when Antigonus had notice, he instantly sent to recal Demetrius out of Greece, beginning now to foresee, that he should have enough to do to defend himself against so many and so potent adversaries. Demetrius, as soon as he had received his father's commands, entered entered into a provisional treaty with Cassander for preserving the peace and freedom of Greece. We call this treaty provisional, because it was not to remain in force, if Antigonus refused to ratify it; the design of both parties being to gain time, and an opportunity of attending their other affairs by acceding to this treaty, which gave liberty to Greece. On the conclusion of it, Demetrius found not only himself at liberty to return, but his forces also, there being now no necessity of leaving an army, as he had first designed, in Peloponnesus &c.

The fatal battle of Ipsus
Year of
the Flood,
2 28.
Before
Christ,
301

WHEN the season of the year permitted, Demetrius transported his forces into Asia; and, having recovered Ephesus from Lyfimachus, marched strait to join his father. By this time Seleucus was at hand, and the news of his approach did not come sooner than that of Ptolemy's irruption into Phœnicia, Judea, and Cælo-Syria, where he carried all before him, and, in a short time, reduced all those provinces, excepting only the cities of Tyre and Sidon, which, being strongly garrisoned, held out for Antigonus; but after these rapid conquests, Ptolemy, who had set down before the last-mentioned city on a flying report, that Antigonus had beaten Seleucus and Lyfimachus, raised his siege, and retired hastily into Egypt. By this time the two grand armies in Phrygia were ready to engage; that of Antigonus consisted of seventy thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and seventy five elephants. The forces of Seleucus and Lyfimachus consisted of sixty four thousand foot, ten thousand five hundred horse, four hundred elephants, and one hundred and twenty chariots of war. Now it was, that Antigonus varied a little from his usual manner of behaviour; for instead of appearing, as he was wont to do, with a frank and open countenance, he shewed himself very thoughtful and melancholy, was frequently silent; and whereas he formerly never consulted with any body, but gave out his orders with extraordinary vivacity, he was now very slow in his resolutions, consulted much with Demetrius; and once, as he was reviewing his troops, recommended him to the officers as his successor. These things were thought to shew, that his usual confidence had forsaken him: The morning of the battle, as he was coming out of his tent, he fell down and bruised himself; upon which rising up as well as he could, immortal gods, said he, grant me victory, if it be your will; but if not, let me fall in battle, and not survive my fading glory. When the armies were disposed in order of battle, Demetrius, having the command of the best part of his father's horse, charged so fiercely on the cavalry of Seleucus commanded by his son Antiochus, that he quickly broke and put them to flight; but pursuing them too far, he thereby lost all; for Seleucus immediately interposed his elephants in such a manner, that Demetrius could never rejoin his infantry; and, having done this, Seleucus marched with his foot to attack Antigonus, where he fought in person. The brave old man, on this occasion, behaved with great wisdom; but Seleucus, making a shew of charging him in flank, Antigonus was forced to alter his disposition; which gave opportunity to many traitors in his army to go over to the enemy; which they did, thereby creating such a confusion, that his forces were quickly broke, and himself, at the head of a very few, left to sustain the shock. When the enemy were about to charge him, one, who was near him, cried out, Sir, consider what you do; they are coming down upon you. Let them come, said Antigonus; Demetrius will come to our assistance. But, while he cast his eyes about in vain for his son, a shower of arrows deprived him of life, and he fell from his horse upon the ground, having only one servant that staid by his body. This was the fatal battle of Ipsus, so called from a town and river of Phrygia, near which it was fought. And thus fell the empire of Antigonus with himself, when he had borne the regal title about four years, and was as many above fourscore <sup>d</sup>.

DIONOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in Demetrio. JUSTIN.
HIST. XV. C. 4.

Demetrius, with the poor remains of his army, which were Demetrius no more than five thousand foot and four thousand horse, re- Poliorce- tired to Ephesus; and even doubting whether he should be tes suc- safe there, he shortly quitted that place, and retired towards ceeds. the sea. Many were of opinion, when he first entered that city, that he would have plundered the famous temple of Diana, in order to raise money to restore his affairs; but he did nothing of this sort, placing his chief hope in the loyalty of the Athenians, and therefore made all the haste he could thither, where he had left the best part of his plate, with his queen Deidamia and her retinue. But here his hopes miserably failed him, for the Athenians sent away his queen, and forbade him to enter their city. He, dissembling his resentment, very gladly received from them his ships, and, after visiting Peloponnesus, sailed away for the Chersonese, where landing, he committed great devastations in the territories of Lyfimachus; at which the confederate princes were not at all displeased, for they liked this ally of theirs no better than Demetrius, and feared him much more. In the midst of his distresses a strange accident happened in the favour of Demetrius. Seleucus having heard wonderful things of the beauty of Stratonice the daughter of Demetrius and Philla, the widow of Craterus and sister of Cassander, he sent to Demetrius to demand her in marriage. This extraordinary turn of fortune did not a little amaze Demetrius himself, who joyfully transported his daughter in his royal fleet to meet Seleucus. As he sailed along he was frequently constrained to put on shore for refreshment, which, amongst other places, he did in Cilicia, a province assigned by the princes to Plistarchus the brother of Cassander, who conceiving this in no other light than that of an invasion, immediately posted away to Cassander, to complain of the injury done him ; of which when Demetrius was informed, he thought Plistarchus could do no more, if he carried matters a little farther ; wherefore he ventured to seize the treasury at Quinda, and took from thence two hundred talents, which had been left by his father. Arriving on the coast of Syria, he was first met by his wife Philla, and then coming to the city of Rossus, he there found Seleucus, who immediately espoused Stratonice ; and, in honour of the nuptials, nobly entertained Demetrius on shore ; accepting also in his turn an invitation from his father-in-law, he was nobly feasted on board the royal galley, after which they parted. Demetrius sailing back again, made a new descent on Cilicia, and got intire possession of it ; whereupon he sent his wife Philla to excuse him to her brother Cassander ; and his other wife Deidamia dying of a cold she had caught at sea, he, by the interposition of Seleucus, espoused Ptolemaida the daughter of Ptolemy, which gave his affairs a new aspect. This fair weather, however, did not last long ; for Seleucus, unsatisfied with the many provinces he possessed, would needs have Cilicia, for which he offered Demetrius a sum of money. This he refused ; upon which Seleucus demanded Tyre and Sidon, threatening, if they were not given up, he would take them by force. To which Demetrius answered, that if he had lost ever so many battles, every one of them as fatal as that of Ipsus, he would never part with cities in so tame a manner ; and immediately gave orders for augmenting the garisons, and filling the magazines in the cities demanded. In the meantime he resolved himself to pass over into Attica, to be revenged for the affront which the Athenians had offered him immediately after the battle of Ipsus. In this expedition he was so roughly handled by a storm, that when he landed his troops in Europe, they were able to undertake nothing. He, however,

<sup>d</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra. ARRIAN. in Syriacis.

ever, soon after besieged the city of Messene, where he received an arrow in his jaw, which not only disfigured his face, but by the accidents attending the cure, threatened his life; yet he continued his siege, and afterwards his army increasing, he formed the blockade of Athens, which he reduced, and strongly garisoned. After this he made war against Sparta; whereupon Archidamus marched at the head of all the forces of Lacedæmon, as far as the city of Man-tinæa, that, as long as was possible, the war might be kept out of his own country; but his success was not answerable to his prudence and courage; for he was here defeated by Demetrius, and afterwards beaten by him again within sight of Sparta; yet such was the inconstancy of this prince's fortune, that he either was beaten, or reaped no benefit from his victories; for, immediately after this battle, came news, that Lyfimachus had conquered all he possessed in Asia; and that Ptolemy, after reducing the greatest part of the isle of Cyprus, had besieged the city of Salamis, in which were the mother and children of Demetrius; so that he had now no leisure to prosecute the war against Sparta. Before the sense of these mischiefs had long tormented the king's breast, a new and stranger scene opened, which turned all his thoughts another way<sup>c</sup>.

Cassander king of Macedon left behind him two sons, Antipater and Alexander, both pretending title to the kingdom; but the former, having married the daughter of Lyfimachus, absolutely refused to grant any thing to the latter, who thereupon called in Pyrrhus and Demetrius to his assistance. Pyrrhus came first, and made such an impression, that Antipater gladly compounded the matter with his brother, and allotted him half the kingdom, from which Pyrrhus, however, lopped a piece for his share; which proceeding giving Alexander to believe, that, when Demetrius arrived, he would take another portion of his kingdom, he made all the haste he could to meet him, and at the interview thanked him for the assistance he brought, but assured him that he had no need of it; whereupon Demetrius prepared to return, which, however, Alexander meant not that he should do, having formed a scheme to murder him at supper. This Demetrius prevented by going away suddenly; yet, when they came to Larissa in Thessaly, Alexander began to practise again; for Demetrius having invited him to an entertainment, he

Demetrius becomes king of Macedonia.
Year of the Flood, 2705.
Before Christ, 291.

<sup>c</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in Demet. JUSTIN. l. xv. c. 1.

went thither without guards, that Demetrius might have no pretence for bringing any with him; but his design being guessed at, Demetrius ordered him, and those who were with him, to be killed after supper; which command when his guards began to execute, one of Alexander's friends cried out, You have been too quick for us by a day. The Macedonian army, when they received the news of the death of their king, were not a little surprised, supposing that Demetrius would take this opportunity of attacking and cutting them to pieces; which, however, he was so far from doing, that he sent to desire leave to justify himself as to the death of Alexander, which he did in a formal harangue. This had such an effect on the Macedonians, that they immediately saluted Demetrius king; and thus, when his affairs were most desperate, he acquired that kingdom, for which so many princes had struggled, not only by the free consent of the people, but also with some colour of right; for tho' Antipater the son of Cassander was living, yet the Macedonians might well hold him unworthy of a crown, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own mother, the daughter of Philip of Macedon and sister of Alexander. Setting him aside, Demetrius, in right of his wife, was the next heir; and the sight of his son Antigonus, who was the grandson of old Antipater, influenced the Macedonians not a little, for they remembered how happily they had lived under his administration, and in what continual broils they had been ever since. The rest of the princes did not seem much displeased with an event which had fixed a crown on the head of the son of Antigonus at none of their expence. As for Lysimachus, while Demetrius and Pyrrhus were agreed, he thought it his interest to be well with both. Ptolemy having recovered Cyprus, dismissed the family of Demetrius, not only without injury, but with much respect, and with many magnificent presents. In the court of Seleucus, a surprising change had happened, which yet was beneficial to Demetrius; for Stratonice was married to Antiochus her son-in-law. Thus all things at present contributed to leave Demetrius at his ease, excepting his own temper only, which, now he had no enemy left, inclined him to pick quarrels with his friends. But of these things in another place. In this chapter we are to consider him as a king in Asia, and therefore we shall proceed to the last attempt made by him for the recovery of his father's kingdom †.

† DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra. JUSTIN. l. xvi c. 2.

WHEN he had reigned about six years in Macedon, part-<sup>He endeavours the recovery of his father's kingdom.</sup>ly to gratify his own ambition, and partly to employ the restless Macedonians, he began to make preparations for the conquest of Asia. In order to this, he set an army on foot of ninety eight thousand foot and twelve thousand horse. He likewise put a fleet of five hundred gallies upon the stocks, at Pella, Chalcis, Corinth, and Athens. Several of these gallies had fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen benches of oars; and they were all built by the particular contrivance of Demetrius himself, whose skill in this respect was not only admired by such as knew nothing more of ships than what their bulk and beauty dictated to their sight, but by the ablest artificers, who, without his directions were incapable of constructing such vessels, as, with all the pomp of royal ships, had also all the strength, and all the conveniencies of ordinary ships of war. The noise of these preparations awakened Lyfimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy; they therefore entered into a strict league against him, and, according to their old maxim in the days of Antigonus, determined to begin the war first. With this view they invited Pyrrhus king of Epirus to enter into the confederacy, which he readily did, tho' he had learned the trade of war under Demetrius, who had taught him ingratitude too, for Demetrius had practised upon him first. This point once settled, Ptolemy sailed with a puissant fleet to invade Greece, at the same time that Lyfimachus with a mighty army invaded Macedon. Demetrius, surprized with these quick proceedings, which came a little too soon for the state his affairs were in, levied, in as short a time as he was able, a considerable army, and marched therewith to oppose Lyfimachus, dispatching at the same time his son Antigonus with another army to provide for the safety of Greece. When Demetrius was arrived within a short march of the enemy, he received advice, that Pyrrhus had entered Macedon on the other side, and had penetrated as far as Beræa; upon which the Macedonians began to mutiny, and Demetrius saw plainly, that they had an inclination to desert to Lyfimachus. This made him apprehend that he had slipped in his politics, when he ventured to lead a Macedonian army against their old commander. To amend this therefore he made a short turn, and marched away directly to fight Pyrrhus, against whom, as a foreigner, he doubted not his troops would behave well; but in this he made a greater mistake than before; for no sooner he came near the enemy than his army began to desert in small parties. By degrees the Macedonians grew bolder, and went so far as to say openly in the camp, that the crown ought to belong to him, who most resembled Alexander; that in Demetrius indeed they saw his vanity, luxury, and pride, but that in Pyrrhus, against whom they were to fight, all the virtues of Alexander were conspicuous. When these notions had circulated among them a little while, the whole camp was in a tumult, and things at last issued in this, that some of the modestest and best meaning of the soldiers advised Demetrius to withdraw in time, and secure his person. Upon this he retired to his tent, laid aside his royal robes, and, in the habit of a private soldier, fled away without attendance to Cassandra <sup>8</sup>.

He is expelled from Macedon.

In this city he found his wife Philla, who, when she was informed of what had happened, overcome with grief, and ashamed to behold a daughter of Antipater at the lowest ebb of distress in Macedon, took poison, and so ended her days. Demetrius, in his worst fortunes, had always hopes; wherefore quitting Macedon, he withdrew into Greece, where having drawn together some of his friends, he began to form an army, which increasing by degrees, he marched to Thebes, and there assumed again the regal habit, and, as the first essay of his authority, restored the democratic authority in the city where he lived. As for the Athenians, as soon as they heard of his distress, without any other motive than mere ingratitude, they contrived to insult him, which provoked him so far, as to engage him to lead his new-raised army immediately to besiege their city. In this siege he had such success, that the Athenians were constrained to deprecate his vengeance by a solemn deputation, at the head of which was an eminent philosopher. Demetrius, who had always a tenderness for Athens, suffered himself to be persuaded to pardon even this new outrage; so that this expedition being at an end, he, of a sudden took it into his head to hazard another, which was for the recovery of Caria and Lydia from Lyfimachus. All his forces amounted to but eleven thousand men, and nothing could be more romantic than to hope, with so inconsiderable an army, to conquer a great part of Asia; however, he had necessity on his side, and a considerable body of desperate men to enforce whatever measures he thought fit to take. When he arrived at Miletus, he was met by Eurydice the sister of his wife Philla. She brought with her a new wife for him. Ptolemaida, to whom he had been long ago contracted. The marriage was consummated at Sardis, which he presently took. Part of the forces of Lyfimachus

<sup>8</sup> PLUT. in Demet. JUSTIN. l. xvi. c. 2.

revolting

revolting to him, and bringing with them a great sum of money, enabled him to recruit his army effectually. All this, however, signified nothing; for Agathocles the son of Lysimachus, coming against him with a very great army, and managing his command with great prudence, brought Demetrius into deep distress; for though the troops of the latter had the advantage in all the skirmishes which happened between them and the forces of Agathocles, yet by avoiding an engagement, and making a proper use of his advantage in numbers, this young prince compelled Demetrius to retire into Phrygia, whither he followed him, and reduced his army to a starving condition. Demetrius, shifting quarters often, at length passed the river Lycus, which being very rapid, many of his soldiers were drowned. This, with the other misfortunes they had endured, exasperated the army to such a degree, that they openly complained; and one day when Demetrius came out of his tent, he found these lines, which are a Parody on the beginning of the Oedipus of Sophocles, fixed over his door,

Thou son of blind Antigonus, Where are we?—

To add to these distresses, the plague broke out in his army, by which, in a very short time, he lost eight thousand men. With the poor remainder he retired to Tarjús, a city belonging to Seleucus, where he ordered his soldiers to observe exact discipline, till at last want forced them to dispense with all orders. Then it was that he wrote to Seleucus in terms the most moving. He represented the grandeur from which he was fallen, the misery to which he was reduced, and the small hopes he had left. Seleucus, taking this matter into consideration, sent orders to the governors of provinces, to furnish Demetrius with whatever was requisite for him, not as a private man, but as a king; as also with provisions for his army. This was done through the inclinations, and with a beneficence worthy of the king himself. But Patrocles, the prime minister of Seleucus, was of quite another sentiment; he continually whispered in his master's ear, that, of all the princes of his time, Demetrius was the most enterprizing; that the more he was distressed, the more ready he must be to make any new attempt hope or despair might suggest to him; and that to afford support to such a person, was to nurse a wild beast in his bosom. By degrees the minister's art overcame his master's clemency; so that, when Demetrius least expected it, Seleucus advanced with a powerful army towards Cilicia, whereupon that unhappy prince prince was forced to take shelter in mount Taurus, from whence he sent deputies to Seleucus, requesting him, that he would permit him the liberty to attempt, by force of arms, to repair his broken fortunes against the barbarous nations, there to establish a kingdom, where he might pass the remainder of his life in quiet and repose, and not in that rigorous season of the year, for it was now the middle of the winter, expose him to the fury of his implacable enemies in this distress, but to allow him a competent time and maintenance for his small army, till the weather should permit him to depart. But Seleucus, who, by this time, was become excessively jealous of him, sent him word, that he would allow him to remain where he was but two months; and that, even in consideration of this favour, he expected that he should deliver as hostages his principal commanders. Demetrius, perceiving himself taken like a beast in a toil, flew with vindictive rage on his cruel persecutors, and had the good luck to get the better of them in many encounters; particularly when he was beset with armed chariots, by his personal valour, he engaged his soldiers to break through them, and thereby opened a passage into Syria; so that things taking a new turn, Lyfimachus thought it would be favourably received, if he made Seleucus an offer of his assistance; but that cautious prince liked no such assistance; he therefore thanked Lyfimachus, and declined his favour; however, he spun out the war with Demetrius, not caring to trust the fortune of that prince, which often, from a very miserable state, had suddenly raised him to great prosperity. Even at this time Demetrius was in a better condition than could have been expected; and his forces, as they had been always victorious under his conduct, so they were very tractable and obedient in hopes that his good fortune would put it in his power to reward them. But while his mind was big with a thousand projects, Demetrius was seized with a malignant fever, which, in a short time, took from him his senses, so that for forty days he was able to give no orders. At the end of this space he recovered his senses, and in some measure his strength; but, to his great affliction, he found his army miserably mouldered away, and those he had left very desirous of getting into fresh quarters; a thing they had small reason to hope, and which yet he promised them, and, by dint of his great skill in military affairs, performed; for making a sudden and swift march towards Cilicia, he turned short in the night, and passing mount Amantus, left Seleucus and his army far behind him. Thus his wearied army had once more some time given them for refreshment.

refreshment. Seleucus, fearing he might recruit where he was, marched towards him, and encamped at no great distance. Of this when Demetrius was informed, he resolved to attack him that very night ; and, if his measures had not been betrayed, would have taken him in his bed ; as it was, he had but just time to mount, yet Demetrius perceiving that his design was discovered, would not hazard his forces, but retired. Seleucus resolving to make use of this opportunity, pressed him close, and at last compelled him to fight in a very disadvantageous situation. However, Demetrius having divided his forces into two bodies, he, at the head of one, charged the troops of Seleucus so briskly, that they were in great confusion, till Seleucus himself dismounting, led up his infantry, which obliging Demetrius to form his forces afresh, Seleucus, as soon as they made a line, advanced to their front, and putting up the vizor of his helmet that he might be known, he exhorted them to lay down their arms, telling them, that it was for their sakes he avoided coming to extremities so long ; whereupon those perfidious men shouted aloud, Long live king Seleucus, deserting in a moment their old master, and the victory he had almost obtained. Demetrius, in this distress retired, with a few who were about him, into a thick wood. At first he had thoughts of retiring to the sea, and going on board his fleet ; but when he considered how few people he had about him, he laid aside this design as impracticable. The next day his bosom-friend, Sofigenes, arriving, and having with him four hundred pieces of gold, Demetrius resumed his former design, and, as soon as it grew dark, sallied from the wood, in order to push forward ; but it appearing by the fires lighted on every side, that the avenues were all secured by the enemy, the king was forced to retire back to his wood. In this retreat some of the inconsiderable band of horse who were with him deserted ; whereby the rest were so intimidated, that they began to talk of delivering up Demetrius to Seleucus, in order to preserve themselves ; which when that unhappy prince overheard, he drew out his sword, and would have run himself through the body, had not some who were near him interposed and prevented him. Then those who had most interest with him took an opportunity of shewing the impossibility of his getting out of the province ; and that therefore it would be prudence in him for once to submit to fortune, and surrender to Seleucus. Demetrius having weighed this proposition duly, conceived it would be better to make that an act of choice, which was most likely would at length be brought about by necessity, and thereupon thereupon dispatched away deputies, to inform Seleucus, that he was ready to yield himself into his hands. Until these deputies returned, he remained still in his dark retreat in the wood <sup>a</sup>.

Demetrius
yields himself to Seleucus.

WHEN Seleucus was informed of the resolution which Demetrius had taken, he was exceedingly pleased, and having given the necessary directions for the reception of a person, who besides the high dignity he had held, stood in so near a relation to himself, could not help, even in the presence of his whole court, breaking out into these words: It is not the fortune of Demetrius which hath thus provided for his safety, but mine, which hath been watchful for my glory. I thank her more for this, than for all the favours she has done me, because I esteem an act of clemency more honourable than any victory. The many noble and generous things said by Seleucus in this high flow of fortune, inclined many of his courtiers to believe, that Demetrius, from being himself a king, would become the chief favourite of a king. In order therefore to secure their own interests, they immediately determined to go and pay their court to him, as soon as he should come into the quarters of Seleucus. Apollonides, who had been formerly a courtier in the palace of Antigonus, was sent to receive Demetrius, and when he had brought him to the village assigned, almost the whole court of Seleucus went to pay their compliments to his father-in-law. When the ministers about Seleucus, who hated Demetrius, perceived this, they instantly put him in mind of the dangerous consequences which might attend his nobles and commanders entering into familiarity with a person of such a dexterous address, and such surprising intrepidity. These insinuations had the effect desired by those who made them, insomuch, that while Demetrius was entertaining his old acquaintance and new friends, Pausanias, with a guard of a thousand horse, came to conduct him, not as he hoped, to the presence of Seleucus, but a castle in a demy-island, where he remained a prisoner. Seleucus, when he had provided for his own security, did all that could be thought of to make confinement easy to Demetrius. He ordered him royal entertainment within doors, a fine stable of horses, and the use of a noble park without. To give him a relish of these pleasures, hopes were cherished, and promises of liberty intermixed, which were all made to depend on the coming of Antiochus and Stratonice, to whom the conditions, on which this freedom was to be obtained, were referred. All other arts were practised to amuse Demetrius, and to divert his cares. At first he suffered himself to be deluded, and hoped, that after a time Seleucus would see him ; but when he found this protracted, and that excuse succeeded excuse, he penetrated the design of his politic son-in-law, and without giving in to vain expectations, fought by all methods to make his time as little tedious to him as might be. Hunting was for a while his chief diversion ; but, by degrees, he quitted it to give himself up to feasting and carousing, that, in wine and pleasant conversation, the memory of past greatness and present sorrows might be drowned ; so hard a thing it is for those who pretend to fight for repose to enjoy it, when they acquire it either in consequence of their victories, or thro' the mere bounty of providence ; and so much wiser is it to moderate our desires, than to place all hopes in their gratification.

<sup>a</sup> PLUT. in Demet.

It is the sentiment of some historians, that Demetrius acted The firm- meanly, first in yielding himself up prisoner ; and secondly, ness of in surviving so long the loss of his glory ; but if we examine Demetrius this matter to the bottom, we shall find, that these censures in his mis- are very rash, and that there is no part of Demetrius's life fortunes. less liable to reproach than the first part of his imprisonment. He had shewn in his former actions, that he was not afraid of death, and, in the first transport of his despair, he fought to have fallen by his own sword. That he supported life afterwards, was the effect of reason, and a very laudable resignation to the conduct of providence, as appears from the last public act he did, which, without comparison, was the noblest of his whole life. As soon as he was imprisoned, he wrote a letter to his son Antigonus, commending to him the care of his concerns in Greece, exhorting him to govern his subjects justly, to act always with moderation, and to look upon himself as dead ; conjuring him never to part with any of the cities, or to give up any thing to Seleucus to procure his liberty, and never to give credit to any letter written with his hand, or sealed with his seal, after this. We must surely look upon this as a most authentic proof of true courage ; and, after this, we may safely alledge his bearing with life as another proof of it ; for having acquitted himself to his family and his people, he might certainly indulge hope to himself. As to his giving way to luxury at the last, and spending his time in banquets and drinking-matches, we ought to pity him, and profit by his example. He found by fatal experience, that mirth and wine were no cures for grief ; for while by them he sought to still his concern, the struggle between resentment and a desire of concealing it, added to his high living, induced a distemper, which, when he had been a prisoner three years, carried him off in the fifty-fourth year of his age. Thus died this active prince, who had so often been at the top, and so frequently at the bottom of fortune's wheel. His death delivered Seleucus from all apprehensions, and not only him, but others; for his great accomplishments, his singular address, his taking presence, and above all, his extraordinary military skill, made him always formidable, though his forces were ever so weak, and the places in his possession ever so few<sup>1</sup>.

His pompous funeral
Year of
the Flood,
2716.
Before
Christ,
283.

WHILE Demetrius lay in prison, many princes and states, moved with the distress of so great a prince, sued to Seleucus for his liberty. Lyfimachus only was base enough to offer him a vast sum of money to put him to death; which, with the highest indignation, Seleucus refused, affirming, that neither envy nor any antient antipathy inclined him to confine Demetrius, but only a regard to his own safety, and a just attention to reasons of state. As Demetrius had rendered himself very remarkable for his filial piety towards his father, so his son Antigonus manifested as laudable an affection towards him; for notwithstanding the letter his father had wrote him might, in the opinion of the world, have freed him from all censure, yet did he offer Seleucus, not only all that he held in Greece, but his own person in hostage, for his father's liberty; but this was refused. However, Antigonus continued earnestly to solicit it by the most earnest and passionate letters as long as Demetrius lived, going in deep mourning during that space, and never once partaking of any feasts or diversions while his father was in prison. As soon as he understood that his father's ashes were coming from Syria, he sailed with a noble fleet to the Archipelago to meet them. He then deposited them in an urn of gold, which, when he entered the harbour of Corinth, he placed in the poop of the royal galley, set his crown upon it, and covered it with a canopy of purple, himself standing by clad in deep mourning, and his eyes red with tears. Most of the cities of Greece sent chaplets to crown the urn, and deputations of their prime citizens to assist at the funeral. All the trophies of honour were left at Corinth, where the ceremony was performed; but the urn itself was transported to Demetria, a city to which the late king had given his name, which had been built under his direction, and peopled, by his command, out of the villages in the neighbourhood of Iolchos. Thus in his death, he was more happy than in his life ; for all concurred in honouring the memory of those virtues which were no longer dreadful to them, and which had heretofore filled them with apprehensions, on account of the restless ambition, which, while he was living, accompanied them in the breast of the possessor, and which was held unextinguishable but by death *.

<sup>1</sup> PLUT. ubi supra. JUSTIN. l. xvi.

By the demise of Demetrius, the empire which his father erected in Asia determined, and therefore we have nothing more to add to this section, excepting a short account of the posterity which Demetrius left behind him. He was a prince much addicted to women, and as, like other princes, he indulged this vice by keeping many concubines, so, like the Macedonian kings, he scrupled not marrying several wives. The first was Philla the daughter of Antipater. She was the widow of Craterus, and somewhat older than agreed with the age of her husband; however, Antigonus having shewed him what benefits would accrue to his family by the match, Demetrius was easily prevailed on to espouse her. By this lady he had Antigonus and Stratonice; the former his successor in his European dominions, the latter queen of Asia, being the wife first of Seleucus, and after of his son Antiochus. Demetrius married for his second wife Eurydice, an Athenian lady, said to be descended from Miltiades. She too was a widow, having been first married to Ophillas, tyrant of Cyrene. She was extraordinary handsome, and her being an Athenian made her the more agreeable to Demetrius, who mightily affected that city. By this lady, some writers affirm, he had a son, named Coriabus; but of this there is great doubt. About the time he was chosen captain general of Greece at Corinth, he married Deidamia, the daughter of Æacidus king of Epirus, and sister of Pyrrhus. She too was a lady celebrated for her beauty, and who very affectionately accompanied him in all his expeditions, till, through the fatigue of travelling, which suited ill with the delicacy of her constitution, she died. By this third wife he had a son named Alexander, who died in Egypt. His fourth wife was Ptolemaida the daughter of Ptolemy king of Egypt. Her he married from motives of interest, and had by her a son named Demetrius, who afterwards reigned in Cyrene. All these wives were alive at once; and it is said, that Demetrius carried himself very obligingly to them all; but he was passionately fond of a strumpet, named Lamia, a woman of great art, and who touched the lute to the greatest perfection. She was, however, much older than any of his wives, even than Philla ; so that the satyrists of those times pretended she had enchanted the king. It is said, he once designed to have married Cratesipolis the widow of Alexander the son of Polysperchon, a woman more famous for her charms than her virtue ; but going to make her a visit while he besieged Megara, he very narrowly missed being taken prisoner by one of Cassander's parties, being forced to change coats with a soldier in order to make his escape, which effectually took away his regard for that lady. By a Sclavonian concubine he had a son, whom he called Demetrius : And these are all his descendants of which [we have any account in history. As to his dominions they remained to Antigonus, of whose life and actions we shall give an exact account in the succeeding section, having already communicated to the reader all that, with propriety, could be brought within the compass of this<sup>1</sup>.

Account of his marriages and posterity.

<sup>k</sup> PLUT. in Demet CORN. M. r. de reg. l. c. 3.

RECEIVED

S E C T. VIII.

The history of the kingdom of Macedon, from the death of Alexander the Great, to the conquest thereof by the Romans.

The state of Macedon at the king's decease.

THE kingdom of Macedon, at the time of the decease of Alexander, was governed by Antipater, yet Craterus was appointed him for a successor ; and the general opinion is, that Antipater, who was directed to come with a fresh Macedonian army to Babylon, would have been disgraced, if not put to death, on account of the many complaints made against him. If this were so, the death of Alexander prevented that of Antipater, and left him possessed of his government<sup>2</sup>. In writing therefore the history of Macedon from the demise of Alexander, we must begin with Antipater and his administration. He was a person noble by birth, of great natural abilities, heightened by an excellent education. He was the friend as well as disciple of Aristotle, learned, and a lover of learning ; magnificent in his actions, but plain in his dress and behaviour, never varying his habit in all the time of his government, but appearing like a private person when he gave laws to kings. In few words, he had either the greatest virtues of any man of his age, or was the greatest hypocrite

<sup>1</sup> PLUT. in vit. Demet. & Pyrrh. DIODOR. l. xix. xx. JUSTIN. l. xvii.      <sup>2</sup> ARRIAN. l. vii. CURT. l. x. JUSTIN. l. xiii c. 5.

hypocrite in it. The former, however, seems to us to be his true character, the lustre of his good qualities being too strong to be eclipsed by the vapours of Athenian envy, which affected the heads of many historians, some of whose writings have lasted to our times <sup>b</sup>. Philip of Macedon, whose great talent was judging well of men and things, made choice of Antipater as his minister, and relied on him as his friend. I have slept soundly, said he, for Antipater was waking. This sentence affords us a stronger description of his abilities and fidelity, than an orator could convey in twenty pages. Alexander intrusted him, not only with the care of his hereditary kingdom, and the command of a great army therein, but also with the custody of Greece. If in this charge he had been either negligent or careless, Alexander's victories would have signified nothing; for the Macedonians would have been for returning home, as soon as ever they had heard any ill news from thence. He had, it is true, many quarrels with Olympias, who was a high-spirited woman, and very desirous of meddling in state affairs. Alexander himself approved his conduct so far, as to say on account of his mother's letters, That he had paid dearly for the months he lay in her womb <sup>c</sup>. It is certain, that she was no less angry with Hephestion, the most faithful friend, as well as the chief favourite, of his master. What he thought of her character, appears from a fragment of one of his letters to her, wherein he wrote thus; Forbear your unjust reproaches; but, if you will not forbear, I care not, since Alexander must judge of all <sup>d</sup>. When the news of Parmenio's death arrived in Macedonia, Antipater is recorded to have said, If Parmenio conspired against Alexander, who can we trust? If he did not conspire, what shall we do? <sup>e</sup> If it were not for the only chasm in Arrian's history, we should be able to speak more fully as to the credit Antipater stood in with his master at the time of his decease. As it is, we know, that it was Arrian's opinion, that the best historians had recorded nothing which testified the king's having any dislike to his old minister <sup>f</sup>. What remains of the letters of Alexander shews, that he kept a regular correspondence with Antipater, and that he gave him public marks of his esteem. There is one fragment of a letter from Antipater to his master, which is the noblest testimony of his extraordinary firmness and strict regard to truth. Aristotle had fallen under Alexander's displeasure, and he had written in severe terms of him to Antipater himself ; yet when Antipater acquainted him with the death of Aristotle, he gave a noble character of that philosopher, which he closed with these words: Besides the marvellous talents wherewith the mind of that truly great man was adorned, this was peculiar to him, that he acquired the good-will of every man who knew him<sup>g</sup>. Having now sufficiently shewn who and what Antipater was, let us proceed to the history of his administration after the death of Alexander.

<sup>b</sup> DIONOR. l. xviii. PLUT. in vit. Alex. — ARRIAN. l. vii. <sup>d</sup> PLUT. in vit. Alex. <sup>e</sup> Id. in Apophthegm. regum. — ARRIAN. l. vii.

The Greeks begin the Lamian war.
Year of
the Flood, 2678.
Before
Christ,
321.

THE Grecians, even in the life-time of Alexander, endured very unwillingly that superiority which he exercised over them ; and tho' nothing could be more gentle than the government of Antipater with respect to Greece, yet he was exceedingly hated, because he obliged them to be quiet. One of the last actions of Alexander's life blew the embers of sedition into a flame. He had, by an edict, directed all the cities of Greece to recal their exiles ; which edict, when it was published at the olympic games, occasioned great confusion. Many of the cities were afraid, that when the exiles returned, they would change the government ; most of them doubted their own safety in case the edict took effect, and all of them held this peremptory decree to be a total abolition of their liberty. Immediately therefore they began to levy soldiers, and to prepare for war. In these transactions the Athenians were extremely busy, yet they did not publicly declare themselves, till they were assured that Alexander was dead. Then they kept no measures ; they laid out the money, which Harpalus had stolen from Alexander, and left in their city, to hire forces<sup>h</sup>. They exclaimed against the Macedonians, as a barbarous and tyrannical nation, and appointed Leosthenes general of their forces raised for delivering Greece. This man was the disciple of Demosthenes, and seems to have meant his country better than he was able to serve it. He was full of an enthusiastic passion for democracy, and this prompted him to talk in a very high strain in the assembly. Phocion, who judged better of the state of Athens, could not help saying to him on this occasion, Young man, your speeches are like the cypress tree, lofty and well spread, but they bear no fruit<sup>i</sup>. This gentleman, however, drew together a noble army, with which he advanced towards Thessaly, which was the most judicious step taken in the war.

Antipater
marches against
them.

Antipater, as soon as he was thoroughly informed of the march of the Athenian forces, sent over into Asia, to desire the assistance of the governors there. In the interim he marched

<sup>g</sup> Plur. in paral. Coriolan. cum Alibi. d.
SECVL. XVIII. <sup>h</sup> Plur. in v. Phocion

<sup>i</sup> Diodor

marched with thirteen thousand foot and six thousand horse, in order to secure Thessaly. He appointed Gillas to preside in Macedon during his absence, and directed him to raise forces with all imaginable diligence ; for the large draughts which Alexander had made rendered this a work not easily performed. A fleet of a hundred and ten gallies was likewise fitted out, under the command of Clytus, who, as a seaman, had served with great reputation under the late king. When Antipater came down into Thessaly, he found the inhabitants of that country still in the Macedonian interest, and received from them a very considerable reinforcement of horse ; yet, according to the practice of their ancestors, they acted deceitfully, and, when he wanted them most, went over to the enemy. Leosthenes was in possession of the Pylæ, or streights leading into Greece, where he waited for Antipater, who, with the small army he had, did not fail to give him battle, wherein numbers, and the skill of the mercenaries serving under Leosthenes, gained him the victory. Antipater, with the remains of his army, retired to Lamia, a city of some strength, and not far distant from the field of battle. This he seized, and fortified in such a manner, that tho' the victorious army attempted to storm it, yet they were unsuccessful; so that Leosthenes was constrained to undertake a regular siege, whereby, when he had reduced Antipater to great straits, himself, advancing too near the wall, was slain by a stone ; whereupon Antiphrilus was created general in his stead. While things were in this condition, Leonatus arrived from Asia with a great army, and advanced to succour Antipater. Antiphrilus, as soon as he was apprized of this, raised the siege, burnt his tents, and marched to fight the new-comers, tho' they were no less than twenty-two thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse, most of them veterans. The battle was hard fought, and continued long ; but, through the valour of the Thessalian horse and the death of Leonatus, the Greeks carried the victory, and the Macedonian phalanx was compelled to retire into the rocky hills, where the horse could not follow them. These victories exceedingly raised the spirits of the confederates, and made them despise their enemies so much, that many of them returned home, which afterwards proved fatal to the common cause <sup>k</sup>.

Antipater, while he was shut up in Lamia, sent deputies Thecon- to Athens, to negotiate peace ; but the Athenians refused him elusion of any other terms than surrendering at discretion, and leaving this way ; all things to their disposal. The siege being now raised, Antipater, with incredible diligence, marched to the place where the remains of Leonatus's army was encamped, and having joined them, held the enemy in play, tho' he was not able to offer them battle. When he found the confederates pressed hard upon him, and that their chief strength consisted in their superiority of horse, he chose such a rout, as, for the most part, hindered the horse from acting; and when they might have acted with effect, he devised this method for avoiding an engagement; he directed the light-armed foot to mount, not only all the carriage-horses, but likewise all the mules and asses belonging to the army, and placing these behind the squadrons of horse which he had, the Thessalians concluded, that he had been reinforced with a great body of cavalry, and therefore contented themselves with observing them at a distance. At length Craterus arrived with a great body of forces under his command; however, he yielded the command to Antipater on their junction at the river Peneus, where there were now assembled forty thousand foot, three thousand archers, and five thousand horse. The Greeks had twenty-five thousand foot and three thousand five hundred horse, with which they ventured a battle. In this the Thessalian cavalry were at first victorious; which Antipater observing, he would not sustain his horse, but suffered the Thessalians to break them intirely. While these continued the pursuit, he, with the phalanx, bore down upon the Grecian foot, and defeated them with great slaughter. The Macedonian horse formed behind their victorious battalions, and the Thessalians fearing they should be surrounded, retired hastily, in order to join their foot. After this defeat, Antipater held a council of war, wherein it was put to the vote, whether they should continue in the field, or think of treating. It was carried for the latter, and deputies were instantly sent to Antipater; but the Grecian generals were exceedingly surprised to hear on their return, that the Macedonian would treat separately with the cities, or not at all; which proposition they rejected<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Phocion. & Demosthen. JUSTIN. l. xiii. c. 5.

Peace granted to the Athenians.

Antipater and Craterus, perceiving that the confederate army was too weak to give them battle, began to besiege the cities in the neighbourhood, and having reduced many of them, treated the inhabitants with much severity. This so affrighted the states confederated with the Athenians, that they immediately made peace on the best terms they could. The Athenians and Ætolians alone stood out; upon which Antipater and

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Demosthen.

Craterus

Craterus advanced towards Athens. The citizens of that famous place found themselves now in no condition to resist him, their fleet, which they had fitted out at a vast expence, under the command of Eetion, having been twice defeated by Clytus. In this distress the Peloponnesians might have succoured and preserved them; but, either through jealousy or a panic fear, they remained motionless, and left the Athenians to their fate. In this distress they turned their eyes on Phocion, and demanded his advice. To what end, said he, Athenians, should I advise you? If you had not rejected my counsels, you had not been this day in this distress. They then called upon Demades, who had always been in the Macedonian interest. He proposed a decree, by which Demosthenes was condemned to death; but he was already fled. He then desired, that deputies might be sent to Antipater, himself and Phocion being of the number. When they arrived, Antipater would hear of no other terms than those offered to him at Lamia, viz. that they should yield themselves intirely to his mercy and suffer their affairs to be settled at his pleasure. With these hard terms they were constrained to comply. Phocion besought Antipater that peace might be concluded where he then was, i. e. in Bæotia, which Craterus said was unreasonable, since their army must subsist all that time in the country of their friends, whereas nothing hindered their living at discretion in Attica (A). To this

Antipater

(A) Xenocrates was a very eminent philosopher, the disciple and successor of Plato, alike remarkable for his wisdom in words, and for the probity of his actions. Many years before this he had been sent ambassador to Antipater in Macedonia, to intreat him to set at liberty some Athenian prisoners. On his arrival, before he had his audience, Antipater invited him to an entertainment. Xenocrates answered him in these verses of Homer, (spoken by Ulysses to Circe, when she pressed him to eat of the dainties set before him :

*Ill fits it me, whose friends are sunk to beasts,
To quaff thy bowls, or riot in thy feasts.
Me wouldst thou please, for them thy cares employ,
And them to me restore, and me to joy* (1).

Antipater was so well pleased with his presence of mind, and happy application of these verses, that, without more ado, he set the Athenians free. On this occasion he did not behave so obligingly,

(1) Od. 2. l. x.

Antipater replied, that he was in the right ; yet, said he, let us grant this, because it is asked by Phocion. When the Athenians had consented to submit themselves to his pleasure, Antipater granted them the following terms ; that the ancient way of raising taxes in the city should be restored ; that they should receive a garison into the fort Munichia, and maintain it at their own charge ; that they should pay the expence of the war ; and that they should deliver up the orators Hyperides and Demosthenes. Phocion earnestly begged the city might be excused from the garison. I would willingly grant this also to your friendship, said Antipater, but I know it is not either convenient for you or for me. By which he meant, that, without a garison, the Athenians would never be kept either in dependence on the Macedonians, or at quiet among themselves. In consequence of this treaty, the popular government in Athens was abrogated, and such only permitted a share therein as had competent estates ; upon which twenty-two thousand of the inhabitants retired from the city, and had estates assigned them in the territories of Macedon, where they settled, and lived very happily. As for the rest of the Athenians, they were constrained to return to Solon's model of government, and, in short, were compelled by Antipater, much against their will, to be rich and quiet. With the same equity and moderation he settled the rest of the Grecian states, who, at first, grudged his power, and for knowing that Xenocrates was warmly affected to the democracy, he passed him by, when he kindly saluted all the rest of the deputies ; which when the philosopher observed, he could not help saying, Antipater does well thus to distinguish me from the rest, as if before Xenocrates only he was ashamed of the injustice he is about to do the Athenians. When the government was afterwards settled, Phocion would willingly have had Xenocrates accept the freedom of the city, which he refused : I will not, said he, submit myself to an administration which I do not like, and the establishment which I oppose (2). Afterwards growing so poor that he could not pay his tribute, the Athenians, with shameless ingratitude, condemned him to be sold for a slave, which was accordingly done. Demetrius the Phalerean bought him, restoring him to his liberty, and paying his price into the public treasury. He was a great writer, for we have the titles of above sixty treatises which he composed. He died at fourscore and two, falling in the night with his head into a basin of water, whereby he was suffocated (3).

(2) Plut. in vit. Phocion
erat.

(3) Diogen. Laert. in vit. Xeno-

complained heavily of the infringments made on their liberty ; but, by degrees, they became better satisfied, and at last honoured him as the father and protector of Greece. On his return to Macedon, he and his son-in-law Craterus, who had just married his daughter Philla, turned their arms against the Ætolians, who alone refused to be comprehended in the peace, and kept a considerable army in the field. These, with much trouble, they reduced in the winter to great straits ; but while they were preparing for the sieges of their principal cities, Antigonus arrived from Asia, with an account of Perdiccas's designs, insisting particularly on his slighting Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, and on his ordering Cynane the sister of Alexander to be put to death. Antipater and Craterus instantly made peace with the Ætolians, that they might be at leisure to attend to their own concerns, and prevent Perdiccas from becoming their sovereign, under colour of being protector of the kings. With this view they entered into a league with Ptolemy, and began to assemble an army in order to pass into Asia <sup>m</sup>.

WHEN all things were ready, and the season of the year permitted, Antipater and Craterus transported their forces into Asia, leaving the care of Macedon and Greece to Polyperchon. On their arrival in Asia, Antipater resolved to march with part of the forces into Cilicia, that he might be able to assist Ptolemy, in case Perdiccas was too hard for him ; and Craterus with the other moiety marched against Eumenes. Antipater, not long after this division of their forces, received the melancholy news of the defeat and death of his son-in-law, whereby his favourite daughter Philla was left a widow <sup>n</sup>. It is said this lady was endowed by nature with such extraordinary qualities, that her father, who was otherwise a very close man, yet was wont to consult her even while she was a girl. Her conduct in the time of both her husbands was extremely remarkable, for she spent her whole time in acts of beneficence ; she had the wives and daughters of the officers of the army continually about her. As her own behaviour was very exact, she kept a strict eye upon theirs, at the same time she relieved their wants, gave portions to their daughters, and was their patroness in all their affairs. The death of her husband Craterus did not greatly affect Antipater's interest ; for Perdiccas being shortly after slain in Egypt, he was sent for to the army in Syria, where Aridæus and Pithon abdicating their offices as protectors of the kings, Antipater succeeded by common consent. At first Eurydice the wife of Philip created him a great deal of trouble, and even endangered his life; but, by degrees, he got over this, and not only conciliated the affection of the soldiers, but acquired also the esteem of Eurydice herself. In fine, after he had settled all things in Asia in the best method possible, and had left his son Cassander to be a check upon Antigonus, he set out with the kings to return to Macedonia, the army being perfectly well satisfied with his conduct, and the friends of the royal family hoping all things from his protection <sup>o</sup>.

Antipater and Craterus pass over into Asia.

<sup>m</sup> ARRIAN. apud Phot. cod. xcii. DIODOR. SICUL. l. xviii. JUSTIN. l. xiii. PLUT. in Demosthen. & Phocion. <sup>n</sup> PLUT. in vit. Eumen. DIODOR. ubi supra.

The Ætolians invade Thessaly. WHILE he and Craterus were in Asia, the Ætolians, who had secretly entered into a league with Perdiccas, broke into the territories of Macedon with a great army, and committed excessive depredations, in revenge for what they had suffered the winter before. Polycles commanded in those parts for Antipater, and had with him a considerable body of troops. He, in attempting to repel the Ætolians, was drawn by them to an engagement, wherein his army was routed, and himself slain. The Ætolians, while they were consulting how to prosecute this victory, received advice, that the Acaruanians had entered their country, and had begun to commit horrible devastations therein. To expel these invaders the Ætolians marched home; but they left the forces of their confederates in Thessaly, under the command of Menon, an officer of great skill and courage. Polysperchon, who, as we observed, commanded in Macedon in the absence of Antipater, immediately took advantage of this division, and, while the Ætolians were busy in expelling their domestic enemies, he, by forced marches, came down into Thessaly, and, before Menon could be properly supported, fell upon him and his troops, and cut them to pieces. By this blow the power of the Ætolians was intirely broken, and the peace of Macedon restored <sup>p</sup>.

The Athenians seek to be eased of their garrison. Antipater, on his return, brought with him the kings into Macedon, and treated them there with all imaginable respect. The Athenians were very earnest with Phocion, whose interest with Antipater they knew to be great, to obtain of him the dismission of their garrison; but Phocion, who saw clearly that this garrison was more useful to the public than to

<sup>o</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra.
<sup>p</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

Antipater, declined the commission ; yet the recalling many of the exiles, and other good things he both asked and obtained of Antipater, with whom he had indeed a very great interest. Menillus, who commanded in the fort, and was both a generous and a good-natured man, offered Phocion, who had but a small estate, a sum of money. My circumstances, answered the patriot, are neither worse than they were, nor are you greater than Alexander the son of Philip, from whom I refused to accept the same favour. And when he was once requested to do somewhat that was wrong in his opinion, for the service of the Macedonians, Antipater, said he, cannot have me for his friend and his flatterer. This the Macedonian chief knew as well as he ; for it was a common saying with him, That he had two friends at Athens, one who would take nothing, and another who never thought he had enough<sup>9</sup>. The former was Phocion, the latter Demades, an orator of some reputation, and who had been all his life in the interest of Macedon. It was this man on whom the Athenians cast their eyes, when Phocion absolutely refused to have any thing to do with the affair of the garison ; and in an ill hour for himself and his family Demades undertook it, having, for the greater honour, his son Demias joined with him in commission<sup>r</sup>.

NOT long after his return to Macedon, Antipater was The death attacked by a dangerous disease, which added to his years, of Anti- for he was now fourscore, left him little hopes of life. He pater. behaved himself in the last moments of his life with the same firmness, and the same regard to his reputation, which he had shewn in all the actions of his life. His great offices of protector and governor of Macedon he bequeathed to Polyperchon, the eldest of Alexander's captains at hand, and of whom Antipater had a much better opinion than he deserved. His eldest son Cassander Antipater appointed to be a chiliarch or colonel of a thousand men, a command in those times infinitely more considerable than now<sup>s</sup>. A little before his death, Demades had audience of Antipater, and was kindly received ; however, as to the garison, nothing was determined ; but at the request of Phocion, signified by letter, the Athenians had a further day given them for the payment of their subsidies. Thus, full of years and glory in a time of full peace and serenity, procured chiefly by his own wisdom and prudence, Antipater expired ; of whom, had we nothing else to say, what Tacitus observed of Galba might properly be applied to him, and sufficiently distinguish his character to posterity; Non in domo successorem quaesivit, sed in republica. In the choice of a successor he regarded not his family, but the commonweal (B).

<sup>9</sup> PLUT. in vit. Phocion.<sup>r</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.<sup>s</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

Demades and his son slain.

BEFORE Antipater was well dead, Cassander in his name sent for Demades the Athenian ambassador, who with his son Demias readily came, and began to expostulate on the busi-

† TACIT. Hist. lib. i. c. 15.

(B) We have no where the reasons assigned us, why Antipater excluded his son Cassander from the administration, but they are not hard to be guessed. First, he was his son, and in all probability the father thought it unworthy of him to aggrandize his own family at the expence of his master's. Secondly, Polysperchon's age, experience, and his late exploit against the Ætolians might induce Antipater to think he would prove a worthy guardian of the kings. There might be a third reason, which was Cassander's ambition, and his having a private intrigue with Eurydice the wife of king Philip, who had as good or a better right to the crown than her husband, which might make the good old man less careful of his son's interest than otherwise he would have been. However it was, he shewed his love for his country, not only in his impartiality, but also in the advice he gave to him whom he designed his successor. On no account, said he, suffer a woman to have any concerns in the affairs of state; their abilities are by no means suited to such arduous concerns; for being slaves to their passions, to indulge them they throw all things into confusion (4). This was understood to point at Olympias, who during his administration had dwelt in Epirus. It is true, he had great reason to dislike her, as well on account of the trouble she had given him, as out of regard to his beloved master Philip, whose second wife she had murdered, and whose child by her she broiled between two copper plates; even in Epirus, she affected to govern all things, and therefore her son Alexander commended her for going thither, because, said he, the Macedonians would never bear the government of a woman. Yet it may be, Antipater's counsel was general, which was more becoming him, and no less founded on fact; for besides the trouble he had had through Olympias, Cleopatra the sister of Alexander had afforded him no small disquiet, and Eurydice had once put him in the utmost danger of his life (5); he might well therefore have no great opinion of women's intermeddling with state affairs. We shall shortly see how deeply the Macedonians suffered from the neglect of Antipater's maxim.

(4) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii.

(5) Arrian. ap. Plot. Jaf.

ness of the garison. Cassander, giving little heed to what he said, ordered his son to be put to death in his presence, and when he had given him a little time to feel the affliction of a father, he first loaded him with bitter reproaches, and then caused him also to be slain. The reason of this extraordinary proceeding was, that, among the papers of Perdiccas, there had been found a letter written to him by Demades, pressing Perdiccas to make haste into Greece; the affairs of which hung at present, he said, on an old rotten thread; so he was pleased to characterize Antipater, from whom he had begged, and from whom he had received so much. It is but just we should inform the reader that authors vary about this fact; Diodorus says, that Demades was put to death by Antipater. Plutarch and other authors ascribe his punishment to Cassander: Some also say, the letter was written to Antigonus, and not to Perdiccas; but this is improbable, and therefore, having well considered its circumstances, we have stated the fact as it appears to us. Cruel without doubt it was, yet it cannot be denied, that Demades, who was a venal orator, and who scrupled not to employ his eloquence against the interest of his country, met with no worse fate than he deserved<sup>u</sup>.

Polyperchon was now at the head of affairs, governor general of Macedon, and protector of the kings; which high offices he derived from the good opinion which Antipater had conceived of him. He was a man of indifferent parts, more capable of following directions, than of giving them, one extremely formal in his manner of transacting business, being conversant in nothing but forms. In a word, he was far from being honest, steady, or wise, and yet a great pretender to probity, fortitude, and policy. He had a son named Alexander, more active, and of better abilities, though not a grain more virtuous than himself. The first step he took in his government was to call a general council; as the first step taken in that council was to set aside Antipater's dying counsel, by recalling Olympias, which they not only did, but put Alexander the son of Roxana under her care, at least they promised so to do, hoping that the majesty of the mother of Alexander would add a lustre to their administration. A measure, which, considered in one light, seems just and honourable; but in another shews, that Polyperchon and his council were sensible of some imbecillity in themselves. The queen, however, who knew she was safe in Epirus, and knew not what might befall her in Macedon, made no great haste, but took time to consider the matter herself, and to consult with her friends. However, she communicated her thoughts upon all occasions to Polyperchon, and so held immediately a considerable share in the administration. Cassander was little thought of in these proceedings; and it appeared plainly, that the new government had very little regard for the friends of the old one, which of consequence created a multitude of malecontents, and afforded colour for certain subsequent transactions, which otherwise would have been of too dark a hue to have borne the light. For as great politicians have a faculty of making all events contribute to their ends, so there are a tribe of wrong-headed statesmen, who obstinately pursue those tracks which lead directly from the ends at which they aim; such were Polyperchon and his council w.

Projects of the new administration in Macedon.

<sup>u</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vita Phocion.

*The views of Cassan-
der.*

As soon as Cassander considered the state in which he stood, he saw, or at least he thought he saw, reason to be displeased with his father's disposition of affairs. He formed a just idea of Polyperchon's character, and drew from thence very dismal apprehensions of what might befall himself, his family, and their dependants. Besides, his ambition prompted him to attempt the recovery of that command, of which his father's will had deprived him; and at the same time it opened his eyes to methods by which it might be obtained. These things having a while revolved in his own breast, he engaged some of his friends to accompany him into the country under colour of diverting themselves with hunting; but in truth to confer with them on his design. When they were at a distance from court he opened to them his project, having first strongly possessed them with the common danger they were all in from the propensity of Polyperchon to Olympias, the antient and implacable enemy of Antipater and all his friends. He then shewed them, that Antigonus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus would, from their respective interests, become the enemies of Polyperchon, because, as protector of the kings, he would claim a superiority over them; from whence he inferred they would be friends to themselves, if they declared against Polyperchon. It is uncertain, whether at first he communicated his intention of absolutely supplanting the protector, or whether he pretended only to aspire to such a degree of power as might enable him to protect himself, his family, and their friends; however it was, his discourses procured him a multitude of creatures, who readily obeyed his dictates, and took such steps as he directed them; and if things began to go well at home, they went still better abroad, for Antigonus, and the rest of the princes, promised

w DIONOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vita Demet. JUSTIN. l. xiv
hunc

him their utmost assistance as soon as it was asked, in consequence, as they pretended, of their extraordinary love for his father ; but, in truth, because they hated Polysperchon, and were desirous to prevent his looking abroad, by finding him troublesome scenes enow at home *.

WHILE Cassander was busied in carrying his schemes into Polysperchon's execution, Polysperchon held another grand council, wherein it was resolved to displace all the governors appointed by Antipater in Greece, and to set up the democracy where-ever it had been abolished. In order to carry this scheme into execution, a very gracious proclamation was drawn, and sent to Athens, and to the rest of the cities. It remains entire in Diodorus, and will be an everlasting monument of the genius of Polysperchon and his ministers. The body of the edict is full of royal authority, and extraordinary stretches of power, yet the preamble and conclusion declare its intention to be the restoring liberty to the Greeks, and at the same time the old regency is loaded with grievous accusations. This edict produced, what in all probability it was intended to produce, confusions every-where ; for the people, under colour of its authority, would no longer obey their magistrates, and the magistrates were no where well inclined to trust themselves to the government of the people. But the point of dismissing governors, which was the main thing the edict was calculated for, it could not produce, for the governors were least of all willing to submit to the execution of a decree by which they were to be cashiered ; they therefore demurred at first, and at last applied to Cassander. In this nice conjuncture all eyes were upon Athens, for as it was the most considerable garison, so if Nicanor, who commanded there, had immediately evacuated the fort, it would have gone a great way towards the carrying the edict into execution elsewhere. But he at first expressed a sort of dissidence as to the authority of Polysperchon, and afterwards, when he received letters from Olympias, he spun out negotiations with the Athenians, till he had thoroughly recruited his garison ; and then, instead of quitting Munichia, he unexpectedly ferzed on Pyraeus. The Athenians, provoked by this usage, which they were not able to revenge upon Nicanor, turned their fury on their own citizens, and instantly proscribed Phocion, with several other persons of distinction, who had conferred with Nicanor, tho' they were not culpable in the least. These unhappy persons retired for shelter to Alexander the son of * Diodor. ubi supra. Justin. ubi supra. Plut. in Demet. & Phocion.

Polyperchon, who had then entered Attica with an army. As he drew near Athens, the citizens also sent deputies to press him immediately to besiege Nicanor, in order to restore them their forts. But Alexander had by this time other notions in his head; he knew the Athenians too well to think of trusting them, and therefore he began to enter into a treaty with Nicanor, not for his evacuating the forts, but for his coming over to his father Polyperchon, in keeping them for him, in which, however, he succeeded not. By this time Polyperchon himself was at hand with a great army, having with him king Aridæus or Philip. To him his son Alexander sent Phocion, and his friends, with letters of recommendation, Dinarchus the Corinthian, Polyperchon's old and intimate friend, going with them. At their heels came deputies from Athens, charging them with treason against the state. Polyperchon was at first extremely perplexed how he should behave himself on this occasion. His son had engaged his faith to the exiles, but himself conceived that his interest would be best promoted by his siding with the Athenians; fickle in his sentiments, and sanguine in all his measures, he no sooner conceived this, than he ordered his old acquaintance Dinarchus to be first tortured, and then put to death, and, after affording Phocion and his friends a pretended hearing, at which the foolish king attempted to strike Phocion through with his lance, the exiles were condemned, and then transmitted to Athens, where the people were giddy enough to mistake for a mark of liberty their being made the executioners of a sentence pronounced in another court. In short, Phocion was murdered, and Polyperchon highly cried up; but in the mean time Nicanor maintained himself in Munichia and in the Pyræus, and advice came, that Cassander, who was fled to Antigonus, had been furnished by him with considerable assistance, and was on the very point of imbar-king for Athens †.

*Cassander
prevails in Greece.*

Year of
the Flood, 2681.

Before
Christ,
318.

It was among the number of the great slips in policy made by the new administration in Macedon, that after so openly attacking the dependants of Antipater, and taking Olympias into a share of the administration, they yet suffered Cassander to withdraw, which he did as soon as he had settled matters at home, and went immediately to the court of Antigonus; there he was received with high honours, and had mighty promises made to him, part of which were fulfilled, not for his sake, but that a war might be kindled in Greece while Antigonus totally subdued Asia. The forces lent Cassander were not great, but to a man of his spirit any assistance was considerable. As soon therefore as he had received them, he sailed for Athens, and entering the Pyræus with his small fleet, was received by Nicanor. Polyperchon instantly resolved to shut up his competitor in that city, and to put a short end to the war by its reduction. For this purpose he assembled a great army, with which he marched to Athens; but forgetting that Attica was never over-fruitful, he found himself in a short time so distressed for provisions, that he was constrained to abandon his design, and therefore leaving his son Alexander with a competent army to observe the motions of Cassander, he with the major part of his forces marched into Peloponnesus, where he knew Cassander had many friends. When he entered Peloponnesus he had recourse once more to his edicts, whereby such as had born offices in the cities under the administration of Antipater were roundly condemned to banishment or death, merely for having born offices. This decree the people in most places put in execution, so that discord, slaughter, and confusion, was effectually spread all about. The Megalopolitans only had wit enough to avoid these dissentions, and the magistrates and people agreeing, they retained their old government, and dwelt in peace. This was high treason in the sight of Polyperchon; he said they had contravened his edict, that they were associates with Cassander, and that for these reasons they ought to be made a public example of as common enemies to the Greeks. When the Megalopolitans heard this, they withdrew all their effects out of the country, fortified their city, and having mustered their fighting men, found their number to be fifteen thousand; and confiding in their own strength, determined to abide a siege. Polyperchon, to make good his threats, came with the king and all his army before the city, having with him also a great number of elephants. The first thing he did was to cause the wall to be undermined, which his engineers performed so effectually, that when the besieged least expected it, three towers with all the wall between them fell down. Polyperchon then led his army to the assault, which proved very obstinate and bloody; but in the end the Megalopolitans repulsed the besiegers, and while their men were fighting, the women and children threw up an intrenchment of earth and rubbish within the breach. Polyperchon determined to attack the place a second time, and to make use of his elephants, the news of which terrified the citizens exceedingly. It happened there was amongst them one Damides, who had served under Alexander; this man undertook for the elephants, which put his countrymen again in heart. The method he used was this ; he took broad pieces of strong plank, into each of which he struck several iron spikes, these he fixed in the ground within the breach, and covered them lightly with rubbish ; then he drew up the citizens, not in front, but in flank on each side of the breach, and so attended the enemy. Polyperchon's troops advanced in excellent order, having the elephants before them ; these being forced by their riders upon the breach, stuck their feet upon the spikes, and were unable to proceed further. The citizens galling them and their riders with stones and darts, many of the beasts fell down, and the rest, growing unruly, turned upon their own men, and trod them under foot. The army seeing this refused to storm the place, so that Polyperchon, leaving a corps of horse and foot to block up the city, marched away with much disgrace. In the interim, Clytus the admiral had beat Nicanor, whom Cassander had sent from Athens with his fleet ; but after this, lying carelessly at Byzantium, Antigonus privately sent over light-armed troops in barks, and then having refitted Nicanor's fleet, commanded him to attack Clytus again, and be assured of victory. This he accordingly did, and, to his great surprize, found him already attacked from the shore, so that he easily and intirely defeated them, Clytus himself being killed, not in the fight indeed, but afterwards by the soldiers of Lyfimachus. When this news came to Polyperchon, he resolved to march back into Macedon, for he saw clearly that Cassander would be too many for him in Greece <sup>2</sup>.

† DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in Phocion.

Nicanor
slain by
Cassander.

Nicanor, after the great victory he had obtained, returned to Athens in triumph, and resumed his government : Soon after the Athenians were reconciled to Cassander, who greatly esteemed Nicanor for the service he had done him. But when he was privately informed that he intended to set up for himself, and saw that he made a difficulty of admitting him into the forts, he posted some soldiers in an empty house in the night, and having invited Nicanor thither to confer with him, surprized and put him to death. Cassander then treated the Athenians with much candor and generosity : He appointed Demetrius the Phalcrean, a person of the highest quality, the greatest abilities, and the utmost moderation, their governor ; under whom the city and citizens received greater advantages than under any former government before, or even in the days of their greatest freedom. This important place secured, Cassander applied himself to the settling the rest of Greece <sup>3</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. & PLUT. ubi supra.

<sup>3</sup> Universal History, Vol. VI. p. 264 DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

ABOUT this time Olympias prepared for her return into Olympias Macedonia, concerning which, as we have elsewhere observ- returns to ed, she wrote to Eumenes. He in his answer advised her in Macedon, the first place not to be too hasty in her resolution, and in and acts the next to forget all the injuries she had received, and to with the behave herself mildly to every body, in case she thought fit to utmost return. Both these cautions she neglected; for, without cruelty.
waiting till the war was ended, she with some Epirots, whom her brother sent to escort her, went to join Polyperchon, when she knew he was returning into Macedon; and as soon as she came there, she discovered such a haughty and overbearing spirit, as struck even those who wished her well with amazement. As for Eurydice the wife of Philip, she rightly conceived that Olympias would never be at peace, as long as her husband lived and enjoyed the regal title. She therefore wrote to Cassander, beseeching him with all diligence to come to her assistance, and likewise sent letters to Polyper- chon, requiring him in the king's name to deliver up the army to Cassander. At the same time she neglected not taking more effectual methods for the security of her own and king Philip's person. She had observed, that the Macedonians loved him, and that they had a great respect for her. She likewise depended on the interest of Antipater's family, and therefore she had recourse to all the arts of persuasion, in order to raise a force sufficient to defend herself and her friends, till Cassander should arrive. This point, as she imagined, she accomplished with great ease. The Macedonians readily armed at her request, and in a very small space she drew together more than seemed sufficient to guard her. When therefore Olympias advanced with Polyperchon and his army, she, like a courageous lady, led out her's. Thus a civil war was kindled in Macedon by two heroines, each willing to put her own and the kingdom's fate on the hazard of a battle. But when the armies drew near each other, the soldiers, who should have fought for Eurydice, struck with the awful majesty of Olympias, the widow of Philip and the mother of Alexander, went over to her immediately, and thereby put an end to the dispute. Olympias had it now in her power to have settled all things, if she had remembered the advice of Eumenes. Her passions, which were not of the mildest sort, had always governed her, and governed her now. King Philip and his wife Eurydice she imprisoned in a room so small, that they could scarce turn themselves in it, and caused them to be fed with very ordinary provisions through a hole. Nicanor the son of Antipater she put to death, and with him no less than an hundred persons, his relations and friends; she then caused
the

the tomb of his brother Iollas to be broke open, and his remains to be thrown into the public street. Perceiving that the people were not over pleased with these proceedings, and that they began to commiserate the condition of king Philip and his wife, she resolved to have them both dispatched. In order to this, certain Thracians armed with poignards entered the place of their confinement, and with numberless wounds laid the king dead upon the floor. Then a messenger presented Eurydice with a dagger, a rope, and a cup of poison, telling her, that Olympias left it to her choice by which she would die; I pray the gods, said she, that Olympias may have the like present made her; she then tore her linen, bound up the bleeding wounds of her husband, and covered his body; after which, without any womanish complaining, she strangled herself with her own garter. Thus, when he had reigned about seven years, Aridæus lost his life through her who in his childhood had deprived him of his wits; and Eurydice, the hereditary heiress of the Macedonian crown, was murdered by her who was mother to the murderer of her father. In the days of Philip this sort of policy was not understood: He married his own daughter to Amyntas his elder brother's son, and from this match sprung Eurydice. Alexander, to leave all safe behind him when he went into Asia, caused Amyntas to be murdered, and Perdiccas began his regency with the murder of Cynane the wife of Amyntas. However, Roxana and her young son Alexander found a protectress in Olympias, who took upon herself the administration as guardian to her grand-child <sup>b</sup>.

Under his influence
...

Cassander, as soon as he received the letters of Eurydice, and immediately after them the ill news of what had happened in Macedon, prepared instantly for his return into his own country, leaving the Greeks for a time to take care of themselves. When he came to the streights of Thermopylæ, he found the Thessalians all in arms to oppose his passage. Revenge being more powerful with him than glory, he contrived not how to fight the enemy, but how to escape them; wherefore collecting all the ships, barks, and boats, which were to be found in the neighbouring cities, he imbarqued his forces on board them, and safely transported them into Thessaly. Thence marching into Macedonia, he determined to leave half his forces under the command of Callas, to hold Polyperchon in play, while himself pursued and shut up Olympias. His design succeeded perfectly well, for Callas effectually baffled Polyperchon, and Olympias with strange imprudence shut up herself. For she, after all her cruelties, relied entirely on the love of the Macedonians, and, having once prevailed by the majesty of her appearance, was more sollicitous about forming a court than an army, of which, however, she had some appearance, and also the elephants with her. Going in progress to the principal cities, she carried with her her daughter Roxana, her grandson Alexander, her niece Deidamia, Thesalonica the sister of Alexander, and many other persons of great quality, with whom, on the news of Cassander's approach, she shut herself up in the city of Pydna, a sea-port strongly fortified. Cassander quickly appeared before the place, and invested it by land, at the same time that he shut up the port by sea. The besieged were very soon in want of provisions, yet, encouraged by the presence of so many great personages, they held out obstinately; Olympias assuring them, that her brother Æacidas was coming out of Epirus with a great army to her assistance, which was true. Cassander had advice thereof as early as she, and he provided very effectually against it. He sent troops to block up the passages from Epirus, which when the troops of king Æacidas found, they began to doubt the success of the war, and, which was more, their own safety. They therefore resolved on a course, which to them appeared short and salutary; they mutinied, deposed their king, and submitted themselves to Cassander. Olympias had now none to depend on but Polysperchon; out of whose power Callas had put it to render her much assistance; for, by throwing about manifestoes, reflecting on the cruelty of her administration, he had debauched the greatest part of Polysperchon's soldiers; so that, instead of being able to succour his mistress, he had much ado to defend himself. In the city of Pydna the court fed on horse-flesh, the soldiers on their dead companions, and the elephants on saw-dust. In this miserable situation numbers deserted to Cassander, who treated all with lenity who were not concerned in the late murders. Olympias at last wrote to Polysperchon, requesting him to send her a bark of fifty oars to convey her away in the night. The bearer of this letter fell into the hands of Cassander, who commanded him to proceed in his journey, and not to mention his being taken. At the time appointed Polysperchon sent the galley, and gave notice of it to Olympias; but Cassander, knowing also when it would arrive, seized it. Olympias not finding the vessel as she expected, gave up all hopes, and, without waiting any longer, surrendered the place and her person to Cassander. This determined the fate of Macedonia; for Pella the capital presently surrendered; and Aristonus, who with a body of troops lay in Amphipolis, at the command of Olympias, yielded the city to Cassander, and

<sup>b</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. xiv. c. 5.

and was immediately afterwards killed by some whom he had injured while he commanded there. Now it was that the last scene of the old queen's life came on : She was accused before the assembly of the Macedonians by the relations of the persons she had slain, and, without being heard in her defence, was condemned to die. Cassander upon this sent to advise her to make her escape to Athens, offering her a ship and equipage safely to transport her thither ; but she refused to fly ; and said, she was ready to answer before the Macedonians for all she had done. Cassander did not care to trust to this, so he sent a band of two hundred soldiers to put her to death. These, when they came into her presence, drew back, and were afraid to execute their orders ; but the kindred of those she had murdered being with them, fell upon her, and cut her throat. She died with great resolution ; but it is said, that Cassander suffered her body to lie some time above ground, probably to revenge the injury she had offered to the ashes of his brother. It is likewise alledged, that he did not advise her to fly out of pity, but that he might have an opportunity of putting her to death as a person self-condemned, who fled from justice. Immediately after her decease, he sent Roxana and her son Alexander to Amphipolis, where they were made prisoners ; he likewise deprived the boy of his companions who had been bred up with him, and ordered that for the future he should be treated as a private person. Thus the line of Alexander was set aside in Macedon, and his son and his successor imprisoned in the very city where his army rendezvoused, when he marched to conquer Asia c.

Cassander
assumes the govern- ment in
Macedon.

Cassander having now provided for his safety, turned all his thoughts to the settlement of the kingdom. In the first place, he married Theffalonica the daughter of Philip of Macedon, who had fallen into his hands at the surrender of Pydna. He next caused the bodies of Philip and Eurydice, together with that of Cynane her mother, to be taken up ; and having conveyed them with mighty pomp to Ægis, he caused them there to be interred in the royal sepulchres, instituting funeral games in honour of the dead. He then built a new city in Pallene, which he called by his own name, Cassandria, and peopled it from the Chersonese ; inviting also the remnant of the Olynthians to settle therein, adding to this place so large and fair a territory, that it quickly grew to be the greatest city in Macedonia ; he also re-edified many cities, and shewed evidently a disposition to restore peace and plenty to his native country. Epirus he governed by Lyciscus his lieutenant, which was the more extraordinary, because from the days of Pyrrhus to this time the government had been hereditary, and the Epirots had never presumed to treat their kings with contempt. As to Æacidæ, he fled to Polyperchon, and with him, when things were grown desperate in Macedon, retired into Greece; and at length to the Ætolians, the implacable enemies of all Antipater's family <sup>d</sup>.

c DIONOR. SIC. ubi supra PLUT. in vit Demet JUSTIN ubi supra.

Cassander, when he had tolerably settled the peace of Ma- Returns
cedon, resolved to return into Greece, in order to drive thence into Polyperchon, his son Alexander, and the rest of his enemies. Greece.
This resolution once taken, he raised a fine army, and therewith marched down into Thessaly, where he found the Pylæ shut up by the Ætolians. However, he forced the pass, and came down with his forces into Bæotia, and proceeded to the ruins of Thebes. The sight of them put him in mind of the power and splendor of that antient city, and these thoughts easily led him to the project of restoring it. With this view he recalled all the Thebans who were scattered throughout Greece: He requested also the rest of the Bæotians to assist him in so good a work, which not only they, but all the cities of Greece, readily did, so that in a short space the walls were finished, and the principal streets rebuilt. The sight of this inspired the Thebans with such zeal, that they sent into all countries to recall their friends and relations. Thus, after more than twenty years, Thebes, which had been with great cruelty razed by the Macedonians, was now rebuilt by them. This design executed, Cassander passed on to Pelopon- nesus, out of which Alexander vainly thought to have shut him by a wall built cross the isthmus. But Cassander transported his army in flat-bottomed boats, and partly by force, partly by treaty, reduced most of the cities, and having left a body of troops under the command of Molychus to guard the isthmus, he returned back into Macedon.

THE power of Antigonus was about this time become for- Where An- midable to all the successors of Alexander, wherefore they, as tigonus in their own defence, united, in order to reduce his power; stirs up a but as all of them in their turns had been under great obliga- war a tions to him, they sent their ambassadors to compliment him gainst him.
on his subduing of Eumenes, and to expostulate with him on their grievances. Antigonus heard the rest with some patience;
but when the minister of Cassander came to make his demands, he thundered out an answer, As for Lyfimechus and Ptolemy, said he, they were always persons eminently distinguished; let

<sup>d</sup> DIODOR. PLUT & JUST. ubi supra.

who is Cassander? it cannot surely be that vagabond, who was here t'other day imploring my assistance, on account of the love I bore his father? He then assembled his army, and approaching the Macedonian phalanx, entered into a detail of Cassander's late proceedings: He has, says he, countrymen, murdered the mother of our late sovereign, and at this time holds in prison his wife and son; let him therefore be decreed a public enemy, unless he restores them to liberty, and leave it to me to prosecute this traitor as he deserves. The army to be sure decreed as Antigonus directed, and, in consequence of their decree, he immediately solicited the Greek cities to drive out Cassander's garisons; to perform which, they did not want so much the will, as the power. However, such troubles were now stirred up in Peloponnesus as made Cassander's presence absolutely necessary; whereupon, leaving Macedonia after another brush with the Ætolians, Cassander came first into Bœotia, and afterwards to the isthmus, then entering Peloponnesus, he resettled his affairs as well as he could. Alexander the son of Polysperchon had for some time taken shelter in the court of Antigonus, where he had fair words and a tolerable subsistence given him, and that was all. But now Antigonus found out that his case was the hardest, and at the same time the most equitable, in the world; and therefore, out of mere regard to justice, he furnished him with five hundred talents, and sent him with some ships and men into Peloponnesus, where he quickly raised forces, and began to make a figure. Cassander knowing well the capacity of the man, and verily believing he had enemies enow already, sent Perpilus to tell him, that Antigonus had an excellent faculty at setting people together by the ears, without caring what became of them afterwards; that five hundred talents was a considerable sum, which he would do well to keep in his pocket; that as for the command of Peloponnesus, he need not seek it by force, for Cassander was willing to put it into his hands, provided he would renounce his league with Antigonus, who never intended him half so much good. Alexander, having considered this proposition, found it too good to be rejected; wherefore he accepted from Cassander the office of captain general of Peloponnesus; quitted the party of Antigonus, and began to settle his province; which, however, he did not live to effect, for while he was endeavouring to suppress Aristodemus, whom Antigonus had made general in his stead, one Alexion, a Sicyonian, treacherously murdered him. His wife Cratesipolis took upon her the command of his army, and having beaten the Sicyonians in a field battle, besieged and took their city, crucified thirty of the most turbulent upon their their own walls and then assumed the sovereignty, which she managed with great prudence, clemency, and justice, being alike courted and feared by all the contending parties. Thus something like a settlement was established in Peloponnesus<sup>e</sup>.

Cassander, observing that the Ætolians were always inclined to take advantage of his affairs, by attacking him at such time as he had other enemies on his hands, resolved to make use of the leisure he now had, to put it out of the power of these people to treat him in this manner for the future. With this view he marched with an army to the confines of Ætolia, yet with no great success, for the Ætolians were so well aware of his intention, that they provided effectually for their own security, so as to prevent his making any impression upon them; yet Cassander, who was a person of great capacity, resolved not to lose all the pains he had taken; when therefore he discovered that the Ætolians could not be reduced by force, he contrived to leave a bridle in their mouths, which should hinder their performing any great exploits for the future. With this view he entered into a negociation with their old enemies the Acarnanians, whom he took pains to convince, that the disadvantages they were under arose from their living in so many scattered towns, whereby the Ætolians had constant opportunities of despoiling them, and by which argument he persuaded them to enlarge the three cities of Stratopolis, Saurion, and Agrinium, and to quit their villages. Then leaving his general Lyciscus in those parts, he marched away to reduce other places<sup>f</sup>.

Glaucias was at this time king of the Illyrians, in whom were united two very different qualities, ambition and the love of justice. When his neighbour Æacidas king of Epirus was banished by his subjects, this prince took upon him to preserve his infant son Pyrrhus, without any other view than that of performing a generous action. This immediately embroiled him with Cassander, and in consequence of these broils, Glaucias drew the cities of Apollonia and Epidamnum into alliance with him. Against these cities at this time Cassander moved, and in a short space reduced them, after which he passed the river Hebrus, and fought the Illyrian army under the command of Glaucias, which had been raised for the relief of the before-mentioned cities. After this engagement peace was made between these princes upon these terms, that Cassander should not invade any part of Illyria, and that Glaucias should neither attack him or any of his confederates. But while the Macedonian was victorious here, his allies the wards on the Illyri-ans.

After-

<sup>e</sup> Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. <sup>f</sup> Id. ibid.

M. A. 2.

M. A. 2. 1. 1.

Acaruanians suffered deeply for taking his advice, for the Ætolians, before it was thoroughly fortified, invested the city of Agrinium, and then proceeded to a formal siege. The besieged, finding that they were not able to hold out, capitulated on these terms ; that they should be at liberty to retire where-ever they thought fit. But, in breach of this capitulation, the Ætolians most perfidiously attacked them upon their march, and put almost every man of them to the sword. A cruel and unjustifiable act, for which they afterwards paid very dear<sup>g</sup>.

Cassander
invades
Asia.

ON his return into Macedonia, Cassander projected a descent in Asia, in order to prevent Antigonus from making any attempts in Greece. These forces marched into Caria, where one Ptolemy commanded for Antigonus. It so happened, that while the troops were in winter quarters, the father of this Ptolemy died, at which his son seemed to be under deep concern ; and, in order to express it effectually, prepared for his funeral, that it might be celebrated with the utmost magnificence. Cassander's generals being informed of this immediately detached Eupolemus, one of their number, with eight thousand foot and two thousand horse, to lie in ambuscade, in order to cut off Ptolemy when he should return to his quarters ; but he receiving early intelligence of this design, not only prevented it, but also turned it upon the contrivers : For returning when they least expected it, he in the middle of the night surprized the forces of Eupolemus, defeated them intirely, and made that general himself prisoner<sup>h</sup>.

Falls also on the Ætolians.

THE next year Cassander sent a puissant army under the command of Philip to fall upon the Ætolians. This general entered Acaruania, and, having effectually succoured his allies, began to harass the frontiers of Ætolia, when on a sudden he received advice, that Æacidus had not only entered Epirus, but by the consent of the people had re-ascended the throne. Philip upon this immediately entered Epirus, and finding Æacidus there at the head of an army, he attacked and defeated him, taking prisoners fifty of the principal persons who had been concerned in the restoration of the king, whom he sent away to Cassander, and then turned again to prosecute the war against the Ætolians, who were by this time ready to meet him in the field ; for Æacidus himself with the remains of his broken troops had joined their army, and had thereby made it more numerous than that of Philip. A battle shortly ensued, wherein the Macedonians were victors, Æacidus king of Epirus being slain. Afterwards Philip so persecuted the Ætolians, that they were forced to forsake their cities, and fly for refuge to the mountains, whither also he pursued them, till he was stopped by the severity of the season. In Asia things went not so well, whereupon Cassander resolved to put an end to the war on that side, and by a treaty with Antigonus undertook to restore the Greek cities their liberty, and for the future to be his fast friend; for his sincere performance of which, he gave up his brother Agathonas for a hostage; however, he quickly repented of this treaty, and having taken care to get his brother rescued from those who should have kept him, he began the war afresh; which exceedingly provoked Antigonus, who sent an army into Greece to restore freedom unto the cities. This compelled Cassander to march thither also, whereupon Antigonus made a quick march into Propontis, with a design to have invaded Macedon. This effectually recalled Cassander, who marched back with all imaginable expedition. This retreat of his out of Greece hurt his affairs there, and at the same time did him no good in Macedon. For Antigonus, finding it impossible for him to persuade the Byzantines to concur with him in his designs, he was constrained to abandon all thoughts of entering the territories of Cassander. He received, however, little pleasure from this news; for upon the heels of it he received advice, that the country about Apollonia and Epidamnus had submitted again to Glaucias, and that the Epirots were inclined to revolt, to which were added advices of a like nature from Athens, where, though the people had never been so well governed as by Demetrius Phalereus, yet they hated him for the sake of his authority, and were inclined to deliver up the city to Antigonus. To these evils Cassander applied the best remedies the situation of his affairs would allow<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>g</sup> JUSTIN. lib. xv. c. i. DIODOR. ubi supra.

<sup>h</sup> Id. ibid.

It was not long before Epirus was all in confusion. Alce-Cassander tas, who had been banished by his father, was recalled by the orders people, and made king. Against him Lysiscus, Cassander's Roxana general, marched with his army, and engaged his forces several times with different success. At length Cassander himself came in to make an end of the war, which finding more difficult than he had imagined, he clapped up a peace with Alcetas, and left him in quiet possession of his kingdom, which, however, he enjoyed not long; for the Epirots, conceiving him to rule tyrannically, murdered him and his children. All this time Cassander was engaged in a war with Glaucias, in which, however, he had very indifferent success; and at last, finding that he could not reduce Apollonia and Epidamnus, he returned into Macedon, where he did abundance of popular acts, and took all imaginable pains to conciliate the minds of the people. By this time all the commanders of Alexander were grown weary of the wars in which they had engaged with each other, and therefore unanimously desiring peace, it was easily concluded. The terms of it were, that they should hold all the provinces, of which at the time of its conclusion each of them was possessed, in propriety ; that the Greek cities should be left absolutely free, and that they should be friends and allies of each other. Immediately upon this peace Cassander resolved with himself to dispatch out of his way Alexander the son of Roxana and his mother ; for though he enjoyed the kingdom of Macedon at that time, as much as he could expect to do after the young man was dead, yet he was in continual fear, lest the Macedonians, who were a restless unruly people, should on a sudden grow dissatisfied with his government, and set at liberty the son of his master. While these doubts and fears distracted his mind, the Macedonians discovered an inclination to do what he suspected ; discouraging openly of Cassander's usurpation, and alledging, that it was now high time for Alexander to take upon himself the administration of his father's kingdom. This was enough to hurry on the ambitious Cassander to the fatal expedient he had projected. He therefore sent for Glaucias, whom he had made governor of the castle; where he kept Roxana and her son, and directed him to put them both to death, commanding also, that they should be interred privately, and their deaths for some time concealed. This he did to try the temper of the Macedonians; and that uncertain reports might keep them from taking any settled resolution. His policy met with all the success he could desire, and much more than he could reasonably hope. The Macedonians murmured a little, but, not knowing who they should have recourse to for a chief, durst not rebel<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Id. ibid.

Cassander gains Peloponnesus. Cassander, that he might find the subjects some other topics than his government to discourse of, engaged in a war against the Autariates, in favour of the king of Pæonia. Having subdued the first-mentioned people, he transplanted them to the number of twenty thousand from their native country into the neighbourhood of mount Orbelus, where he assigned them lands. About this time Ptolemy, one of the generals of Antigonus, who commanded in Peloponnesus, went over with his whole army to Cassander, and received from him the same commission which he had from his former master. This was a most extraordinary piece of treachery, for Ptolemy, was not only the officer of Antigonus, but his nephew, so that he violated at once the ties of gratitude and nature. However, his treason did not remain long unpunished: Ptolemy king of Egypt coming with a fleet upon the coast, sent for this other Ptolemy to come and visit him. On his arrival the king treated him not only with civility, but with kindness and respect. This he repaid with endeavouring to corrupt the soldiers Ptolemy had with him; his head being full of mighty projects for his own interest, to accomplish which he resolved to stick at nothing. When the king found this out, he first caused him to be imprisoned, and afterwards ordered him to be dispatched by a dose of hemlock; which, whatever he might pretend, Cassander was glad of; for he could never trust a man who had betrayed his uncle, and had endeavoured to seduce the troops of a prince who had received him like a friend. But without question, he was sorry that king Ptolemy had incorporated the army, which the other Ptolemy had commanded, into his own, because this was a loss, which fell heavy upon himself, and not easily to be repaired. His thoughts, however, were quickly diverted by the appearance of another storm<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xix. JUSTIN. ubi supra. PLUT. in Demetrio.

Polysperchon, who had hitherto lived in Ætolia, rather as a banished man, than as one who pretended to the government of Macedon, of a sudden appeared more formidable than ever. He had engaged Barsina and her son Hercules to leave Asia and come over to Greece; where he received them with great honours, proclaimed Hercules king, and by the help of the Ætolians raised money, and an army of twenty thousand men. Cassander assembled an army as soon as he received the news, and marched away to meet the enemy. When the armies were near each other on the frontiers of Ætolia, Cassander sent one of his private agents to Polysperchon to put him in mind, that if the king was restored, himself would be but a servant, though to him he owed his restoration; whereas, if he put him out of the way, he should be declared generalissimo of Peloponnesus, and be acknowledged by Cassander for his coadjutor. These promises had the same effect upon Polysperchon, as they had formerly on his son; he therefore accepted them, and at an entertainment, to which he invited, and afterwards forced, the king to come, most barbarously murdered him. This being performed,

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra.

Cassander, according to his promise, delivered him four thousand Macedonian foot and five hundred horse; owned him for his coadjutor, and left him to take possession of Peloponnesus, which, however, was not so easily effected as he imagined; for the Bæotians, joining with the Peloponnesians, raised a formidable army, so that he was after all forced to winter in Phocis; from this time forward, knowing nothing but trouble and disquiet, the just reward of his flagitious actions <sup>m</sup>.

Cassander
after much ill fortune recovers
Greece.

Cassander, having now removed out of his way all obstacles, well hoped that he should enjoy the kingdom, he had bought at so dear a price, in peace; but in this he was exceedingly mistaken, for the Grecians immediately began to plot against him, and knowing that it was Antigonus's interest rather to have them free than the subjects of Cassander, they applied to him for assistance. This occasioned the famous expedition of Demetrius, which we have so often mentioned, wherein he expelled Demetrius the Phalerean; in shew restored the Grecians to liberty, but in truth reduced them under the subjection of his father. Extravagant were the honours paid by the Athenians to the victor, and as extravagant the rage they expressed against Cassander and his party; that great captain and politician withdrew from a country where he was so generally hated, and chose rather to trust time, than fortune and his enemies; and when he found disasters still crowding upon him, he contented himself with leaving garisons in the cities he still possessed, and withdrew the gross of his army into Macedon. After the check which Demetrius received before Rhodes, the Athenians deserted him, and affected to resume their antient grandeur, pretending for the future to prescribe laws, instead of receiving them. Not long after Demetrius came again into Greece, and having taken Sicyon from Ptolemy, and the strong castle of Corinth from Cassander, the rest of the cities surrendered without resistance, and their garisons were immediately incorporated into the army of Antigonus. In this distress Cassander, conceiving himself to be in the utmost danger of ruin, resolved, if it were possible, to make peace with Antigonus, and to that end dispatched ambassadors to Demetrius, as also to his father, but in vain. These princes were so elate on account of the victories they had lately obtained, that they would not listen to any terms of accommodation, but proudly insisted on Cassander's submitting himself and his dominions intirely to their pleasure. He, when he found peace was not to be had, determined to make his last effort in war. To this end he sent ministers to Ptolemy and Lyfimachus, instructing them to shew those princes, that if once Macedonia fell into the hands of Antigonus, they might be sure Thrace and Egypt would quickly follow. For he would be then able to act against them on all sides; and to the force of all Asia would add the weight of all Greece. This had its desired effect, they came immediately into the war, and resolved to act offensively against Antigonus<sup>n</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> DIODOR. ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. xv. PLUT. de Verecund.

WHEN the operations of this war came to be considered, Cassander, who knew his stake would be the first drawn, laid down such a scheme as all the rest came readily into. He sent a considerable part of his forces to join Lyfimachus, under whose command they were to pass into Asia, whither Cassander had transported another corps under the command of Perpelaus. With the rest of his army Cassander marched in person towards Thessaly, in order, if possible, to resettle his affairs in Greece. Demetrius immediately marched to meet him, and the armies encamped in sight of each other; that of Demetrius consisted of fifteen hundred horse, eight thousand Macedonian foot, five and twenty thousand auxiliary foot, fifteen thousand mercenaries, and about eight thousand retainers to the camp who were, however, disposed into battalions; in all fifty six thousand men. Cassander had but two thousand horse and twenty nine thousand foot: With these he kept the field, protected most of his garisons, and held the war in suspense, till such time as Antigonus sent orders to his son to come speedily over into Asia; whereupon a provisional treaty was made by Demetrius with Cassander, which was to subsist or to be made void, according as it was approved or disapproved by Antigonus. However, it answered the ends of both; for Demetrius had thereby an opportunity given him of withdrawing all his forces out of Greece, and after he was gone, Cassander, notwithstanding the treaty, by force, by persuasion, and by bribes, got possession of many of the cities. Yet he did not so closely attend his own business, but that he kept his eye also on the concerns of his confederates. To their assistance Cassander sent his brother Plistarchus with twelve thousand men, in order to ballance in some measure the forces carried over by Demetrius to his father. His policy was good, as in most cases it was; but

The war ended.
Year of the Flood, 2698.
Before Christ, 301.

<sup>n</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xx. PLUT. in Demetrio.

Plistarchus had very ill success, for his army being wasted by famine, sickness, hardships, shipwrecks, and desertions, he at last, with a handful of men, joined Lyfimachus, who, with the mighty forces brought by Seleucus, was grown strong enough to offer Antigonus and Demetrius battle; which shortly after ensued, and was the famous battle of Ipsus, where Antigonus lost his life and empire.

The death
of Cassan-
der.

Year of
the Flood,
2702.

Before
Christ,
297.

ON the death of Antigonus, the princes confederated against him divided his dominions amongst them, whereby Cassander recovered all that he had lately lost; however, he was not intirely freed from all apprehensions; for on the one hand, Demetrius the son of Antigonus had still some territories in Greece, and was a prince who never conceived his title at all affected by the impressions made by force on his possessions. The hopes of Demetrius therefore filled Cassander with fears: On the other hand, Cassander had a nearer enemy, of whose power he was very justly jealous; this was Pyrrhus king of Epirus, whom he had hated, and persecuted from his very cradle. This prince, then a little helpless infant, was at the time the Epirots revolted from his father, who would have led them into Macedonia to the relief of Olympias, conveyed with much difficulty into the dominions of Glaucias king of Illyria; that king was not a little confounded at this accident; pity moved him for the child, but he was afraid of incurring the hate of Cassander. Those who had the care of little Pyrrhus, perceiving the confusion the king was in, laid the boy at his feet. The child getting hold of the king's robes raised himself up upon his feet, and with his hands grasped the king's knees. Upon which, Glaucias taking him in his arms professed, that he would defend him at the hazard of his life and his dominions; and then delivered him to his queen to be educated with his own children. This was the source of Cassander's quarrel with Glaucias, against whom, as often as his affairs permitted, he employed force; and when he was constrained to turn his arms another way, he practised on him by negotiation, offering him two hundred talents, besides other great advantages, if he would deliver the young Pyrrhus into his hands. But Glaucias could neither be beaten nor flattered into so base a design; but when he was twelve years old, restored Pyrrhus by an army to the possession of the throne of his ancestors. From thence about five years afterwards, he was driven by his rebellious subjects. He then fled to Demetrius, who had married his sister Deidamia, and was in point of interest the irreconcilable enemy of Cassander. After the battle of Ipsus, he came over into Greece, and performed formed many great exploits in favour of his brother-in-law ; when his subjects growing weary of a sudden of Neoptolemus, a king of their own setting up, recalled and restored him ; when, to prevent further disputes, he associated Neoptolemus with him in the kingdom ; but afterwards slew him for having framed a conspiracy to poison him °. This Pyrrhus, though ill at ease in his own kingdom, Cassander was mightily afraid of ; however, he strengthened the frontiers of his own dominions, re-edified such cities as were run to decay, and built new ones, where the situation of places invited. Thus near Therma he raised the noble city of Theſſalonica, which he so called in honour of his wife, and which after became the most considerable place in Macedon. He likewise endeavoured by all other means to fix the love of his subjects to his family, being with very just reason afraid of the inconstancy of the Macedonians. But while he was thus employed, he was seized with a dropſy, which brought him by slow degrees to his end ; and some say, that at last his body, as it corrupted, breeding lice, he became alike offensive to himself, and to all who were obliged to approach him. His death happened after he had held the government of Macedon nineteen years ; and had ruled it three years with the title of king, which he received readily from others, but took not himself ; he was a man of consummate prudence in peace and in war, but of detestable ambition. He is said to have hated Alexander personally ; to have remembered him with fear and spight, and to have suffered his malice against him to instigate the utter extirpation of his family (C). By Theſſalonica, the daughter

° PLUT. in Demet. & in Pyrrho.

(C) We learn from Plutarch the following circumstances as to the hatred which Cassander bore Alexander, and the causes thereof. It happened, when Cassander was just arrived from Greece, and was full of that freedom in which he had been educated, the first time he saw the Barbarians adore the king, he was surprised at the novelty of the thing, and could not forbear laughing out aloud at it ; which so incensed Alexander, that he took him by the hair with both hands, and violently knocked his head against the wall. Another time Cassander would have said something in defence of Antipater to those who accused him ; but Alexander interrupting him, What is it you say ? Do you think people, if they have received no injury, would come such a journey only to calumniate your father ? To which when Cassander replied, That this very thing was a great evidence of their calumny, for the farther they are come the farther they are got from those proofs that could confute them, and clear the innocent.

X x 2

Alexander

daughter of Philip of Macedon, he had three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander; the eldest of these, viz. Philip, succeeded him, but died shortly after of a consumption, whereby a way was opened to a long and fatal controversy about the kingdom <sup>P</sup>.

Antipater
and Alexander kings of Macedon.

Antipater, on the demise of his brother Philip, caused himself to be declared king; but herein he found himself opposed by his brother Alexander, who was supported in his pretensions by some of the Macedonian lords, and secretly, as Antipater conceived, by the queen his mother. The first step therefore that he took, to secure himself against Alexander was, to take away the life of Thessalonica, which, if he did not with his own hands, he permitted to be done in his presence, though she besought him, by the breasts that had given him suck, to spare her. A fact beyond all example cruel. After this, by the assistance of Lyfimachus his father-in-law, he for some time maintained himself in the possession of the kingdom. But Alexander, persisting in the competition, and vehemently desiring to revenge his mother's death, invited Pyrrhus king of Epirus, and also Demetrius the son of Antigonos, to his assistance. Pyrrhus came first with a potent army, and did him such service, that for it he demanded and received all the maritime coast of Macedonia, together with Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. He then applied himself to conquer the rest of the kingdom, that Alexander might have no occasion to repent of his bargain; upon which Antipater and his wife Eurydice strongly solicited Lyfimachus to assist them. His affairs were at that time in such disorder, that he could not in prudence spare any part of his forces; however, knowing that Ptolemy had a mighty influence over Pyrrhus, and that his requests had the force of laws, he forged a letter from him to Pyrrhus, desiring him, on the pay-

<sup>P</sup> JUSTIN. lib. xv. PLUT. in Demet.

Alexander smiled at this, and said, Those are some of Aristotle's sophisms which will serve equally on both sides; but, added he, both you and your father shall be severely punished, if it appears that the complainants have received the least injustice at your hands. This menace made such a deep impression of fear on Cassander's mind, that long after, when he was king of Macedonia and master of all Greece, as he was walking one day at Delpbi, and looking on the statues, at the sight of that of Alexander, he was suddenly struck with horror, and shook all over, his eyes rolled, his head grew dizzy, and he had much ado to recover himself (6).

(6) Plutarch. in vit. Alexand.

ment

ment of three hundred talents, to leave Antipater half the kingdom. This deceit Pyrrhus easily detected ; for whereas Ptolemy was wont to address his letters thus : The father to the son greeting, this letter ran, king Ptolemy to king Pyrrhus health ; however, it did the business as well as if it had been a true letter, for he, perceiving that money might be had, struck up an agreement between the two brothers, to which, however, he would not swear, because one of the three victims died as it was led to the altar at the time of the performance of this solemnity ; whence the soothsayer predicted, that one of the kings would shortly die. Immediately after this agreement, whereby two kings seemed to be established in Macedon, Demetrius arrived on its frontiers, in order to have assisted Alexander. The young prince, knowing how largely he had paid Pyrrhus, was afraid of having more protectors upon his hands ; wherefore he passed away to meet Demetrius, in order to inform him of what had happened, and to decline his aid, which he no longer wanted. In the former chapter we have shewn the issue of this business, how Alexander was slain, and how Demetrius gained the kingdom. Here, however, it may not be amiss to observe, that it is in a manner impossible to know the truth as to Alexander's death ; that is, whether Demetrius slew him on account of his having conspired against himself, or whether he invented that story to colour the murder of the young king. The authority of Plutarch is on all sides of the question in the life of Demetrius ; he affirms, that Alexander intended to have slain him, and that he prevented it by a day ; in another place he, in general terms, relates this accident as an act of treachery in Demetrius <sup>9</sup> ; yet elsewhere, he particularly ascribes the death of Alexander to his modesty, in not refusing to visit Demetrius when he invited him, for fear he should seem to distrust him<sup>r</sup>. However it was, Alexander was slain, and Demetrius with his forces and his own compelled Antipater to leave him sole master of the kingdom, who thereupon fled to the court of his father-in-law Lyfimachus, hoping by his assistance to be restored. But there were two reasons why Lyfimachus, if he had been better inclined to him than he was, could not have yielded him any great help. The first, that he was engaged in foreign wars : The second, that there were great dissensions in his family. To this we may add, that he was afraid of uniting Demetrius and Pyrrhus ; whereas he well hoped, that if they were left to themselves, they would quickly fall out, which he intimated to his son-in-law, <sup>9</sup> PLUTARCH, in vita Pyrrh.

De Verecund.

and

and exhorted him to be patient. Antipater and Eurydice, however, could not comprehend the force of this reasoning, and therefore they clamoured loudly against what they called his neglect of his children. Lyfimachus, who was a fierce and arbitrary prince, thought fit thereupon to imprison them both, and a-while after directed Antipater to be put to death in prison. Thus the whole race of Cassander was exterminated almost as soon as he was dead<sup>c</sup>.

Demetrius
becomes king of Macedonia.

Year of
the Flood, 2705.

Before
Christ,
294.

Demetrius, from being in very low and desperate circumstances was now become more potent than Cassander had been; for, with the kingdom of Macedon, he held Thessaly, the best part of Peloponnesus, and the two great cities of Megara and Athens. He thereupon resolved to make himself master of all Greece; in order to which he turned his arms first against the Bæotians, who, on his coming, were inclined to submit to him; but Cleonymus the Spartan engaged them to stand out, which occasioned the siege of Thebes, of which Pisis a Thespian was governor. When Cleonymus saw the prodigious engines which Demetrius made use of, he was so frightened, that he would have had the Thebans immediately to surrender, which Pisis refused, and made a very gallant defence, till Cleonymus withdrew himself, which so intimidated the people, that he was forced to give up the city. Demetrius dealt very gently with the Thebans, appointed Hieronymus, the good old friend of Eumenes, governor of Bæotia; and, sending for his prisoner Pisis, he highly commended his valour, and then sent him to govern his countrymen the Thespians. The king then returned into Macedon, where he was guilty of a very mean act; for hearing that Lyfimachus was taken prisoner by the king of the Getae, he immediately advanced with a great army to the frontiers of Thrace, hoping to subdue his dominions in his absence. But before he was able to make any impression, Lyfimachus was restored to liberty, and Demetrius recalled by the defection of the Bæotians, whom he had so lately subdued. Antigonus his son had, on the first advice of the revolt, led the forces left with him against them, and, having routed them in battle, shut up the remains of their army in Thebes, to which he laid siege. Thither Demetrius came with the gross of his army out of Macedon; but he had not been there long before he received news of an irruption made by Pyrrhus into Thessaly, upon which he marched to oppose him, and left his son Antigonus to carry on the siege. Before Demetrius arrived in that country, Pyrrhus was withdrawn; he therefore contented himself with the leaving ten thousand foot and a thousand horse for the guard of Theffaly, and then returned with the rest of his army to Thebes. Antigonus, who had continued the siege all this while, perceiving that, through the obstinate defence which was made by the besieged, numbers of his men were slain, could not help one day speaking to his father in this manner: I beseech you, Sir, to consider what reason there is you should expose so many of your valiant soldiers to continual danger, when — Ay, sweet Sir, interrupted Demetrius, what reason have you to afflict yourself? Don't you know, that the more there are killed here, the fewer you will have to provide for? This he said in his passion; but when he was in a cooler temper, he alledged the ingratitude of the Thebans as the true cause of his persisting in the siege, in which he exposed his person as much as the meanest soldier, till in one of the attacks he received a stroke of a javelin quite through his neck, whereby his life was extremely indangered. However, he refused to stir, till at length the Thebans, quite tired out, were constrained to surrender at discretion. Then it was, that they expected a desolation as general as that which happened thirty years before, when Alexander destroyed their city. But it proved quite otherwise; Demetrius ordered thirteen persons, who were principally concerned in the revolt, to be put to death, and received all the rest of the citizens into his favour. He afterwards celebrated the festival of the Pythian Apollo at Athens, because the Ætolians had shut up the passages to Delphi, so that he could not go thither<sup>r</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN lib. xvi. cap. 1. PLUT. in Demet. & Pyrrh.

WHEN Demetrius returned into Macedonia, he discovered such a restless uneasy temper in his subjects, that he was constrained to think of employing them in some war, to prevent their making an ill use of peace. With this view he marched against the Ætolians, but, before he could come to an engagement, he had advice that Pyrrhus was about to invade Macedon. To oppose him he marched in person, and left Pantauchus to command the forces he thought sufficient to bridle the Ætolians. Demetrius and Pyrrhus both missed their intentions: The former, passing by the latter without knowing it, entered Epirus without opposition, wasting and plundering the country where-ever he came, till he had satiated the avarice of his soldiers, and, as he conceived, had fully revenged himself for what Pyrrhus had done in Theffaly. In the mean time Pyrrhus engaged Pantauchus, the general of Demetrius, whom, on a challenge given, he encountered hand to hand, and, after an obstinate combat, wounded and dismount-

The ill conduct of Demetrius loses him the affections of his people.

<sup>r</sup> PLUT. in vita Demet. PAUSAN. in Bœoticis.

ed him. The battle also ended in his favour, wherein, after cutting to pieces a multitude of Macedonians, he took five thousand prisoners. This loss was in itself a great mortification to Demetrius, but in its consequences was far more detrimental than he either foresaw, or than the thing itself seemed to indicate. Upon the return of Demetrius, Pyrrhus retired hastily into his own dominions: but from the time that the Macedonians had beheld this prince fighting hand to hand with their general, they continually talked of him as a prodigy of valour, and amongst other praises this was perpetually in their mouths; that the other kings resembled Alexander in his robes, his quick tone of voice, and the turn of his neck; but that in Pyrrhus they saw his vivacity in fight, and his courteous behaviour towards his soldiers. At first perhaps Demetrius did not mind this, or, it may be, was never made acquainted with it. Certain it is, that his conduct tended strongly to alienate the minds of his subjects: In his garb he was vain to excess; his robes seemed fitter for a stage than a court; his head was enriched with the novelty of a double diadem; and his very shoes shone not only with gold, but with precious stones. In short the garment of his, which was left unfinished, and wherein he intended to have had the whole universe displayed, remained for ages after a monument of his pride, and of the modesty of his successors, who neither wore it, or so much as suffered it to be finished. His conduct was absurd and extravagant; he spent his time in revelling with women and parasites, wasted away immense sums of money, and set the nobility of Macedon a most scandalous example. His behaviour also was remarkably altered; for, instead of that kind and obliging deportment, by which he had formerly attached the minds of all men to his person, he grew humourfome at least, if not morose, affecting to treat every body with disdain, and to put on such airs of insolence as were insupportable. He suffered the Athenian embassadors to wait two years before he gave them audience, and one day when he had graciously condescended to receive all the petitions that were offered him, at his return to his palace he opened his robe, and suffered them all to fall into the river Alia. This effectually lost him the hearts of the Macedonians, who from that day forward wished for another master. Some small time after he fell sick of a fever at Pella, induced by hard drinking, and while he struggled with the violence of the distemper, Pyrrhus entered his dominions with an army, and penetrated as far as Edeffa. He might have possessed himself of the whole kingdom, if he had known how how much the Macedonians were displeased with their king, and how far they were prejudiced in favour of himself; but plunder was all he sought, and when his soldiers had loaded themselves, he had thoughts of retiring. Demetrius, sick as he was, quitted his bed, and mounted on horseback: some of his friends drew together immediately some troops; and at the head of these he marched against Pyrrhus, who avoided a battle by a quick retreat. As soon as the king returned into Macedon, he determined to put an end to the difference between himself and his brother-in-law. To this end he sent ambassadors who were kindly received, and the treaty they were sent to negotiate quickly concluded. This point once got over, Demetrius raised a powerful army, and led it against Lyfimachus; but before he reached his confines, Pyrrhus, at the persuasion of Ptolemy, invaded Macedon, and marched strait to Beræa. This brought Demetrius and his army back to oppose him, but when they were incamped over-against each other, Pyrrhus was advised by deserters that his soldiers were inclined to desert Demetrius, and to revolt to himself. To try their temper therefore, he rode out of the city near the camp with his head bare, but finding none came over to him, he expressed his surprize to the deserters, who advised him to put on his helmet, which when he had done, and the Macedonians perceived by the plume that it was Pyrrhus, they came out to him in throngs and saluted him king. Demetrius, finding himself deserted, retired privately to Cassandria, having lost a kingdom as unaccountably as he found it.<sup>a</sup>

Pyrrhus doubted not his holding the crown he had acquired, without dispute at least with any but Demetrius, but he had scarce time to flatter himself with these expectations before another competitor appeared; for Lyfimachus, having raised an army to oppose Demetrius, as soon as he had heard what had befallen him, marched strait into Macedon, and advanced towards Pyrrhus, from whom he demanded half the kingdom for his share, alledging, that Demetrius had been compelled to fly by his approach. Pyrrhus, who was very sensible that this claim had not the least foundation, yielded, however, to his request, desiring rather to have him his friend and colleague upon any terms, than to have to deal with him as an enemy, knowing the fickleness of the Macedonians, and remembering that Lyfimachus was their countryman. Each then took a part of the kingdom of Macedon, not to content himself but his partner, for each privately designed to make himself master of the whole w.

<sup>a</sup> PLUT. in Demetrio.

Pyrrhus
becomes king of Macedon.

Year of
the Flood, 2712.

Before
Christ,
287.

Pyrrhus, now king of Macedon, thought the small remains of empire which his brother Demetrius retained in Greece, were just appendices to his kingdom, and therefore could not enjoy in peace what with so much pains he had acquired, till he had considered of some method for outing that unfortunate prince and his son of what their ill fortune had left them. In order to this he commenced a war, in which he gained the quiet possession of Athens, whither he went to sacrifice, and being received with all the testimonies of kindness and respect by the citizens, he gave them thanks with great civility; but at the same time told them, that he believed it would be for their safety, if for the future they made it a rule with them not to admit sovereign princes into their city upon any terms. This he said to furnish them with a pretence for excluding Demetrius; a mean and scandalous contrivance to deprive him of a retreat, when he had deprived him of a kingdom. But he was quickly punished for his own ambition by the ambition of his neighbour; for when Lyfimachus was at leisure from other wars, he immediately came pouring into Macedon with a very numerous army. In the first place he carried off some convoys, whereby he distressed the army of Pyrrhus: In the next he caused manifestoes to be scattered through the kingdom, complaining of the injury they did to the Macedonian name, by accepting a foreigner for their king to the exclusion of him who was a native, and who had been a principal commander in their armies, when under the auspice of Alexander they acquired the command of the world. These arguments were plausible enough to furnish with a pretence for rebellion a people who were prone to it. In short Pyrrhus saw himself reduced to the same necessity to which he had reduced Demetrius, and was constrained to leave Lyfimachus by flight a kingdom which himself had stolen. One would have conceived, that, having this leisure, he would have fallen upon Antigonus the son of Demetrius, who resided at Corinth, and had many cities under his jurisdiction in Peloponnesus and the rest of Greece. But either Pyrrhus was afraid of acquiring the sovereignty of so fickle a people, or else he willingly left Antigonus behind him, in hopes that he might create Lyfimachus some trouble. However it was, he chose to sail into Italy to acquire new kingdoms, and laid aside all thoughts of Grecian conquests, till a more convenient season, which we shall hereafter see dawn upon him when he least expected it *.

<sup>w</sup> PLUT. in Pyrrho. JUSTIN. lib. xvi. c. 3.

Lyfimachus, who had now Macedonia to himself, as well as the provinces he had held since the division of Alexander's empire, might, if he had so pleased, have sat down satisfied and contented, having also fifteen children living to be the comforts of his old age. But so it was, that, like the fair city Lyfimachia, which he had built and called by his own name, and which was swallowed up by an earthquake; he suddenly saw himself and his fortunes, his foreign and domestic hopes, not only turned upside down, but destroyed for ever. His eldest son Agathocles, a prince of great hopes, because of great prudence and greater humanity, he had married to Lyfandra the daughter of Ptolemy by Eurydice the daughter of Antipater, and some time after himself married Arfinoe the daughter also of Ptolemy by Berenice, a widow lady, who had accompanied his wife Eurydice into Egypt as her friend. These ladies, Eurydice, Berenice, Lyfandra, and Arfinoe, introduced scenes of blood and confusion into both courts. In that of Ptolemy first, Berenice procured a preference to be given to her children, to the prejudice of those of her mistress; whereupon Ptolemy Ceraunus, the king's eldest son, fled to the court of Lyfimachus, where he was kindly received by his brother-in-law Agathocles and his sister Lyfandra. But in this court he found Arfinoe the daughter of his implacable mother-in-law, as powerful and more cruel than she. This lady infused it into her husband's head, that his son, his eldest son Agathocles, who had conquered for him half his empire, and in whom the army and people had their hopes bound up, was secretly his enemy; upon which the hapless young prince was first imprisoned, and then poisoned. A fact which struck not only the family, but all the subjects of Lyfimachus with horror, and the fright of which induced Lyfandra to fly, with her children and her brother Ptolemy Ceraunus, to Seleucus, where they found not only a civil, but a kind reception. Many of the officers in Lyfimachus's army, and some of the principal lords of his court followed them, and all concurred in beseeching him to make war upon this unnatural parent, who, vexed with the reflections made on what he had already done, became every day more and more cruel. Seleucus, though he was seventy-seven years old, had still all the vigour and activity of a young man:

Lyfima-
chus ac- quires the kingdom.
Year of
the Flood.
2714.
Before
Christ,
285.

* JUSTIN. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra.

He therefore lent a willing ear to these insinuations, the rather, because he had no rival left, but Lyfimachus, and him once subdued, he saw no cause to doubt that his own empire might be extended as far as that of Alexander his master. Instantly therefore he fell upon the dominions of Lyfimachus in Asia, and stript him of them almost as soon as he attacked them; but before he could transport an army into Europe, Lyfimachus passing the Hellepont, met him at Corupedion in Phrygia with a gallant army, where, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, Lyfimachus, having first lost all his children except two, fell in the field, and left the victory with his kingdoms to Seleucus, justly surnamed Nicator, or the conqueror<sup>y</sup>.

*Seleucus
assumes the title of king.*

LED by a warm desire of taking possession of Macedonia, as soon as the season permitted, Seleucus passed the Hellepont, and with his army advanced as far as Lyfimachia in Thrace. In the neighbourhood of this city, he observed as he marched an old altar, concerning which he asked certain questions, whence he learned that it was called Argos, at which he was exceedingly surprized; for he had been warned by an oracle to have a care of Argos, which hitherto he thought had referred to Argos in Peloponnesus. But while by farther questions he sought to sift into this matter, Ptolemy Ceraunus, whom he had so generously relieved, for whose sake he had commenced this war; and whom, after settling his own affairs in Macedonia, he intended by force to have restored to his father's kingdom, came behind him, and basely thrust him through, so that in seven months space, and by a violent death also, he followed Lyfimachus, having so long worn the title of king of Macedon<sup>z</sup>.

*Ptolemy
becomes king of Macedon.
Year of
the Flood,
2719.
Before
Christ,
280.*

Ptolemy Ceraunus having performed this execrable deed, escaped away to Lyfimachia, where having got about him a band of his companions, he put on a diadem, and boldly declared himself king of Macedon. We do not find it very clearly laid down, by what title he desired to hold his crown; however, he made use of many pretences to gain him friends. To those whom he discerned to be lovers of the house of Antipater, he observed, that he was his grandson. To such as were to the last loyal to Lyfimachus, I am, said he, his avenger. To all he made vast promises, and, which must appear most singular, he was believed by all; so that the army and people accepted him as lawful king ; the city of Cassandria only standing out. Three enemies he had to deal with, who all threatened him at the same time ; Antiochus the son of Seleucus, on account of the murder of his father ; Antigonus the son of Demetrius, who claimed the kingdom of Macedon as his hereditary right ; and Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who, though fully bent on his Italian expedition, would needs have before he went some satisfaction for the kingdom of Macedonia. Antigonus, being nearest at hand, came with a fleet and army to dispute with Ptolemy the possession of his new-acquired dominions ; the latter superior to him both in naval and land-forces, engaged and routed him. Thus delivered from one rival, he had art enough to rid himself without fighting from the other two. Antiochus he pacified by fair words. To Pyrrhus he lent five thousand foot, four thousand horse, and fifty elephants for two years, whereupon Pyrrhus married his daughter, and appointed him protector of his dominions in his absence. All this so well brought about, the new king of Macedon wrote to his brother Ptolemy Philadelphus, telling him, that he acquiesced in his father's disposition of his paternal kingdom, being satisfied with that which he had honourably obtained by the death of his father's enemy. Next he applied himself to his sister Arfinoe the widow of Lyfimachus, who had obliged him to fly from the court of her husband. She was possessed of the strong castle and rich city of Cassandria, where she resided with her two sons. Ptolemy's suit to her was, that, forgetting all former quarrels, she would remember her near relation to him, and consent to share the kingdom with him, promising to marry her, and to adopt her children. She, credulous as she was, readily embraced the offer, and in consequence thereof put Ptolemy in possession of the city of Cassandria ; where on the very day of the nuptials, Ptolemy caused her two sons to be slain, and turned herself out attended only with two maid-servants to lead a solitary life in Samo-Thrace, from whence she afterwards passed into Egypt, where she married her other brother Ptolemy Philadelphus, who for her sake divorced and banished Arfinoe daughter of Lyfimachus. Ptolemy now looked upon himself as thoroughly fixed in the Macedonian throne ; but he had not sat on it above a year, before a people he had scarce heard of sent to demand of him a tribute. These were the Gauls, who with three different armies broke into Pannonia, Thracia, and Macedon. This last corps was commanded by Belgius, who sent deputies to Ptolemy Ceraunus, to inquire of him in few words, how much money he would give for peace. Ptolemy, proud of his own performances, and not at all doubting the fidelity of the Macedonians against these barbarous invaders, slighted the message, and returned for answer, that unless the principal officers of their army were given up to him for hostages, he would not allow it to them. The Gauls in their turn derided the haughtiness of this rash monarch, and marched immediately against him with a mighty army of horse and foot. Ptolemy failed not to meet them with the whole force of Macedon, and a battle was fought with great obstinacy on both sides. At last Ptolemy, being much wounded, was thrown by his elephant, and taken prisoner. The Barbarians shewed him as little pity as he had shewn others; for those who took him tore him to pieces, and then exalting his head on the top of a pike, his army were so intimidated, that they immediately began to break, and were soon after surrounded and cut to pieces. This misfortune was wholly owing to the confidence of Ptolemy, whose army was overthrown, not so much by the valour as by the multitude of their enemies; for whom they would have been at least a more equal match, if he had not refused twenty thousand men offered him by the king of the Dardanians, with this proud boast, that he had an army composed of the children of those with whom Alexander had subdued the east. This miserable end had Ptolemy himself, after he had been a king no more than eighteen months<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>y</sup> APPIAN. in Syriacis. MEMNON. ap Phot. Cod. ccxxiv. c. 9. JUSTIN. lib. xvii. c. 1—2. <sup>z</sup> JUSTIN. ubi supra. MEMNON. ubi supra. PAUSAN. in Atticis.

Meleager,
Antipater
and Soft-
henes.

THE Macedonians in this distress knew not well what to do, either in respect to preservation of their country, or the choice of a king. Meleager the brother of Ptolemy was at hand, him therefore they saluted king, but finding with the name they were not able to bestow on him the qualities requisite to a monarch, after two months they deprived him, and in his stead exalted Antipater the son of Philip, the brother of Cassander. Upon him they bestowed the surname of Etesian, because he governed but forty-five days, during which time the Etesian winds blew. Then an interregnum followed; the Gauls making havock of every thing, till Softhenes, a young nobleman of great merit, collected as well as he could a body of able youths, and having disciplined them, and brought them by degrees to a tolerable knowledge in military discipline, he with them, taking proper seasons and all the advantages resulting from the thorough knowledge of the country, greatly harassed, and at length totally destroyed the Gauls, and, as is generally believed, slew Belgus their commander. These noble exploits might well have intitled him to the kingdom, if his modesty had not induced him to refuse regal honours. He caused the soldiers to swear to him as their general, and with that title ruled happily in Macedon for two years; about the end of that time came a new inundation of Gauls under the command of Brennus, and broke into this country. His army consisted of one hundred and forty thousand foot and ten thousand horse, besides an innumerable train of retainers. Softhenes bore up against him with great courage, till himself and his army were overwhelmed with numbers; then they ruined and pillaged all the country, till being quite sated with booty, or rather finding there was nothing more to be had, and having received vast recruits from Gaul and Illyria, they left Macedonia, and poured down into Greece <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> JEAN IN. lib. xxiv. 3—5. MIMON. ap. PLOT. ult. supra.

Softhenes being dead and the kingdom of Macedon deserted by the Gauls, Antigonus Gonatus, so called from the place of Gonatus his birth, revived his claim to the kingdom, as son to Deme- restored.
trius Poliorcetes; but he was opposed by Antiochus Soter the Year of son of Seleucus Nicator, who also pretended title to the the Flood, kingdom, in right of his father who had conquered it, tho' 2725.
he never possessed it. Antigonus who had already reigned Before ten years in Peloponnesus, came with a great fleet and army Christ, and took possession of the kingdom, before his rival was in 274.
any condition to contest it with him; yet this did not at all discourage Antiochus from prosecuting his claim; for he immediately raised a great army, and threatened to transport it from Asia into Europe. It so happened, that during this dispute Nicomedes king of Bithynia entered into a treaty with Antigonus for their mutual defence; whereupon Antiochus carried the war into his kingdom, which he invaded with a powerful army; yet there happened no decisive action, but after the armies had for some time observed each other, a treaty was made, whereby all these differences were adjusted. Antigonus married Phila the daughter of Seleucus by Stratonice the sister of Antigonus himself, and as this lady was half-sister and daughter-in-law to Antiochus, he resigned his right to the kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus on account of the marriage. Being now peaceable possessor of the kingdom of Macedon, he applied himself with all imaginable industry to the restoring the towns and villages which had been ruined by the Gauls. But while he was intent upon such matters, the Gauls threatened another invasion; but before they entered his country, they sent to him as they had to Ptolemy Ceraunus, to know if he was inclined to purchase

<sup>b</sup> JUSTIN. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. excerpt. lib. xxii.

peace.

peace, for they were well informed that he had brought a great treasure out of Peloponnesus. Antigonus entertained the ambassadors splendidly, and having shewn them his camp, his army, and his treasures, told them, these were not to be given away, but to be employed for the just defence of his subjects. When these deputies returned home, and had reported not only the king's answer, but also what splendid things they had seen in his camp, the Gauls were impatient to go and take possession of all the fine things they talked of ; for though they were but fifteen thousand foot and three thousand horse, yet they made no question of subduing Antigonus, as they had done some of his predecessors. That they might perform this the more easily, they made forced marches in order to surprize him ; but Antigonus, being aware of their intent, withdrew his forces into a wood, and so avoided an engagement : however, the Gauls rifled his camp, and then proceeded to plunder his ships ; but the seamen and soldiers on board, perceiving that they observed no order, and that they were quite intoxicated with success, fell upon them and cut off numbers of them. In the mean time Antigonus and his soldiers being apprised of what had happened, they also attacked the Gauls in the rear, and gained over them so complete a victory, as for the present established Antigonus firmly on the throne. But before he had time to perform what he endeavoured, the restoring the kingdom to its antient lustre, he had another enemy upon his hands, more formidable than the Gauls, viz. Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who, returning with the shattered remains of an army from Italy, after he had continued a little time in his own country, invaded the frontiers of Macedonia, in hopes of plunder ; but finding little resistance, he advanced into the very heart of Macedon, where two thousand men, who had been posted in the adjacent towns for their defence by Antigonus, deserted to him ; whereupon he resolved to venture a battle, notwithstanding the Macedonian army was more numerous, and composed of better troops than his own. This once resolved on, he prosecuted his march against Antigonus with the utmost diligence, and coming up with him in a defile, he charged his forces briskly. The rear of the army was composed of Gauls, whom Antigonus had taken into his service ; they made a very gallant defence, and continued fighting till most of them were cut to pieces. When these were destroyed, Pyrrhus made himself master of the elephants, and, elated with his success, advanced towards the phalanx which Antigonus commanded in person, and which alone was capable of defeating his army :
yet

yet Pyrrhus vanquished it without a stroke. For when he drew near enough to be heard, he called not only some of the principal but also many of the inferior officers by their names, and thereby drew them and the troops under their command over to his party, so that of a sudden Antigonus saw himself without troops; whereupon with a few of his friends he retired from the field, and had much ado to reach the coast of Macedon, where by means of his fleet some of the maritime cities were held in his obedience c.

Pyrrhus was once again owned king of Macedon, for the royal city of Ægis, and all the places of any importance in the neighbourhood, submitted without farther dispute. Yet, as soon as he got possession of the kingdom, he, by an unaccountable act of folly, or rather of wickedness, lost the hearts of the people; for after plundering the city of Ægis, and using its inhabitants with very great severity, he placed a garrison of mercenary Gauls therein. They, as soon as he was departed, took it into their heads that there must be vast riches buried in the sepulchres of the antient kings; wherefore they, without more ado, entered the silent repositories of the dead, and having impiously scattered the ashes of the deceased princes, tore away whatever they found of any value in their monuments. Pyrrhus, when informed of this, shewed very little concern at it, and never so much as pretended to revenge it: all his care was to keep the kingdom, and make the most of it. When he was obliged to quit it for some time, he left his son Ptolemy as his vicegerent. This opportunity Antigonus took to return with what troops he could get together from the sea-coasts, in hopes of reconquering the kingdom. But Ptolemy advancing against him with the army left him by his father, an engagement ensued, wherein Antigonus was routed, and with much ado escaped with no more than seven attendants. Of this, when Pyrrhus received advice, he was so intoxicated with his good fortune, that he said by way of raillery, That Antigonus was a very impudent fellow, still to wear a purple robe: A most unmannerly and ill-grounded sarcasm, since that prince, distressed as he was, held still very considerable territories in Greece, and had both spirit and ability to maintain a longer contest for the kingdom of Macedon. When Pyrrhus had held the kingdom two years, he rashly, and almost without any ground, involved himself in a war with the Lacedæmonians, and, in order thereto, marched down into Greece with the flower of his army; there he missed taking Sparta

c PLUT. in Pyrrho JUSTIN. lib. xxv. c. 3.

by delay, and while he endeavoured to retrieve his mistake, he had news that Antigonus, having recovered a great part of Macedon, had followed him to Greece, and was in the neighbourhood of Argos; whither himself being invited by the opposite faction, he, according to his wonted custom, laid hold of that opportunity to desert an unlucky enterprize, in hopes of entering on one more fortunate. But when he drew near the city, he was met by a deputation from thence, who were sent to inform him, that Antigonus was encamped on the neighbouring hills, and that it was the humble request of the city, that neither of them would enter it. Pyrrhus promised that he would do as they desired; but in the mean time he sent to defy Antigonus, and to challenge him to fight hand to hand before both armies for the kingdom. To which Antigonus returned him for answer, That himself in making war, used not only arms but time; and that if Pyrrhus was weary of life, there were ways enow to death, which lay directly before him. To the deputies from Argos who made him the same proposition they had Pyrrhus, he answered, That he came to do them good, but if his retiring would be more for their interest, he was content to retire, and, as a proof of his sincerity, to give them his son for a hostage. They thankfully received the young prince, and then sent to demand hostages of Pyrrhus, which he refused, but promised to keep his word, though he never intended it. For in the night he entered the city, and Antigonus, at the request of the citizens, having sent forces to assist them, a battle ensued in the streets, where, in the morning, Pyrrhus was slain. Alcyoneus the son of Antigonus taking the head by the hair, rid with it full speed to his father, and, finding him talking with some of his favourites, threw it at his feet. Antigonus looking upon it, and knowing it, not only thrust his son from him with disdain, but struck him with his battoon; Barbarous wretch, said he, why didst thou think, that he whose grandfather was thus slain, and whose father died a captive, should rejoice at such a sight? Then taking the robe from his shoulders, he covered the head, and at the same time let fall a shower of tears, giving orders that the body should be carefully looked for, and that they should be burnt together, with all the funeral honours due to a king. While he was speaking, Alcyoneus having discovered Helenus the son of Pyrrhus in a threadbare coat, he spoke to him kindly, and with great respect presented him to his father; Well, my son, said Antigonus, this is better than you did before; however, you have done less than your duty still, in that you have suffered a person of his quality to approach me in that thread-bare coat, which is not a disgrace to him, but to our victory. Having then comforted Helenus for the loss of his father, he entertained him kindly, and afterwards set him at liberty, and sent him home to Epirus. The principal officers in Pyrrhus's army he sent for, assured them of his favour, and incorporated the troops they commanded into his own <sup>d</sup>.
quality

Antigonus now held not only the kingdom of Macedon, but also very large possessions in Greece; yet was he as far as ever from being freed from enemies, new ones arising up as the old ones were destroyed. The Gauls, breeding him new disturbances, threatened no less mischief than they had heretofore done himself and his predecessors; but Antigonus, having made all the necessary preparations for subduing them, first cut off numbers in skirmishes, whereby they were so provoked, that in a rage they massacred their wives and children, and then put all to the hazard of a battle, in which they were defeated, and in a manner exterminated. After this victory Antigonus led his army against Athens, and, notwithstanding it was powerfully supported, compelled it to receive a garison; but in the midst of his success he was recalled into Macedon, by the news that Alexander the son of Pyrrhus, being become king of Epirus, had entered Macedon, and committed great depredations. Antigonus on his return marched directly with a great army to repel the invader. Then, when he least expected it, the Macedonians again deserted him, and went over to Alexander, who thus acquired the kingdom without a stroke. Antigonus was so much surprized and confounded at the ingratitude and infidelity of a people, whom he had used so well, that he even deserted them and retired into Greece. His son Demetrius, a very boy, remained in Macedon, where having with much difficulty collected a body of troops, he daily did some exploit or other, which so charmed the Macedonians, who were always fond of active princes, that they listed willingly under his banners, and thereby enabled him not only to regain the whole kingdom, but also to prosecute his father's quarrel in Epirus, the hereditary kingdom of his father's enemy, which he did with such effect, that in his turn he expelled Alexander, who fled for shelter to the Ætolians, amongst whom he collected a fresh army with an intent to make a brisk inroad into his own kingdom, once more to try the affections of his subjects. In this attempt he had all the success he could wish, for the Epirots joined him in such numbers, that Demetrius found it convenient to leave that kingdom, in order the more effectually to secure Macedonia, which he had recovered for his father <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> PLUT. in vit. Pyrrh. JUSTIN. lib. xxv c. 5.

Antigonus Antigonus, returning to this kingdom, governed his subjects for many years in peace, making use of every advantage afforded him by the fluctuating state of things in Greece, to strengthen and enlarge his authority there. In his declining years he conceived a strange ungovernable desire of getting the citadel of Corinth into his hands, which he pursued with incredible vehemence and assiduity. It had been formerly held, together with Sicyon, by Cratesipolis, the wife of Alexander the son of Polyperchon; from her it was taken by Ptolemy, and, having often afterwards changed its masters, it was now in the hands of one Alexander, who esteemed himself a prince, but was deemed by the Greeks a tyrant. The famous Aratus had contrived a scheme for surprizing it, but, before he was ready to put it in execution, Alexander entered into the Achæan league. Then it was, that Antigonus conceived an opinion that he should never be able to support his authority over the Greeks, unless he had this important place in his hands, which he compassed thus. Alexander being taken off by poison, Demetrius the son of Antigonus was sent by his father to court the widow, whose name was Nicæa, an old woman full of vanity, but suspicious and very cunning; a strong garison she kept in the citadel, but she could not keep her own understanding from being imposed upon by the pretences of Demetrius; in short she was weak enough to believe, that one of the handsomest princes of his time, and in the full vigour of his years, might be passionately in love with a woman of an advanced age. A marriage was therefore speedily concluded, and Antigonus himself came to grace the solemnity. Nicæa, however, kept the citadel, nay, and was more cautious of it than ordinary, of which Antigonus took no notice; but spent all his time in feasts, shews, and theatrical entertainments. One day, when Amæbeus, a famous musician, was to perform on the theatre for the amusement of Nicæa, Antigonus would needs accompany her as she was carried thither in a splendid chair; but when they came to a passage which led up to the citadel, Antigonus bid the bearers of the chair go on; then with more speed than could be expected from a man of his years, he ascended to the gate of the citadel, which finding shut, he knocked at it with his staff, and in a quick tone bid the soldiers open it; they, surprized to behold the king in person, did as he commanded; and Antigonus being once within the place, easily transacted things there according to his pleasure. The joy he conceived on the happy success of this project, led him into great acts of indecorum, for he not only drank to excess at the feasts he gave his friends, but when he was full of wine went and danced in the streets, embraced every one he met, and in short acted as if the taking of Corinth had taken away his senses. From this time forward he employed all his care and thoughts in the prosecution of his views in Greece, where he supported all the petty tyrants against the free states, appointing new ones on the demise of the old, or swallowing them up as occasion offered, thereby enlarging his own dominions; though not much to the reputation either of his arms, or of his honour. But the Achæans, and especially Aratus, their glorious general, gave him not a little disquiet: they openly professed a desire of restoring Greece to freedom, which was the same thing, as if they had declared they would extirpate the Macedonian power in Greece. Yet Antigonus did not make war on them, for he had in his lifetime experienced such variety of fortune, that he was fearful of staking any thing in the open field; and therefore sought by promises to bring over Aratus, and by smooth language to amuse the Achæans. His policy without doubt was right; yet it did not very well answer his end, for Aratus and the Achæans acted just as he did, they laid hold of every opportunity to augment their own power, and pretended to surprize cities, and to take under their protection countries dependent on Antigonus without breaking the peace. At length Aratus ventured upon Corinth, and actually surprized it in the night, about eight years after it had been taken by Antigonus. Archelaus, who commanded the king's garison, he dismissed; but for the treasure in the citadel and the ships in the haven, those he retained. It does not appear, that even this engaged Antigonus in an open war against the Achæans; on the contrary, we find he prosecuted his old method of countenancing and supporting their enemies, whereby he impeded their power at least, though somewhat at the expence of his own. Other acts of his we find none, except that he thoroughly settled the realm of Macedon, and so effectually conciliated the minds of the people to him and his family, that they were ever after very loyal subjects to his descendants. In fine, after a reign of upwards of thirty years, he died, being somewhat above fourscore, with the character of a mild and generous prince, one whose wisdom surpassed his valour, and yet one who, in cases of necessity and when all was at stake, had shewn himself personally brave f.

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. lib. xxvi.

f JUSTIN lib. xxviii. PLUT. in vit. Arat.

Demetrius
II.

Year of
the Flood

2756.

Before
Christ

243.

Demetrius succeeded his father, and, on account of the great things he had performed while a youth, much was expected from him. Yet after he obtained the crown, he seemed to have altered his conduct, and to have acted with greater caution than vigour. He had married the daughter of Antiochus Hierax, and so long as he kept to this wife, his affairs went peaceably enough at home. Abroad he had some trouble with the Ætolians, a restless uneasy people, who were impatient of any wrong done to themselves, and yet were continually robbing and spoiling their neighbours. Demetrius, to blunt the edge of their courage, stirred up against them Agrion king of Illyria, who came down against them with a great army, engaged, and routed them; for joy of which he made vast feasts, and at them drank so heartily, that he was seized with a fever, and died in a few days time. He was succeeded by his wife Tuta, who was as successful, and made as bad use of her success, as her husband; for having experienced the valour of her subjects, she not only permitted, but encouraged, them to commit all sorts of robberies and piracies on the neighbouring nations, which ended at last in their destruction. Demetrius in the mean time found himself engaged in a war against the Achæans, who under the command of Aratus had invaded Attica. Bythis, who was general for the king in those parts, instantly took the field, and at Phylacia it came to a battle, wherein the Achæans were beaten, and it was reported, that Aratus was either slain, or made prisoner. At Athens the former was so firmly believed, that the citizens, to shew their affection to the Macedonians, put on garlands, as if some mighty good luck had befallen them; whereas in truth, Aratus intended to restore them to their liberty; their behaviour therefore was at once chargeable with gross flattery and rank ingratitude. What confirmed them in all probability in their notion of the death of Aratus, was a message sent by Diogenes who was governor of the Pyræus for the king, to Corinth, commanding the Achæans immediately to quit that city; but this order was very indifferently obeyed, because Aratus himself was then in the city, where receiving information of the joy shewn by the Athenians for his death, he, with such troops as he could first draw together, invaded their territories, to let them see that he was alive, and penetrated as far as the academy, where being met by certain deputies, to excuse the conduct of their countrymen from the visible force they were under, he suffered himself to be appeased, and withdrew his forces without doing any considerable mischief. In Macedon the latter report of his being a prisoner, was so well received, that Demetrius sent a ship directly to Athens to bring him from thence thence in chains. The Ætolians, having being relieved from their late distress by the Achæans, recovered their old disposition with their prosperity, and, in consequence thereof endeavoured to tear away that part of Acarmania which was subject to the crown of Epirus. This kingdom was at that time governed by Olympias the sister and widow of Alexander, as guardian to her sons Pyrrhus and Ptolemy. She therefore, to rid herself of these barbarous enemies, applied to Demetrius king of Macedon, and prevailed on him to marry her daughter Phthia. This produced the queen and her children very little good, though it proved the cause of no small mischief to Demetrius; for his first wife was so much enraged thereat, that she left him, and retired to her brother, whom she earnestly excited to make war upon her husband; which though the unsettled state of his own affairs would not permit, yet the inclination he shewed to revenge his sister's quarrel obliged Demetrius to take all the precautions necessary to repel an invader. All that we know farther of this king of Macedon is, that he added Cyrene and all Libya to his dominions; but at what time, or by what means, we are not able to say. During his whole reign the Achæans struggled with him in Greece, and the barbarous nations on his frontiers gave him no small trouble. In defending himself from their attacks he spent the ten years in which he enjoyed the regal authority, and then died, leaving behind him a young son named Philip <sup>8</sup>.

Macedonia could not be without a king, and as their lawful prince was little more than two years old, there was a necessity of appointing a regent. Some historians say, that Demetrius assigned his brother Antigonus to be the tutor of young Philip, which is probable enough; but he did not long continue to exercise this office, for having by his gentle and obliging conduct gained the good-will of the Macedonians, as also of the widow of the deceased king, he took her to wife, and was by them saluted king. Yet, imitating the policy of his predecessor Philip the son of Amyntas, he did not offer the least violence to his nephew, but, on the contrary, caused him to be brought up with great care, and, as we shall see, made him his successor. He was indeed a prince of great abilities, equally capable of maintaining peace at home, and of carrying on war abroad. He had a great reputation for his justice, was renowned for his clemency towards his enemies, and for his kindness and affability towards his friends. With all these great qualities he had very high ideas of the regal

Antigonus
Dofon.
Year of
the Flood, 2766.
Before
Christ,
233.

<sup>8</sup> JUSTIN. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra. POLYB. lib. ii. PORPHYR. in Græcis. EUSEB. SOALIG. p. 229.

dignity, and of the honour of the Macedonian name : he is said to have been slower in performing than promising, and therefore the Greeks, who in this age were more remarkable for saying quick things, than for doing wise ones, surnamed him Dofon, i. e. will-give. He had scarce begun to meddle with the administration, when Diogenes, whom the late king had made governor of his several forts in the city of Athens, most basely sold them, together with the island of Salamis, for a hundred and fifty talents. In the transacting of this treaty, the Athenians made use of Aratus, whom they had so lately treated as an enemy, and he not only lent them his advice, but furnished twenty talents out of his own pocket. So true a friend was he to the liberty of Greece, and so strongly was he at this time persuaded, that nothing cramped it so much as the Macedonian power. But in process of time, when the Ætolians, by lending assistance to Cleomenes king of Sparta, had enabled him to give check to the Achæans, and even to defeat Aratus in battle ; this great man began to change his sentiments, and to have another opinion of the Macedonians. Yet, not caring to be himself the author of a motion for calling in Antigonus once more into Peloponnesus, whom himself had so earnestly laboured to expel, he found means to engage the Megalopolitans, who were in immediate danger of being destroyed by Cleomenes, to demand succours of Antigonus, who very politicly answered, that he would readily send them assistance when the Achæans should desire it. When this answer was reported in the assembly of the Achæans, and generally applauded, Aratus alone opposed it, and advised the Achæans to try what they could do with their own forces, before they called in so powerful an ally ; yet this he did only to colour the business, foreseeing what quickly after fell out, that they would be under a necessity of applying to Antigonus ; and when this happened, he readily agreed to the motion, and sent his own son to the king, not only to negotiate the affair, but to be a hostage. Antigonus received the young man with great civility, and the request made by his father and the Achæans with the highest satisfaction ; for he of all things desired to retrieve his interest in Greece, and to assert that authority which the kings of Macedon from the time of Philip had maintained therein. One thing, however, from the beginning he insisted on, which was, that the citadel of Corinth should be put into his hands. For, as Plutarch observes, he looked on the Greeks, as a high-mettled horse, too dangerous to be rid without a bridle. To this condition, to avoid falling under the power of the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans submitted, and for the performance

ance of this, the son of Aratus became hostage. The king therefore soon after his coming prepared to perform his part of the treaty, and, in order thereto, assembled an army of twenty thousand foot and a thousand horse, with which he intended to have descended into Thessaly; but his march that way was hindered by a message sent him by the Ætolians, that they would oppose his passage at Thermopylae with their utmost force. He then transported his forces into Eubœa, but when he was come thither, he was informed that Cleomenes lay with a gallant army just within the isthmus, and that he had fortified it with lines which were not to be forced, but at the expence of a great number of men. All this made him very uneasy, especially as it happened in the very beginning of a war, when all cross adventures are most apt to discourage an army. Aratus came by sea to Pegæ with some of his friends, there Antigonus met and complimented them, treating all with great civility; but receiving Aratus with particular marks of friendship. This was the effect of policy, for he had been his old enemy, and was but lately become his friend; yet when they had conversed a little together, and Antigonus, who was an excellent judge of men, had thereby an opportunity given him of discoursing freely with this great politician, he grew into a sincere friendship with him, treating him ever after with the utmost familiarity and confidence. The first step of the war was the attacking the lines of Corinth, which were better defended than any other lines mentioned in the Greek history; but the city of Argos in Peloponnesus revolting, Cleomenes was forced to abandon his lines, lest he should have an enemy on both sides. Antigonus pursued the war to the satisfaction of the Achæans for some time, and then having the citadel of Corinth put into his hands, he made a pompous feast there for all the generals in the army. At this entertainment Aratus was placed next the king, who feeling himself on a sudden very cold, called for his cloak, and when the servant brought it, turning to Aratus, My friend, said he, don't you think the weather very sharp? Yes, replied Aratus, I never felt it sharper. The king thereupon pulled him closer to him, and bid the servant throw the cloak over them both; upon which Aratus fell a laughing; of which when the king demanded the reason, I will tell you, Sir, said Aratus; a little before our treaty with you, when I had offered a solemn sacrifice, the soothsayer finding in the liver two gall-bags in one cell, he pronounced it his opinion, that two persons, then thought irreconcilable enemies, should very soon become most intimate friends; I smiled at the prediction then, and laughed at its accomplishment just now, for I believe your cloak covers those gall-bladders at present. The history of this war the reader has already had in our sixth volume; we shall therefore only touch on such points as relate immediately to the conduct of Antigonus, and are not mentioned there. As the advantages obtained by the Achæans were entirely due to the assistance he had brought them, the king thought it but reasonable that Orchomenus, and some other places that were taken, should be garisoned by Macedonians. He also caused the statues of those who had surprized the citadel at Corinth to be thrown down, excepting only that of Aratus. In Argos he restored the statues of those whom the Achæans stiled tyrants, but who had been protected in the authority they exercised by his ancestors. These things created a great deal of trouble to Aratus, who was made accountable by his countrymen for every thing that happened, as if after they had admitted Antigonus into their country, had chosen him their captain general, and had vested him with supreme power, he would not conduct things a little according to his own will, and not intirely in consequence of the advice given him by others. Yet it seems, that to gratify the Achæans, he sent the greatest part of his forces to take up their winter quarters in Macedonia, which gave Cleomenes an opportunity of destroying all the country about Argos, under the nose of the king, who with a few mercenary troops lay in the neighbourhood of the city. It was upon this occasion that he performed the greatest action of his life, which was absolutely refusing to fight, when he could not do it without manifest disadvantage, notwithstanding he was insulted by the enemy, and railed at by his confederates. His prudence preserved him from that disgrace, which would have attended a defeat; and when his forces were returned, he made himself ample amends for the injury his reputation had received, by the glorious victory at Sellasia, where he totally defeated Cleomenes, and, in consequence of his victory, took the virgin city of Sparta. If any thing could add to his glory after this, or rather, if any thing could eclipse the lustre of his victory by its superior splendor, it was his behaviour on this occasion; for he not only prevented the plunder of the city, but declared to the magistrates, that he did not carry on the war against the Spartans, but against Cleomenes; with respect to whom, as he was fled, he had no farther rancour. He left the city in three days, and left it as free as he found it, being obliged to make a precipitate march back into Macedonia, on account of his having received information, that the Illyrians had invaded that kingdom with a great army. In his return he came to Tegea, where he restored that little republic. Thence he proceeded to Argos, and arriving there at the time the Nemean games were celebrated, had the satisfaction of receiving the highest compliments, and strongest testimonies of respect from the Greeks in general, and from every little state in particular. When he arrived in Macedon, he found all things in confusion; his own people dejected, the enemy flushed with success. He did not, however, despair, but having recruited his army, advanced to meet the Illyrians, who had brought with them a mixt rabble of Barbarians, and had hitherto bore down before them all things like a deluge. A battle quickly ensued, which proved decisive, the Macedonians obtaining a victory equally glorious and complete; but they gained it at a very great expence, the king dying a few days afterwards of a spitting of blood, induced by straining his voice during the time of the engagement. Thus Antigonus died, as he had lived, in the service of his country, having adjured the army to remain faithful to his nephew and pupil Philip; who, though a very youth, was now to take the government into his own hands. The people were in general very much grieved on the death of so good a prince; however, he left them in a better condition than they had ever been in since the days of Antipater; for they were well united, and began to resume their antient liberty<sup>a</sup>.

came

Philip began his administration very happily, and, which Philip is not a little singular, had both better reputation, and better Year of success, while he was so young as to be governed by others, the Flood, than after he managed all things according to his own will. 2778. His natural abilities were very great, for he was brave in his Before person, very eloquent, skilled in all the learning worthy of a Christ, king, and one who knew how to make himself acceptable 221. to all degrees of people. In the beginning of his reign, he was engaged in the social war in Greece, which drew after it a train of other military expeditions against the Illyrians, Ætolians, and other nations, who either made war upon the Achæans, or invaded Macedon, in order to divert Philip from succouring the last-mentioned people. All of these we have considered at large in our sixth volume: here therefore it would be superfluous to repeat them, and for that reason we shall only glance on such points, as are necessary to introduce the history of the remaining part of Philip's life, unaccounted for in that part of our work. The course of his affairs discovered to him before he was a very old man, that he had some true friends, and some very false ones; but which were his true friends, and which only pretended to be his friends, he could not discover; at least not certainly; which was the reason that he often treated his false friends with confidence, and his true ones with disdain. In the end, however, he fell to destroying them all. Apelles and Ptolemy, who had been in his councils from his accession to the throne, he put to death, the latter with, the former without, the ordinary forms of justice; neither without cause. But for Aratus the elder and his son Aratus the younger, men of the greatest worth and honour, men who had been the support of his family, his guides in his best actions, those who procured to him, and those who preserved to him, the affections of the Greeks; these he treated most detestably. The former he poisoned, the wife of the latter he debauched, while he was his guest; and then practised upon himself by giving him drugs, which by degrees disturbed his senses, and induced him to perpetrate such actions, as made his death appear rather seasonable to his friends, than untimely, as it really was. Philip, however, from such practices as these grew odious at home and abroad, yet he maintained his authority by dint of his skill in government, and his experience as a general; for though he was seldom fortunate either in conducting his projects, or in the field, yet he had happy talents in negotiation, could put on an appearance of firmness in the worst circumstances, and could improve every opportunity that offered of retrieving his affairs, though, when he had retrieved them, his ambition would never suffer him to be quiet. Wars, losses, treaties, repeated over and over again, employed thirty years and upwards of his reign; till the Romans had reduced him to such a miserable state, that he was forced to submit to the orders they sent him; to send his younger son Demetrius to Rome as a hostage, and to undertake to live in peace with all his neighbours, in consideration of their leaving him the kingdom of Macedon, circumscribed within its antient bounds, with other hard conditions, such as delivering up his ships of war, and paying by way of fine a thousand talents at several times<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> POLYB. lib. ii. PLUT. in vit. Arat. JUSTIN. lib. xxviii. c. 3. 4.

Philip struggles with the Romans.

THE subsequent war between the Romans and Antiochus seemed to offer Philip an opportunity of restoring in some measure his power; but he passed it by, not through negligence or want of discernment, for no prince in the age in which he lived was either quicker in executing, or could penetrate farther than he: but the cause of his not stirring was this; he saw clearly that the strength of his kingdom was much exhausted, and that his revenues were in no condition to support the charges of a war. When this struggle was over, and the war against the Ætolians commenced, he attempted to take part therein for his own advantage, coming down with an army to the siege of Lamia, at the same time that the consul Acilius lay before Heraclea. But when Philip had brought the town almost to extremity, the consul sent to command him to raise his siege, not with any design to save the city, but that he might take it himself. However, the king was allowed to turn his arms for the present into Athamania and towards Thrace; but no sooner had he made some conquests of importance, than complaints were made against him at Rome, and the Romans immediately appointed commissioners, who were to go over to Greece, with full power to hear and determine; in consequence of which, they did accordingly summon all parties before them, pronounce judgment against Philip, and order him to content himself with Macedonia in its antient state. Philip, stung with so severe a sentence, could not help saying, that he had not seen his last sun set, of which many constructions were made, most of them little to his advantage. In the mean time there sprung up divisions in his family, and a spirit of discord began to appear among his subjects. His eldest son Perseus he had begotten on a concubine, whence he was not so much respected as his younger brother Demetrius. This Demetrius was not only happy in the people's affections, but was really a prince of extraordinary merit. He had a sincere affection for his father, a most tender love for his country, and had conceived a high respect for the Romans; among whom he had remained some time a hostage, and was afterwards dismissed with great respect. His brother Perseus, observing what regard Philip paid him, how fond the Macedonians were of him, and what an interest he had at Rome, began to hate him very heartily, and to do him privately all the mischief he could. The hatred of Philip towards the Romans began by degrees to appear, not only by words escaping him at unawares, but by his endeavouring to increase his revenues, by augmenting the customs upon merchandize, and causing the mines to be every-where put under a new regulation, at the same time that he granted large privileges to certain cities, and endeavoured all that in him lay to encourage foreigners to come and settle in his kingdom. Demetrius saw plainly the drift of this, and therefore advised his father

<sup>1</sup> PLUT. in vit. Arat. & Philopœm. POLYB. Hist. lib. iv.
JUSTIN. lib. xxx, xxxi, xxxii. See Vol. VI. p. 494.

to

to desist from all projects against the Romans, who, as he affirmed, would be ever too powerful for him ; wherefore it was better that he should use their friendship for the supporting at least, if not for the augmenting, his dominions, than that, out of a vain hope of recovering part of what he had lost, he should hazard all that remained, and which he might be said to hold from their courtesy. Philip was too great a politician not to discern the strength of his son's arguments, yet he could not prevail with himself to follow them. He remembered the great reputation of his ancestors, and was ashamed to see himself, with greater abilities than most of the kings of Macedon, cramped up in narrower bounds than their enemies had ever prescribed them. He took this the worse, because, as he conceived, he had deserved well of the Romans ; he alone had assisted them in the Ætolian war ; he had given a passage to their army through his country, and had yielded obedience to their decrees when they touched him to the quick. He could not therefore endure, that Eumenes king of Pergamus should be gratified by them in every thing he asked, and himself at the same time as steadily refused things which in his opinion were his right. His discontent was augmented by a decree of the Romans, which peremptorily required him to withdraw his garisons from Ænus and Maronea, maritime towns of Thrace. Philip pleaded, that if these cities were at liberty, they would become weak and defenceless places, and fall easily into the hands of the Thracians and Dardanians, wild and barbarous nations, whom, by retaining these cities in his hands, he kept from doing what they had often practised in former times, viz. making inroads into Macedon. The Romans looked on all these pretences as so many frivolous excuses, which, when Philip understood, he determined with himself to comply with their demands, but at the same time to revenge himself on the Maronites, whose clamours had obtained the decree. With this view he sent orders for his garisons to leave those cities, yet at the same time sent instructions to Onomastus, who was his governor of the maritime coast of Macedonia, to strike such a blow, as that the Maronites might not be too much transported with their liberty. Onomastus transmitted his orders to Cassander, one of the king's officers in Maronea, advising him privately to let in the Thracians, which he did ; and they plundered the city with all the circumstances of cruelty and avarice which could possibly be imagined. Without all doubt, a contrivance of this sort was executed with as much secrecy as possible ; yet so it fell out, that the Roman deputies gained such positive intelligence, that they charged it home upon the king ; and the the Romans thereupon directed, that he should justify himself before the senate. This was a new mortification, the rather, because he was commanded to send Onomastus and Cassander thither; which he conceived to be an high indignity offered to him, who was an independent prince, and expected to have been believed on his word. Yet, to preserve himself from being destroyed, before he was strong enough to make resistance, he yielded, though with some constraint, to the conditions imposed upon him. Onomastus, he protested, he could not send, because he was a person whose service he needed, and whose innocence, he affirmed, sufficiently appeared, in that he was not near the city at the time it was taken and sacked. Cassander he sent, but took care to have him poisoned by the way, and then well knowing that the Romans would not pass by such a scene of extraordinary actions, he ordered his son Demetrius to repair to Rome, with notes of the answers he had to make to the objections raised against his conduct, and also a schedule of grievances which might serve to justify his conduct, if it should appear as extraordinary as it was represented. Demetrius, furnished with these credentials, came to Rome; but when he was admitted to defend his father's cause before the senate, he was so much amazed at the weight of the several charges brought against him, that he was not able to return any answer at all. Yet, in regard to his youth, his inexperience, and the great personal regard they had for him, he was permitted to make use of his father's notes, out of which he read what he thought would have greatest weight. The cause over, he had liberty given him to return home, and by him was sent the ratification of the treaty formerly made, and his excuses accepted; but with this express clause, that all was done out of regard to his son, which was also signified to him by the ambassador resident in Macedon. A circumstance which did not please Philip, and did very little good to Demetrius, whom his father began to believe more attached to the Romans than himself; though in truth the young man only stood in more fear of them than his father did, because he was better acquainted with their power and arts than he. Philip failed not to use the leisure he had acquired by his son's negotiation, in providing effectually for war, when all negotiation should fail. In pursuit of this design, he took such steps as proved him to be a man of deep foresight, and one who was as well able to struggle with fortune as any king that ever lived. In the first place, perceiving his subjects on the sea-coast were not only greatly addicted to peace, but likewise strongly inclined to the Romans, he immediately transplanted these into

Æmathia,

Æmathia, and brought multitudes of Thracians to inhabit the sea-coast, who were in themselves a hardy warlike people, and who, he was sure, would depend upon him as the author of their settlements, and him from whom they were to expect all things. Finding the Dardanians, a barbarous nation, who were the implacable enemies of the Macedonians, not to be wrought upon by fair means, and that it was no way in his power either to bridle or subdue them by force, he bethought himself of a very extraordinary expedient for the ridding himself and his people of these bad neighbours, and of getting better in their room. He sent certain deputies whom he could trust to the Bastarnæ, a very numerous people, inhabiting the banks of the river Ister, now the Danube, to persuade them to leave their old seats, and to come and possess themselves of Dardania, which was a country far preferable to their own, and in the conquest of which he promised to assist them. There was one difficulty, however, to be adjusted, which was their getting to Dardania, because in their march thither, they were first of all to lead with them their wives and children; and secondly, they were to cross the dominions of several Thracian princes. The first seemed to require a great deal of time, the latter to render the scheme absolutely impracticable. Philip, however, devised means for removing both difficulties; he offered to remit them money to furnish them with necessaries for their journey, and, by presents made to the petty princes of Thrace, he procured for them a safe passage through their dominions. But while his mind was big with these vast projects, he found things of importance enough to disquiet him near home. His subjects, whom he had transported from the coasts of Macedonia, testified their discontents aloud, and complained vehemently of the king's want of affection towards his countrymen, that could consent to transport them hither and thither, merely to make way for strangers and barbarians. If Philip had taken little notice of these passionate speeches, it is very probable they would in a short time have passed over; for except that they had lost their old habitations, these people had small cause to repine, being rather gainers than losers by the exchange they had been forced to make. But the king, who was naturally cruel, and grew more and more jealous as he grew in years, construing those sharp speeches into rebellion, began with acts of severity to exasperate the people, and to make such disloyal, who were before but impatient. These steps, instead of supporting, embarrassed all his other projects, and induced by degrees such mischiefs, as, with all his policy, he knew neither how to remedy, nor how to endure.

The

The quarrels in his family grew daily wider and wider; Perseus encouraged all who either ridiculed or declaimed seriously against the Romans, and Demetrius openly vindicated the Romans against all such. An accident at last happened, which increased those dissensions which were already but too fierce, and was attended with such consequences as could hardly have been foreseen. Philip, at a certain stated season, gave directions for lustrating the army, a ceremony heretofore described, and of which we shall say nothing more here, than that it was concluded by the representation of a fight, the army dividing for that purpose, and one half combating the other. The two young princes were commanders in this mock-engagement, and their companions rashly instigating them to shew their skill and bravery therein, a great deal of mischief ensued. In the end Demetrius prevailed. Perseus at the first was very much discontented, but when his counsellors shewed him, that this intemperate heat in his brother might furnish him with a very plausible complaint to his father, he grew better satisfied, and consulted on this subject with his confidants. In the evening both princes entertaining their friends, some of Perseus's spies were discovered at Demetrius's table, and, on account of their insolent behaviour, were first well beaten, and then expelled. But when the company had drank more freely, Demetrius, who was naturally good-humoured, would needs go to see his brother, that he might shew he was no way disaffected to him; those young men, who had lately beaten his spies, desired Demetrius to excuse them, to which he would by no means consent, believing that he should be able so to compose matters, as to give Perseus satisfaction. Those young men, having quite another opinion of his brother's temper, took care privately to arm themselves for fear of the worst, which when others, who were Perseus's discreeter spies observed, they instantly went and acquainted him with; he and the counsellors about him immediately determined, that this was the grand opportunity they sought, wherefore they caused the doors to be immediately barricadoed, at which, on his arrival, Demetrius expressing great surprize, his brother from within called to him to be gone, told him, he must take some other time, for that at present he was too well guarded to be assassinated. Presently after Demetrius was accused by his brother to their father of an attempt to murder him; and it was suggested, that he did this in confidence that the Romans would support him, and, to give colour to this suggestion, Perseus took notice of a letter from T. Quintius, wherein it was recommended to him to send Demetrius once again to Rome better attended than formerly, as the best means to procure favour for himself. Demetrius, on the other hand, defended himself boldly, and, without shewing any apprehension for the consequences, he recapitulated all the passages of the day; he bitterly inveighed against his brother for turning the exercise of the army into a struggle for the crown, and for representing actions of merriment and play as the effects of some gloomy conspiracy; he avowed his purpose to visit his brother, but disclaimed any sinister view, or any thought in himself, to practise against his brother's life. As for any dependance on the Romans, he said, that those only who were unacquainted with that people, could suggest, they would support so base and black a conspiracy; that the affection they had for himself proceeded, if not from his own virtue, at least from their opinion of it, which would have been effectually forfeited by so nefarious an enterprize; he concluded with a solemn asseveration, that, notwithstanding what was passed, he still loved Perseus as his brother; that he revered the king as his parent and his sovereign, and that he had ever sought to promote the peace of Macedon, as that which was most conducive to its power and grandeur. Philip, having calmly heard all that was said on both sides, decided prudently, and with a great shew of justice. He blamed Demetrius for acting in such a manner, as to give the least colour to his brother's charge; he reprehended Perseus for putting the worst construction on dubious actions; rising at length from his seat, he declared, that he would pass no judgment on the passages of a day, and the discourses at a dinner, but would believe of his sons whatever their future actions should speak them, exhorting them to take what had now happened for warning, and to be extremely circumspect in their conduct for the future. Notwithstanding this grave and disinterested speech, the king leaned for the time to come wholly to his eldest son; with him he consulted on all his affairs; and him only he made privy to the projects he had formed, for regaining a part at least of what the Romans had taken from him. As for Demetrius, he countenanced him publicly, but kept him a stranger to his councils. In the mean time he formed in his own breast a scheme, which, as he thought, would put him out of doubt, as to the intentions of his young son, either by demonstrating his innocence, or making his guilt apparent. With this view he chose Philotes and Apelles, Macedonian noblemen, who, as far as his intelligence reached, had never sided with either of the brethren, to go ambassadors to Rome; their public instruc-

instructions ran to assure the state of his maintaining the present good correspondence between himself and them ; but they were privately directed to inquire into his sons conduct there, who were his intimates, and what schemes he had been forming. These worthy ambassadors, perceiving on which side the king's affections leaned, addressed themselves immediately to Perseus, and with him concerted what report they should make on their return before they set out for Rome. The result of their contrivances was, that when Philocles and Apelles came back, they spoke very tenderly of Demetrius, and presented the king a letter from Titus Quintius, whose seal, before he opened it, the king, who was well acquainted with it, observed ; wherein the Roman interceded earnestly for his younger son, excusing his wrong practices from his youth, and beseeching the king to pass by the measures he had taken to supplant his brother, the rather because all Demetrius's hopes from the Romans were vain and ill founded, since himself, who loved him so well, would never have countenanced so base an action. Philip made no question that he had now discovered the truth, and therefore marched his army towards mount Hæmus, on a frivolous pretext of viewing the country, but in truth, that he might have the better opportunity of putting Demetrius under an arrest, which he accordingly did, giving one Didas the command of the guard placed upon him. This commander too was one of Perseus's creatures, and by his directions found a way to compleat the ruin of the young prince. He insinuated to him, that though his father had placed him as a kind of keeper, yet he was so much moved with a sense of his misfortunes, that to deliver him out of them he would be content to run any risque whatever. The hapless Demetrius, swallowing the bait, confessed that he desired to fly to Rome, there to pass his days in safety out of the reach of his vindictive brother. Didas having communicated this to the king, received from him a command to take off his prisoner by poison ; but withal, he was cautioned to do it privately, on account of the love born by the Macedonians to the young prince, as well as for fear of the Romans. Didas, according to his master's orders, poisoned Demetrius ; but the drug working slowly, and the young man complaining bitterly, the business began to take air ; upon which Didas picked out two stout ruffians, who smothered that hopeful prince in the twenty-fifth year of his age. This was the first fact of its kind, which had fallen out in the house of Antigonus the Great, which till now had been remarkable for nothing so much as the piety of children towards parents, and the affection of parents towards children ; a doctrine which Philip himself had formerly inculcated to his sons, and which he now dispensed with merely from reason of state <sup>1</sup>.

Philip falls into a deep melancholy. THE unfortunate Demetrius was hardly in his grave, before his brother and his father altered their conduct. Perseus, having obtained all he sought for, began to be less assiduous about his father, and to act more independently than he was wont ; he did not disguise the satisfaction which the death of his competitor gave him, or endeavour to conceal the number of his dependants and the strength of his faction. Philip was too quick-sighted not to discern this alteration in his son's conduct ; he began from that moment to doubt whether all that had been told him was true, or whether a base and cruel son had not contrived to deprive him of a worthy and deserving child. These thoughts having once entered his head, he saw daily more and more circumstances tending to heighten the suspicion. At length he communicated his apprehensions to his cousin Antigenus, a man of great honour and integrity, whose frank behaviour and honest counsels had long before rendered him obnoxious to Perseus. This man readily agreed with the king, that his jealousy of Perseus was better grounded than that which he had conceived of his brother ; he farther informed him, that there was one Xychus about the court who, he had good grounds to believe, was privy to the whole contrivance ; whereupon, by the king's express command, this traitor was seized, and brought into his presence ; where, for fear of the torture, he confessed that the letter of T. Quintius Flaminius was a forgery, and that he had been employed to frame it. Philip, distracted with the thoughts of having destroyed his own child, and tortured Herodorus, a Macedonian nobleman to death, merely for being his favourite, gave himself up to a melancholy, which differed very little from madness. However, by fits and starts he acted as a king ; for laying suddenly hold of Philacles, he first extorted from him a confession, and then put him to death ; Apelles would have shared his fate, if he had not secured himself by flight, withdrawing into Italy, in hopes of receiving there the news of his master's death, whom age and grief had now brought into a very declining condition. As for Perseus, though he did not retire out of Macedon, yet he kept upon the borders, quite deserting his father's court, expecting with impatience the happy minute which should make it his own. Philip, having now a true sense of his misery, plainly perceived that his arts served only to render him suspected; that his cruelty had made him odious; that the Romans spared him only out of respect to his ancestors; and that his death, as it was expected, so it was also generally wished for at home and abroad. In this untoward situation he formed a design of altering the succession of the crown, and having exposed the whole contrivance of his son Perseus against his brother Demetrius to the Macedonians, he earnestly recommended it to them to set Antigonus on the throne, which a little after he left vacant, dying of grief, when he had reigned forty-two years, and began to draw towards threescore. This end had Philip, who with great natural parts had an excellent education, and in process of time all that experience could add to perfect his wisdom. He was the author of his own misfortunes, for his tutor Antigonus left him in far happier circumstances than he could ever arrive at, after he presumed by his own judgment to change the face of affairs. In him it is pretended the prophecy of a certain Sibyl was fulfilled, who foretold, that as the Macedonians owed the extension of their power to a Philip, so a Philip should bring on its extinction. It is indeed observable, that these Philips had a likeness in their characters, though not in the success of their designs; they were both generals, both orators, both politicians; but they differed in this, that the first Philip was debonaire, open, and full of clemency, affecting empire, but affecting also so mild a government, as to leave men in doubt whether they should not prefer it to liberty; whereas the other Philip was suspicious, implacable, ready to shed blood, and alike covetous of power, and of making himself terrible by his power. The first was prosperous in all things, the latter prospered not in any <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> LIV. Hist. lib. xxxix. xl. POLYB. excerpt. Hist. lib. vii. & ix. DIODOR. SICUL. excerpt. lib. xxvi. JUSTIN. lib. xxxii. did

If Philip had entered upon this scheme of his ever so little earlier, he had in all probability succeeded; for we do not find that the Macedonians were much addicted to Perseus, or, that they at all disliked Antigonus; but inasmuch as the king thought not of it till his life grew near a close, Perseus found means to bribe his physician Caligines, who gave him from time to time notice of his father's state of health, and who advised him of his death a considerable time

Perseus.
Year of
the Flood, 2820.
Before
Christ,
179.

<sup>k</sup> TIR. LIV. lib. xli JUSTIN. lib. xxxii.

before he suffered it to be known to the public. Perseus, laying hold of this opportunity, came unexpectedly to the city of Demetrias, where his father died, with a body of troops, and seated himself on the throne by force. His first care was to settle himself firmly, which he conceived could not be done, till Antigonus was taken off; he began his reign therefore with shedding blood, and little regarding either the virtues of the man, or his near relation to his own family, he caused him to be put to death. Then he began to take gentler measures, and to put on the appearance of clemency and generosity; virtues with which in truth he was wholly unacquainted. We have before mentioned Philip's inviting the Bastarnæ to change their cold barren seats for the fruitful country of Dardania. This project with much difficulty he had brought to bear in the very last year of his life; and these people were then actually on their march through Thrace to the country he had offered them. But when the news of Philip's death came to be published, this business began to go backwards. The Bastarnæ themselves doubted, whether it were best for them to proceed, and the Thracians were irresolute as to the permission of their further progress. Hereupon quarrels ensued, under pretence that the Thracians exacted on the Bastarnæ in their markets, whence a war took rise, in which at first the Thracians were grievously handled, losing all the plain country to their new guests, who, not contented therewith, began to follow them to the mountains. In this expedition their fortune failed them, and either the despair of the Thracians, or, as some authors have reported, a miraculous tempest of hail, rain, and lightning, compelled the far greatest part of these barbarous invaders to return with their wives and children to their antient dwellings. Only thirty thousand penetrated into Dardania, and began there to carve out for themselves new settlements, wherein they were privately assisted by Perseus, who well knew both the nature and importance of his father's scheme. His circumstances did not allow him to act according to his inclination; his pride and avarice swelled his bosom with almost all the vices capable of deforming the human will; his fear, however, taught him to counterfeit some of the virtues which give the highest lustre to a crown. Moved by the terror of their greatness, he sent an embassy to the Romans, intreating them to renew the league made with his father, and to acknowledge him for king of Macedon, promising in return to act as their faithful ally, to leave his neighbours in peace, and to undertake no war without their permission. At home he affected all things that might reconcile him to the minds of the people;

he not only curbed his innate thirst of wealth, and made a shew of generosity, but his administration was also wonderfully mild, and, above all, he affected a rigid regard to justice. He sat daily to hear causes, and having a clear head, decided upon them with some applause. Towards the Greeks he behaved with the utmost moderation; he gratified them in all things they desired of him; he relinquished all the pretences of his ancestors upon any of their cities; in short he behaved so over graciously, that his very favours rendered him suspected. The Romans, when they had heard his ministers, sent over ambassadors of their own into Macedon, who were kindly entertained by Perseus, till they began to act like tutors. First, they interrogated him about the Bastarnæ, and began to intimate, that the Romans would not see the Dardanians subjected by these barbarians. Perseus affirmed, that he did not invite them; but that would not serve his turn, they were for forcing him to drive them back again. Shortly after the Dolopians, who were the subjects of Perseus, rebelled, and slew Euphanor his governor, under pretence that he had behaved tyrannically; Perseus marched against them with an army, and by force reduced them again under his dominion, not without chastising them pretty severely for their revolt; this furnished the Roman ambassadors with new cause of complaint; they said, he was tied up by his treaty from making war without the consent of their state; they intimated as much to Perseus, while he was in the field; but he would not hear of being tied up from punishing rebels, which to him appeared little less than taking from him his kingdom. Henceforward therefore the Romans and he were never upon good terms, though they were not immediately engaged in war, which however, the uneasiness only of their respective circumstances hindered, and not any inclination in either to enter into an amicable disquisition of the causes whence the discord between them sprung. After subduing the Dolopians, Perseus went to make a visit to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, marching, however, at the head of his army; this seemed to be at once a dangerous and unnecessary expedition, on account of his passing through the territories of states little affected to him, and to whom indeed the conduct of his father might have justly rendered him obnoxious; yet Perseus so managed it, as not only to avoid giving farther offence, but also to make this very march a means of restoring friendship and confidence between himself and these states. He took such care in quartering his army, that none were oppressed, and paid so exactly for whatever they had, that many thought his his passage a benefit to them. The deputies which were sent to compliment him, he received kindly and with respect ; and when he had performed his journey to Delphi, he returned without leaving any mark either of resentment or ambition behind him. This was a new cause of complaint at Rome, where, if the king lived upon ill terms with his neighbours, it was resented as a mark of his thirst of power ; and if he was desirous of being upon good terms with them, that too was resented as an indication of his seeking allies, in case he made war with the Romans. To say the truth, suspicion reigned at present in Italy and in Greece, the Romans holding none for friends who scrupled obedience in any thing ; and the Greeks began to distrust the Roman friendship, when they found it as fatal to their liberty as the enmity of others<sup>k</sup>. Hence two factions sprung up in Greece, the one wholly dependent on Rome, the other desirous of restoring the ancient glory of their country, and therefore favouring the king of Macedon, who on all occasions affected to speak warmly on this topic, and to represent the independency of Greece as the main point he had in view. As a war was generally expected, and as the king himself meant at last to recur to force, he took great pains to be well provided for it ; he cultivated the friendship of the Rhodians, who had been his father's open enemies, and this with such success, that in a most sumptuous manner they conveyed to him Lacdice the daughter of Seleucus, son to Antiochus the Great<sup>l</sup>. About the same time he married his sister to Prusias king of Bithynia, whom he had engaged in alliance with him. With the Thracians he not only struck up a peace, but drew them to consent to furnish him with soldiers, when and in what proportion he pleased. In his own kingdom of Macedon, he not only laid up vast sums of money, but provided magazines of provisions for a great army for ten years, keeping up at the same time thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse. These steps appeared so prudent to the Greeks, that, forgetting Eumenes king of Pergamus, their old favourite, upon whom they had heaped extravagant honours, they began to incline to Perseus, who gave himself out for the patron of the Greek liberty against the pride of the Romans ; Eumenes, provoked at this, and being also an hereditary enemy to Perseus whom he greatly hated, determined to make a special journey to Rome on purpose to incite the senate to pull down his competitor, whom he now looked on as the idol of Greece. Perseus had also his ambassadors, the chief of whom was one Harpalus, at Rome, who, when Eumenes had been heard, requested to speak in the king's defence. This was granted them, and Harpalus, who was at the head of the commission, either of his own head, or by direction from the king, spoke in very high terms. He said, that Perseus had hitherto and would always give every reasonable satisfaction to the Romans, but that he would still remember he was a sovereign prince; and if reasonable satisfaction would not content them, he would not be afraid of betaking himself to arms. The senate acted with its usual caution, concealed the substance of Eumenes's speech, that it might be thought to contain more than it really did, and gave the ambassadors of Perseus a cold general answer. Eumenes, when he went from Rome, resolved to imitate the conduct of his rival, and, in order to regain the favour of the Greeks, to visit the temple at Delphi; Perseus having intelligence of this, took special care for his reception, by causing four assassins to hide themselves behind a wall making one side of a narrow passage from the sea to the temple, whence with stones they might destroy Eumenes without being discovered themselves. This scheme was carried into execution, and very narrowly missed meeting with success. The bravos took the king at the proposed disadvantage, and so effectually stoned him, that they had not the least suspicion of his escaping death. They then endeavoured to provide for their own safety, and one of them being slower of foot than the rest, they killed him to prevent his making any discovery. However, the king came afterwards a little to himself, and was conveyed to the island of Ægina, where he lay concealed, till such time as he was perfectly recovered. In all probability, Perseus would have been well contented, notwithstanding the miscarriage of his design, if it had remained a secret; but it was his misfortune to have the whole break out with such evidence as could scarce be denied. One Praxo, a lady of quality at Delphi, with whom king Perseus had lodged, had entertained the assassins, and one of them was known to be Evander, a Cretan, who was general of the auxiliary troops in the service of the king of Macedon. Valerius, a Roman ambassador in Greece, caused Praxo to be seized and sent into Italy, where they had scarce made discovery of the plot against Eumenes, when the news of another, which more nearly concerned them, came from the diligence of the same person. Valerius brought with him one Rammius, a citizen of Brundisium, who opened the following scene: he said, that having a large house in his native city, he had often entertained the Macedonian ambassadors, when passing to Rome, and returning thence home. That king Perseus, having given him to understand that he took very kindly his civility to his ministers, invited him into Macedon, and when he was come thither, caused to be proposed to him the giving of a certain poisonous drug to the principal senators who were esteemed enemies to the Macedonian interest, which poison Rammius was informed would work imperceptibly. That for fear of his own life he had accepted this commission, but had immediately disclosed it to Valerius, and with him came home. The Romans upon this dispatched orders to their ambassadors in Macedon to acquaint Perseus with the crimes laid to his charge, and to demand direct answers; of which the king being informed, he put off their audience several times, and having at length tired out their patience, they resolved to return home. When they were about to put this design in execution, he sent for them, and heard all they had to say. In answer to their harangue, he fell rudely upon their masters: he said the Romans were grown so intolerably proud, so excessively insolent, and so unreasonably greedy of authority, that they would not be content to have princes for their allies, unless they were also their slaves. That under colour of sending ambassadors, they sent spies, and sometimes tutors; that as to the league made with his father, he had nothing to do with it. That he had indeed submitted to it on his first coming to the crown, because his affairs were unsettled; but that for the future he would not look upon himself to be bound by it, though he was content to make a new treaty upon equitable terms. The ambassadors having according to their instructions defied him; he commanded them to depart his dominions in three days. It was the misfortune of this king to have at some times too much, and at other times too little, spirit. If he had begun the war with the same vigour that on this occasion he seemed to declare it, in all probability he had succeeded therein; but suffering fear to get the better of him, and entertaining false hopes of peace, he once more fell into a train of negotiation, than which nothing could be more prejudicial to his affairs. Before we proceed farther, it will be necessary to take notice of the conduct of the princes, whose dominions bordered on those of Macedon in this nice conjuncture. Gentius king of Illyria, and the Rhodians, inclined to the Macedonian side, for which reason the Romans dealt haughtily with them for the present, and very severely afterwards. Eumenes king of Pergamus did not only discover his usual complaisance for the Romans, but also the most fierce and implacable hatred against Perseus. Prusias king of Bithynia desired to stand neuter. He had obligations to the Romans, and he had married the sister of the king of Macedonia. Antiochus king of Syria declared for the Romans; so did the regency in Egypt, where the king was a child. Cotys king of the Odrysians declared for the Macedonians. As for the Greek cities, those in the government were, generally speaking, in the interest of Rome, and the people in most of them as generally favourers of Perseus <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> Liv. Hist. lib. xli. Justin. lib. xxxiii. c. 4.
Legat. lx

<sup>l</sup> Polyb.

for

THE fresh applications of the king for peace produced no other answer than this, That if he was sincerely inclined to treat with the Romans, he might have an opportunity of doing it shortly in his own dominions, into which they were about to send their consul with an army. They were not at all worse than their words. P. Licinius Crassus was immediately after dispatched with an army; but, before he could arrive in Greece, Perseus had attempted another method of treating; for having been informed, that Martius, a Roman legate, was in Thessaly, he came himself down to Larissa, and there desired to have an interview with him, with which Martius complied. At this conference the artful Roman, though he talked in the high strain of his country, yet he mingled so many obliging expressions, and testified such personal respect for the king, as put him upon sending ambassadors once more to Rome, when his affairs required leading down a good army into Greece, which would have enabled his friends there to have acknowledged their attachment to him, and have prevented the Bæotians and others from declaring as they did for the Romans, merely out of fear. When Martius the Roman ambassador returned home, he valued himself very much for having over-reached the king, and drawn him into a truce; for he had agreed to one for a certain time, whereby himself, who was in a condition of acting, was bound up, and the Romans had time given them, till they could be in a condition to act. The ambassadors of Perseus, who came in consequence of this truce to Rome, had audience given them; but, notwithstanding they signified the king's readiness to give full and ample satisfaction on every head, they received a very short answer, and were commanded to quit Italy in thirty days. When these ambassadors returned, Perseus with much ado perceived that peace was upon no terms to be had, and therefore, as if it had been against his will, though his counsels had hitherto always led that way, he began to prepare for opening the war. He appointed the general rendezvous of his army at Citium, whither when he himself came, he offered a hecatomb to Pallas, and then proceeded to a general review. He mustered on this occasion thirty nine thousand foot and four thousand horse: the most numerous and by far the finest army, that, since Alexander's expedition into Asia, any Macedonian king had brought into the field. The king having viewed them, mounted his tribunal, from whence he made a long and laboured harangue, entering into a detail of all that had passed between himself and the Romans, from his accession to the crown to that time, which the soldiers heard with some attention and moderate signs of satisfaction; but when at the close he represented the antient glory of the Macedonians, and the misery to which the Romans sought to reduce them in pathetic terms, the army shouted aloud, and promised him that they would die in the field to a man, rather than not equal their ancestors, and redeem their country from any apprehensions of being subjected by this new and arrogant state. The king after this gave audience to the deputies from the several cities of Macedon, each of which offered men, money, and provisions for carrying on the war. Perseus testified the pleasure he received from these tokens of their loyalty, but told them in answer, that as the war he made was for their defence, so he would endeavour that it should be carried on without any burthen or expence to them, and therefore, except carriages for his baggage, he would expect nothing at present from them. These were quickly furnished, and the king took his rout into Theffaly, whither soon after came the Roman consul with two legions, in hopes of finding a confederate army, ready to receive him, strong enough to have faced Perseus; but herein he was mistaken, and, as soon as he found his mistake, was compelled to act slowly and cautiously. The Macedonian king in the mean time had abundance of cities opened to him, and several of those that did not yield, he took by force. At length he began to waste the country about Pherea, notwithstanding the consul lay with his army within a few miles of it; and though he had in his army several kings and princes, who came on purpose to shew their fidelity to the Romans and their hatred to Perseus. The consul, however, durst not adventure to offer the enemy battle, which when the Macedonian perceived, he advanced within twelve miles of him, and with his horse and light-armed troops came and insulted him in his camp. This he repeated several days together, though he was obliged to send every day carriages laden with casks of water to refresh his troops, there being none in the road. At length he took a nearer station by seven miles, from whence he could with greater facility march to and disturb the Roman camp. Accordingly, instead of coming as he was wont to do a little before noon, he appeared next

<sup>m</sup> LIV. lib. xlii. POLYB. Legat. lxi. lxii. lxiii. DIODOR. SICUL. excerpt. lib. xxvi.

next morning before the Roman camp by break of day. The whole camp was in confusion, and the soldiers began to have but an indifferent opinion of a consul, whose first intelligence of the enemy came from the noise of their arms. Licinius drew up the foot within the camp, the horse and light-armed troops he sent to fight the Macedonians. When Perseus perceived them issuing from their camp, he drew his own forces into a line within five hundred paces of their retrenchments. Cotys king of the Odrysians took post with his own troops on the left. The Macedonian and Cretan horse on the right. The king with his household troops in the centre, having before them a forlorn of four hundred slingers and archers. On the other side all the Roman and Italian horse were in the right, under the command of Caius Licinius Crassus. The troops of the allies in the left. Quintus Mucius with a choice corps of horse was in the centre, having before him a troop of a hundred Gauls, and three hundred of the horse brought by Eumenes. Four hundred Thessalian horse were placed as a corps of reserve on the left of the left wing, and the rest of the forces of Eumenes, under the command of himself and his brother Attalus, drew up behind the last line of horse between them and the retrenchments. The action was lively, and quickly over, ending every-where to the advantage of the Macedonians. Cotys with his Thracians beat the flower of the Roman cavalry. King Perseus in the centre broke the auxiliaries, and greater slaughter had been made, if the Thessalian horse with the light-armed troops had not covered the retreat of the rest into the camp. The troops on each side were about four thousand. The Romans lost two hundred horse killed on the spot, as many taken prisoners; and of the foot there were no less slain than two thousand. Of the Macedonians there fell twenty horse and forty foot only. While Perseus remained in the field, his generals, Hippias and Leonatus, without staying for his command, brought up the phalanx, and pressed him to storm the enemy's retrenchments. If he had followed their advice, in all probability he had put an end to the war; for by this time the very Greeks, who were in the service of the Romans, began to perceive they were rivetting their own chains, and would gladly have laid hold of any opportunity of declaring against their masters with safety. But the cowardly counsel of Evander the Cretan, who had managed the assassination of Eumenes, prevailed with Perseus to let things remain as they were till next day; but the consul prevented his taking such an advantage a second time, by passing the river Peneus in the night, and betaking himself to an advantageous vantageous post. The next day Perseus came with his horse and foot to take a view of what they might have done the day before; afterwards he advanced to Mopselus, under colour of frightening the Romans in their new quarters, but in truth, that he might have an opportunity of treating with the consul. Accordingly he sent deputies to acquaint him, that, notwithstanding his late victory, he was contented to accept of the terms which had been granted to his father Philip after he was vanquished. The consul answered, that he would grant him no terms, but those of submitting himself and his kingdom to the discretion of the Roman people. The king, not yet to be discouraged, sent again to offer tribute, and when he found this application also vain, he retired to his old camp. This pusillanimous conduct ruined him in the opinion both of his friends and foes; the Romans would grant him nothing, and the Greeks were afraid to express any inclination towards him, having no reason to expect that he would defend them, who had so little heart to defend himself. When Perseus found that he had no choice but war, he began to renew it, and as he had once been very near surprizing the Roman camp, he thought to be quicker the next time; but the Roman consul was become more careful, and so his forced marches had no other consequences than fatiguing his troops. He then fell upon their foragers with some success, but this drawing on another horrid battle, he was routed with considerable loss; whereupon he retired into Macedon<sup>n</sup>. On his retreat the consul recovered several places in Thessaly, and Lucretius the Roman admiral levied heavy contributions on the Greek coast. Afterwards Appius Claudius was sent to penetrate Macedon on the side of Illyria; but he had very ill entertainment, for the inhabitants of a frontier town pretending to betray it, the Roman general entered it so carelessly, that they had an opportunity of falling upon his troops, which they used so well, that he was glad to make a very precipitate retreat. However, not long after he took it, while Perseus with great trouble made an expedition into Ætolia; the principal city in which, it was promised should be yielded up to him. In this the king miscarried; but in his return he took several places, and having strengthened one of his lieutenant generals with some recruits, that general fell upon Claudius, routed him, and retook Uscana. The next spring the consul Martius was sent to command against Perseus. As soon as he came to the army he began to make war in earnest; his intent was to penetrate into the very heart of Macedonia, which, however, he found a very difficult matter. Perseus had distributed his forces in such a manner as to guard all the passes, not knowing where the enemy would break through; encamping himself at Dium with a considerable corps of troops, that he might be ready to assist any of his guards that should be attacked. This was wisely enough contrived, if he had executed his scheme with tolerable courage. The Roman consul attempted to pass over a very high mountain at a small distance from his camp; the road through which he was to pass was extremely narrow, and very much encumbered, so that if there had been no enemy at hand to oppose him, the passage had been difficult enough. Hippias, however, with a body of Macedonian foot appeared in his way, and such trouble they gave him, that he neither knew how to proceed, nor how to retire. If Perseus had supported his own soldiers, the consul had been undone; but he spent his time in making courses with his cavalry, so that Hippias was left to fight it out, and Martius with much ado got into the famous vale of Tempe, contrary to all expectation, and when he might have been repelled with ease, or, which was worse, might have been starved with all his army. As soon as the timorous Perseus received the news of the Roman consul's being in full march towards him, he instantly fled from Dium, a place strong by situation, and well fortified, crying out, that he was vanquished without a battle, and that all was lost; he also dispatched orders to Andronicus, governor of Thessalonica, to burn the arsenal there with all the naval stores he had with so much pains laid up; and to Nicias, governor of Pella, he sent positive directions to throw all his treasures into the sea. The former of these orders, Andronicus, who received it, had too much wisdom to execute; the latter Nicias conceived delivered in terms too precise to be disobeyed, so the treasures were instantly thrown into the sea. When the king recovered his fright a little, and perceived that the consul now he was come into Macedon could effect no great matter, he sent to have his treasures recovered by divers, which was also done, and then to reward the wisdom of Andronicus, the loyalty of Nicias, and the labour of those poor men who had plunged to the bottom of the sea to serve him, he ordered them all to be put to death, hoping by this means to conceal from the world his scandalous meanness of spirit, in throwing up all hopes the very moment he was attacked. With the same view he sent for Philippus and Asclepiodatus, who had so bravely defended the passage, and after having with great heat reproved them at the head of the army, he with much seeming reluctance left them in their commands: had they attempted to defend their conduct, which in itself was above censure, they had without doubt shared in the fate of Andronicus, Nicias, and the divers. In the mean time the consul Martius took possession of Dium, and advanced farther into Macedonia, having sent orders to the prætor Lucretius at Larissa to transport with all diligence provisions for his army into Macedon. Whether the prætor executed the commands sent him with all the care he was able, or whether the badness of the roads permitted not the waggons to proceed farther than Phila, certain it is, that there they stopped. The consul the farther he marched found his distress still increase, so that, terrified with the fear of losing his whole army, he suddenly did what the king had done before, abandoned all that was already in his power, and marched precipitately back to Phila. Perseus seized this opportunity, and, after having given directions for repairing Dium, encamped on the river Eunipus, where he fortified himself so well, that the consul durst not attack him, and, which was still worse, could not advance farther into the country, so that except taking the city of Heraclea, he did nothing throughout the whole campaign. To shew his good-will, however, he sent orders to the Roman admiral to make descents on the sea-coast, and to make himself master of all, or at least of most of, the considerable ports<sup>n</sup>. In obedience to these directions, the admiral first attempted Thessalonica, but with very indifferent success; the country about it he ravaged, but for the city itself he found his forces were not either able to invest, or to attack it, so he sailed still along the coast, landing and attacking the little cities of Ænia and Antigonia, without being able to take either. Then proceeding to Cassandria he was there joined by king Eumenes with twenty ships of war; they both agreed to besiege the citadel of Cassandria in form, which accordingly they did, and for some time proceeded successfully by sap; but while they sounded an alarm in their camp, and made other dispositions for a false attack to amuse the garrison, the besieged suddenly sallied and surprized them, cutting off the miners, and the troops who were sent to support them. A little after they received relief by sea, whereupon king Eumenes and the Roman admiral reembarked their troops, and stood away for Demetrias. When they arrived before that city, they again landed; but there they found Euphra-

<sup>n</sup> Liv. lib. xliii.

<sup>n</sup> TIT. LIV. Hist. lib. xliv.

nor, a Macedonian general; who, having a fine corps of troops under his command, not satisfied with preserving the city, encamped before it, and would not so much as suffer the Romans to pillage the country without calling them to a severe account; whereupon the admiral once more embarked his forces, being obliged to put an end to the campaign on his side, having done just nothing at all. The prætor Appius Claudius lay all this while in Illyria with a body of troops; but whether he was never strong enough to invade Macedon, or whether king Perseus by himself or his lieutenants defeated him in any expedition for that purpose, we know not, having none but Roman guides to instruct us; this is certain, that by the end of the campaign he was in a very miserable condition, insomuch, that he earnestly demanded of the Achæans a reinforcement of five thousand men, which he had certainly received, if the envy of Martius the consul had not induced him to send a contrary order under pretence of sparing the Roman allies<sup>o</sup>. These successless proceedings, joined with some apprehensions that the Romans were not very well affected to any kings, induced Eumenes to think of changing sides, and of coming to some agreement with his old enemy Perseus. He thought, however, that his friendship, being of great value, ought to be well paid for, and knowing that the Macedonian had heaped up large treasures, he set his amity at a very high price, no less than fifteen hundred talents. This also he required to be paid down, promising to give hostages for his observing an exact neutrality; and if a further sum was paid him, to make peace for him with the Romans. Perseus liked every thing but parting with the money, and to this even the giving of hostages would not persuade him, though nothing could be clearer, than that the single detaching of Eumenes from the Roman interest was of much greater value than that sum. The policy of Perseus ran quite a contrary way, he fancied, that his very negotiations would produce the desired effect without parting with a talent; and herein he was right, for they did produce an inveterate hatred between the Romans and their old friend Eumenes; but that hatred did not produce him any good, and we shall see that the same conduct had the like event in other places. Illyria was the only side of the Macedonian kingdom which afforded a plain and open passage. This had hitherto been well secured, partly by force, partly by artfully keeping up dissensions and disputes between Gentius king of Illyria and the Romans. Perseus was very desirous of pushing this matter still farther ; he knew well, that if he could kindle a war against Rome on this side, it would at least protect his territories, and at the same time divide the forces of the republic. He therefore commissioned his ambassadors to make Gentius large offers, in case he would break with the Romans and carry on the war with vigour. This young Illyrian prince hearkened willingly to the offers made him, for he comprehended easily enough, that the Romans would extend their dominions on all sides, and that to be their ally would be only in other terms to become subject to them. He therefore plainly answered Perseus, that he was content to take a share in the war, but that he by no means could stir till he had a considerable sum of money. This mention of money stopped Perseus's mouth for a time ; however, when the consul broke into Tempe, Perseus thought he might as well give Gentius his wealth, as throw it into the sea ; wherefore he sent him ten talents by way of earnest, and sealed up three hundred more, which was the sum agreed on in the presence of the Illyrian ambassadors, and ordered them also to be conveyed to his ally ; yet here again covetousness getting the better of his fear, he directed they should make very slow marches, and stop upon the frontiers, till they had further orders. When Gentius had received from Pantaucous the Macedonian minister ten talents, and letters from his own ambassadors, importing, that three hundred more were actually upon the road, he was persuaded to take what was called the first necessary step on his side, which was to seize the Roman ambassadors, in open violation of the law of nations. Of this when Perseus had advice, he sent immediately to put a stop to the progress of the treasure waggons ; for he knew that Gentius would be forced for his own sake to engage in a war, on account of his having imprisoned the legates of the republic. This low policy issued in the ruin of the Illyrian, his kingdom, and family, at the same time that it produced Perseus no good in the world. These mistakes one would have thought might have induced the king to have thought better for the future ; but he was everlastingly steady in wrong measures, and would never be brought to act otherwise, than as a most careful treasurer for his enemies. It happened, that Clondicus, who, from the best intelligence we have, seems to have been king of the Bastarnæ, that is, of such of them as had settled themselves on the frontiers of Macedon, had agreed to bring a very considerable reinforcement to the king's army, provided, that they might enter into present pay upon reasonable terms. Perseus promised all things, and Clondicus, not dreaming that a king would break his word, set out with with ten thousand foot and as many horse, all choice troops and well disciplined. As soon as king Perseus had intelligence of their approach, he sent one Antigonus, a lord of his court, to congratulate Clondicus, and to desire him to hasten his march to the camp; when Antigonus had delivered his message, Clondicus answered him, that the Gauls could not march a step farther without money, and that if he had not brought it with him, he must return to his master and demand it instantly. Antigonus, having received this short answer, returned with all imaginable speed to his master. Perseus hereupon called a council of war, in which he made a long speech, tending only to save his money. He said, that the coming of such a number of Gauls might have a very bad tendency; and that it might be as difficult to get them out of the kingdom, as the Romans; though it was evident enough, he might have employed them immediately in Thessaly, where, whether they had acted according to his instructions or not, they must have made a very powerful diversion, and compelled the Romans to have quitted Macedonia. When Perseus had declaimed upon this head sufficiently, he proceeded to shew, that five thousand horse would be as many as he should have occasion for; and when he had delivered himself so fully on this subject, how could it be expected that any in his council should oppose it? Antigonus therefore was sent back to Clondicus to inform him, that king Perseus would accept no more than five thousand horse; intelligence which might have stirred a man of base principles to act in such a manner as Perseus most feared. Clondicus, however, made no other answer than this: That it was very extraordinary, the king should not have considered how many he wanted before they had marched so far, and at the same time recurred to his old demand, viz. whether he had brought pay for those five thousand men? Antigonus being forced to own that he had not, Clondicus and his Gauls would have no longer patience; but immediately began their march home again, spoiling some part of Thrace in their way, which created Perseus new enemies, at the same time that he was justly deprived of the assistance that he hoped from his friends. Besides the attempts already mentioned, this prince made some others, as well for the support of himself, as for the withdrawing some of their allies from their attachment to the republic. With this view he sent ambassadors to Antiochus king of Syria, with orders to represent to him, that the Romans were alike enemies to all kings, and that his turn would be next, if once Macedonia was subdued; wherefore he prayed him to interpose so far, as either to oblige the Romans to leave himself in quiet possession of the kingdom of his ancestors, or, by joining with him, bring about such a reduction of the power of the commonwealth, as to compel her to allow peace to all princes, without pretending to prescribe them laws in their own dominions. Perseus also solicited the Rhodians, who at this time were very powerful at sea, and, by flattering them, induced a favourable regard to be shewn to his interests. The consul Martius had also some points to carry with these people, he therefore insinuated to them, that if they sent deputies to Rome, they might be a means of restoring peace to this part of the world, through their mediation: but in this he most egregiously deluded them, as they found to their cost; for when their ministers had audience of the senate, and in their harangue proposed their mediation, they received an answer, not only harsh and severe, but contemptuous also in the highest degree. The ambassadors of the king of Bithynia, who likewise laboured the same point, had a cold return made them; but Onesimus, a Macedonian nobleman, whose attachment to the Romans had obliged him to leave his country, was not only favourably heard by the senate, but had a very large pension assigned him, and in all public places was treated with the highest respect. But it is now time to return to the war, which ended the next campaign in the ruin of Perseus and the total reduction of his kingdom, though that campaign was over in a fortnight<sup>p</sup>.

<sup>o</sup> Poi. x b. legat. lxxviii.

D d d 2

quiet

P. Emilius sent into Macedonia.

THE Romans had no reason to be satisfied with those who had hitherto commanded in Macedon; for though it did not appear, and perhaps it was never suspected, that they were biassed from their duty, yet they had very clearly shewn, that they wanted courage and conduct to finish the war. These commanders therefore were all removed, and new ones appointed. The consul Paulus Emilius had the command assigned him of the army already in Macedonia; Octavius was appointed admiral, and Anicius sent into Illyria. These changes were all so much for the better, that it is not easy to say, which of the three executed his charge the best. Emilius, when he arrived in the Roman camp found about thirty thousand men therein, of whom upwards of twelve thousand were Roman foot. The soldiers thought to have treated him as they had done his predecessors, so they began to question all his commands, to reason upon his orders, and to discuss in their own minds the worth of those motives upon which he acted. The consul would bear nothing of this; he advised them to whet their swords ; as for the duty of a general, he would not lay so heavy a burthen upon any of his soldiers, but was content to take it entirely upon himself. To shew them, however, that he really knew more than either they or those who had hitherto commanded them, he decamped, and drew nearer the enemy, a motion hitherto thought impracticable on account of the want of water. Emilius rightly conceived, that though there were not either springs or rivulets visible, yet it could not be, that so great a mountain as Olympus, so covered with fine grass and beautiful trees, should want water ; he therefore ordered wells to be sunk, which perfectly answered his purpose, by their becoming presently full of water ; this also raised the courage of his soldiers, and made them perfectly tractable. Emilius next directed enquiries to be privately made, whether there were not some roads, however difficult or round about, that led to the top, and so over this mount Olympus ; for the consul saw plainly, that to attack Perseus in his retrenched camp, where with extreme diligence he had fortified himself, would be to expose his troops to a most bloody and at the same time a most hazardous, encounter. His enquiries were not fruitless ; he was in a short time informed, that there was such a way as he apprehended there was, and that, as it was extremely steep and craggy, so the guard posted there was but slender. This news rejoiced him, and he thereupon detached five thousand light-armed troops, under the command of Scipio Emilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own sons, but adopted into other families. When this detachment marched from the camp, it took the road to the sea, the consul giving out, that they were to go on board the fleet, which under the command of Octavius lay upon the coast, in order to waste the maritime parts of Macedonia. But when Scipio and Q. Fabius had received the necessary provisions, and night began to fall, they faced about, and marched with all imaginable diligence up the mountain. Three days they employed in passing it, and during those three days Emilius drew out his forces, and attacked the Macedonian camp, notwithstanding that Perseus by the situation and fortifications of his camp, with the engines placed upon them, easily and constantly repulsed the Romans. At length the detachment reached and defeated the Macedonian guards, whom they surprized asleep, though they afterwards stood to their arms, and made some defence. This obstacle removed, Scipio and Fabius with their men descended by the channel of a brook, now dry, into the country below, and appeared suddenly on the other side of the Macedonian camp. Perseus apprised of this, and frightened with the report of his guards, immediately mediately decamped, and retired precipitately to Pydna. There he held a council of war, in which some of his best friends advised him to garison his strongest cities with his best troops, and to lengthen out the war, experience having shewn that the Macedonians were better able to keep cities, than the Romans were to take them; but this opinion the king rejected from this cowardly principle, that perhaps the town he chose for his residence might be first besieged. Those who with him disliked this sentiment, were for putting all upon a battle. The reasons they assigned in support of their judgment were these: First, that the army of Perseus, which consisted of somewhat more than forty thousand men, exceeded the consul's in number: Secondly, that his troops were the flower of the Macedonian infantry and horse: Thirdly, that they were to fight now for their cities, wives, and children, and would therefore not only behave valiantly, but like desperate men: Fourthly, that the king and most of the nobility being present would greatly encourage them: Fifthly, they had now leisure to chuse their ground, so as to bring the phalanx, hitherto invincible, to act with the greatest advantage. It must be confessed, these positions were very plausible, and therefore we need not wonder, that they prevailed on Perseus, who was a prince of a very desultory genius, sometimes violent in one opinion, and presently recurring with the same violence to a contrary sentiment. When once it was resolved to fight, the ground was next considered, and a line of battle marked out perfectly advantageous to the phalanx, and whereby the wings of the Macedonian army were flanked by the city on one side, and by the mountains on the other; these dispositions gave the soldiers such spirits, that, instead of being apprehensive, they rather wished for an engagement, as, on the other hand, Emilius marched with all imaginable speed, that he might overtake the Macedonians, and decide the war at once, being afraid of nothing so much as being obliged to take city after city, whereby the war would have been exceedingly protracted. When the troops under the command of the consul had joined those commanded by Scipio and Fabius, they perceived the enemy drawn up in battalia before them. It was growing late, but the ardor of Scipio engaged him to press Emilius not to lose the present opportunity, but to engage immediately. The fact is certain, but the discordance between what is said by Livy<sup>a</sup> and by Plutarch<sup>b</sup>, as to the speeches of these captains on this occasion, shews, that under their names we have the sentiments only of those authors. In this they agree, that

<sup>p</sup> POLYN. legat. lxxx. lxxxvi. lxxxvii. &c. LIV. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Æmil.

<sup>a</sup> Hist. lib. xliv.<sup>b</sup> PLUT. in vit. Æmil.

Emilius over-ruled the proposition, and would not hear of attacking, with soldiers wearied by a long march, men just come out of quarters, and who had provisions and refreshments at hand. The consul, however, directed, that the army should form in order of battle; but while the first line remained under arms, the second was employed in disposing and retrenching a camp, into which, after they had amused and harassed the enemy, the whole Roman army retired, the Macedonians being exceedingly surprized to see them safely and regularly encamped, without their having the least notice of their breaking ground. The same evening there happened an eclipse of the moon, which, as Livy tells us, Sulpitius Gallus, one of the Roman tribunes, foretold, first to the consul, and then with his leave to the army, whereby that terror, which eclipses were wont to breed in ignorant minds, was entirely taken off, and the soldiers more and more disposed to confide in officers of so great wisdom and of such general knowledge. In the Macedonian camp, however, things went not so well, the army were terribly amazed at the eclipse, and began to affright themselves with the apprehension of its portending the extinction of their glory. Early the next morning Perseus made all the necessary dispositions for battle, and did every thing in his power to encourage the soldiers to behave themselves bravely. On the other hand, the consul also made the proper dispositions, and when he had so done, offered a solemn sacrifice to Hercules, who it seems was not easily pleased, for twenty victims were offered without any signs of success. Upon the offering of the twenty first, the soothsayer pronounced this judgment, that the victory would be to the Romans, if the enemy attacked them. It is not improbable, that Emilius himself gave into this delay, for all the morning the sun was full in the eyes of his soldiers. About three a clock in the afternoon, he ordered a horse to be turned loose, as some say, or, as others affirm, sent out a party to forage, that the Macedonians might be tempted to attack them, and so bring on a battle. However it was, by design or chance, a horse running into the water, and two or three Roman soldiers following to catch him, some Thracians adventured to take him from them; whereupon a great fray ensued, and soon after a general engagement. The Macedonian army was extremely well drawn up; the Thracians, mercenaries, and auxiliaries making a very martial appearance; but the phalanx struck a peculiar terror from the excellency of its order, and the condition of those who composed it; all picked men, all habited in scarlet, their shields bright and shining, and those of the veterans of polished brats, with their their long spears, disposed with the utmost exactness, as if they were drawn up for a review, and not for a battle. The Romans were in their usual line of battle, and shewed the greatest alacrity in doing their duty; to which Emilius encouraged them by shewing himself every-where. Polybius and Livy agree in relating, that Perseus, after the field oration, retired into the city of Pydna, and there spent his time in sacrificing to Hercules†. But one Posidonius, a Greek writer, who affirmed he was present in the battle, tells us quite another thing: he says the king had the day before received a kick of a horse on his thigh, which disabled him from fighting; but that, against the advice of his friends, when the engagement was begun, he ordered a pad to be brought, and being set on the horse unarmed he rode into the midst of the battle, encouraging his soldiers by his voice and presence, till he was wounded by one of the Roman darts, then indeed he withdrew‡. But where-ever king Perseus was, the engagement seemed at the beginning to go in his favour. The light-armed Macedonians charged with such vigour, that, after the battle was over, the bodies of some of them were found within two furlongs of the Roman camp. When the phalanx came to charge, the points of their spears striking into the Roman shields, kept their heavy-armed troops from making any motion, while, on the other hand, Perseus's light-armed men did terrible execution. On this occasion, it is said, Emilius tore his cloaths, and almost gave up all hopes. However, perceiving that as the phalanx gained ground, it lost its order in several places, he caused his own light-armed troops to charge in those spaces, whereby the Macedonians were soon put into confusion. If Perseus with his horse had on the first appearance of this charged the Romans briskly, his infantry would have had time to recover themselves; but instead of this, they basely provided for their own safety by a precipitate flight. The foot finding themselves deserted, at last fled too, but not till twenty thousand of them were slain. Perseus with the horse had taken the road to Pella; the foot took the same road, and when it was almost night, overtook them in a wood, where they halted; there they fell to upbraiding them with their scandalous behaviour; and at last, grudging such cowards should have horses to carry them out of the reach of their enemies, fell to plucking them off, and mounted themselves. At which Perseus was so frightened, that with a few of his friends he struck

† Liv. ubi supra. POLYB. ap. PLUT.
PLUT.

‡ Posidon. ap.

into a by-road, pulled off his purple cloak, and tied it before him, and carried his diadem in his hand. About midnight he arrived at Pella, very slenderly accompanied; his noblemen being more afraid of him than of the Romans, knowing that he ever loved to shift his own ill conduct upon others. In his capital he found Euctus and Eudeus, two of his chamberlains, and some other officers of his household, who came to wait upon him as they were wont; but Euctus and Eudeus laying hold of this opportunity to demonstrate to the king the folly of his former conduct, and to exhort him to act more steadily for the future, Perseus in a rage drew his dagger, and stabbed them both, of which wounds they died in his presence. After this his court consisted but of three persons, viz. Evander the Cretan, Archidemus the Ætolian, and Neo the Bæotian, with about five hundred Cretan soldiers, who remained with him, not out of fidelity, but because they could not depart from the treasure which he carried along with him. As Pella was the chief city of Macedon, so it was also one of the strongest. It was seated on a hill in the midst of impassable marshes, and was commanded by a citadel much stronger, and more inaccessible than itself. Perseus, however, who could not think himself any-where safe, fled from thence as precipitately as from the battle, marching with incredible expedition to Amphipolis. When he came thither, he found that Diodorus the governor had by a stratagem expelled his Thracian garison, lest they should plunder the city. This, however, did not hinder the king from stirring up the Bisaltæ to take arms and come to his assistance. But when he found all this was in vain, he grew very disconsolate, and began to fear, that, to preserve themselves, the Amphipolitans would deliver him up to the Romans. He therefore came out with Philip, the only child he had with him; and having mounted the tribunal, began to speak; but his tears flowed so fast, that, after several trials, he found it impracticable for him to make an oration. Descending again from the tribunal, he spoke to Evander, who then went up to supply his place, and actually began an harangue; but the people hating him, refused to hear him, crying out, Be gone, be gone; we are resolved not to expose ourselves, our wives and our children, for your sakes. Fly therefore, and leave us to make the best terms we can with the conquerors. The king now at his wits end, shipped his money, which he ever carried with him, on board some barks, suffering his Cretans to plunder him of fifty talents, which he left upon the shore for them, tearing to give it them, lest the Macedonians in spite should take all the rest. Attended by these guards, he came first to

Galipfus, and the next day after landed in the island of Samo-Thrace, where he brought on shore two thousand talents, intending there to take up his residence. Let us now return to the consul, and observe the steps he took in subduing the kingdom<sup>1</sup>.

Macedonia submits.
Year of
the Flood, 2832.
Before
Christ,
167.

Paulus Emilius, being a man of strict justice, gave, according to the rules of war, the plunder of the camp to the infantry, and of the adjacent territory to the horse. As for the cities, he would not suffer them to be touched; and as for the royal treasures, he carried the last farthing of them to Rome, though it procured him the ill-will of the army. Hippias with other officers who were in Berea, with a considerable body of forces, surrendered, and immediately after Thessalonica, Pella, and the rest of the principal places in Macedon, so that the whole kingdom was given up in two days, excepting only Pydna, under the walls of which the battle was fought; the reason of which was, that several thousand soldiers taking shelter there, were ashamed to deliver up so considerable a place without a capitulation. This was readily granted them; and, as soon as the place was evacuated, the consul marched away to Amphipolis. There he received letters brought by three very mean persons, who yet were styled the ambassadors of Perseus. The consul no sooner saw them, but turning to those who were about him, he said, Mark the inconstancy of fortune; this man, who, but t'other day thought the ample kingdom of Macedon nothing, if he was hindered from subduing the Dardanians and Illyrians, now confined in a narrow island, and an exile from his native land, sends these poor men to ask favours from me. Then reaching out his hand to receive the letters, as soon as he had read the superscription, which ran thus; King Perseus to the consul Paulus health: he refused to open them, or to give any answer. As soon as Perseus had notice of this, he readily perceived that he was now no more than a private person, or at least so considered by the Romans; whereupon he wrote letters a second time, and addressed them to the consul, without assuming himself any title at all. In these he bewailed his own misery, implored mercy from the Romans, and begged that commissioners might be sent to treat with him. This last, which was all the consul had in his power to grant, he readily complied with. With these commissioners let us transport ourselves to Samo-Thrace, in order to observe the last scene of royalty performed by this unfortunate king, and which if possible, we shall see worse performed than any of the rest <sup>u</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> PLUT. in vit. Æmil Tit. Liv ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. xxxiii. c. 2.

THE temple of Castor and Pollux in Samo-Thracia was at King Perseus this time an inviolable asylum, and, in truth, the whole isle was looked upon as holy, and consecrated to those deities. This was the cause which induced king Perseus to fly thither, as supposing he should there remain in safety. On the arrival of Lentulus, Albinus, and Antonius, who were the commissioners sent by the consul to treat with him, Perseus instantly entered into a negotiation, which, however, he managed slowly and improvidently, insisting that he should still retain the title of king, which the commissioners told him the consul could not grant; but that, if he would submit himself and his affairs to the direction of the Roman people, the consul would undertake for his safety. While these things were debating, Octavius the Roman admiral arrived with a great fleet, which exceedingly awed the Samo-Thracians. These people, considering the insecurity of their own condition, called frequent councils to deliberate what was most fit for them to do. In one of these assemblies, Attilius, a young Roman, appeared, and desired leave to speak; which once given him, he made a long harangue, wherein having premised many things concerning sanctuaries in general, he came at last to put this question, whether the whole isle of Samo-Thrace was not holy? Which the assembly having presently determined in the affirmative, he proceeded next to demand Whether it would not be polluted by a notorious murderer's taking shelter therein? This being also admitted, he said, he would prove that Evander the Cretan, who was with king Perseus in the temple, had been the principal actor in the assassination of king Eumenes. The Samo-Thracians upon this sent to inform Perseus, that they expected Evander should either submit himself to a fair trial, or that he should quit the island. Perseus affrighted at this message, and grievously apprehensive of the consequence, if Evander should fall into the hands of the Romans, and, to obtain favour for himself, should charge that assassination on its original author; sent for him, and told him, that the necessity of affairs required that he should voluntarily put himself to death to stop all further inquiries. Evander desired that he might die by poison, rather than by the sword, hoping that if he could get a little time he might escape. But Perseus, ever vehement in those sort of enterprizes, suspecting something from this delay, ordered him to be immediately dispatched ; and then, fearing that the Samo-Thracians would look upon this as a pollution of their sanctuary, bribed one Theondas with a very large sum of money to aver, that Evander was his own executioner. This salved the matter well enough with the Samo-Thracians ; but it effectually lost Perseus the hearts of all his friends. Evander was doubtless a bad man, otherwise he would not have been concerned in the attempt on Eumenes ; but as he did this at the command of Perseus, as he had constantly followed the fortunes of that prince, and had never betrayed him in any thing, it was held an act of the greatest ingratitude and meanness of spirit in the king, to forget all his services in an instant, and at the first sight of danger to give him up to a violent death, not by the hands of strangers, but his own servants. Perseus, having now a prospect of his misery in a true light, beholding himself without forces, without friends, and without hopes, resolved, if possible, to escape into Crete, and to that end bargained with one Oroandes a Cretan, who had a small ship in the haven of Samo-Thrace, to carry himself, his wife, his son, his treasure, and three attendants, to the island before-mentioned. The crafty master of the vessel took the money on board first, and then assigned an hour in the night for the king and his company to come on board. But as soon as it began to grow dark, he hoisted sail, and left the hapless Perseus to deplore at leisure his credulity, and the loss of his money. At midnight the king, his wife, his son Philip, and three attendants, slipped by a back-gate into a garden behind his apartment ; then clambering, with much difficulty, over the wall, they made the best of their way to the port, and, after wandering till it was almost light on the sea-shore, were informed by a stranger, that Oroandes sailed for Crete the evening before. The king, his consort, and the young prince, with those who attended them, were forced to make all imaginable speed back, that they might regain the temple before they were discovered by the Romans. But finding the day broke before they reached the wall of the garden, they were constrained to hide themselves there behind a corner, till by degrees they could get in unperceived. It was not long after this, that the king surrendered himself to the admiral Octavius, moved thereto by new misfortunes, especially the two following accidents : First, the desertion of all his pages, which happened on the Romans publishing a manifesto or proclamation, whereby they declared, that all such as quitted the service of king Perseus, should not only be safe in their persons, but have their estates restored them also in Macedon, and remain at full liberty. The other, the news that Ion of Thessalonica, one of the king's principal favourites, had given up all the rest of the royal family intrusted to his care to Octavius. He it was who had the honour of receiving prisoner also the king of Macedon, his eldest son Philip, and the few that were yet about him. Octavius, as soon as he had him in his power, ordered the king to be put on board the admiral, and having embarked also all his treasure that was left, the Roman fleet weighed, and stood over to Amphipolis. Thence the admiral dispatched an express to acquaint the consul with what had happened; to assure him, that Perseus was in his custody, and that he should be speedily sent to attend his pleasure <sup>w</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> Liv. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra

news

As soon as Paulus Emilius received the letter of Octavius, he sent Tubero his son-in-law, with several persons of distinction, to receive the king. He ordered sacrifices to be immediately offered, and made the same rejoicings, as if a new victory had been obtained. When he was informed the king drew near, he assembled a council of war in his own pavilion, where he resolved to wait for him. The whole camp ran out to see the royal prisoner, and the crowd was so very great, that the lictors were constrained to make a way for him to go to the consul's tent. Perseus walked alone, covered with a mourning cloak; and when he entered the tent, would have thrown himself at the feet of the consul; but Emilius, rising hastily, stepped forward a little, gave him his hand, and would not suffer him to kneel. He then placed him in a seat over-against those who assisted at the council. When silence had been observed some time, the consul demanded of the king, what wrong the Roman people had done him, which had constrained him to take up arms, and with such obstinacy to persist in hazarding his person, subjects, and kingdom, as he did? The king, looking on the ground, and shedding tears, spake not a word. Whereupon the consul continued his discourse: "If, (said he) you had been very young when you came to the throne, I should have imputed your rashness to your not knowing the world. But inas- much as you served in that war which your father waged against us, knew its success, and knew also how faithfully we observed the treaty we made with him; what strange policy was it for you to choose war, rather than peace, with a people, whose force, and whose fidelity, you had already tried; and therefore might well apprehend, what might be feared from the one, or hoped from the other?" The king still remaining silent, the consul, after some pause.

The reception of Per-seus in the Roman camp.

concluded thus : “ However these things have come to “ pass, whether by human error, by chance, or through ne“ cessity, do not despair ; the clemency of the Roman peo“ ple, so well known, and so often experienced, may afford “ you not only hope, but assurance of safety.” All this the consul spoke in Greek ; then, turning to his council, he said in Latin, “ You see here a notable instance of the in-“ certainty of human grandeur, and of the mutability of for“ tune ; let it make a proper impression on you all ; but es“ pecially on such of you as are in the vigour of your age.
 “ Let not present prosperity so far puff up any man, as to “ make him behave with arrogance towards another ; nei“ ther let any man confide in his good fortune, for he can“ not tell how soon it may forsake him. His courage only “ shall be admired by me, which neither the flow of fortune “ swells, or its ebb decreases ; but who preserves a steady “ temper of mind in all times, and on all occasions.” Then he committed Perseus to the custody of Tubero, directing that he should sup with him that night, and then and ever after treated him with all imaginable civility and respect. Emilius, having thus settled all things in Macedon, proceeded to a progress through Greece, where he ordered all matters as might best suit the interest of the Romans ; and though he was naturally a merciful man, used severity enough. At length hearing that ten legates, all men of consular dignity, were coming from Rome to assist him in settling a new form of government in Macedonia, he speedily returned thither, directing his course to Apollonia, where he was informed they were to land ; there he was met by king Perseus, whom Sulpitius, to whose custody, on the consul’s going into Greece, he had been committed, suffered to go at large. Emilius received the king kindly ; but when he came to Amphipolis, he checked Sulpitius very severely for suffering the king to go where he pleased. Posthumius therefore had the charge of him for the future, who kept him and his son Philip very strictly ; as for his younger son Alexander and his daughter, Emilius sent for them from Samo-Thrace to Amphipolis, where he treated them with much kindness. As to the establishing of the new government, Emilius issued his precepts, directing that ten deputies from each of the Macedonian cities should appear before him at a day certain, and bring with them such papers of state, and all such sums of money and plate, as they had any knowledge of belonging to the king.
 At the day assigned they appeared ; then it was that Emilius, with his ten colleagues, mounted the tribunal, together with the praetor Octavius, the lictors attending. The Macedoni-

ans, though they had been used to see their princes do justice, and were no strangers to courts established by their authority, yet were surprized at this; the austerity of the Romans, the using of the Latin language in all their proceedings, and their customs so different from those of the Greeks, struck terror and amazement into the deputies, and all who were present. However, they were not left long in the dark, as to what the senate and people of Rome expected from them. Emilius had the decree ready drawn in his hand, which he pronounced with a slow and audible voice, but in the Latin tongue. Then the prætor Octavius acquainted the assembly, that it was to the following purpose: First, that the senate ordained the Macedonians should be free, and that they should enjoy all the cities and territories they were now possessed of, living for the present under their own laws, and electing annually their magistrates as they were wont to do, paying to the people of Rome half the tribute which they usually paid to their kings: Secondly, their will was, that Macedonia should be divided into four regions; the first to contain all the countries between the rivers Strymon and Nessus, together with such boroughs, cities, and castles, as Perseus held beyond the river Nessus; the cities of Ænus, Maronea, and Abdera excepted. On the west of Strymon the territory of the Bisaltæ and Heraclea Syntica were added to this region. The second included the country between Strymon and Axius, together with Pæonia. The third had the river Axius for its east, and the river Pencus for its west boundary. Towards the north it was bounded by the mountain Bora, the cities of Edessus and Berea being annexed thereto. The fourth contained the remainder of Macedonia beyond the mountain Bora, having Illyria on the one side, and Epirus on the other. The capital of the first region was to be Amphipolis; of the second Thessalonica; of the third Pella; of the fourth Pelagonia. To these cities they were once a quarter to be summoned to hold general assemblies to raise money, and to elect magistrates. Thirdly, it was declared unlawful for any person to intermarry, to carry on any trade, to buy or sell any lands to any who was not an inhabitant of his own region. Fourthly, they were prohibited to work any mines of gold or silver; those of iron and brass they were allowed to work, paying half the rent to the Romans, which they were wont to pay to their kings. Fifthly, they were prohibited from importing any foreign salt. Sixthly, they were forbid to sell any timber fit for building ships to the barbarous nations. But they were allowed, for their necessary defence, to keep garisons on their frontiers. Seventhly, the Macedonians were directed to enrol their names, Emilius signifying to them, that he intended to give them laws. When this decree was published, it greatly affected the minds of the people. Glad they were to be restored to their liberty; but at the same time they were sorry, that they could not well comprehend what that liberty was they were restored to. They saw evident contradictions in the decree, which, though it spake of leaving them under their own laws, imposed many new ones, and threatened more. What most disturbed them was the division of the kingdom, whereby, as a nation, they were torn and mangled, separated and disjointed from each other. One thing, however, was generally applauded, viz. the prohibition to work the gold and silver mines, which was founded upon this caution. The senate saw, that, to collect a revenue from them, tax-gatherers, surveyors, and receivers, must of necessity be employed; they therefore chose to forego all the advantages these mines could produce, rather than plague their new subjects with officers of revenue, as Livy expressly informs us. Emilius proceeded next to regulate the rest of the Grecian affairs at Amphipolis, where, at the close of the proceedings, Andronicus the Ætolian, and Neo the Bæotian, because they had been always friends to Perseus, and had not deserted him even now, were condemned, and lost their heads. Then came out a proclamation, whereby the supreme power in Macedon was vested in certain senators. All the nobility, as also all their children exceeding the age of fifteen, were commanded immediately to transport themselves over into Italy; as were likewise all such as ever had any commission, even of the smallest importance, from the king or his predecessors; and it was declared, that whoever presumed to contravene that edict should be punished with death. Last of all, Emilius published the laws he had promised, which, whether they were or were not to the liking of the Macedonians, they were ever after bound to obey. These serious matters once out of the way, Emilius celebrated games at Amphipolis with a magnificence unknown to former times. The brazen shields, belonging to the Macedonian phalanx, he sent on board the ships. All the rest of the arms belonging to the Macedonians, he caused to be brought to Amphipolis, and, as it was intended they should never raise armies, nor be troubled with military expeditions more, these weapons were framed into a prodigious pile, and, after solemn prayers offered to Mars, Minerva, and other deities, the consul first set fire to them with a torch he had in his hand; and then the principal officers in the army threw in those lighted torches with which they had assisted at the solemnity. All the rich furniture, furniture, plate, statues, and other valuable things, found in the royal palaces, were first exposed to public view, and then put on board the fleet (D). Emilius afterwards marched away

(D) It is a great misfortune to such as are engaged in writing the histories of nations conquered by the Romans, that they have no materials, but the writings of Romans, or of Greeks, who flattered the power of the Romans more than the spirit of their own writers would allow them to do. Livy, whose history may be justly said to vie with its subject, represents his countrymen as acting upon the noblest and most philosophical principles upon all occasions. He says, that, with respect to the Macedonians, the consul Emilius treated them in such a manner as tended to convince the world, that the Romans did not make war with a view to enslave free men, but, on the contrary, that they might be able to set free such nations as were already enslaved (7). Plutarch speaks much the same language, and highly commends his hero, the senate, and people of Rome, for so generously treating those whom they had totally subdued (8). To adventure, without authority, to contradict authors so much and so justly in esteem, may seem a high presumption. Yet this presumption we must be guilty of, in order to set this part of our history in its proper light; it will, however, be somewhat alleviated by our grounding all the observations we make on facts recorded by the authors from whose sentiments we beg leave to differ. In the first place, let us remark, that Perseus, from the very beginning of the war, was for submitting almost to any thing, provided the Romans would grant him peace, which was refused him, except he would put himself in that condition into which the most unsuccessful war could scarce reduce him. This the consul Licinius Crassus told him in few words, when as yet the Romans had not entered Macedonia, but were, on the contrary, in danger of being beat out of Thessaly. This conduct may be sanctified with the epithets firm, magnanimous, heroic; but whoever considers who the Macedonians were, must allow, that it was at least haughty, if not tyrannical. If subjection was so hateful to the Romans, that they thought all things lawful to shake it off; why should it not appear in the same dreadful light to the Macedonians; and if so, what magnanimity was there in pressing it upon them, and how was Perseus, or his subjects, to blame for endeavouring to avoid so servile a submission? Secondly, what sort of liberty was it these people received from Emilius after his victory? To answer this question in few words, we may justly alledge, that they received none at all; for which we assign this reason, that the consul left them not so free as they had been under their kings. It is clear from the foregoing history, that the most eminent cities in Macedonia were like the free cities of the German empire; a sort

(7) Tit. Liv. hist. lib. xlv. xlv.(8) Plut. in vita P. Æmil.

way for Oricum, having first given instructions that all that part of Epirus, which had revolted to Perseus, should be plundered; and, that this might be done with more effect, centurions were sent to the several cities, who gave out, that all garisons were to be withdrawn, and the Epirots restored to their liberty; yet, on a day assigned, when the people thought themselves all safe, the troops in every city sacked and plundered it, carrying off an immense sum of money; after which joining Emilius, the whole army, together with

of little republics associated among themselves, and owing certain homage to their prince. The liberty they enjoyed made them populous and rich, the government they were under provided effectually for their safety, nor did Perseus himself, for ought we see, violate the rights of these cities; on the contrary, when their deputies offered him levies and subsidies, he declined both, and desired only that they would furnish his army with waggons. Paulus Emilius instantly divided the whole realm into tetrarchies, with a severe prohibition to the inhabitants of each tetrarchy to interfere with the inhabitants of another tetrarchy, in any amicable way whatsoever. He also took upon him the office of a legislator, and gave them not only new laws, but a new constitution. Where then was their liberty? Thirdly, great stress is laid on the great abatement of tribute made by the victor; for instead of two hundred talents yearly exacted by the Macedonian kings from their subjects, the Romans were contented with one hundred. Yet what intelligent person can deny, that a hundred talents annually paid to a foreign people, is a heavier load than two, nay, than four hundred raised, and afterwards spent at home? But, besides, one may justly wonder how it could be thought equitable to charge these people with any taxes, when such an immense sum of ready money was taken from them, as released the Romans from all taxes for one hundred and twenty five years. If we sum up therefore all these regulations, viz. the quartering the kingdom, the settling new laws, the carrying away all the wealth, the prohibition to bring in bullion from the mines, the leaving them still burthened with a tax of a hundred talents, and, add to these, the carrying away of all their nobility above the age of fifteen, we shall have a right comprehension of the matter, and be well able to account for two things, viz. how the Romans came to stand less in fear of the Macedonians, when a free people, as they called them, than while they were under the dominion of their kings. And, secondly, how these Macedonians came to be so strangely ungrateful, as eagerly to lay hold of every opportunity of taking arms against these Romans, and of endeavouring to change their new constitution for their old one (9).

(9) Vide infra.

the

the captive kings Perseus and Gentius, who was taken by the prætor Anicius, were transported to Italy * (E).

Emilius,

* PLUT. in vita Æmil. LIV. ubi supra.

(E) The fate of Gentius king of Illyria hath such a necessary dependance on the Macedonian history, that there was a necessity of taking notice of it somewhere, and therefore, to avoid prolixity, we thought proper to digest it into a note. The reader has been already informed, that the prætor Appius Claudius had been able to do little or nothing on this side, except giving umbrage to the king of Illyria, which made him the more ready to hearken to the propositions made him by Perseus. Anicius, who was named successor to Claudius, at the same time that Emilius was sent to command in Macedon, made very quick dispatch in the Illyrian war. He took care to have his army well recruited, and acting, as he did, in strict conjunction with the consul and the admiral Octavius, all things went on well. Gentius had assembled an army of fifteen thousand men at Lissus, where he waited for the coming of the three hundred talents, intending, on the receipt of them, to have marched away into Macedonia, there to have joined the king. Anicius saved him this trouble, by meeting him with the Roman army; whereupon a smart engagement happened, in which at last Gentius was overcome. However, he had the strong city of Scodra behind him, and to which with much ado he retreated. If he had been content to have defended that city, he had gained time at least, and in the end perhaps might have made some sort of treaty; but the Illyrians, vexed at their late defeat, flattered themselves with better success in another engagement, and therefore on the first appearance of the Roman army, would needs march out to fight them. Anicius looked upon this to be an event more fortunate than he could have expected; wherefore he immediately gave them battle, and with great slaughter defeated them. However, the king got a second time into Scodra, which was a city strong by situation, and extremely well fortified. It had also in it a very numerous garison, the flower of the Illyrian nobility, and the king himself; yet it scarce made any defence. Gentius was terrified; for, to say the truth, he derived all his courage from the bottle, and, having now time to be sober, grew quite out of heart. He therefore sent to the prætor, desiring leave to treat, and that a truce of three days might be granted him, which, with much ado, he obtained. This delay he procured in expectation of succours; but either his people were not over loyal, or their force was quite exhausted, so that within the space of these three days, the king had certain intelligence that his expectations were vain, which determined him to yield on the prætor's terms, that is, at discretion. In consequence of this, himself, his mother, his wife, children, brother, and friends, were yielded prisoners, and were afterwards led in triumph at Rome; and his whole kingdom delivered

The miser-able end of Perseus. Emilius sailed up the Tiber in king Perseus's royal galley, richly adorned with the arms of his prisoners, and with the king's purple robes. Though nothing could be more glorious than the short and sudden conquest which this great general had made of so large a kingdom, yet on account of some discontent his soldiers had taken, there arose great disputes about his triumph. Until such time as this could be decided, and afterwards, while the necessary preparations were making for the triumph, king Perseus was confined in a common gaol. When he knew that a triumph was decreed Emilius, he sent to beseech him, that he might not be made a spectacle therein, to which the general made answer, This is entirely in his own power, he needs not ask this favour of me. Intimating, that the king might kill himself, and thereby avoid that shame of which he stood in fear; but if he had inclined to this, he might as well have done it in Macedonia or Samo-Thrace, unless that we suppose he relied upon the general's promise at Amphipolis, which was indeed very indifferently kept. On the day of the triumph, immediately after delivered up. This conquest cost a campaign only of a month, so that Perpenna, one of the Roman ambassadors, whom Gentius had imprisoned, carried the news to Rome of the ending of the war, before they had any notion there of its being begun (10). The Illyrians were not the only people, as the reader hath seen in the text, whom Perseus brought into a most distressed condition: Part of Epirus had revolted to him, and paid dearly for that revolt. The occasion of it is so much to our purpose, that we cannot omit it. In the war against Philip the father of Perseus one Charopus, an Epirot by birth, had conducted Titus Flaminius with the Roman army over the mountains; for this eminent service he and his son of the same name were highly caressed at Rome, and after a time the young one returned into his own country, where he affected to govern all things at his pleasure, sending private informations to the senate against such of the nobility as opposed him, and thereby working such quick destruction to them and their families, as compelled them to have recourse to Perseus (11). The Achaëans too, being suspected of having wished the king no evil, were for that reason contrained to send a thousand persons of distinction to Rome, who were immediately imprisoned as malefactors convict, and, in spite of repeated embassies in their favour, remained seven teen years in that custody, and at length thirty, being all that remained alive, were allowed to return home; among whom was Polybius the famous historian. Such were the fatal consequences of this Macedonian war (12).

(10) Tit. Liv. hist. ubi supra.
lib. xxvi

12) Liv. ubi supra.

(11) Excerpt. Diodor. Sicul.

the arms, treasures, and gold plate belonging to king Perseus's table, followed his sons, Philip and Alexander, and his little daughter, with their nurses, preceptors, and attendants ; all brought to them on this occasion, not to render them any service, but to heighten the pomp of the procession. These poor people wept, and wrung their hands, and made the children also extend their arms to move the compassion of the people. Next them came Perseus alone, clad in deep mourning. Behind, at some distance, his friends and the chief nobility of Macedon. They moved along with their hands folded, and their eyes fixed upon the king, as if their concern for him had swallowed up all concern for their own condition. After the triumph, Perseus was sent back to the gaol, and put amongst the meanest criminals, no care being taken that he should have so much as a subsistence. In this miserable state, he remained four days fasting. At last he besought some of the poor people there to give him a part of their provision, which they very readily did, and at the same time procured for him a rope and a sword, supposing that he would be glad to end his misfortunes by one of them ; which, however, he did not, but continued to live on. Some time afterwards, at the request of Emilius, he was taken out of this prison, and put into a milder custody. Some say, that he was sent with his son Alexander, his eldest son being dead, to Alba, where, though he had a guard placed upon him, he had a house, a table, and necessary attendants assigned him. Yet, after all, he ended his days most miserably ; for some say, that having disoblinded his keeper, he killed him. Others, that the soldiers appointed for his guard, taking a dislike to him, would never suffer him to sleep, and so by continual watching brought him to his end. It is but just we should observe, that some say he died a natural death, which, however, can hardly be credited, if we consider the authority on which the former opinion is built, and which we have therefore set down at large in a note (F). Here the antient and famous

(F) We are indebted to Diodorus Siculus for a distinct account of the death of the unfortunate Perseus, as we are indebted to the judicious patriarch Photius for preserving us this account ; which is to the following effect : Perseus, after he had been led in triumph, fell into such extreme misery, and experienced such incredible misfortunes, that hardly any thing related by writers of romances can be compared with what is truly recorded of his ill fate. Yet still he was fond of life. “ Before the senate had determined any thing as to his punishment, one of the city prætors threw him famous kingdom of Macedon ended, after having subsisted from the time of Caranus upwards of six hundred years, and from the death of Alexander the Great not quite a hundred and threescore. It is certain, that nothing contributed so much to the destruction of the Macedonian empire, as the unhappy disposition of its last prince. Perseus laid the foundation of all his subsequent misfortunes in his father's lifetime, by destroying his brother Demetrius, whereby he lost the affections of a great part of his countrymen, and at the same time drew upon himself the implacable hatred of the Romans. His capital vices were covetousness and cruelty.
“ and

“ and his children into the gaol Albinus. This prison is a deep “ dungeon of the bigness of a chamber, capable of nine beds at “ the most ; dark and full of all sorts of filth and nastiness, by “ reason of the multitude of men condemned for capital offences, “ that from time to time were thrust down there ; and generally “ most of such malefactors were put into this place. So that many “ being shut up together in so strait a place, those miserable crea“ tures were even turned into beasts. And in regard the meat, “ drink, and other necessities which were brought them, were “ jumbled together into one chaos and heap of confusion, there “ arose thence such a stench, that none that came near were able “ to endure. In a most miserable condition Perseus continued “ here for the space of seven days, insomuch, that he begged re“ lief, and some share of the food of those strangers in prison who “ had only a stinted allowance. They, out of compassion to this “ miserable man, with great humanity and tears in their eyes, “ gave him part of that small pittance they had, and withal offer“ ed him a sword and a rope to use, which of them he would at “ his pleasure, for the putting an end to his life. Yet nothing “ seems so sweet as life, even to the miserable ; though they suffer “ what is equivalent to death itself in the mean time. To con“ clude, he had certainly ended his days in this extreme misery, if “ Marcus Emilius, president of the court, out of respect to the dig“ nity of his person, moved by the natural and innate hu“ manity of the Romans, had not, with some indignation, moved
 “ the senate in his behalf, putting them in mind, that though “ they feared not man, yet they should bear some awe and reve“ rence to Nemesis, who will take vengeance on them that use their “ power with pride and insolence. Upon this he was committed “ to more moderate confinement ; and while he was feeding him“ self with fresh hopes, he ended his days agreeable to the former “ misfortune of his life. For after he had lived two years in this “ fond love of life, having displeased his barbarous keepers, they “ would not suffer him to sleep, and so he died (13).”

(13) Dipl. Sacul. Lib. vxxv. apud Phot. Bibliothec. p. 1157.

He discover'd the last, first by murdering Apelles, whom his father had sent embassador to Rome, and whom himself had suborned to deliver the forged letter, which took away his brother's life. Thenceforward he addicted himself to all sorts of sinister methods for filling his treasures, and taking off his enemies. Poisons, assassinations, murders with his own hand ; actions, which might have shaken the fidelity of any people, did not render the Macedonians disloyal. Perhaps, both they and the allies of Perseus saw clearly, that, bad as he was, he was the only instrument they could make use of to ward off that slavery, which notwithstanding all their fair pretences, the Romans were spreading over Europe, Asia, and Afric. Natural timidity, and the consciousness of a long scene of crimes, rendered Perseus unable to manage so great a controversy against so potent and so firm an enemy as the Romans. His own sense of his incapacity, which must have saved him, if he had made use of it in time, most effectually contributed to his ruin, by suggesting to him desires of peace out of all time : all writers agree, that Perseus was the very reverse of his father ; for as Philip's prudence served him best in adversity, and taught him to restore to a flourishing condition a kingdom quite exhausted, so Perseus, after shewing great abilities in prosperity, seemed to lose them all with his fortune, and to suffer his spirits to sink as low as his condition. The treatment given him by the Romans cannot, however, be excused, either from their greatness, or his misery. The former left them little to fear, and the latter took away that little which they might pretend to fear. We must therefore attribute their conduct towards Perseus to that haughtiness which began to grow upon them, and made them forget, as well the meanness of their former state, as the grandeur of others †.

Perseus, when he was led in triumph, had two sons, Philip and Alexander, and a daughter, whose name we find not. His posterity. As to their ages, we can say nothing with certainty, except that they were all very young, and the two last infants. Philip is said to have died before his father ; but how or where cannot be collected, because the books of Livy and of Diodorus Siculus, which treat of these times, are lost. As for Alexander he was put out to a joiner, carpenter, or turner, and grew an ingenious man in his profession, and addicted himself also to the Latin learning ; he became afterwards clerk or secretary to the senate. This was another instance of the Roman pride ; for at the same time Nicomedes the son of Prusias, king of Bithynia, was educated with all imaginable pomp and splendor, because his father had sent him thither, and put him under the care of the republic. It may be wondered, that the allies and relations of Perseus could do nothing either for him or his off-spring ; but we need not be at much pains to account for this ; they had much ado to bring off themselves. After Emilius had visited Greece, the Rhodians were called to an account for the kindness they had expressed to Perseus. King Eumenes was treated with great coldness, not to say contempt, for not hating that prince to the last, as heartily as he had done at first. The son of Cotys king of Thrace, one of the wisest and most generous princes of his time, was made prisoner at the battle of Pydna ; and though the Romans did vouchsafe to send him back to his father, yet they sent ambassadors with him, who read Cotys a very round lecture, exaggerating his fault, the mercy shewn him by the Romans, and how dangerous it would be for him to offend a second time. As we have conducted the Macedonian kingdom to its close, it should seem that we ought here to put an end to this section. But the reader must remember, that the Macedonians were still free, and our business is to shew how they lost their freedom, and how that once noble kingdom came to be reduced into the form of a province ; and as these events were not brought about, but by new and fierce wars, it is necessary that we enter into a detail of them, and look upon the last strugglings of this noble nation to preserve themselves from being swallowed up by the Roman power, after they had once held the empire of the world, and for a long time the supreme authority in Greece <sup>2</sup>.

† PLUT. in vit. Æmil. OROS. lib. xi. JUSTIN. lib. xxxii. LIV. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. excerpt. lib. xxxi. apud Phot.

Andriscus
calls himself Philip the son of Perseus.
Year of
the Flood, 2817.
Before
Christ,
142.

THE settlement, made by Paulus Emilius in Macedon, was extremely well adapted to the purpose of the senate and people of Rome ; for in the first place, every city became a sort of republic. Once in three months the general assembly of the district met, and deputies were annually chosen in each of the regions, in whom the supreme power, so far as was consistent with their duty to Rome, was vested. All their ancient nobility dwelt in Italy. Thither their wealth had been transferred, and consequently whatever boast might be made of setting them free, they were now no better than a poor, divided, headless, and heartless people. Sixteen years they had remained in this state, when it began to be whif-

<sup>2</sup> PLUT. LIV. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

pered about, that one of the sons of Perseus was living. All who speak of this matter being either Latin writers, or such as took their materials from them, we must be content to hear the story in the form they were pleased to place it, though very probable it is, that the Greek historians of those times might deliver it in another manner. The best accounts we have tell us, that one Andriscus, a native of the city of Adramyttium, in the country of Troas in Lesser Asia, by birth and manners of the very dregs of the people, took upon him to be Philip the son of Perseus. Not that Philip who was led with his father in triumph, but another begotten on a nameless concubine of his, and preserved from slaughter, as he pretended, thus : He was born, he said, while Perseus was engaged in the war against the Romans ; and the king, being already apprehensive of its issue, ordered his birth to be concealed, and committed him to the care of one Gyrthesa to be privately brought up, that in case things should fall out amiss, one of the blood royal might be preserved, and one day assert his right to the kingdom. He was bred up at Adramyttium, by a man in mean circumstances, till he was twelve years old, without having the least suspicion that he was any other than that man's son. But about that time his foster-father falling sick of a mortal disease, he disclosed to this Andriscus the secret of his birth, and that his true name was Philip. There was likewise a narrative to this purpose signed with the hand of Perseus, in the custody of his foster-mother, whom the dying man charged to deliver it to Philip, when he should arrive at the age of fourteen. This was performed very exactly, and in that memorial there was mention made of two chests of treasure privately deposited for the use of this son by king Perseus. The woman, when she put this paper into the young man's hand, recommended it to him to make all imaginable haste out of this part of the world, lest Enmenes, the inveterate enemy of Perseus and all his race, should gain intelligence of his birth, and procure him to be murdered (G). Full of apprehensions, Andriscus or Philip retired retired into Syria, and went to the court of Demetrius Soter, who had married the sister of king Perseus, and from whom on that account he hoped for favour and protection. This Demetrius having heard Andriscus's story, considered it attentively, till by degrees either himself or his wife traced out such imperfections in it, as gave them grounds to suspect the whole was a fallacy. The Romans were at this time so powerful, and Demetrius had so little inclination to have any disputes with them, that, to prevent his being made accountable for any thing that this pretended Philip might attempt, though without his countenance or assistance, he fairly seized him. Under the name of Andriscus an impostor, falsely pretending to be the son of Perseus, he was sent by Demetrius to Rome, who no doubt thought he should by this act win great credit with that state <sup>a</sup>.

(G) It may seem a little odd, that since there were many princes, who might have pretended some title to the throne of Macedon, in sight of their descents from its antient kings, none offered at any such thing ; but, on the contrary, left all things quiet, and in the state they were settled by Paulus Emilius. This is, however, easily accounted for, if we consider the condition of the kings of Syria and Bithynia, who were nearly allied to Perseus. The former was a prince of mean abilities, and terribly afraid of the Romans, whose

*Andriscus
escapes from Rome.*

THE senate caused this matter to be inquired into upon the first arrival of Andriscus; but whether it was that the consequences of his pretences were not apprehended, or whether, as the Roman writers affirm, he looked, spoke, and acted so little like the son of a prince, that there seemed to be nothing dangerous in him, certain it is, that he was committed to a very gentle custody, and no sentence at all pronounced upon him. It is very possible, the senate might apprehend, that while Alexander the son of Perseus, who had been led in triumph, was a peaceable man, and their scribe, as all the world knew, this Andriscus with a lame story, and, as they thought, very mean parts, would gain no credit; but that the contrary might happen, if he was severely dealt with; no just cause appearing, for which he might be put to death. Andriscus did not let slip the favourable opportunity offered him by the carelessness of those who had the wrath he sought to avert by sending the pretender to the throne of Macedon to them as soon as he came into his dominions. He was sensible enough, that he held his crown almost by their permission, and therefore durst not think of putting in any claim to another, while he was unable to act independently in the kingdom he possessed; as for Prusias of Bitynia, he was also a mean spirited prince, and besides was so plagued by foreign enemies and divisions in his own family, which were at last attended with fatal effects, that he had small leisure to look abroad; and this encouraged Andriscus, if he was indeed an impostor, to act as he did.

<sup>a</sup> Epitom. Liv..lib. xlviii. xlix. ZONAR. ex DIONE. FLOR. l. ii.

custody

custody of him ; but secretly stealing out of Italy, took shelter in Thrace <sup>b</sup>.

IN the mean time the Macedonians were in a very bad situation ; for as the genius of the people was wholly suited to a mixt government, or, in other words, a well-regulated monarchy, so the new constitution which had been given them, sat very indifferently on their minds, some being too proud of their freedom, and others desiring to see themselves once more an independent nation, and as considerable as in former times. The Romans, sending ambassadors into Asia, ordered them to pass over from thence into Macedonia, to appease these troubles, and to engage the people to live peaceably under the new government. What effects the exhortations of these legates had, we know not ; but in all probability, they did not operate very strongly, since in a few years the same disturbances broke out again with still greater vehemence, so that it appeared plainly a popular government was little for the advantage of the inhabitants of this kingdom. The Macedonians dwelling at Rome had interest enough to prevent any harsh measures from being taken with their country-men ; this interest they were at great pains to cultivate, attending the funeral of their conqueror Emilius with all imaginable marks of sorrow and concern, applying themselves afterwards to Scipio his son, surnamed Africanus. Him they owned for the protector of their nation, and publicly solicited the senate that he might be sent into Macedonia to compromise the disturbances there. But the affairs of the republic in Spain being fallen into a dangerous condition, insomuch, that many declined serving there, Scipio desired to be sent thither, as conceiving it would be more for his country's service, though he was very sensible of the affection borne him by the Macedonians, and would most willingly, but for this accident, have gone thither to repair the breaches which had been made in his father's settlement of the affairs of that people. It is very possible, that while the Romans apprehended no ill consequence to themselves from the disputes among the Macedonians, they were not very much disturbed at their continuance, since it appears clearly from Polybius, that the Romans were by this time become great politicians, and extended their own power on every side by practising on others, and taking advantage either of their misfortunes, or of their errors in government. Be it as it will, Macedonia was in great confusion, and little or no care was taken to redress the grievances the people complained of ; indeed the redressing of them was the more difficult, because there were no Roman officers amongst them ; but from themselves those were taken who were made use of to oppress them * (H).

Troubles in Macedonia, and their causes

<sup>b</sup> Epitom. Liv. lib. xlix. VAL. PATERCUL. lib. i. ZONAR. cx. DION.

Andriscus
or Philip recovers
Macedon.

Andriscus, when he first came into Thrace, depended rather on the charity of the inhabitants, and especially of their petty princes, than on any pretensions of being of use to them, which would have come with an ill grace from a per-

* POLYB. Legat. cvii.

(H) 'Twas an essential maxim of the Roman policy, to let the subjects of the republic enjoy much greater quiet than their allies and dependents ; and it was built on this supposition, that either by art or force the countries of their allies might be reduced into provinces, either without resistance, or under colour of justice. Hence it was, that while they acknowledged the Achaëans to be free, and gloried themselves in the title of protectors of the liberties of Greece, they treated the former worse and regarded the latter less, than the Macedonians had ever done, when they had the pre-eminence in that country. For whereas the kings of Macedon permitted the Greek republics to chuse their own magistrates, and to judge all criminals in their own courts, and according to their own laws, the Romans mostly sent legates of their own to hear and determine differences among states they pretended to call free, and not seldom drew the causes to Rome, whither the parties were constrained to follow them. We have already shewn how Charopus, almost against their wills, drove the Epirots into rebellion ; and yet this man was again invested, not only with almost regal authority, but his mother also, a most vindictive and covetous woman, plundered and harassed these unhappy people with equal malice and impunity. In Macedonia, those who had the government of its several districts in their hands, were either extremely necessitous, and from thence prone to oppression, or were the relations and allies of the nobility who were prisoners at Rome, and were therefore much more addicted to the interest of the republic, than to that of their country. The rebellion of Andriscus might easily have been prevented ; for he was a long time in Thrace before he was in any condition to invade Macedon ; or when it was begun, it might have been presently quashed ; but it is propable, the Romans desired neither, but rather wished for an opportunity of reducing the whole kingdom into a province, which at length they obtained, and did not fail to use (14).

(14) Liv. lib. xlix. l. Polyb. legat. cvii. Diodor. Sicul. except. lib. xxvi

son in his condition. However, by often repeating his story, by shewing them the incroachments which were daily made on their neighbours, and by explaining the methods whereby one king was employed to ruin another, and thereby reduced into circumstances which rendered him unfit to defend himself; he begat in the minds of the Tracians such suspicions, and kindled in their bosoms such an ambition of being once more independent, that at first he had some attendants, which soon after grew into a little court, and at length he was permitted to raise an army; which when it had swelled to a reasonable bigness, he boldly led down into Macedon, and there began publicly to declare his title to the crown. Some places he reduced by force, others submitted through fear; most were willing to lay hold of any pretext to rid themselves of their new masters, and to regain their antient constitution, the loss of which had rendered it but so much the more desirable. Such as were in possession of power, and consequently were strictly dependent on the Romans, endeavoured to make what resistance they could; but it proved even feebler than Andriscus or Philip could have expected. Such as had been most forward to support these men in their authority for the sake of reaping rewards, which it was only in their power to give, were the first to desert them, in order to rejoin authority again; and thus Macedonia was reduced by one who called himself the son of Perseus, in almost as short a time as Perseus himself had lost it. Nay, so full was he of that courage, which success usually inspires, that, not content with Macedon, he began to meditate an invasion on the adjoining provinces, as well to gratify his own ambition, as to keep up the hopes and spirits of his new subjects d.

THE Romans, on the first news of this extraordinary event, were not a little at a loss; they had no army in these parts; they had all the reason in the world to believe that the Greeks would by no means raise an army in favour of those who had of late treated them but very indifferently. However, they sent Scipio Nasica with other legates, rather to dispose the minds of the people in Greece to remain steady to the Roman interest, than to perform any notable service against the new king of Macedon, whom the Romans qualified with the name of Pseudo-Philippus, i. e. the sham Philip. Scipio and his colleagues found things in quite another state than they expected. For, in the first place, Andriscus

d Epitom. Liv. lib. lxxx. l. PATERC. lib. i. L. FLORE. lib. ii.

or Philip was much more powerful than he had been thought at Rome. And, secondly, the Achæans, contrary to all expectation, laying aside all former jealousies and suspicions, appeared most ready to side with the Romans, and to do whatever they required. Scipio, as he was of great parts, so he was also naturally just, temperate, and courteous, in the highest degree ; these good qualities supplied the place of an army, and rendered him more formidable to the enemies of the republic, than a person of another disposition would have been attended by legions. The first thing he did was, fully to inform the senate of what had happened in Greece : That the disturbance in Macedon was not a sudden tumultuary insurrection, but that the people for the most part had not only willingly, but joyfully, received this pretended Philip, not so much because he styled himself the son of Perseus, as on account of his declaring he would expel the Romans and give liberty to all Greece. When Scipio had dispatched these advices, he applied himself to the discharge of his commission ; he visited all the principal cities of Greece, harangued the people in their general assemblies, heard all their remonstrances patiently, excused some things, admitted others, promised the redress of all ; by which arts he drew every city to furnish a certain quota of troops, and joining these with a considerable body of auxiliaries raised by the Achæans, he at last entered Thessaly, where he immediately stopped the progress of Andriscus, or Philip ; retook such of the cities as he had garisoned, and in the end compelled him with his army to retire back into Macedon ; which was all or rather more than could have been expected from a person in his situation, whose commission extended no farther than to provide for the safety of Greece *.

The prætor AT Rome, as soon as the dispatches from Scipio arrived, and Juventius it was perceived that the affair in Macedonia was become very defeated serious, the prætor P. Juventius Thalna, and Q. Cælius were and slain. sent with a great army to reduce the rebels. It quickly appeared, that an able general was capable of doing more without an army, than a rash officer with very numerous forces. Juventius was a man of fire and spirit, one who was desirous of performing very great things, but altogether void of that calmness and conduct which are so essential to the character of a hero. Hence it was, that he made all imaginable haste to enter Macedonia, and, as if his presence only would have finished the war, advanced as fast as the army was able to march towards Andriscus. This Pseudo-Philippus, as the Romans called him, was owned, attended, and obeyed as king of Macedon; he therefore having notice of the manner in which the prætor Juventius behaved, and that he regarded himself as a theatrical prince only, who, by putting on royal robes, had qualified himself to be led in triumph, Andriscus was encouraged to attack him. When the Roman general was come within a day's march of his camp, the Macedonian prince began to move at the very break of day; and having refreshed his army the next day, about noon, he in the evening shewed himself in sight of the Roman camp, which, as he rightly judged it would, drew the prætor out of his intrenchments, and induced a general engagement, wherein the Roman army was totally defeated. The prætor Juventius and Q. Cælius being slain, if the night had not interposed and afforded the remains of the army time to retreat, there had not been a man left. Those who escaped, made all the haste they could out of Macedon; and Philip, pursuing the blow he had struck, not only reduced the whole kingdom again to his obedience, but also opened a passage into Thessaly, which he again united to his dominions, seeming now to be effectually seated on the throne, as having expelled his mortal enemies, and having about his person a numerous and victorious army, ready to undertake any thing at his command f.

* DIODOR. SICUL. excerpt. lib. xxvi. FLORUS, lib. ii. c. 14. V. PATERCUL. lib. i. c. 11.

THE Carthaginians not long after this victory sent embassadors to congratulate Philip, and to engage him into an alliance for reducing the exorbitant power of the Romans, who were on the point of beginning the third Punic war. The Macedonian received these ministers very graciously, and made them large promises of assistance, which he might have fulfilled at least in some measure by an invasion on Greece, and thereby making a diversion, which would consequently have weakened the Romans. But him whom adversity could not, prosperity ruined; his fortune buried his abilities and his virtues, if he really had any, and did not put on the appearance of good qualities to draw in and cajole the people. The Romans he thought no more of, and, instead of endeavouring to cherish his subjects, to revive trade, and to make them happy, he began to play the tyrant, and to make them feel the weight of his sceptre, almost as soon as he had handled it himself. If he had been hurried on by the impetuous rage of any one vice, the people might have hoped for quiet, when it was satiated; but he soon discovered, that he had almost all the ill qualities which are wont to render men odious, and that

Andriscus
or Philip proves a tyrant.

f Liv. ubi supra. DION. FLOR. PATERCUL. ubi supra.

he pursued every one of these as eagerly as if it had been his only and darling vice. His pride was intolerable ; coming late as he did to royalty, he thought he could never have enough submission paid him. He was suspicious to such a degree, that imprudence was a capital crime, and a circumspect conduct an indication of treason. His cruelty was so great, that he spared none whom he either disliked, or whom he conceived to dislike him and his proceedings. With all this he was so rapaciously covetous, as having been till lately excessively indigent, that he searched all corners of the kingdom for money, and where-ever he found it, declared himself its owner ; urging the care of the public safety as a pretext for public robbery ; and in short, from the moment he gained the sovereign authority, acted as if he had designed nothing less than to retain it. Yet the Macedonians bore all with invincible patience, and shewed themselves infinitely more loyal to this Philip than he was true to himself. The reason of this is easily found ; they hoped for a successor, whose government might be milder, and were willing to bear any thing, so they might once more become an independent people<sup>8</sup>.

Is twice defeated by Metellus.

WHEN the news of the defeat and death of P. Juventius was known at Rome, Q. Cæcilius Metellus was immediately named to supply his place, and troops were with all imaginable care transported into Macedon. Thither also the new prætor speedily repaired, and the king found himself on a sudden under a necessity of fighting once more for his life and crown. He shewed on this occasion the only good quality he had, viz. unconquerable courage, a quality desirable in all princes, and peculiarly revered by the Macedonians. He quickly assembled his forces, and to prevent the Romans from plundering the adjacent country, he encamped under the walls of Pydna, and there expected the prætor. Metellus, understanding Philip's resolution, marched with the Roman army, and encamped over-against him. Thus far both generals seemed to act with prudence, and military skill. The king of Macedon however quickly betrayed an extraordinary confidence in his fortune, and his forces. Metellus was strongest in horse, Philip ventured an engagement with cavalry only ; and though the Macedonians were inferior in number, and not so well armed, yet after a long and obstinate dispute, they had the victory, and compelled the Romans to retire into their camp with some confusion. This new success completed the king's destruction ; for understanding immediately after that the allies of the Romans were about to attack his conquests in Thessaly, he sent a great detachment from his army to cover them. Metellus, apprised of this, attacked him now he had weakened his forces, and, after an obstinate and bloody battle, totally routed him, insomuch that not being able to collect out of his broken army troops enough to keep the field, he was forced to fly to his old friends the Thracians. These people whom we so often find branded by the Greek writers with the name of barbarians, were neither deterred by his present adversity, nor by the ill use he had made of his former prosperity, from receiving him with open arms, and giving him all the assistance in their power, insomuch that in a very short space he was enabled to enter Macedonia again with a numerous army, which increased daily, and which, if he had managed prudently, would have enabled him to have protracted the war, a thing the Romans could least of all bear. His conduct was the very reverse of what it ought to have been, since, forgetting his late misfortunes, and breathing nothing but a vehement ambition of becoming once again master of Macedonia, and all its dependencies, he marched directly to fight Metellus, and in a second battle met the same ill fate which had attended him before. In these two engagements he had twenty five thousand men killed upon the spot, so that he found it absolutely impossible to raise a third army in defence of his pretensions. Consulting therefore his own safety, he fled to Byzas, a petty prince of Thrace, who at first received him very kindly ; but when he saw clearly that he should draw upon himself the vengeance of the Romans, he delivered up Andriscus to Metellus, who now hoped that he had put a full end to the troubles in this country ; but it presently appeared that the Macedonians were not so easily subdued, for immediately there started up a new pretender to the regal dignity, who called himself Alexander, and boasted that he too was the son of Perseus. He set up his standard in the first region of Macedonia, that is, in the country bordering upon Thrace, and very quickly reduced under his obedience the whole territory between the rivers Strymon and Nessus. But Attalus king of Pergamus, who had assisted Metellus with a fleet, remaining still upon the coast, and the prætor advancing towards the river Strymon, Alexander found himself too weak to engage the numerous and victorious army of the Romans, and quitting his conquests, and the ensigns of the regal dignity which he had assumed, he withdrew into Dardania, where he so effectually concealed himself, that the Romans could never get him into their power. Such was the end of this war, which afforded what had been to long

<sup>8</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. excerpt lib. xxvi. LIV. FLOR. & PATERCULUS ubi supra.

Year of
the Flood, 2851.
Before
Christ, 148.

Two other pretenders
defeated.

desired, an opportunity of reducing Macedonia into a Roman province, a thing immediately put into execution, as well as the chastising of the Thracians, and other borderers, for having shewn greater affection to the Macedonians, than duty towards the republic. Q. Cæcilius Metellus, on his return to Rome, triumphed, and led Pseudo-Philippus, as the Romans stiled him, in the cavalcade; after which the victor took the surname of Macedonicus; which shews of what consequence this conquest was, and how arduous the war by which it was obtained <sup>h</sup>.

As the Macedonians were reduced to the same state with the rest of the nations conquered by the Romans, by Q. Metellus, so by him also they were deprived of what small remains of their antient grandeur Emilius had left behind him; among the rest, of the brazen statues set up at Dium, for such of Alexander's guards as had fallen in the battle of Granicus. Metellus also appointed new magistrates, and changed in every respect the government under which they had lived before. As the rest of Greece soon after fell under the like circumstances, it was not doubted but the spirits of these people were effectually quelled, and that they would never think more of throwing off that yoke, which, after repeated victories, they had seen imposed upon the bravest and most potent of their neighbours. Yet it happened otherwise; a new Pseudo-Philippus shewed himself on the borders of Thrace, and having drawn together a small band of desperate men, began to harass the country, and particularly to destroy such as he either knew or suspected to be attached to the Romans. The love of liberty amongst the Macedonians encreasing with the loss of it, they resorted in crowds to this new pretender, and advised him to invade the kingdom, with full assurance that he would meet with little opposition. Accordingly he came down with his forces into the heart of Macedonia, where he was continually joined by new recruits, making in a short time so quick a progress, as the greatest part of the country submitted to him; and thus with the regal title he gained the power and authority of a king. To reduce him, the Romans sent a numerous army under the command of the quæstor Lucius Tremellius, who no sooner entered the province, than he began to retake the cities which Philip had subdued and fortified; and though he managed with much greater prudence than Andriscus, who had assumed the same name, had used, yet in the end he was defeated and slain. He seems to have been the last who pretended to vindicate the liberty of the Macedonians, or to attempt the recovery of that kingdom, under colour of a right derived from Perseus, or any of its antient princes<sup>1</sup> (I).

<sup>h</sup> LIV. FLOR. PATERCUL. ubi supra. STRAB. lib. xiii. p. 624. JUL. OBSEQ. de prodigiis. EUTROP. lib. iv.

THE trouble which the subduing this province had cost, The Macedonians and the manifest disaffection which the people had shewn towards the republic, encouraged such as were intrusted with the government to exercise great severities, and no less grievously to oppress, under colour of severity, those whom they were sent to rule. D. Junius Syllanus, a man of high quality, exceeded all his predecessors, as well in fleeing the Macedonians, as in treating them with excessive rigor. In short, though few years had elapsed since their country had

<sup>1</sup> LIV. lib. liii. VARRO. de re Rustic. lib. ii. c. 4.

(I) It must be easily discerned, that the history given in the text of the endeavours of the Macedonians to preserve or rather to recover their freedom, is very imperfect ; the cause of this is, that we collect from fragments ; a line or two from Polybius furnishes us with one circumstance (15), an extract from Diodorus (16) with another ; the contents of these books of Livy which are lost, and certain epitomes of Roman history, with the rest. That it was requisite to put all these circumstances together appears from hence ; the epitomizer of Livy tells us, that Metellus recovered Macedonia, which was before lost (17). Florus intitles his detail of this business, Of the third Macedonian war. Q. Cæcilius Metellus triumphed, led Andriscus in chains, and took the surname of Macedonicus. Florus adds, after reciting the fate of Andriscus, De eo populus Romanus, quasi de vero rege, triumpharet (18). As we are now writing the Macedonian history, there is no question to be made that the quasi does not belong to us, but that we ought to treat expressly of the reign of Andriscus, since the Romans triumphed over him as over a true king. Whether he was in truth what the Romans said, an impostor, and so far from being the son of Perseus, that he was in fact sprung from the very dregs of the people, is what cannot be determined, any more than who they were who afterwards called themselves Alexander and Philip, and put themselves at the head of the Macedonian armies against the Romans (19). Most certain it is, that the Macedonian kings were wont to have several wives, and not seldom many concubines ; this being so, admitting none of these men were in reality descended from the royal family, it must remain, however, a thing difficult to prove it ; and the Macedonians in general being disaffected, the colour of truth was sufficient to lead them into rebellion. This then may suffice for excusing those imperfections necessity hath occasioned in this part of our work.

(15) In legat. (16) ap. Phot. (17) Tit. Liv. lib. liii.
(18) Flor. lib. ii. c. 14. (19) Entrop. lib. iv.

been reduced into a province, and they had all the reason in the world to believe that their strenuous endeavours to avoid it were well remembered at Rome; yet so much of their ancient spirit remained, that they could not bear the thoughts of enduring tamely so sharp a subjection. They therefore sent deputies to Rome to represent their grievances, and to pray that more justice might be done on their rapacious governor, than ever he had done in his province. When this matter came before the senate, the deputies were heard with great shew of kindness, and Junius Syllanus was commanded to appear at a certain day, and answer to the crimes objected against him. Before that time was expired, Titus Manlius Torquatus his father, a very eminent person, of the old Roman stamp, preferred a petition, that the cause might be referred to him, and he be allowed to hear and determine it at his own house, which was granted. There the Macedonian deputies appeared, and boldly opened the particular causes of their complaints, exhibited their proofs, and fully replied to the defence made by Syllanus. At length Titus Manlius gave sentence that his son was guilty, and ordered him to be taken out of his presence. A little after Junius Syllanus hanged himself, and when the good old man was informed of it, he shewed no concern; but on the very day of his funeral kept his house open, and transacted all sorts of business, as if his son's deviating from virtue had divorced him from his family, and made him a stranger to his blood. After this we meet with nothing relating to the Macedonians, which deserves to be recorded in their history, to which therefore we shall now put an end * (K).

THE

* TIT. LIV. Hist. lib. liv.

(K) The punishment of Syllanus, with the very extraordinary circumstances which attended it, plainly proves that the Romans were now very desirous of making the Macedonians easy, by preventing those acts of tyranny and oppression, which for the sake of aggrandizing themselves and their families, governors were but too ready to commit. And these proceedings of theirs fully justify an observation which we heretofore made, that they were desirous to give all possible ease to their proper subjects, though they encouraged troubles among their allies, and in such states as were tributary to them. Such a conduct naturally conciliated the minds of the people, who when they found themselves protected and well used, were no longer inclined to take up arms against those who had so often subdued them; whereas necessity and oppression would have wrought their old effects; and the Macedonians would have rose in arms time after time, till they had been either relieved
or

THE intelligent reader, by comparing the contents of this Summary with those of former sections, will acquire a perfect knowledge view of of the steps by which the state of Macedon rose, the arts used this his- by its princes to render it formidable, the wars and conquests tory. by which it became arbiter of Greece, and sovereign of a great part of the known world; the accidents which contributed to its quick declension, and the causes which, by slower degrees, brought on its total ruin (L). For in a political sense, a government is said to be brought to destruction, when it no longer resides in the hands of natives, and the constitution under which the people live owes its form, not to their choice, but to the will of their conquerors. From such a comparison as we have mentioned, it will appear, that all this series of events did not take up a space of above seven hun-or extirpated. But indulgence got the better of the love of liberty, and when they were allowed to be quiet, they forgot that quiet was only allowed them, and that they did not owe peace to themselves, but to the will of their masters.

(L) The principal intent of the recapitulation in the text was to demonstrate the usefulness of this work, in which, without any interruptions or digressions, the histories of nations are to be found from their infancy to their decay. In the famous Sir Walter Raleigh's history of the world, we have a very imperfect account of the kingdom of Macedon before the reign of Philip the son of Amyntas (20), and no description of the country at all. In Dr. Howell's history, there is no amendment of this matter; the kings preceding Philip are but just mentioned, and there are some mistakes, and several omissions, in the little which is said (21). Mr. Rollin is by much the fairest writer, for he sets out with acquainting us, that the history of Macedon before Philip is very obscure and confused, and so he leaves it (22). Sir Walter Raleigh, in the conduct of his history, treats of the affairs of Alexander's successors in a continued narration, which blends the transactions in several nations one with another. Dr. Howell avoided this, but his history of Macedon from the time of Alexander to the captivity of Perseus is too concise, neither is the period well fixed, for it ought to have ended with the reduction of Macedonia into a province. Mr. Rollin takes the same method with Sir Walter Raleigh, and one may safely say, that dean Prideaux is a guide he seldom or never forsakes. On the whole, the regular series of events traced in the text is not to be met with in any other history or collection of history that has come to our hands. We also take the liberty to add, that what has been before laid down, may be as well applied to the histories of other nations as this; for having pursued the same method in all, all have the same advantages.

(20) P. i. B. iv. c. 1. sect. 1.

(21) B. ii. c. 2. sect. 5.

(22) Hist. Ancien. Vol. VI.

dred years. That the first settlement of Ceraunus and his Argives in the centre of that country, which was afterwards called Macedonia, is very obscurely related by antient historians; and yet that we have a better account of the transactions of his reign than of his immediate successors, whose names are all that we have transmitted to us. That the homage yielded by the Macedonian princes to the Persian emperors was one great cause of their subsequent power, inasmuch as it preserved them from being harassed by the wars made by the Persians on the rest of the Greek states, brought great sums of money into Macedonia, and afforded frequent opportunities of annexing cities and districts to the kingdom by grants from the great king, in trust, as it were, for the better securing their submission to his empire. That the declension of the Persian power, while there were but weak princes on the throne of Macedon, had well-nigh caused the destruction of their kingdom, endangered alike from the rapacious violence of its barbarous neighbours, the boundless ambition of the Greek republics, and those civil dissensions which raged in its own bowels. But when a prince of great abilities assumed the regal dignity, he by dint of genius quieted domestic feuds, by force of arms repressed the barbarous nations, and then made a successful war against those republics which had held his immediate ancestors in a kind of subjection, till from these accessions of power, directed by his own superior wisdom, he acquired the sovereignty of Greece, wherein himself and his people at the beginning of his reign were scarce at all regarded, or rather contemned as Barbarians. That as his conduct founded, so the courage and military virtues of his successor wonderfully extended the Macedonian empire; which for want of his having an heir at age, was broke in pieces, and the kingdom of Macedon left in the same condition in which the victorious Alexander received it. That the successors of these great monarchs, preserving the ambition without the abilities of those they imitated, instead of restoring, weakened, and lost all the dependencies to the dominion of Macedon, and at last, by an ill-timed attempt to recover them, delivered up the kingdom itself into the hands of strangers (M). Against whom its inhabitants, with a spirit far far superior, though as successful as that of their last princes, struggled for a time, till at last, worn out, and breathless, they yielded to the power of the conqueror, and were content that Macedonia, which had been the mistress of so many provinces, should now become a province herself. There remained still however some unsubjected fragments of her ancient empire, viz. the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, the history of which, to their reduction by the Romans, the next sections will relate.

(M) We chose to give a list of the princes who ruled in Macedon after the death of Alexander the Great rather in a note at the end of the history, than at the beginning of this section, because of their different titles and authorities which could not there, but will be here easily understood.

A TABLE of the Macedonian Princes.

Aridæus or Philip the son of Philip.
Alexander the son of Roxana.
Cassander the son of Antipater.
Philip the son of Cassander.
Antipater and Alexander his sons also.
Demetrius Poliorcetes the son of Antigonus.
Pyrrhus.
Lyfimachus.
Ptolemy Ceraunus.
Meleager.
Antipater the son of Philip.
Softhenes.
Antigonus Gonatus son of Demetrius.
Demetrius the son of Antigonus.
Antigonus Dofon, first protector, then king.
Philip the son of Demetrius.
Perseus.
Andriscus, or Pseudo-Philippus.

They were all as to their power alike sovereigns of Macedon, but they differed as to the authority they claimed, and as to the titles by which they claimed. Some were lawful princes, as Aridæus and Alexander; others downright usurpers, as Cassander and his sons. The choice of the people bestowed the crown on Demetrius the son of Antigonus. Conquest gave the small right they had to the princes interfering between Demetrius and his son Antigonus Gonatus. After him the kingdom continued hereditary to its extinction.

S E C T. IX.

The history of the Seleucidæ in Syria, to the reduction of their dominions by the Romans.

AFTER the battle of Ipsus, wherein Antigonus was slain, and Demetrius put to flight, the empire of Alexander was, as we have related above <sup>a</sup>, by a new partition divided into four kingdoms. Ptolemy had Egypt, Libya, Arabia, Cælo-Syria, and Palestine; Cassander Macedon and Greece; Lyfimachus Thrace, Bitbynia, and some other provinces beyond the Hellefpont and the Bosphorus; and Seleucus all the rest. The two kingdoms of Syria and Egypt continued in the same families through a long series of princes, without any considerable alteration. But Macedon often changed its masters, and the provinces, which fell to the share of Lyfimachus, were, upon his death, as they lay at a great distance from each other, seized by different princes, and so dismembered, that his kingdom may be truly said to have ended with his life. The history of the kingdom of Macedon, from its foundation to Alexander the Great, and from that period to its being reduced to a Roman province, we have already delivered, and shall therefore now proceed to the two other kingdoms, which the above-mentioned division of provinces produced, viz. those of Syria and Egypt. The kingdom of Syria, to which, as the most powerful and extensive of the two, we shall give the precedency, was not confined to that country alone; but, besides Syria, comprehended those vast and fertile provinces of the upper Asia, which formed the Persian empire; being, in its full extent, bounded by the Mediterranean on one side and the river Indus on the other. These vast spreading dominions were commonly called the kingdom of Syria, because Seleucus, the first of the Syro-Macedonian kings, having built the city of Antioch in that province, chose it, as did likewise his successors, for the usual place of his residence. Here his descendants, from him stiled Seleucidæ, reigned, according to Eusebius <sup>b</sup>, for the space of two hundred and fifty one years, that is, from the one hundred and seventeenth olympiad, when Seleucus recovered Babylon, to the the third year of the one hundred and eightieth, when Antiochus Asiaticus, the last of the race of Seleucus, was driven out by Pompey, and

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 302, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> EUSEB. in Chron.

SYRIA after the Death of ALEXANDER the GREAT

Taurus Mons

Cyrrhestica

Chalcidene

CHALDAEA

BABYLONIAE
FINES

Arabes Scenitæ

DESERTA

COCCESYRIA

PROSRIA

MARIS

MEDITERRA

NEI PARS

PHOENICIUM MARE

Septentrio

Meridies

Oriens

Occidens

Syria reduced to a Roman province. Before we proceed to the history of the Seleucidæ, we shall exhibit a series of the kings of that race, with the years of their respective reigns.

A table of the kings of Syria, from the foundation of that monarchy, to its being reduced by the Romans, with the years of their respective reigns.

Seleucus Nicator	32	Alexander Zebina	5
Antiochus Soter	19	Antiochus Theus	2
Antiochus Theus	15	Antiochus Sidetes	9
Seleucus Callinicus	20	Antiochus Grypus	19
Seleucus Ceraunus	3	Antiochus Cyzicenus	21
Antiochus the Great	36	Seleucus	months 7
Seleucus Philopator	11	Antiochus Eusebes	1
Antiochus Epiphanes	11	Demetrius Eucharus	3
Antiochus Eupator	2	Philip	7
Demetrius Soter	12	Antiochus Dionysius	3
Alexander Balas	6	Tigranes	18
Demetrius Nicator	13	Antiochus Asiaticus	4

Seleucus, the founder of the Syro-Macedonian empire, was Seleucus the son of Antiochus, one of the chief captains of Philip the Nicator. father of Alexander. We are told by Justin<sup>c</sup>, that his mother Laodice, nine months before he was born, dreamt, that Apollo, being in bed with her, presented her with a precious stone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to the son she should bring forth; and that next morning upon waking she found in her bed a ring, with a stone like that which she had seen in her dream. The same author adds, that not only the child she was afterwards delivered of, but all the Syrian kings of his race had the mark of an anchor on their thigh (A). The ancients speak

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. l. xv.

(A) To this Ausonius, speaking of the cities of Alexandria and Antioch, alludes in the following verses.

*Et vos ite pares, Macedumque attollite nomen, Magnus Alexander te condidit, illa Seleucum Nuncupat : ingenitus nœvus fuit anchora signum :
Qualis juncta solet generis nota certa : per omnem
Nam sobolis seriem nativa cucurrit imago (1).*

(1) Auson. de clar. m. lib.

Made governor of Babylon.

Aspires to the sovereign power in his government.

speak of several other dreams, prodigies, responses of oracles, &c. portending to Seleucus some extraordinary rise and good fortune ; but the eminent parts he brought with him into the world, joined to a great sweetness of temper, to an obliging behaviour, and a no less gallant than prudent conduct, were the surest prognostics of his future greatness. He served under Alexander from his tender years, attended him in his expedition into Asia, and was by him honoured with the chief command of the elephants, a commission of great trust and reputation. After the death of that conqueror, Perdiccas, whom the officers had unanimously appointed regent of the empire, put him at the head of the cavalry of the allies ; in which command he acquitted himself with such reputation, that Antipater, who succeeded Perdiccas in the regency, raised him to the government of Babylon and its territory. In this post he was tempted, by the example of the other captains of Alexander, who aspired to the supreme power in their respective allotments, to betray his trust, and entertain thoughts of setting up for himself ; whence, when Eumenes, on his march into Susiana, pressed him to join the governors of the upper provinces against Antigonus, who had openly revolted, he not only refused to lend them any assistance, but even attempted to destroy both Eumenes and his army, by cutting the sluices of the Euphrates, and laying the whole plain where they were encamped under water. Eumenes, however, tho' thus surprized, gained an eminence with his troops, before the waters rose to any height, and the next day, by diverting their course, found means to escape the danger, without the loss of a single man. Seleucus, finding this stratagem prove unsuccessful, sent emissaries under-hand

But Appian, without taking any notice of this native mark, as Ausonius styles it, tells us, that Laodice was warned in a dream to deliver to her son the first ring she should find, and assured, that he should reign in the country where the ring should be lost. In compliance with this admonition, Laodice, having some time after found an iron ring, with the figure of an anchor engraved on it, gave it to her son Seleucus, who lost it near the Euphrates, where he afterwards reigned. The same author adds, that Seleucus, on his march to Babylon, having stumbled against a stone, and caused it immediately, out of a superstitious observance, to be dug up, found under it, deep in the ground, a small anchor ; and hence the custom among the Seleucidæ of Syria to use an anchor on their seals (2).

(2) Appian in Syriac.

into

into Eumenes's camp, soliciting, with mighty promises, the Argyaspides and Antigenes their leader, to abandon Eumenes and come over to him ; but not being able to prevail with them upon any terms whatsoever, he made a truce with Eumenes, granting him a free passage thro' his province. However, he sent an express at the same time to Antigonus in Mesopotamia, advising him to come with all possible expedition, and fall upon Eumenes, before he was joined by the governors of the upper Asia ; for as Eumenes was unalterably attached to the interest of the kings, and withal the best general and greatest statesmen Alexander had left behind him, Seleucus, as well as the other governors, who were prompted by their ambition to usurp the sovereign power in their governments, were under no small apprehension of his superior merit and genius. Antigonus followed the reasonable advice of his friend Seleucus, and, being attended in his expedition against Eumenes with the great success we have related above<sup>d</sup>, he returned to Babylon, where Seleucus received him with rich presents, and, at a vast charge, feasted his whole army. But when Antigonus demanded an account of the revenues of his government, he told him in plain terms, That he was not accountable to any-body for the revenues of a province, which the Macedonians had bestowed upon him, as a reward for his services in Alexander's life-time. This blunt answer occasioned a misunderstanding between him and Antigonus, who, as the breach grew daily wider and wider, waited only for an opportunity of cutting off this new rival, as he had already treated others, whose abilities gave him umbrage ; but Seleucus, suspecting his design, stole away with fifty horse only, and put himself under the protection of Ptolemy governor of Egypt, whose kindness and courteous behaviour, towards all who fled to him for shelter, was every-where cried up. Antigonus, when informed of his flight, expressed great joy, being thereby put in possession of a rich province without striking a blow, or being obliged to imbrue his hands, as he had resolved to do, in the blood of his old friend and confederate<sup>e</sup> (B).

Falls out with Antigonus, and flies to Egypt.

Seleucus

<sup>c</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. xix. PLUT. in Eumen CORN. NEP. in vi. ejusd. c. 7. <sup>d</sup> See before, p. 280, & seq. <sup>e</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. APPIAN. & JUSTIN. ibid.

(B) Diodorus tells us, that, upon the first news of the flight of Seleucus, the Chaldeans foretold to Antigonus, that if Seleucus should get safe into Egypt, he should one day become lord of all Asia, adding, that if Antigonus opposed him, he should fall in a battle thereupon Antigonus immediately dispatched some horsemen after him.

Seleucus being got safe into Egypt, and received there by Ptolemy with all possible demonstrations of kindness and friendship, represented so effectually to that prince, as he did also to Lyfimachus and Cassander, the formidable power and ambitious views of Antigonus, that he engaged them all three in a league against him. This Antigonus apprehended, and therefore, to prevent them from entering into any measures prejudicial to his interest, sent an embassy to each of the three, with new assurances of his friendship; but finding, by their answers and the high demands they made, that they were entered into a confederacy against him, he began, without loss of time, to make the necessary preparations against the impending storm <sup>f</sup>. This war, which put an end both to the life and reign of Antigonus, we have already described at length <sup>g</sup>, and therefore shall at present confine ourselves to that part alone which Seleucus acted in it. After the victory which Ptolemy gained over Demetrius at Gaza, Seleucus having obtained of the conqueror a thousand foot, according to Appian, eight hundred according to Diodorus, and two hundred horse, took his rout towards Babylon, in order to attempt the recovery of that city. This undertaking was looked upon as a desperate enterprize, even by his friends, but, however, was attended with all the success he could have wished for (C). On his arrival at Carrhæ in Mesopotamia, he prevailed, partly by force, and partly by persuasion, on the Macedonians who garisoned the place, to revolt from Antigonus, and join him. Being thus reinforced, he entered him, enjoining them to bring him back, with a design to put him to death; but Seleucus happily escaped the danger, which greatly disturbed Antigonus, though he had ever before slighted and ridiculed such predictions (3).

<sup>f</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ibid. PLUT. in Demet. APPIAN. in Syriac. JUSTIN. l. xv. <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 301, & seq.

(C) His friends, seeing the inconsiderable number of his forces, and, on the other hand, the great strength of the enemy, did all that lay in their power to divert him from such an attempt; but he, in order to encourage them, and redeem himself from their importunities, told them, in an harangue which he made to the soldiery, that he was sure of success, since Apollo Branchides, with whom he had advised about the issue of this undertaking, had given him the title of king, and Alexander, standing by him in his sleep, had shewn him the ensigns of royalty, assuring him that he should be honoured with them in due time (4).

(3) Diodor. Sicul. l. xix.

(4) Diodor. Sicul. ibid.

the territories of Babylon, where great numbers of the inhabitants, his antient subjects, flocked to him from all parts, offering him their service, and declaring themselves ready to stand by him, at the expence of their lives and fortunes. Among others, one Polyarchus, who bore an office in the city, came over to him at the head of a thousand men compleatly armed. Seleucus had governed that province, for the space of four years, with great mildness and moderation, carrying himself in the most obliging manner to all, in order to gain the good-will of the people, and thereby secure an interest to himself, if at any time he should have occasion to contend for the sovereign power. On the other hand, Antigonus, who was of a morose and surly temper, had, with his unseasonable severity, so estranged the minds of all, that he was universally detested. No wonder then, that, as Seleucus approached the city, the inhabitants went out to meet him, welcoming him and his small army with loud acclamations, and all possible demonstrations of joy. Those who favoured Antigonus, perceiving the general and irresistible inclination of the people to Seleucus, retired into the castle, which was defended by one Diphilus; but as Seleucus was master of the city, and the affections of the people, he soon possessed himself of the fortrefs, and there found, to his inexpressible joy, his children, friends, and domestics, whom Antigonus had detained prisoners ever since his flight into Egypt <sup>h</sup>.

Recovers
Babylon.
Year of
the Flood, 2687.
Before
Christ,
312.

Seleucus, being now master both of the city and castle, judged it necessary to raise what forces he could, not doubting but Antigonus would soon send an army to drive him from these acquisitions. Accordingly, while he was busy in recruiting his army, and disciplining his new-raised troops, news was brought him, that Nicanor, governor of Media under Antigonus, was advancing full march against him, at the head of ten thousand foot and seven thousand horse. Upon this intelligence Seleucus went out to meet him with three thousand foot and four hundred horse only, and, passing the Tigris, concealed his men, as the enemy drew near, in the reeds hard by the river, with a design to fall upon Nicanor at unawares, who not having had any intelligence of Seleucus's march, encamped in a disadvantageous post, where he was the following night surpris'd, and his army with great slaughter put to the rout. Nicanor had the good fortune to make his escape; but Evager, who commanded under him, and most of the chief officers, were killed on the spot. Such of the soldiers as outlived the slaughter, declared for Seleucus, Defeats and reco
Nicanor,
Media, Susi
ana, &c

<sup>h</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. & APPIAN. ibid.

which

which enabled him to pursue his conquests, and reduce in a short time all Media and Susiana, with many of the adjacent provinces. Having, by this victory, established his interest and power in Babylon, he daily improved them by the clemency of his government, and by his justice, equity, and humanity to all his subjects, to such a degree, that, from so low a beginning, he became, in a few years, the greatest and most powerful of all Alexander's successors*.

Æra of the Seleu-cidæ.

FROM this retaking of Babylon by Seleucus, commences the famous æra of the Seleucidæ, made use of all over the east by Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans. The Jews stile it the æra of contracts, because they were obliged, when subject to the Syro-Macedonian princes, to use it in all their contracts, and other civil writings. This method of computing their years they followed till the tenth century of the Christian æra, when, upon their being obliged to remove into the western countries, they learned of the Christian chronologers of those parts to compute by the years of the creation. The same æra is called by the Arabians Taric debilkarnain, that is, the æra of the two-horned; which appellation some derive from Alexander, who, in the Coran, and other Arabic books, is frequently called the two-horned, probably because he affected to be the son of Jupiter Hammon, whom the heathens represented with two rams horns on his head. But this æra has no relation to Alexander, though by some ignorantly derived from him, and also called by his name; for Alexander was dead twelve years before Seleucus recovered Babylon, from which recovery the æra of the Seleucidæ commenced. Others therefore, with better grounds, derive the Arabic name Taric debilkarnain from Seleucus, who, as Appian informs us<sup>1</sup>, was a person of such extraordinary strength, that, seizing a bull by his horns, he could stop him short in his full career; and therefore the statuaries usually represented him with two bulls horns on his head, which, without all doubt, gave rise to the above-mentioned denomination, that æra taking its origin from him, and not from Alexander. In the two books of the Maccabees it is called the æra of the kingdom of the Greeks<sup>k</sup>; and they both use it in their dates, with this difference, however, that the first book begins the years of this æra from the spring, and the other from the autumn following (D). Antignus

* DIODOR. SICUL. l. xix. APPIAN in Syriac. p. 121. <sup>1</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac p. 201. <sup>k</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. i. ver. 10.

(D) The Syrians, Arabians, Jews, and all others who antiently computed, or still compute (for it is still in use among the eastern nations)

Antigonus, receiving an account from Nicanor of the success of Seleucus in the east, sent his son Demetrius with an army to Babylon, to drive him from that city, and dispossess him of the provinces which he had lately seized, while he himself advanced to the coasts of Asia Minor, to defeat the designs of the confederate princes, whose power began to be formidable in those parts. Demetrius, pursuant to his father's directions, having, with all possible expedition, assembled his forces at Damascus, marched from thence to Babylon, at the head of five thousand Macedonian foot, ten thousand mercenaries, and four thousand horse. His march was so expeditious, that, passing the Euphrates, he invested Babylon before the enemy had notice of his departure from Damascus. Seleucus himself was then in Media, and Patrocles, whom he had intrusted with the government of the place, no ways in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy. The Demetrius wise governor therefore, instead of sacrificing the few troops regains he had under his command to no purpose, retired with them Babylon into the fens and marshes, ordering the citizens to follow him with their most valuable effects, and abandon the city to the enemy. Demetrius finding the city deserted, laid siege to the two castles, which stood on the two opposite banks of the Euphrates, and had been well garisoned by Patrocles before his retreat. However, one of these Demetrius took, and placed in it a garison of seven thousand men; but not being able to master the other, before the time was expired in which his father had appointed him to return with his troops into nations) by this æra, began it from the autumn, excepting the author of the first book of the Maccabees, who begins it from the preceding spring, and Ptolemy of Alexandria, who, in his great syntaxis, places the beginning of this æra in the spring of the year following. Ptolemy did not reckon Seleucus thoroughly settled in the possession of Babylon till Demetrius made his retreat from thence; and this retreat happening in the spring of the following year, from that season he reckoned the years of the Seleucidæ. Some writers date the beginning of Seleucus's reign from his recovering of Babylon, when this æra began. Others from the partition which was made twelve years after, upon the death of Antigonus and defeat of Demetrius, in the battle of Ipsus: so that, according to some, he reigned twenty, according to others thirty two years; for he died twenty years after that battle, and thirty two after the recovery of Babylon. We have followed Eusebius and the learned Lipper, who compute the years of his reign from his recovering of Babylon (5)

But abandons it again.

The authority of Seleucus established in Babylon.

Extends his conquests into Media, Bactria, Hyrcania, &c.

Takes the title of king.

Invades India.

Asia Minor, he left Archelaus, one of his principal officers, with a thousand horse, and five thousand foot, to pursue the siege, and, with the rest of the troops, marched to the assistance of his father in Asia Minor. Before his departure, he allowed his soldiers to plunder the city, which proved very detrimental to his father's affairs, and greatly attached the inhabitants to Seleucus, even those who till that time had stood up for Antigonus; for they all looked upon this act of depredation as a tacit declaration of his having intirely abandoned them, since he would never have treated them as enemies, if he had looked upon them any longer as subjects; they therefore all unanimously declared for Seleucus, who, on his return to Babylon, after the retreat of Demetrius, without much ado, drove out the few troops he had left in the city, recovered the castle which he had garisoned, and thenceforth settled his authority in those parts upon so firm a foundation, that it could never after be shaken<sup>1</sup>. From this year the Babylonians, as appears from Ptolemy of Alexandria's syntaxis, date the æra of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, though all other nations place its commencement in the autumn of the preceding year.

AND now Seleucus, seeing himself in quiet possession of Babylon and its territory, advanced at the head of a considerable army into Media, where he engaged, and slew with his own hand, Nicanor, or, as others call him, Nicator, whom Antigonus had sent against him. Having reduced all Media, he pursued his march into Persia, Bactria, Hyrcania, &c. subjecting to his new empire these, and all the other provinces on this side the Indus, which had been formerly conquered by Alexander<sup>m</sup>. From these conquests, and not from Nicanor or Nicator, whom he slew, he took the surname of Nicator, as Appian and Ammianus Marcellinus inform us<sup>n</sup>. In the mean time Antigonus and Demetrius having assumed the title of kings, Seleucus, not to be behind-hand with them, took the same, stiling himself king of Babylon and Media.

Seleucus was now master of all the countries between the Euphrates and the Indus, but not of those large provinces which lay beyond the latter of these rivers, and had fallen to his share in the general partition. He was at this time closely united in point of interest with Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus; the forces of Antigonus were divided into several distant bodies, and Demetrius was employed in the siege of Rhodes. Having therefore no enemy to fear on this side the Indus, he resolved to cross that river, and, by a sudden irruption, make himself master of those vast provinces which were known by the name of India. These Alexander had formerly subdued; but, after his death, while his successors were engaged in mutual wars with each other, one Sandrocottus, or, as others call him, Androcottus, an Indian of mean extraction, under the specious pretence of delivering his country from the tyranny of foreigners, had raised a powerful army, and, having driven out the Macedonians, seized the Indian provinces for himself. To recover these provinces Seleucus marched over the Indus; but finding that Sandrocottus had made himself absolute master of all India, and, from the several provinces of it, drawn into the field an army of six hundred thousand men, with a prodigious number of elephants, he did not judge it adviseable to provoke so great a power, and therefore entering into a treaty with him, he agreed to renounce all his pretensions to that country, provided Sandrocottus furnished him with five hundred elephants; which proposal the Indian prince willingly agreeing to, a peace was concluded between them<sup>o</sup>. Seleucus having thus settled matters in India, marched back into the west against Antigonus; and the absolute necessity he was under of engaging in this war, was what hastened the peace with Sandrocottus; for Cassander finding himself reduced to great straits by Demetrius, and not being able to obtain a peace but upon terms of surrendering himself, without reserve to the will and pleasure of Antigonus, agreed with Lysimachus, who was in no better condition than himself, to send embassadors to Seleucus and Ptolemy, and by representing to them the situation of affairs, the ambitious views and exorbitant power of Antigonus, prevail upon them to enter into an alliance against him, as a common enemy. The alliance was soon concluded, for they were all under no small apprehension of the over-grown power of Antigonus and his son Demetrius, who had already driven both Cassander and Ptolemy out of all the places they possessed in Greece. This confederacy induced Seleucus to hasten a peace with the king of India, and march back into Assyria, to provide there for the war<sup>p</sup>, which was carried on with great vigour the last year by Cassander in Europe and Lysimachus in Asia, while Seleucus and Ptolemy were raising forces in their respective dominions.

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ibid. PLUT. in Demet. <sup>m</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. XIX. & XX. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 124. JUSTIN. l. XV. c. 4. AMMIAN. MARCEL. l. XXIII. Histor

<sup>n</sup> AMMIAN. ibid. siege

Concludes a peace with Sandrocottus, and yields to him all India.

<sup>o</sup> JUSTIN. l. xv. c. 4. APPIAN. in Syria. p. 117. 118. STRABO. l. v. p. 721. Pto. in Alexand. GEORGIUS. p. 101. EUSEBIUS. l. xx. JUSTIN. l. xv. c. 5. Pto. in Demet.

*The battle
of Ipsus.*

with a design to come against Antigonus with their whole strength, and put all to the issue of a general engagement. Accordingly, in the beginning of the next summer, Seleucus having drawn together at Babylon twenty thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and four hundred and eighty elephants, with an hundred chariots armed with scythes, advanced into Cappadocia and after joining the forces of the confederate princes pursued his march into Phrygia, where he met Antigonus and Demetrius near the city of Ipsus. The confederate army was commanded by Seleucus and Lysimachus, and consisted of sixty-four thousand foot, ten thousand five hundred horse, four hundred and eighty elephants, with an hundred and twenty chariots armed with scythes. The enemies forces, amounting to seventy thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and seventy-five elephants, were commanded by Antigonus and Demetrius, who, as we have already related, behaved on this occasion with the utmost bravery; but their army being entirely defeated, and Antigonus killed, Demetrius was forced to save himself by flight, being attended only with five thousand foot and four hundred horse, the poor remains of seventy thousand men he had under his command at the beginning of the engagement <sup>9</sup>.

Antioch built by Seleucus.
Year of
the Flood, 2699.
Before
Christ,
300.

AFTER this battle, the particulars whereof we have already related at length<sup>r</sup>, the four confederate princes divided the dominions of Antigonus among themselves, adding them to what they enjoyed before; but, before this division, Seleucus marching into the upper Syria, made himself master of that rich province, and there built on the river Orontes the city of Antioch, which soon became, and continued to be for many ages, the metropolis of the east; for not only the Syrian kings, but afterwards the Roman governors, who presided over the affairs of the eastern provinces, chose it for the usual place of their residence: and, in the Christian times, it was the see of the chief patriarch of Asia. It stood on the Orontes, about twenty miles from the place where that river empties itself into the Mediterranean, being equally distant from Constantinople and Alexandria in Egypt, that is, seven hundred miles from each<sup>s</sup>. Seleucus called it Antioch, either from his father's name, as Malela, Cedrenus, and the emperor Julian inform us, or from that of his son, as Strabo,

<sup>9</sup> ARRIAN. l. vii. PLUT. in Pyrrho. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 122. <sup>r</sup> See before, p. 302. & seq. <sup>s</sup> JOHANNES ANTIOCHENUS, MALLEA & BAUDRAND, Geogr. de Antioch. Mag.

Appian, and Trogus insinuate<sup>c</sup>, or perhaps from both. He built sixteen other cities bearing the same name, whereof one, situate in Pisidia, is mentioned in scripture<sup>d</sup>; but Antioch on the Orontes eclipsed all the others, being by far the most famous of the many cities Seleucus built. Antigonus, not long before, had founded a city in that neighbourhood, which, from his own name, he called Antigonia, and had designed for the capital of his empire. This city Seleucus razed to the ground, employing the materials to build, and transplanting the inhabitants to people, his new metropolis (E). Besides Antioch, Seleucus built in the same country

Seleucia,
Apamea
and Laodicea built.

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN, ubi supra. STRABO. l. xvi. p. 750. APPIAN. ubi supra.
<sup>d</sup> ACTS. xiii. 14.

(E) Johannes Malela, a native of Antioch, tells us in his chronicle, that Seleucus coming to Iopolis, a city in the hilly country of Siliphum, offered there, on the first of the month Artemisium, a sacrifice to Jupiter the Thunderer, in a chapel said to have been antiently built by Perseus the son of Danae. From Iopolis he advanced to Antigonia, and there offering a sacrifice to Jupiter, on an altar newly built by Antigonus, he, together with Amphion the priest, begged Jupiter to shew him, by some sign, whether he should inhabit Antigonia, calling it by some other name, or build a new city in another place. They had scarce ended their prayer, when an eagle snatching up a piece of flesh from the altar, dropt it near the hill of Siliphum. Hereupon Seleucus on that spot, where antiently stood a town called Botzia, laid the foundation of his new city, on the twenty second day of the month Artemisium, that is, of our May. At a small distance from the city he built a magnificent temple in honour of Jupiter Botzius. These and many such things we read in Johannes Malela concerning the origin of Antioch. This metropolis of Syria was afterwards known by the name of Tetrapolis, being divided, as it were, into four cities, each of them having its proper wall, besides a common one, which inclosed them all. The first of these cities or quarters was built by Seleucus Nicator; the second by those who flocked thither on its being made the capital of the Syro-Macedonian empire; the third by Seleucus Callinicus, and the fourth by Antiochus Epiphanes (5). The place where it stood was very subject to earthquakes, by which it suffered greatly, and was often in danger of being intirely overwhelmed; however, it continued to be, as Pliny calls it, the queen of the east, for the space of sixteen hundred years, till it was taken in 1262, and utterly destroyed by Bibaris sultan of Egypt (6). The walls of each quarter, as well as those which surrounded the whole, are

(5) Strabo. l. xvi. p. 750.

(6) Golii notæ ad Alfraganum. p.

country several other cities, whereof three were more remarkable than the rest. One of these he called Seleucia (F) from his still remaining ; but as the houses are entirely destroyed, those four quarters look like so many inclosed fields (7). It is now a small and contemptible villages known by the name of Anthakia, and remarkable for nothing but its ruins. Aleppo is become, in its stead, the metropolis of those eastern parts, the patriarchal see, which once adorned it, being translated to Damascus.

Daphne, mentioned in the second book of the Maccabees (8), was reckoned one of the suburbs of Antioch, tho' four or five miles distant from it. There Seleucus planted a grove ten miles in compass, and in the middle of the grove built a temple, which he consecrated to Apollo and Diana, making the whole an asylum. Thither the Antiochians resorted for their pleasures and diversions, as the Romans did to Baiæ, and the Alexandrians to Canopus. As persons of all ranks and conditions flocked to this delicious place, in process of time Apollo and Diana gave room to Venus and Bacchus, whereby it became so infamous, that Daphnicis moribus vivere, to live after the manner of Daphne, was used as a proverb, to express a most voluptuous and dissolute way of living. Such as had any regard for their reputation, avoided Daphne as they did the public stews, it being frequented only by young debauchees and women of professed incontinency ; insomuch, that when Cassius the Roman general came to Antioch, the very next day after his arrival, he took care to forbid, by a public proclamation, and under the severest penalties, any of his soldiers to enter, or even go near, that place, lest they should be corrupted by the horrid abominations practised there by the natives (9). It was so remarkable a place, that to distinguish Antioch, near which it lay, from other cities else where bearing the same name, the former was commonly called Antioch near Daphne (10).

(F) Johannes Malela tells us, that on the twenty-third day of our April, while Seleucus was sacrificing to Jupiter on mount Casius, and consulting him concerning a proper place to build a city in, an eagle snatching from the altar part of the sacrifice, flew towards the sea, and dropt it in a sea-town of Pieria, not far from Palæopolis, a small city, built in former ages by Syrus the son of Agenor. Hereupon Seleucus laid immediately the foundations of a great city on that spot, and called it from his own name Seleucia. Others tell us, that he was induced to build a city in that place, not by an eagle, but by a flash of lightning ; whence lightning was ever after adored there as a deity, and honoured with hymns and prayers by

(7) Idem ilid. p. 280.

(8) Maccab. l. ii. c. 4. ver. 37.

(9) Vide Chrysost. sermon. in Babylon martyrem.

(10) Strabo l.

xv. p. 719.

his own name ; another Apamea from his wife Apama, the daughter of Artabazus the Persian ; and the third Laodicea from his mother Laodice. Apamea, and Seleucia stood on the same river with Antioch, the former above it, and the latter fifteen miles below it, and five from the place where that river falls into the sea. Laodicea stood in the southern part of the same country. From these four cities, that quarter of Syria, in which they stood was called Tetrapolis, or the country of the four cities ; which indeed was but an occasional name, if we may so call it, the true name of that tract being Seleucis, a name given it by Seleucus himself ; for Syria, under the kings of the Macedonian race, was divided into three parts, viz. Syria properly so called, Cælo-Syria or the Hollow-Syria, and Syria Palestina. The first of these, called also the Upper Syria, contained Commagena, Cyrrhestica, Seleucis, and some other small districts, and extended from mount Amanus on the north, to mount Libanus on the south. It was, in after-ages, called also Syria Antiochena. The second reached from Libanus to Antilibanus, including the city of Damascus, and its large territory. As this tract consisted mostly of deep vallies between high mountains, it was on this account called Cælo-Syria or the Hollow-Syria. Syria Palestina extended from Antilibanus to the confines of Egypt. The maritime parts of the two latter, lying between Aradus and Gaza, were known to the Greeks by the name of Phœnice.

Antigonus being killed in the battle of Ipsus, and the power of Demetrius brought, by that dreadful overthrow, to a very low ebb, the confederate princes, having now no other enemy to fear, began to be jealous of each other. Lyfimachus, being under no small apprehension of the over-grown power of Seleucus, entered into a separate alliance with Ptolemy, taking to wife Arsinoe one of his daughters, and marrying his son Agathocles to another (G). This alliance gave umbrage to enters into an alliance with De- metrius.

Seleucus

the inhabitants (11). Seleucus allowed the Jews the same privileges and immunities in each of these new cities, as were enjoyed by the Greeks and Macedonians, especially at Antioch in Syria, where that people settled in such numbers, that they possessed as considerable a part of Antioch as their countrymen did of Alexandria.

(G) Lyfimachus married the daughter, not of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as we read in Memnon (12) ; but of Ptolemy the first, the son of Lagus, and Eurydice, as Plutarch (13), Justin (14), Pausanias (15), and even Memnon himself elsewhere informs us (16).

(11) Appian. in Syriac. p. 125. (12) Memnon in excerpt
5. (13) Plut. in Demet. (14) Justin. l. xvii. c. 2. & l. xxi.
c. 2. (15) Pausan. in Attic. p. 8. (16) Memnon. in excerpt c. 9.
8. l. viii.

Seleucus, who thereupon entered into a treaty with Demetrius, marrying Stratonice the daughter of that prince by Phila the sister of Cassander. As Demetrius was at that time in a very low condition, he readily laid hold of Seleucus's proposal; and sailing from Greece, where he still held some cities, conveyed the new bride, with the few ships he had then remaining, into Syria. In his passage thither he made a descent on Cilicia, which then belonged to Plistarchus the brother of Cassander, the four kings having, in the general partition, bestowed it upon him. Hereupon Plistarchus, leaving Cilicia, went to complain to Seleucus of the wrong done him, and to expostulate with him for contracting an alliance with the common enemy, without the consent of the other kings, which he apprehended to be an infraction of the treaty. Demetrius, receiving intelligence of this journey, advanced directly to the city of Quinda, where the treasures of the province, amounting to twelve hundred talents, were kept. These he seized, and hastening back to his fleet with the booty, sailed to Orasfus, a maritime town of Syria, where he met Seleucus, and delivered to him his bride. After the two princes had spent several days there in nuptial rejoicings and mutual entertainments, without arms or guards, Seleucus returned in great pomp and magnificence to Antioch, and Demetrius with his fleet to Cilicia, which he intirely reduced, and thereby considerably increased his power in those parts, being, after this acquisition, master of all Cilicia, of the whole island of Cyprus, and of the two rich and strong cities of Tyre and Sidon in Phœnice <sup>u</sup>.

It was highly impolitic in Seleucus, to permit a prince of an unbounded ambition, of extraordinary parts, and great skill in military affairs, to settle at so small a distance from him, and usurp from one of his allies a province so near his own dominions as Cilicia. His eyes, however, were opened at last, and growing jealous of such a neighbour, he would fain have purchased Cilicia of him; but Demetrius rejecting the proposal, Seleucus, to pick a quarrel with him, insisted upon his yielding up to him the cities of Tyre and Sidon, as belonging to Syria, of which he was king. Demetrius was fired at this demand, and in a great passion replied, That though he were to be vanquished a thousand times over, he would never purchase a son-in-law at so dear a rate; and immediately sailed to both those cities, reinforced the garisons, and furnishing them with all things necessary for a vigorous defence, defeated,<sup>w</sup> for the present, the designs of Seleucus, whose proceeding on this occasion was generally blamed; for as his dominions were of a vast extent, reaching from the river Indus to the Mediterranean, every one judged it base and mean in him to disturb his father-in-law, who was under a cloud of misfortunes, in the enjoyment of those poor remains of his broken fortune<sup>w</sup>. But Seleucus, notwithstanding these public murmurs, falling upon Cilicia, made himself master of that whole country, while, on the other hand, Lyfimachus reduced all the territories belonging to Demetrius in Asia, and Ptolemy made himself master of the island of Cyprus, and of the cities of Tyre and Sidon in Phœnice. Thus was Demetrius, notwithstanding his alliance with Seleucus, stripped by the confederate princes of the best part of his dominions<sup>z</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> PLUT. in Demet. STRABO. l. xv. p. 719. MEMNON. in excerpt. c. 5. JUSTIN. l. xvii. c. 2.

Demetrius being, by these losses, reduced so low as to give Seleucia Seleucus no further jealousy, that prince undertook the building on the Tigris of a new city, which he called from his own name Seleucia, gris built. and made the metropolis of all the provinces of his empire beyond the Euphrates. It was placed on the western side of the Tigris, about forty miles from Babylon, over-against the place where at present the city of Bagdad stands. This new city soon became one of the most populous and flourishing in those parts; for the country near Babylon being laid under water, by the breaking down of the banks of the Euphrates, and the branch of that river which passed through the middle of the city, rendered innavigable, most of the inhabitants, forsaking their antient habitations, settled at Seleucia; which Seleucus had not only made the place of his residence whenever he came into those parts, but distinguished it with many privileges above all the other cities of the east. By these means Babylon, soon after the building of Seleucia, was quite abandoned, nothing remaining of that antient city but its walls. Pliny<sup>y</sup> tells us, that it was drained of its inhabitants, and brought to desolation by the neighbourhood of Seleucia on the Tigris, which Seleucus Nicator, to use Pliny's words, built there for that purpose. Jerom, who flourished in the fourth century of the Christian æra, writes, that, in his time, Babylon was intirely ruined, the walls only being kept up by the Parthian kings, who had made the space within a park for the

<sup>w</sup> PLUT. ibid.
c. 26.

<sup>z</sup> PLUT. in Demet

<sup>y</sup> PLIN. l. vi.

keeping of wild beasts <sup>2</sup> (H). On the other hand, Seleucia became so populous, that in Pliny's time, it had six hundred thousand

<sup>2</sup> HIERONYM. Comment in Esaï. c. 14.

(H) The first after Jerom, who mentions Babylon, is one Benjamin, a Jew of Tudela in Navar. This traveller, in his Itinerary, which he wrote about the middle of the twelfth century, tells us, that he was upon the spot where the city of Babylon stood, and that he saw only some ruins of Nebuchadnezzar's palace still remaining, which no body ventured to visit, by reason of the many serpents and scorpions that infested the place (15). Texeira, in the account he gives us of his travels from India to Italy, tells us, that, in his time, there was scarce any thing remaining of this great and famous city, and that the place on which it stood was the least frequented of any in all that country (16). Rauwolf, a German traveller, who visited those places in 1574, confirms what we read in the abovementioned writers. We shall quote his words: “ The “ village of Elugo, says he, stands on the place, where formerly “ Babylon, the metropolis of Chaldea, stood. The harbour is a “ quarter of a league off, whither those use to resort, who intend “ to travel by land to the famous city of Bagdad, which lies about “ a day and a half's distance to the east on the river Tigris. This “ country is so dry and barren, that it cannot be tilled, and so “ bare, that I should have doubted very much, whether this power“ ful and potent city (which was the most stately and famous one “ of the world, situated in the pleasant and fruitful country of Si- “ nar) stood in that place, if I had not known it by its situation,
“ and several antiquities still to be seen in that neighbourhood ;
“ first by the old bridge which was laid over the Euphrates, whereof “ there are some arches still remaining, built of burnt brick, and “ wonderfully strong. — Just before the village of Elugo is the hill, “ whereon the castle stood : and you may still see the ruins of its “ fortifications. At a small distance from the castle stood the “ tower of Babylon. This we see still, and it is half a league in “ diameter, but so ruined and full of venomous reptiles, that no “ body dares come within half a mile of it, except in two months “ of the winter, when the insects keep within their holes. Among “ these reptiles there are some called in the Persian tongue Eglo, “ bigger than our lizards, very poisonous, &c. (17). ” All this shews how fully the predictions of the prophet Isaiab relating to this place have been accomplished. His words are as follow ; And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah ; it shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation ; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, thousand inhabitants, and far excelled all the other cities of the east <sup>a</sup>. Besides Seleucia, Seleucus built several other cities, And many sixteen other cities.

(15) Benjamin. Itiner. p. 76. (16) Texeira c. 8. (17) See Kay's edition of these travels in English. part ii. chap. 7.

<sup>a</sup> PLIN. ubi supra.

neither shall the shepherds make their folds there ; but wild beasts of the desert shall be there, and their house shall be full of doleful creatures, and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there, and the wild beasts of the island shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces, and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged (18). Thus far Isaiah ; and, besides him, several other prophets have uttered prophecies to the same purpose, foretelling the utter destruction of Babylon. 'Tis true, that Lucan (19), Philostratus (20), and others, mention the city of Babylon as still standing and flourishing in their time ; but those authors, and all others who speak of Babylon as a city still remaining after the time of Seleucus Nicator, are to be understood of Seleucia on the Tigris, and not of old Babylon on the Euphrates ; for that city becoming soon after it was built, the metropolis of the east, was called also Babylon, as Pliny and Stephanus inform us (21). It was first called Seleucia Babylonica, or Seleucia in the province of Babylon, to distinguish it from several other cities in different provinces bearing the same name. Afterwards it was known by the name of Babylonia, and at length by that of Babylon (22). That Lucan by Babylon in the place abovementioned means Seleucia, is very plain ; for the poet speaks there of the metropolis of the Parthian kingdom, where the trophies of Crassus were hung up after the defeat of the Romans at Carrhæ ; which can be understood only of the Seleucian Babylon, that city, and not the old Babylon, being the seat of the Parthian kings. The same author, speaking in another place of Babylon (23), describes it as surrounded by the Tigris ; which plainly shews, that by Babylon he meant Seleucia or the new Babylon ; for that city, and not the old Babylon, stood on the Tigris, as every one knows. As for Philostratus, he mistook Seleucia, then called Babylon, for the old Babylon, and therefore gives us the same description of it, which Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo and others give of old Babylon ; but this is not the only blunder Philostratus is guilty of in his account, or rather romance, of Apollonius Thyanæus. As Babylon was drained of its inhabitants by Seleucia, so was Seleucia in process of time by Ctesiphon and Almadayan, and these two again by Bagdad. This last city was first built in the same place where Seleucia or new Babylon stood, which without all doubt, gave rise to the common error, that Bagdad stands on the ruins of old Babylon. In the year of the sixteen of which he called Antioch, from the name of his brother Antiochus; nine Seleucia, from his own name; six Laodicea, from his mother Laodice; three Apamea, from Apama his first wife; and one Stratonicea, from his last wife Stratonice<sup>b</sup>. In these, as well as in the other cities he built, viz. Beræa, Edeffa, Pella, &c. he planted the Jews, allowing them most ample privileges; and hence it was that they were dispersed all over Syria and the Lesser Asia. They had been settled in the eastern countries beyond the Euphrates, and multiplied there in great numbers, ever since the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities; but Seleucus Nicator was the first, as Josephus informs us<sup>c</sup>, who granted them settlements in the provinces of Asia on this side the Euphrates.

(18) Isa. . xiii. ver. 19—22. (19) Lucan. l. i. ver. 10. (20) Philostrat. l. i. c. 17, 18, 19. (21) Plin. l. vi. c. 26. & Steph. in Babylon. (22) Vide Plin. & Steph. ibid. (23) Lucan. l. vi. ver. 50.

WHILE Seleucus was thus employed in building cities, Demetrius having, as he thought, settled his affairs in Greece, began to make great preparations for the recovering of his father's dominions in Asia. With this view he raised an army of an hundred thousand foot, and about twelve thousand horse, and fitted out a fleet of five hundred sail, which was the greatest force that had been seen since the time of Alexander. These formidable preparations alarmed Ptolemy, Lysimachus and Seleucus, who renewing their antient alliance for

<sup>b</sup> APPIAN in Syriac. p. 201.      <sup>c</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. & contra APPIAN. l. ii. EUSEB. in Chron.

Christian æra 754, Seleucia was reduced to such a state of desolation, as to have nothing on the spot where it stood, but the cell of a monk called Dad, and a garden adjoining to it, whence it was called Bagdad; that is, in the language of the country, the garden of Dad. In this place Abu Jaafar Almanfur, caliph of the Saracens, not likeing Hishemia, where his predecessor had resided, built a new city, which has ever since been called from the place Bagdad. This he made the capital of his empire, raising it upon the very foundations of Seleucia or new Babylon, on the west side of the Tigris; but not long after it was translated to the other side, where it still stands, that part which was built on the west side, being at present no more than the suburbs of it. It was, for many years, the capital of the Saracen empire, and is still a place of great note; but such as take it for the antient Babylon, are greatly mistaken, that city standing on the Euphrates, and Bagdad on the Tigris, about forty miles from it (24).

(24) Vide Bochar. Geog. Sacr. part. i. l. i. c. 8. Gollii notæ ad Alfragan. p. 121, 122. Sionitæ descript. Bagdad. in Geog. Nubiensi.

their mutual defence against Demetrius as a common enemy, prevailed also upon Pyrrhus king of Epirus to join in the same confederacy. Demetrius, not being able to withstand so many enemies, was, after many great losses, obliged to abandon the conquests he had made in Caria and Lydia, and march into the east; but Agathocles the son of Lyfimachus following him close in his march, reduced him to such straits for want of provisions, that a sickness spreading through his army, swept off great numbers of his men; and when he attempted with the small remains of his troops, to pass mount Taurus, he found all the passes guarded by the enemy, which obliged him to return to Tarsus in Cilicia, a city belonging to Seleucus, to whom he transmitted an account of the melancholy situation of his affairs, intreating that prince, in a very moving manner, to afford him the necessary subsistence for himself and the remainder of his troops. Seleucus at first pitying his condition, ordered his lieutenants in those parts to supply him and his army with all things necessary; but afterwards, being put in mind of the valour and enterprizing genius of this prince, instead of helping him, he resolved upon his destruction; and accordingly marching against him, reduced him to such difficulties, as we have already related, that he was obliged to surrender at discretion. Seleucus Death of caused him to be conducted under a strong guard to the Sy- Demetri- rian Chersonesus, where he was detained prisoner till he died, us. but allowed the freedom of a park to hunt in, and plenti- Year of fully supplied with all things necessary both for the support the Flood, and pleasures of life<sup>d</sup>. Upon his death Seleucus took posses- 2715. sion of whatever he held in Syria and Asia, and of both these Before kingdoms made, to use the expression of Eusebius, one intire Christ, 284. empire<sup>e</sup>.

A FEW months after Demetrius, died also Ptolemy Soter War be- king of Egypt, so that now two only of all Alexander's cap- tween Sc- tains survived, viz. Lyfimachus and Seleucus. As they were leucus and now drawing near to the last period of their days, each of Lyfima- them being upwards of seventy, one would have thought chus. they should have closed the scene of their life in the union which had subsisted so long between them, for they had ever been closely united, and, to the utmost of their power, supported each other; but it happened quite otherwise, a war, which proved fatal to both, soon breaking out between them, on the following occasion: Lyfimachus, after the marriage of his son Agathocles with Lyfandra, one of Ptolemy's daughters, married another of them called Arfinoe himself, and had by her several children. Hereupon great emulation arose between the two sisters, each of them striving to form a powerful party in their favour against the death of Lyfimachus. As they were sisters by different mothers, for Lyfandra was the daughter of Eurydice, and Arfinoe of Berenice, the disagreement of their mothers greatly contributed to the heightening and fomenting of the contention between them. In the height of their emulation, Ptolemy Ceraunus, the brother of Ptolemy Philadelphus, arrived at the court of Lyfimachus, and his arrival, as he was brother to Lyfandra by both parents, made Arfinoe apprehensive, that his interest would prove too effectual to the party of Lyfandra, and enable them to destroy her and her children at the death of Lyfimachus. To prevent this she plotted the death of Agathocles, and effected it, by representing him to her husband as one who was forming conspiracies against his life and crown, which induced the old king to confine him to a castle, and there put him to death. Hereupon Lyfandra with her children, and Ptolemy Ceraunus her brother, took sanctuary in the court of Seleucus, and prevailed upon him to make war upon Lyfimachus. Many of Lyfimachus's chief officers, even those who had been most attached to his interest, were so much affected with the death of Agathocles, under whose conduct they had gained many glorious victories, that they went over to Seleucus, and backed the remonstrances of Lyfandra with their own complaints. Seleucus was easily persuaded to engage in this war, being already sufficiently inclined to it on other accounts; but before he imbarqued in so great an undertaking, he not only resigned to his son Antiochus a considerable part of his empire, but also, by an unparalleled example, his favourite queen Stratonice. The manner how this happened is thus related by Plutarch<sup>f</sup>, Appian<sup>g</sup>, and Valerius Maximus<sup>h</sup>. As Stratonice was the most beautiful woman of her age, Antiochus fell violently in love with her; but not daring to own his passion, he silently languished under it, and at length fell dangerously ill. Erasistratus, an eminent Greek physician, who attended him, soon perceived that love was his distemper; but the difficulty was to discover the object of his flame: He therefore passed whole days in the apartment of his patient, and carefully watching the countenance of the prince when visited by the ladies of the court, he observed,

<sup>d</sup> PLUT. in Demet. APPIAN. in Syriac. VAL MAX. l. v.

<sup>e</sup> EUSEB. in Chron.

Seleucus yields his queen Stratonice to his son Antiochus, with all the provinces of the upper Asia

<sup>f</sup> PLUT. in Demet. l. v. c. 7.

<sup>g</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac.

<sup>h</sup> VAL. Max.

that when Stratonice came alone, or in company with Seleucus, to make him a visit, great alterations happened in his pulse, in his countenance, in his behaviour, &c. and that nothing of this was seen when any other lady entered his room. From these infallible symptoms Erasistratus plainly perceived, that Stratonice was the object of his passion; and the first time he was alone with the sick prince after that discovery, he, with great dexterity, drew the secret from his own mouth. The prince owned his passion for Stratonice his mother-in-law, and declared that he had done all that lay in his power to vanquish it; that he had a thousand times had recourse to every consideration that could be represented to his thoughts in such a conjuncture, particularly the respect which was due from him to a father and a sovereign, by whom he was tenderly beloved; the shameful circumstance of indulging a passion altogether unjustifiable, and contrary to every maxim of decency and honour; the folly of harbouring a desire, which he never ought to gratify, &c. but that his reason, in its present state of distraction, being incapable of attending to any motives that could be suggested, he had resolved to put an end, both to his shameful passion and unhappy life, by abstaining from all kind of food. Erasistratus, plainly seeing that the prince neither could nor would live, unless some way were found out to apply the only remedy which was capable of curing him, for the bringing of this about thus managed the matter with great craft and dexterity. The first time Seleucus inquired of him after his son's health, he put on all the assurance he could, and told him, That the prince's disease was love, and that he was incurable, because it was impossible for him to have the person he loved, and he could not live without her. Seleucus, surprized at this answer, asked, Why his son could not have the person he loved? Because she is my wife, replied the physician, and I am not disposed to yield her up to the embraces of another. How! said Seleucus, will Erasistratus, my dear Erasistratus refuse to part with his wife to preserve the life of a son I so tenderly love? Is this the friendship you profess for me? Nay then, answered the physician, make it your own case; if Antiochus were thus desperately in love with Stratonice, would you part with her for the sake of Antiochus? would you take the counsel which you give me? No certainly; and if you, who are a father, and have all the tenderness imaginable for your son, would not part with your wife to save his life, how can you expect such a sacrifice from any other? Ah! my dear friend, subjoined Seleucus, may the gods put the safety of the prince upon that issue; I would part, not only with Stratonice, but my empire, to preserve-

serve the life of Antiochus, my dearest Antiochus. In uttering these words he burst out into a flood of tears; when Erasistratus taking him by the hand, You have then no need, said he, of any physician but yourself; for the love of Stratonice is the source of his distemper, and nothing can recover him but your yielding her up to him. Hereupon Seleucus having, without much ado, prevailed upon Stratonice to accept of a young prince for her husband instead of an old king, the nuptials were solemnized with the utmost pomp and magnificence; after which Antiochus and Stratonice were crowned king and queen of Upper Asia, Seleucus willingly resigning to them all those provinces<sup>s</sup>. From this incestuous marriage sprung all the kings of Syria, who so tyrannically oppressed the Jewish nation in Judah and Jerusalem, as we shall see in the sequel of this history (I).

*Seleucus
marches against Lysimachus.*

Seleucus being now eased of this inquietude, thought of nothing but marching against Lyfimachus. Having therefore drawn together a powerful army, he advanced at the head of it into Asia Minor, where he easily reduced all the places belonging to Lyfimachus, most of the governors coming over to him out of hatred to that prince, on account of the murder of his son Agathocles, who was the darling of the army (K).
The

<sup>s</sup> PLUT. & APPIAN. ibid. LUCIAN. de dea Syra.

(I) The emperor Julian, surnamed the Apostate, relates in a fragment of his writings, which is still extant, that Antiochus could not, by any means, be prevailed upon to marry Stratonice till after the death of his father; but herein he contradicts Plutarch, Appian, Valerius Maximus, Lucian, and all other writers (25). Some authors tell us, that Leptinas a mathematician, and not Erasistratus, discovered the secret passion of Antiochus. Erasistratus was the grandson of Aristotle, by a daughter of that philosopher, and, according to Pliny (26), a disciple of Chrysippus, or, as Laertius will have it (27), of Theophrastus. Against the followers of Erasistratus, known by the name of Erasistratæans, Galen wrote a book of phlebotomy, or opening the vein, which is still extant. Plutarch places the marriage of Antiochus and Stratonice before the death of Demetrius; but most other writers relate this adventure as happening at the time Seleucus engaged in a war with Lyfimachus; and these, with the learned Usher, we have followed.

(K) Amongst these was the eunuch Philetærus, by birth a Paphlagonian, whom Lyfimachus had trusted with all his treasures in

(25) Julian. in Misopogone.
Laertius in vita Theoph.

(26) Plin. l. xxix. c. 1. (27)

The city of Sardis was the only place that sustained a siege, which was carried on by Seleucus with such vigour, that the garison was soon obliged to capitulate, and surrender at discretion, putting Seleucus in possession of that important city, and of all the treasures which Lyfimachus had laid up there, as in a place of great safety. Lyfimachus, upon intelligence of this invasion, marched with all possible expedition to the Hellepont, in order to check the progress of Seleucus, and having crossed over into Asia, met the enemy at a place called Europedion in Phrygia. Both armies prepared for the engagement, being commanded by two generals, who, out of the thirty-six left by Alexander, were the only two captains now alive, and both seventy years old and upwards. The engagement was very bloody, and the victory long doubtful; but at last Lyfimachus, who had fought the whole time at the head of his troops with incredible bravery, being run through with a spear by one Malacon of Heraclea, and killed on the spot, his men betook themselves to a precipitous flight, and left Seleucus master of the field, and all their baggage. Thus died Lyfimachus, after having seen the death of fifteen of his children; and as he was, to use the expression of Memnon, the last stone of his house to be pulled down, Seleucus, without opposition, made himself master of all his dominions; but what gave him most pleasure on this occasion was, that he was now the only survivor of all the captains of Alexander; and that, by the event of this battle, he was become, as he stiled himself, the conqueror of conquerors. This last victory, which he looked upon as the effect of a peculiar providence in his favour, gave him the best title to the name of Nicator or Conqueror, by which historians commonly distinguish him from other kings of the same name, who afterwards reigned in Syria <sup>b</sup>.

Lyfimachus killed, and his army defeated.

<sup>b</sup> POLYÆNUS l. iv. c. 9. JUSTIN. l. xvii. c. 1. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 128, 131. MEMN. Excerpt. c. 9. PAUSAN. in Attic. p. 9. OROS. l. iii. c. 23. LUCIAN. in Macrob.

Pergamus. These Philetærus seized, and making himself master of the city, offered to put Seleucus in possession of both. Seleucus, not doubting of the sincerity of his offer, put off going to take possession of the place, and Philetærus improving this delay, raised with the money troops, by which he maintained himself in the sovereignty of Pergamus for the space of twenty years, and founded a new kingdom, as we shall relate in the history of that country. Appian calls him only prince or potentate of Pergamus (28); but in some antient medals we find him honoured with the title of king (29).

(28) Appian. in Syriac. p. 129. (29) Vide Huber. Golzii, Thesaur.
HIS

His triumph on this occasion did not last long ; for seven months after, as he was marching into Macedon, to take possession of that kingdom, with a design to pass the remainder of his life in his native country, he was treacherously slain by Ptolemy Ceraunus, on whom he had conferred innumerable favours ; for he had received him into his court on his flight thither, and maintained him suitably to his rank : he had likewise taken him with him in this expedition, designing, upon his finishing it with success, to employ the same forces in restoring him to his father's kingdom ; but the base traitor, having no sense of gratitude for these favours, conspired against his benefactor, and villainously murdered him in the following manner : Seleucus having crossed the Hellepont, in his way to Macedon, as he was pursuing his journey from thence to Lyfimachia, a city built by Lyfimachus, near the Isthmus of the Thracian Chersonesus, he spied an old altar standing at a small distance, on a very conspicuous place ; and being told that it was called Argos, he asked many questions about it, whether it was so named from the Argonauts who passed that way in going with Jason to Colchos ; or from the Argivi who went to the siege of Troy ; or from the ship Argos, which was cast away in that neighbourhood ; or finally, because that was the country of the Atridæ, Agamemnon and Menelaus ? What made him thus inquisitive was, that he had been warned by an oracle to beware of Argos (L), which he had ever understood of the city of Argos in Peloponnesus ; but while he was thus inquiring about the origin of that name, Ptolemy Ceraunus, who stood behind him, ran him through with his sword, and before those, who stood round the king, recovered from the surprize and consternation they were in, got, by the help of a swift horse, into Lyfimachia, whence he soon returned to the army with a crown on his head, and a strong guard about him. The troops, being destitute of a general, and in the utmost confusion, not only received the traitor, but saluted him king of Macedon, the soldiers, who had served under Lyfimachus, looking upon him as the revenger of that prince's death ; but providence did not suffer this and many other barbarous

Seleucus
murdered by Ptolemy Ceraunus.
Year of
the Flood,
2719.
Before
Christ,
280

<sup>1</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxiv. c. 2. MEMN. Excerpt. c. 15.

(L) We are told, that the oracle was uttered in the ambiguous words of the following distich :

*Si fugias Argos, fatum superabis iniquum ;
Sin minus, ante diem tartara nigra petes.*

murders

murders he soon after committed, to go long unpunished, as we shall relate in the history of the Ptolemies of Egypt. Such was the end of Seleucus, the greatest general, in the opinion of Arrian, and the most powerful prince, after Alexander, of the age he lived in <sup>k</sup>. He died in the forty-third year after the death of Alexander, in the thirty-second of the Grecian or Seleucian æra, and seventy-third, or, as Justin will have it, seventy-eighth of his age <sup>l</sup>. Philetærus, the prince of Pergamus, having, with a great sum of money, purchased his body of Ceraunus, sent it to his son Antiochus, who, with extraordinary pomp, burnt it in Seleucia on the sea-coast, erecting on the place a magnificent chapel, which, from his surname, he called Nicatorium <sup>m</sup>. Polybius observes, that Ptolemy the first, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus died all in the CXXIVth olympiad; and that Ptolemy the first died in the first year of it, and Lysimachus and Seleucus in the last; but Ceraunus did not die till the latter end of the first year of the following olympiad; whence Polybius being, it seems, well apprized of his mistake, in mentioning elsewhere the concurrence of their deaths, omits Ceraunus <sup>n</sup>.

Seleucus was, without all doubt, a prince endowed with extraordinary qualities; for, without mentioning his military accomplishments, it may be justly said, that he distinguished himself above all the kings of his age by a very remarkable love for justice, a great sweetness of temper, and a peculiar regard for religion, which endeared him to his people. He had a taste for polite literature, and was a great encourager of learning, taking great pleasure in the conversation of Erasistratus and the famous Megasthenes. The latter he employed in his negotiations with Sandrocottus king of India. On this occasion it was, that Megasthenes, by residing some time in that country, and travelling over great part of it, gathered the materials for his history of India <sup>o</sup> (M). Seleucus

His character.

<sup>k</sup> ARRIAN. de reb. Alex. <sup>l</sup> JUSTIN. ubi supra. <sup>m</sup> ARRIAN. in Syriac. p. 129. <sup>n</sup> POLYB. l. ii. p. 128. & ib. p. 155. <sup>o</sup> Vide Voss. de Historicis Græcis.

(M) Megasthenes composed a history of the Indies, from the third book of which Clemens of Alexandria quotes a passage in the first book of his Stromata, where that author tells us, that whatever the antients have said concerning nature, was taught them, not by the Greeks, but by Indian Brachmans and the Jews of Syria. Pliny and Solinus inform us, that Megasthenes lived in India to gather

His triumph on this occasion did not last long ; for seven months after, as he was marching into Macedon, to take possession of that kingdom, with a design to pass the remainder of his life in his native country, he was treacherously slain by Ptolemy Ceraunus, on whom he had conferred innumerable favours, for he had received him into his court on his flight thither, and maintained him suitably to his rank : he had likewise taken him with him in this expedition, designing, upon his finishing it with success, to employ the same forces in restoring him to his father's kingdom ; but the base traitor, having no sense of gratitude for these favours, conspired against his benefactor, and villainously murdered him in the following manner : Seleucus having crossed the Hellepont, in his way to Macedon, as he was pursuing his journey from thence to Lyfmachia, a city built by Lyfmachus, near the Isthmus of the Thracian Chersonesus, he spied an old altar standing at a small distance, on a very conspicuous place ; and being told that it was called Argos, he asked many questions about it, whether it was so named from the Argonauts who passed that way in going with Jason to Colchos ; or from the Argivi who went to the siege of Troy ; or from the ship Argos, which was cast away in that neighbourhood ; or finally, because that was the country of the Atridae, Agamemnon and Menelaus ? What made him thus inquisitive was, that he had been warned by an oracle to beware of Argos (L), which he had ever understood of the city of Argos in Peloponnesus ; but while he was thus inquiring about the origin of that name, Ptolemy Ceraunus, who stood behind him, ran him through with his sword, and before those, who stood round the king, recovered from the surprize and consternation they were in, got, by the help of a swift horse, into Lyfmachia, whence he soon returned to the army with a crown on his head, and a strong guard about him. The troops, being destitute of a general, and in the utmost confusion, not only received the traitor, but saluted him king of Macedon, the soldiers, who had served under Lyfmachus, looking upon him as the revenger of that prince's death ; but providence did not suffer this and many other barbarous

Seleucus
murdered
by Ptolemy Ceraunus.
Year of
the Flood,
1719.
Before
Christ,
80

JUSTIN. l. xxiv. c. 2. MEMN. Excerpt. c. 15.

(L.) We are told, that the oracle was uttered in the ambiguous words of the following distich :

*Si fugies Argos, fatum superabis iniquum ;
Sed mæus, ante domum tartara nigra petes.*

murders

murders he soon after committed, to go long unpunished, as we shall relate in the history of the Ptolemies of Egypt. Such was the end of Seleucus, the greatest general, in the opinion of Arrian, and the most powerful prince, after Alexander, of the age he lived in <sup>k</sup>. He died in the forty-third year after the death of Alexander, in the thirty-second of the Grecian or Seleucian æra, and seventy-third, or, as Justin will have it, seventy-eighth of his age <sup>l</sup>. Philetærus, the prince of Pergamus, having, with a great sum of money, purchased his body of Ceraunus, sent it to his son Antiochus, who, with extraordinary pomp, burnt it in Seleucia on the sea-coast, erecting on the place a magnificent chapel, which, from his surname, he called Nicatorium <sup>m</sup>. Polybius observes, that Ptolemy the first, Lyfimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus died all in the CXXIVth olympiad; and that Ptolemy the first died in the first year of it, and Lyfimachus and Seleucus in the last; but Ceraunus did not die till the latter end of the first year of the following olympiad; whence Polybius being, it seems, well apprized of his mistake, in mentioning elsewhere the concurrence of their deaths, omits Ceraunus <sup>n</sup>.

Seleucus was, without all doubt, a prince endowed with extraordinary qualities; for, without mentioning his military accomplishments, it may be justly said, that he distinguished himself above all the kings of his age by a very remarkable love for justice, a great sweetness of temper, and a peculiar regard for religion, which endeared him to his people. He had a taste for polite literature, and was a great encourager of learning, taking great pleasure in the conversation of Erasistratus and the famous Megasthenes. The latter he employed in his negotiations with Sandrocottus king of India. On this occasion it was, that Megasthenes, by residing some time in that country, and travelling over great part of it, gathered the materials for his history of India <sup>o</sup> (M). Seleucus

His character.

<sup>k</sup> ARRIAN. de reb. Alex.      <sup>l</sup> JUSTIN. ubi supra.      <sup>m</sup> ARRIAN. in Syriac. p. 129.      <sup>n</sup> POLYB. l. ii. p. 128. & ib. p. 155.      <sup>o</sup> Vide Voss. de Historicis Græcis.

(M) Megasthenes composed a history of the Indies, from the third book of which Clemens of Alexandria quotes a passage in the first book of his Stromata, where that author tells us, that whatever the antients have said concerning nature, was taught them, not by the Greeks, but by Indian Brachmans and the Hebrews of Syria. Pliny and Solinus inform us, that Megasthenes lived in India to gather

Seleucus having found in Persia the famous library which Xerxes had taken from the Athenians, sent them it back, together with the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, whom they honoured as their deliverers. He is highly commended by Polyænus, Seneca, Pliny, Valerius Maximus, Appian, Lucian, and Plutarch. This last writer tells us, that he used to say, If men knew what trouble attends only the reading and writing of letters, which in those days was thought the indispensable duty of a king, no one would accept of a crown, though thrown at his feet, or think it worth taking off the ground.

Antiochus
Soter.

ON the death of Seleucus, Antiochus surnamed Soter, his son by Apama the daughter of Artabazus the Persian, took possession of the empire of Asia, and held it for the space of nineteen years. Having, upon the first news of his father's death, secured his dominions in the east, where he then gather materials for his history. Some fragments of this history are preserved by Josephus (30), and Eusebius (31), wherein he makes mention of Nebuchadnezzar, and extols his great wealth and power. He is likewise quoted by Strabo (32) Athenæus, Arrian, Cicero, Pliny, and Solinus; but the book itself has not reached our times. Annius, a monk of Viterbo, who flourished about the end of the fifteenth century, counterfeited several books under old names, of which number were Manetho, Berosus, and Megasthenes, whom he, by mistake, calls Metasthenes, being led into this error by Rufinus's Latin version of Josephus, and this first gave occasion to the discovery of the imposture. These books he published with a comment upon them; and they were for some time looked upon as the genuine works of the authors whose names they bore, but are now every where exploded as fictitious and fabulous, being framed on purpose to impose upon the world. Plutarch seems to have entertained but a very indifferent opinion of those authors in general who have wrote of India (33); and Strabo (34) tells us, that all those who have wrote histories of India are great liars, but above all Diamarchus, and after him Megasthenes, Onesicritus, and Nearchus. To the two former, continues Strabo, we ought to give no credit at all, for they would make us believe, that there are men in India, whose ears are so large as to cover their bodies, that some have no mouths, nor noses, and but one eye; that their feet are of a monstrous size, and their toes turned inwards; that there are whole nations of men only three spans high, ants that search for gold, and birds with heads in the shape of a wedge, which swallow serpents, stags, and oxen.

(30) Joseph. Antiquit. l. x. c. 11. Et contra Appian. l. i.
 (31) Euseb. Præp. Evang.      (32) Strabo. l. xv. p. 68.
 (33) Plut. de flumin.      (34) Strabo. l. ii.

was, he sent Patrocles, one of his generals, at the head of a powerful army, over mount Taurus, into Asia Minor, to settle affairs there. Patrocles, on his first arrival, marched against Heraclea in Pontus, at that time a powerful state, with a design to make himself master of its rich territory, the Heracleans having formerly entered into an alliance with Mithridates king of Pontus, and the cities of Byzantium and Chalcedon against Seleucus; but matters being made up between them by a treaty, Patrocles, led his army against the Bitbunians, and entering their territories, committed there, on what provocation we know not, great devastations; but the Bitbunians having drawn him into an ambush, cut off His army him and his whole army, not one man escaping the general cut off by slaughter. Zipætes, who was then king of Bitbunia, and the Bitbunians. in the seventy-sixth year of his age and forty-eighth of his reign, was so overjoyed at the news of this victory, that he died soon after, leaving behind him four sons, of which the eldest, by name Nicomedes, succeeding his father in the kingdom, caused, out of jealousy, two of his brothers to be put to death; but the youngest, called also Zipætes, having saved himself, by a timely flight, seized on part of his father's dominions, and there maintained a long war with his brother, who, hearing that Antiochus was making great preparations to attack him at the same time, and revenge the death of Patrocles and the loss of his army, called in the Gauls to his assistance; and on this occasion it was that the Gauls first passed into Asia Minor<sup>P</sup>. With their assistance Nicomedes having overcome his brother Zipætes, and acquired the possession of all his father's dominions, bestowed upon them that part of Asia Minor, which, from their name, was called by some Gallo-Græcia, and by others Galatia. In process of time the latter name prevailed, whence the people were no more called Gauls, but Galatians. To their descendants St. Paul wrote one of his canonical epistles; and St. Jerom witnesses, that, near seven hundred years after they had settled in Asia, they continued to speak the same language, which, in his time, was spoke at Treves.

BUT to return to Antiochus; Solbaces, who had defeated the Gauls, as we have related in the history of Alaceon, and reigned some years in that country, being dead, Antiochus Soter and Antigonus Gonatus, the son of Demetrius, laid claim to that kingdom, their fathers having held it, one at ter the other ; but Antigonus, who had already reigned ten years in Greece, being nearest, first took possession of those dominions. Hereupon Antiochus being resolved to dispossess his rival, if possible, of his new conquests, and the other to support himself in them, each raised great armies, and contracted powerful alliances. On this occasion Nicomedes king of Bithynia having espoused the cause of Antigonus, Antiochus not thinking it adviseable to leave such an enemy behind him in Asia, instead of crossing the Hellepont to attack Antigonus, unexpectedly poured his troops into Bithynia, which then became the theatre of the war ; but both armies having there lain some time in sight of each other, and neither daring to attack

<sup>P</sup> APPIAN. in SYRIAC EUSEB. CHRON. MIMNON Excerpt. p. 16. & 21. LIV. l. xxxviii.

Antiochus the other, the two kings came to an agreement, in consequence of which Antigonus having married Phila the daughter of Stratonice by Seleucus, Antiochus renounced his pretensions to the crown of Macedon. In virtue of this renunciation Antigonus not only quietly enjoyed himself the kingdom of Macedon, but transmitted it to his posterity, who reigned there for several generations, till at length Perseus, the last of that race, was, by Paulus Æmilius, divested of his dominions, and Macedon reduced to a Roman province<sup>q</sup>.

Antiochus, being thus freed from a threatening war, marched against the Gauls, who having, by the favour of Nicomedes, got settlements in Asia, harassed, with frequent incursions, the neighbouring princes. Antiochus defeated them with great slaughter, and delivered those provinces from their oppressions ; and hence he acquired the title of Soter or Saviour<sup>r</sup>.

Antiochus, not long after this successful expedition against the Gauls, hearing of the death of Philetærus prince of Pergamus, laid hold of that opportunity to invade his territories, with a view to add them to his own dominions ; but Eumenes, nephew and successor to the deceased prince, having raised a considerable army, encountered him near Sardis, overthrew him in battle, and thereby not only secured himself in the possession of what he already enjoyed, but enlarged his dominions with several new acquisitions<sup>s</sup>. After this defeat, Antiochus returning to Antioch, there put to death one of his sons for raising disturbances in his absence, and 2738.

Before
Christ,
201.

<sup>q</sup> MEMNON. c. 19. JUSTIN. l. xxv. c. 1. PLUT. in Demet.
PORPHYR. in GRÆC. EUSEB. p. 229. <sup>r</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac.
p. 130. <sup>s</sup> MEMNON. c. 21. STRABO. l. xiii. p. 624. LUCIAN.
in Zeux.

at the same time proclaimed the other, called also Antiochus, king of Syria. He died soon after, leaving his son in the sole possession of all his dominions. This young prince was his son by Stratonice the daughter of Demetrius, who, from his mother-in-law, became his wife, as we have related above.

Antiochus, on his coming to the throne, assumed the sur- Antiochus name of Theos, that is, God; and by this he is distinguished Theos.
from the other kings of Syria who bore the name of Antiochus. The Milesians were the first who bestowed it upon him, for delivering them from the tyranny of Timarchus; for Timarchus, being governor of Caria for Ptolemy Philadelphus, rebelled against his sovereign, and, setting up for himself, chose Miletus for the seat of his tyranny. The Milesians, to deliver themselves from his oppressions, had recourse to Antiochus, who defeated and slew him; in acknowledgment of which favour, they rendered him divine honours, and by an impious flattery, conferred upon him the title of Theos or God. The Lemnians had not long before placed his father and grandfather in the number of their gods, and built temples to them, as the Smyrnians did to Stratonice his mother<sup>r</sup>.

IN the beginning of this king's reign lived Berosus the famous Babylonian historian, and dedicated his history to him (N). Pliny informs us, that it contained the astronomical

<sup>r</sup> TROG. in prologo. l. xxvi. POLYÆN. Statagem. l. viii. c. 50. APPIAN. ubi supra. JUSTIN. l. xxvii. c. 1. THEOCRIT. Idyll. 17. ATHEN. l. vi. c. 6.

(N) The words of Tatian are as follow: Berosus the Babylonian, who was a priest of Belus at Babylon, and lived in the time of Alexander, dedicated to Antiochus, who was the third after him, his history, which he wrote in three books, of the affairs of the Chaldeans, and the actions of their kings (35). Now, the third after Alexander was, without all doubt, Antiochus Theus: for Seleucus Nicator was the first, Antiochus Soter the second, and consequently the prince we are speaking of the third; but as Berosus, according to Tatian, lived in the time of Alexander, who died sixty four years before the beginning of the reign of Antiochus Theus, we must place this dedication as early as possible, that is, in the very first year of his reign; for if Berosus was but twenty at the death of Alexander, he must have been eighty four in the first year of Antiochus Theus.

(35) Tatian. in Orat. advers. Græcos.

observations of four hundred and eighty years. While the Macedonians were masters of Babylon, he learned of them the Greek language, and passing from Babylon into Greece, first settled at Cos, a place famous for the birth of Hippocrates, and there opened a school, in which he taught astronomy and astrology. From Cos he went to Athens, where he acquired such reputation by his astrological predictions, that the Athenians erected to him in their gymnasium a statue with a golden tongue *. Josephus and Eusebius have transmitted to us many noble fragments of this history, which illustrate several passages of the old testament, and, without which, it would be impossible to trace out the series of the Babylonian kings.

War between An-tiochus Soter and Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt.

IN the third year of the reign of Antiochus Soter, a bloody war, which was carried on for a long time with great vigour, broke out between him and Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, on the following occasion: Magas king of Cyrene and Libya, having waged war for many years with Ptolemy Philadelphus his half-brother, to support himself in the usurpation of those dominions, and being now grown very old and infirm, caused overtures of an accommodation to be tendered to Ptolemy, with the proposal of a marriage between Berenice his only daughter, and the eldest son of the king of Egypt, promising to resign all his dominions to her for her dowry. The proposal was approved of by Ptolemy, and a peace concluded on these terms; but Magas died the year following, before the execution of the treaty, after he had reigned fifty years over Libya and Cyrene, from the time that these provinces were first committed to his care. On his death his widow Apame, whom Justin calls Arsinoe, the sister of Antiochus Theus, resolved to put a stop to the marriage of her daughter with the son of Ptolemy, since it had been agreed on without her consent. With this view she sent into Macedon for Demetrius, half-brother to Antigonus Gonatus, promising him her daughter in marriage, and with her the kingdoms of Libya and Cyrene. This invitation soon brought Demetrius thither; but, as he was a beautiful young man, Apame no sooner saw him but she fell in love with him, and resolved to marry him herself. Demetrius finding himself highly favoured by the mother, intirely neglected the young princess, and imagining that her favour raised him above all controul, he began to treat the princess, as well as the ministers and officers of the army, in a most insolent and imperious manner. Hereupon they all conspired against him, and Berenice herself led the conspirators to the door of her mother's apartment, where they slew him in her bed, though Apame did all she could to save him, and even covered him from the swords of the conspirators with her own body. Upon his death Berenice went into Egypt, where she was married, according to the former agreement, to the son of Ptolemy, and Apame was sent to her brother Antiochus Theus in Syria <sup>w</sup>. On her arrival at his court, she so exasperated him against Ptolemy, that he proclaimed war against him. This war was carried on for many years with great fury, and proved at last very fatal to Antiochus, as we shall see anon. Ptolemy did not head his army in person, his declining state of health not permitting him to expose himself to the fatigues of a campaign, and the inconveniencies of a camp; for which reason he left the whole conduct of the war to his generals; but Antiochus, who was then in the flower of his age, took the field, at the head of a numerous army, having under his standards all the forces of Babylon, and the east. History has not transmitted to us the successes of this war on either side, probably because they were not very considerable; for if any signal events had happened, they would, in all likelihood, have been recorded in an age, when so many learned men and able historians lived, who would not have failed to commit them to writing.

* PLIN. I. vii. c. 35, & 37. VITRUV. I. ix. c. 7.

WHILE Antiochus was thus engaged in a war with the king of Egypt, great commotions and revolts happened in the eastern provinces of his empire, which, as he was not at leisure to suppress them immediately, grew to such a head, that he could never afterwards master them. The lewdness of Agathocles, whom Arrian calls Pherecles, was the occasion of this great event. Antiochus had committed to his care the administration of all the provinces beyond the Euphrates; so that Parthia and the adjacent countries were under his government. As Agathocles was most viciously given, he was charmed with the gracefulness and beauty of a youth called Teridates to such a degree, that he made an attempt on his modesty. Hereupon Arfaces, the brother of the youth, enraged at the affront offered to his family, ran to arms, and being supported by some friends who engaged in his quarrel, fell upon the governor, and slew him. After his death, Arfaces prevailed upon several of his countrymen to stand by him, and by degrees his party grew so numerous, while neglected by Antiochus, that in the end he found himself strong enough to drive out the Macedonians,

The Parthians and Bactrians revolt from

Antiochus.
Year of
the Flood,

2749.
Before
Christ,

259.

<sup>w</sup> JUSTIN lib. xvi. c. 3. ATHENÆUS ex Agatharclide l. xii. p. 550. PLUT. in Demet.

and set up for himself, which he accordingly did, fixing his residence at Hecatompolis, and there giving rise to the Parthian empire, which rose in process of time to so great a pitch of power, as to become formidable, not only to all the princes of the east, but to the Romans themselves. Much about the same time Theodotus revolted in Bactria, and, from governor, became king of that province, which, if we believe Justin, contained no fewer than a thousand cities, and strengthened himself so effectually in his new kingdom, while Antiochus was taken up with the Egyptian war, that he could never afterwards be dispossessed of his acquisitions. His example, and that of Arsaces, were followed by all the nations in those parts, each of them shaking off at the same time the Macedonian yoke, and setting up princes of their own ; by which means Antiochus lost all the provinces of his empire lying beyond the Euphrates *. The revolt of the Parthians happened, according to Justin, while L. Manlius Vulso, and M. Attilius Regulus were consuls at Rome ; which period, as Polybius observes, coincides with the fourteenth year of the first Punic war. This Arsaces is called by the modern Persian writers Aski and Askam. Mircondus gives him the name of Chapur, and says, that he began his reign seventy two years after the death of Alexander the Great, which, according to the learned Usber, is one year before the consulship of Manlius and Attilius, and three years before the CXXXIII<sup>d</sup> olympiad, when, according to the calculation of Eusebius, Arsaces and his Parthians revolted from Antiochus ; but as they annually solemnized the day on which Arsaces engaged and defeated Seleucus Callinicus, the son and successor of Antiochus, and looked upon it as the day that gave birth to their liberty, both Justin and Appian thought, that the Parthians first revolted under Seleucus, and not under Antiochus his father *.

Antiochus concludes a peace with
Ptolemy.

THESE troubles and commotions in the east made Antiochus weary of his war with Ptolemy ; a treaty of peace was therefore concluded on the following terms ; That Antiochus should divorce his former wife Laodice, who was his own sister by the father, marry Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and settle the crown upon the male issue of that marriage. Antiochus, pursuant to this treaty, put away Laodice, tho' she had already brought him two sons ; and Ptolemy carrying his daughter to Pelusium, there put her on board his fleet, and sailed with her to Soleucia, a maritime city near the mouth of the Orontes in Syria, where he met Antiochus, delivered his daughter to him, and solemnized the nuptials with extraordinary magnificence. Ptolemy, as he had a tender affection for his daughter, gave, of his own accord, an immense sum with her by way of dowry; whence he was surnamed Phernopheros, or the Dowry-giver <sup>1</sup>. Besides, he ordered regular supplies of water from the Nile to be transmitted to her, where-ever she was, believing it to be more beneficial to her health than any other <sup>2</sup>.

* ARRIAN. in Parthica apud Phot. cod. 58. SYNCELL. p. 284. JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 4. Strabo. l. xi. p. 515. * JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 4. APPIAN. in Syriac p. 177.

Two years after this marriage Ptolemy Philadelphus died, which Antiochus Theus his son-in-law no sooner heard, than he removed Berenice from his bed, and recalled Laodice, with her children Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus Hierax; but Laodice being well acquainted with his fickle temper, and fearing lest he might again alter his mind, and receive Berenice, resolved to improve the present opportunity, and secure the succession to her son; for by the late treaty with Ptolemy, her children were disinherited, and the crown settled on the children which Berenice should bear, and she had then a son. For the effecting of this design, she caused Antiochus to be poisoned, and when she saw him expiring, she ordered him to be privately conveyed away, and one Artemon, who greatly resembled him, as well in features as in the tone of his voice, to be placed in his bed. Artemon acted his part with great dexterity, and personating Antiochus, tenderly recommended his dear Laodice and her children to the lords that visited him. In the name of Antiochus, whom the people believed still alive, orders were issued, enjoining all his subjects to obey his beloved son Seleucus Callinicus, and acknowledge him for their lawful sovereign. The crown being by this means secured to Callinicus, the death of the king was publicly declared, and Callinicus, without any opposition, ascended the throne <sup>3</sup>. Antiochus Hierax, the other son of Laodice, had at this time the government of the provinces of Asia Minor, where he commanded a considerable body of troops.

Antiochus Theus
poisoned by his wife
Laodice

Seleucus Callinicus ascends the throne.

Laodice not thinking herself safe so long as Berenice and her son were alive, concerted measures with Seleucus to destroy

<sup>1</sup> Vide HIERONYM. in Daniel. c. 11.      <sup>2</sup> ATHENÆUS. l. ii. c. 2.      <sup>3</sup> HIERONYM. ubi supra. PLIN. l. vii. c. 12. VAL. MAX. l. ix. c. 14. SOLINUS. c. i. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 130. JUSTIN. l. xxvii. c. 1. POLYB. l. ii. p. 155.

Berenice with her son mardered by Laodice.

them likewise ; but Berenice being informed of their design, eluded the danger for some time, by retiring with her son to Daphne, where she shut herself up in the asylum built by Seleucus Nicator. There she was closely besieged by the forces of Seleucus ; which the cities of Asia hearing, and pitying her condition, they formed a confederacy, and sent a strong body of troops to Antioch for her relief. Ptolemy Euergetes, her brother, hastened thither likewise at the head of a formidable army ; but both Berenice and her son, with all the Egyptians who attended them, were barbarously cut off before either of the armies came to their rescue (O). When they

(O) The particulars of the marriage of Antiochus with the daughter of Ptolemy, and the fatal consequences that attended it, with the greatest events in the history we are now writing, were evidently foretold by the prophet Daniel. The words of the prophecy are (36) ; And now I will shew thee the truth ; Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia, viz. Cyrus, who was then upon the throne ; his son Cambyses, and Darius the son of Hystaspes ; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all : and by his strength through his riches, he shall stir up all against the realm of Greece. The monarch here mentioned was Xerxes, who invaded Greece with a formidable army. And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided towards the four winds of heaven, and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled ; for his kingdom shall be plucked up even for others besides those This part of the prophecy evidently alludes to Alexander the Great, whose vast kingdom we have already seen broken by his death, and parcelled out into four great kingdoms, and, besides these, divided into a great many petty kingdoms, namely, Cappadocia, Armenia, Bithynia, &c. The prophet then proceeds to the treaty of peace, and the marriage, which we have mentioned. And the king of the south shall be strong, and one of his princes, and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion ; his dominion shall be a great dominion. And in the end of years they shall join themselves together ; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement : but he shall not retain the power of the arm, neither shall he stand, nor his arm ; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times. We must observe, that Daniel, in this passage, and through all the remaining part of the chapter before us, confines himself to the kings of Egypt and Syria, these being the only princes who engaged in wars against the people of

(36) Dan. c. xi. ver. 2, 3, 4, &c.

God

they saw all their endeavours for saving the queen and her child rendered ineffectual, they determined to revenge their death in a remarkable manner. The Asian forces joined the Egyptian, and Ptolemy, at the head of both, carried all before him; for he not only slew Laodice, but made himself master of all Syria and Cilicia, and then passing the Euphrates, subdued all the country as far as Babylon and the river Tigris; and if the progress of his arms had not been interrupted by a sedition, which obliged him to return to Egypt, he would have brought under subjection all the provinces of the

Her death revenged by Ptolemy Euergetes her brother.

God. The king of the south shall be strong. This king of the south was Ptolemy the son of Lagus, the first who reigned in Egypt after Alexander; and that he was strong all historians testify; for he was master of Egypt, Libya, Cyrene, Arabia, Palestine, Cælo-Syria, and most of the maritime provinces of Asia Minor, together with the island of Cyprus, and several isles in the Ægean sea; and even possessed the cities of Sicyon and Corinth in Greece. The king of the north was Seleucus Nicator, of whom the prophet says, that he shall be more powerful than the king of the south, and his dominion more extensive; for such is the import of the prophet's expression, and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; and that he had a more extensive dominion is plain from the large territories he possessed; for he had under him all the countries of the east, from mount Taurus to the river Indus, several provinces of Asia Minor between mount Taurus and the Ægean sea, and a little before his death the kingdoms of Thrace and Macedon. The prophet, in the next place, tells us of the coming of the daughter of the king of the south, and the agreement, or treaty of peace, which should thereon be made between these two kings. This plainly points out the marriage of Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy king of Egypt, with Antiochus Theus king of Syria, and the peace, which, in consequence of that marriage, was made between them; every particular of which was exactly fulfilled, according to the holy prophet's prediction. Daniel afterwards informs us of the fatal consequences attending this marriage; that is, that neither he, viz. Antiochus king of the north, nor she, that is Berenice daughter of Ptolemy king of the south, should continue in their power, but that he, viz. king Antiochus, should fall, and that she, viz. Berenice, being deprived of him that strengthened her, that is, of her father, who died a little before, should be given up with those that brought her, that is, who came with her out of Egypt, to be cut off and destroyed; and so it happened to her and her attendants who came with her out of Egypt, as we have related. The king of Egypt is called by the prophet king of the south, and the king of Syria styled king of the north, which must be understood with respect to Judæa, that country having Syria to the north, and Egypt to the south.

Syrian empire. On his return he appointed Antiochus, one of his generals, to govern the provinces he had reduced on this side mount Taurus, and Xantippus to command in those he had possessed himself of beyond it <sup>b</sup>. He returned loaded with an immense booty; for he is said to have brought from Syria forty thousand talents of silver, with a prodigious number of gold and silver vessels, and two thousand five hundred statues, among which were many of the Egyptian idols, which Cambyfes, on his conquering Egypt, had carried from thence into Persia. These Ptolemy, on his return from this expedition, replaced in their antient temples, and thereby gained the hearts of his superstitious subjects, who, in acknowledgment of so great a favour, honoured him with the title of Euergetes, or Benefactor (P).

Seleucus Callinicus, who had succeeded his father Antiochus Theus after a reign of fifteen years, no sooner heard that Ptolemy was returned to Egypt, but he set sail with a mighty fleet, which he had fitted out at a vast charge, to reduce the revolted cities; but he had scarce advanced into the open sea, when his whole navy was destroyed by a violent storm; as if the gods, says Justin<sup>c</sup>, had made the winds and waves the

<sup>b</sup> JUSTIN. APPIAN. HIERONYM. ubi supra. POLYB. l. v. POLYÆN. l. viii. c. 50.      <sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxvii. c. 2.

(P) All this was likewise accomplished exactly, as the prophet Daniel had foretold it (37); for in that prophecy he tells us, That after the daughter of the king of the south should, with her attendants, be cut off, and he that strengthened her in those times, (that is, her father, who was her chief support) should be dead there should one arise out of a branch of her roots in his estate, that is, Ptolemy Euergetes, who, springing from the same root with her, as being her brother, did stand up in the room or estate of Ptolemy Philadelphus his father, whom he succeeded in his kingdom. And he shall come with an army, continues the prophet, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, (who was Seleucus Callinicus) and shall deal against them, and shall prevail; and shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver and of gold; and he shall continue more years than the king of the north. So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom, and shall return into his own land. How exactly all this was fulfilled, what we have related above sufficiently shews. As to the last part, viz. that the king of the south, on his return into his kingdom, should continue more years than the king of the north, this likewise happened as foretold by the prophet; for Ptolemy Euergetes out-lived Seleucus Callinicus four years.

(37) Dan. c. vi. ver. 7. & 9.

ministers

ministers of their vengeance. Seleucus himself, with a small number of his attendants, was, with the utmost difficulty, saved; but all the rest perished in the wreck; but this dreadful stroke, which seemed intended to overwhelm him, by a strange turn of fortune, contributed to the re-establishment of his affairs; for the revolted cities of Asia, which, out of the aversion and horror they had conceived against him on account of the murder of Berenice and her son, had declared for Ptolemy, no sooner received intelligence of the great loss he had sustained, than they turned their hatred into compassion, and thinking that crime sufficiently revenged, submitted to him anew<sup>d</sup>. Being again restored, by this unexpected revolution, to the best part of his dominions, he raised a great army to recover the rest; but this effort proved as unsuccessful as the former; his army was defeated by Ptolemy, and he obliged to save himself by flight to Antioch, with as few of his followers as when he escaped from the shipwreck, as if he had recovered his former power, says Justin, only to lose it a second time by a fatal vicissitude of fortune. In this condition he invited his brother Antiochus to join him with his forces, promising him all the provinces of the Lesser Asia that belonged to the Syrian empire, provided he found means to extricate him out of his present difficulties. Antiochus was then at the head of an army in those provinces, and being of an aspiring genius, and very ambitious, though then only fourteen years old, he readily accepted the proposal, and accordingly reinforced his army with great numbers of mercenary Gauls, not with a design to assist his brother in the recovery of his dominions, but to seize them for himself; for he was of a very greedy and rapacious temper, wresting from others whatever came in his way, without the least regard to justice or equity, and thinking every thing good prey which he could lay his hands on; whence he had the surname of Hierax, that is, the Hawk. At the same time the cities of Smyrna and Magnesia in Asia Minor, out of affection to Seleucus, formed a confederacy in his favour, by which they mutually stipulated to support him to the utmost of their power. This treaty they caused to be engraved on a large column of marble, which is still to be seen in Oxford, with the said league, in Greek capitals very legible (Q). When

Ptolemy

<sup>d</sup> JUSTIN l. xxvii c. 2.

(Q) This column was brought out of Asia by Thomas earl of Hundel, at the beginning of the reign of Charles the first, and presented,

After having sustained several great losses, makes a truce with Ptolemy. Ptolemy heard that Antiochus was preparing to join Seleucus against him, not caring to engage both these princes at the same time, he came to an agreement with Seleucus, and concluded a truce with him for ten years <sup>e</sup>.

BUT notwithstanding this truce, Antiochus continued his military preparations, which Seleucus now plainly seeing to be made against himself, marched, without delay, over mount Taurus to suppress them. The pretence for the war on the side of Antiochus was the promise which had been made him of the sovereignty of the provinces in Asia Minor, as a reward for assisting his brother against Ptolemy; but Seleucus, being delivered from the war without the aid of his brother, did not think himself obliged to any thing by that promise; but Antiochus persisting in his demand, and Seleucus refusing to comply with it, the controversy was brought to the decision of a battle, which was fought near Ancyra in Asia Minor.

Defeated by his brother Antiochus. In this battle Seleucus was intirely defeated, and most of his troops cut in pieces, he having very narrowly escaped falling into the enemies hands. Antiochus likewise was exposed to great dangers, even after his victory; for as the troops, to whose valour the victory was chiefly owing, was a body of Gauls, which he had taken into his pay, these Barbarians, on a false report that Seleucus was slain in the action, plotted the death of the other brother also, not doubting but in case both were cut off, they should easily make themselves masters of all Asia; Antiochus therefore was obliged to redeem his life with all the treasures he possessed <sup>f</sup>.

Eumenes and Attalus seize great part of Asia Minor. Eumenes, king or prince of Pergamus, taking advantage of these divisions, advanced with all his forces against Antiochus, and the Gauls, in hopes of crushing them both at once. The imminent danger which Antiochus saw himself exposed to on this occasion, obliged him to make a new treaty with the Gauls, in which it was stipulated, that he should renounce the title of their sovereign, and content himself with that of their ally, entering into an offensive and defensive league with them. This treaty, however, did not prevent Eumenes from falling upon them; and, as he attacked them before they had time to reinforce themselves with new levies after the loss they had sustained in the battle of Ancyra, he sented, with other marbles, to the university of Oxford, by his grandson Henry duke of Norfolk, in the reign of Charles the second.

<sup>e</sup> JUSTIN. ubi supra.      <sup>f</sup> TROGUS in prologo 27. STRABO, l. xvi. p. 750. POLYÆN. l. viii. c. 61.

gained gained a complete victory over them, which cost him but little, and laid all Asia Minor open to him. Attalus, who succeeded Eumenes in the sovereignty of Pergamus, improving the advantages gained by him over the Gauls, intirely subdued that people, and being by that means firmly established in his dominions, took upon him the title of king, which his predecessors had declined, though vested with sovereign power<sup>8</sup>.

WHILE Eumenes, and after him Attalus, were thus curtailing the Syrian empire in the west, Theodotus and Arfaces were doing the same in the east; for it being reported that Seleucus had been slain in the battle of Ancyra, Arfaces laying hold of this opportunity, possessed himself of Hyrkania, and annexed it to Parthia, which he had already dismembered from that empire, causing himself to be acknowledged king of both countries. Theodotus, who had possessed himself of Bactria, dying soon after, Arfaces entered into an alliance with his son bearing the same name for their mutual defence; by which means they supported each other in the possession of the dominions they had usurped. In the mean time the two brothers, Antiochus and Seleucus, pursued the war against each other with implacable hatred, not considering, that, while they were thus contending for their father's empire, it would be wrested from them both by their common enemy. This war was at length carried into Mesopotamia<sup>h</sup>, at the time when, in all likelihood, happened the battle in Babylonia, or the province of Babylon, which was a part of Mesopotamia, mentioned by Judas Maccabæus in his speech to his army<sup>i</sup>. In this battle eight thousand Babylonish Jews joined with four thousand Macedonians, defeated the Galatians, and put to the sword an hundred and twenty thousand of their men. The Galatians indeed were joined in confederacy with Antiochus Hierax, as we have related above, and at this time came into Asia in such swarms as to fill the whole country, serving under such princes as thought fit to hire them. However, it is somewhat strange, that such a signal victory should not be mentioned by any one of the eminent writers who flourished under the kings of Syria, and transmitted their actions to posterity: but be that as it will, Seleucus at length prevailed over his brother Antiochus, who, after several overthrows and losses, was obliged to shift from

Antiochus and Seleucus continue on the war.

<sup>8</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxvii. c. 3. LIV. l. xxxiii STRABO, l. xiii p. 624
<sup>h</sup> VALESII excerpt. ex Polyb POLYÆN. l. iv. c. 19. <sup>h</sup> TRIC-GUS in prologo 27. POLYÆN. l. iv. STRATAGEM. c. 17.
<sup>i</sup> 2 MACCABVIII. 20.

place to place with the shattered remains of his army, till he was at last driven quite out of Mesopotamia. As he found no place within the Syrian empire where he thought himself safe, he retired to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, whose daughter he had married; but that prince, notwithstanding this alliance, growing soon weary of entertaining a guest who could bring him no advantage, and was very chargeable to him, ordered him to be cut off; but Antiochus, being informed of his design, escaped the danger by a speedy retreat into Egypt, chusing rather to put himself into the hands of Ptolemy, a professed enemy to his family, than to trust a brother whom he had so highly offended. He had soon reason to repent of this resolution; for immediately after his arrival, Ptolemy caused him to be seized, and kept him closely confined for several years, till at last, by the assistance of a courtesan, he made his escape; but, as he was retiring out of that kingdom, he had the misfortune to fall in with a band of robbers, by whom he was murdered *.

Death of
Antiochus

Seleucus, being now extricated out of the troubles his brother had created him, applied himself first to the establishing of good order and tranquility at home; and having repaired the disorders occasioned by the war, he turned his thoughts to the reduction of the eastern provinces which had revolted from him; but in this attempt he was attended with bad success. Arfaces, having been allowed too much time to strengthen himself in his usurpations, obliged him to return with shame and dishonour. He might perhaps have succeeded better, if he had made a longer stay in those parts; but new commotions arising at home in his absence, he thought it adviseable to make a speedy return to suppress them. Arfaces did not fail to improve this farther respite to his advantage, establishing his power so effectually, that all future efforts of the Syrian kings could never shake it †.

Seleucus
defeated and taken prisoner by Arfaces.

HOWEVER, Seleucus, as soon as he was at leisure from his other affairs, undertook a second expedition against the usurper, which proved more unsuccessful than the former; for he was not only overthrown by Arfaces in a great battle, but taken prisoner. The day on which Arfaces gained this victory was, for many succeeding ages, observed annually by the Parthians with great solemnity, as being, in their opinion, the first day of their liberty; whereas it was in reality the first of their slavery; for the world never produced greater tyrants than the Parthian kings, under whose despotical government they thenceforth continued. From this time

* JUSTIN. POLYÆN. ibid.

† JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 4.

Arfaces took upon him the title of king, having founded, and by this victory firmly established, an empire in the east, which, in process of time, counterbalanced the overgrown power of the Romans in the west <sup>m</sup>. Seleucus having, for the space of four years, continued prisoner in Parthia, died in that country, by a fall from his horse. Athenæus tells us, that Arfaces treated him during his confinement as a king <sup>n</sup>; but that he restored him to his liberty and kingdom, as some will have it, does not appear from antient records. Justin says in express words, that he died in the manner we have related, being then an exile, which cannot be otherwise understood than that he died out of his own dominions, being held in captivity by the Parthian king. He died, according to some, in the twentieth, according to others, in the twenty-first year of his reign, leaving behind him by his wife Laodice, the sister of Andromachus one of his chief generals, two sons and a daughter. The sons were Seleucus and Antiochus. The daughter he married to Mitridates king of Pontus, yielding Phrygia to him for her dowry <sup>o</sup>. He was surnamed Pogon from his long beard, and ironically Callinicus, or the victorious, being very unfortunate, and generally conquered in the battles he fought; however, some writers tell us, that the surname of Callinicus was given him after the victory which he gained over his brother Antiochus.

Seleucus, the eldest of the two sons, succeeded to his father's throne, and assumed the surname of Ceraunus, or the Thunderer, a name which no-ways suited his character; for he was a very weak prince, both in body and mind, and never did any thing worthy of that name. He reigned but three years, and during that time, had no great authority either in the army or the provinces; nay, he would have lost it intirely, had not Achæus, the son of Andromachus his mother's brother, who was a man of great courage and abilities, managed his affairs, as well as the bad state which his father's ill conduct had brought them into would admit. As for Andromachus, he was taken prisoner by Ptolemy in his wars with Callinicus, and kept in Alexandria all this reign, and some part of the next, till the Rhodians, to ingratiate themselves with Achæus, obtained his liberty. Antiochus king of Pergamus having made himself master of all Asia Minor, from mount Taurus to the Hellepont, Seleucus marched against him, leaving Hermias, a Carian, regent of Syria in his absence. Achæus attended him in this expedition, and forced captivity.

Dies in
Year of
the Flood,
2772.
Before
Christ,
227.

<sup>m</sup> JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 5. ATHEN. l. iv. c. 13.
<sup>n</sup> JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 5.

<sup>o</sup> ATHEN.

l. iv. c. 13.

Seleucus
Ceraunus
poisoned.

Antiochus
the Great ascends the throne of Syria.
Year of
the Flood,
2775.
Before
Christ,
224

him in it as well as the shattered state of his affairs would allow; but money being wanting to pay the army, and the king, on account of his weakness, despised by the soldiery, Nicator and Apaturius, two of the chief officers, formed a conspiracy against him, and, by poison, put an end to his life; but Achæus, who was then in the army, revenged his death, by cutting off the two ringleaders, and all those who were any ways concerned in the plot. After this he managed the army with such prudence, address, and resolution, that he not only kept all in order, but also prevented Attalus from reaping any advantage from this accident, which, had it not been for his prudent conduct, would have been attended with the loss of Syria. Seleucus dying without children, the army offered the crown to Achæus; and several of the provinces did the same: But he then generously refused it, tho' he afterwards judged it necessary, for his own safety, to act in a different manner. In the present conjuncture, instead of accepting the crown, he preserved it with great integrity for the lawful heir Antiochus, the brother of the deceased king, who was but in the fifteenth year of his age. When Seleucus set out for Asia Minor, he sent him to Babylonia to be educated there; and in that city he was when his brother died. He now was sent for to Antioch, where he ascended the throne after his brother, and reigned thirty-six years. This prince was afterwards, for his illustrious actions, surnamed the Great. Achæus, the better to secure him in the possession of the empire, sent a detachment of the army to him in Syria, under the command of Epigenes, one of the late king's most experienced generals. The rest of the army he kept with him in Asia Minor, to support the Syrian interest in those parts<sup>P</sup>.

Antiochus, seeing himself seated on the throne, sent Molo and Alexander, two brothers, into the east, appointing the former governor of Media, and the latter of Persia. All the provinces of Asia Minor he committed to the charge of Achæus. Epigenes had the command of the troops which the king kept about him; and Hermias the Carian was declared prime minister, which station he had held under the deceased king. Achæus soon recovered all the countries which Attalus had wrested from the Syrian empire, and confined him within the limits of his own kingdom of Pergamus; but Alexander and Molo, despising the young king, were no sooner

Alexander
and Molo, two of the generals revolt.

<sup>P</sup> POLYB. l. iv. p. 315. APPIAN. in Syriac. HIERON. in Daniel. c. 11. JUSTIN. l. xxix. c. 1.

fixed

fixed in their governments, but they refused to acknowledge his authority, and set up for themselves in their respective districts. They hoped that Abeæus would join them; but above all things, apprehended the cruelty and malice of Hermias, who bore a great sway at court, and therefore chose rather to withdraw their obedience to the king than obey so wicked a minister, against whose malice no man was safe. This Hermias was of a most savage disposition, punished the least faults with the utmost rigor, and, being himself a man of little genius and no merit, could not endure either merit or abilities in others. He was haughty, envious, full of himself, and so tenacious of his own opinion, that he thought it highly dishonourable either to ask or follow the advice of another. He suspected all those who had any trust, or share in the king's esteem; but the chief object of his jealousy and suspicion was Epigenes, who had the reputation of being one of the ablest generals of his time and in whom the troops reposed an intire confidence. It was this reputation that gave the prime minister umbrage, and he could not conceal the ill-will he bore him. News being brought of the revolt of Molo and Alexander, Antiochus assembled his council to deliberate on proper measures in so delicate a conjuncture; for he had great reason to apprehend a general revolt of the provinces. Every one being desired to deliver his opinion freely, Epigenes spoke first, and declared, That they had no time to lose; that it was absolutely necessary the king should, without delay, march in person against the rebels; that his authority on the spot would be of great weight; and that Molo and his followers would not have the assurance to persist in their rebellion, seeing the king himself at the head of his army; or should they continue obstinate, the soldiers themselves would mutiny, return to their duty, and deliver up their leaders to the king. Epigenes had hardly delivered his opinion, when Hermias, in a violent passion, replied, That this was not the first treacherous advice he had given; that he had long harboured evil designs against the king; that, however, he was now pleased to hear him openly declaring his bad intentions in the pernicious counsel he had given, wherein he plainly shewed his design of betraying the king into the hands of the rebels. He said no more then on that subject, being content to have thus sown the seeds of suspicion against him. The real motive of his opposing the opinion of Epigenes was, his being afraid to venture upon that expedition. As Ptolemy Philopator, who had succeeded his father Ptolemy Evergetes in the kingdom of Egypt, was a most vicious and effeminate prince, he thought him a much less formidable enemy, and therefore advised

O o o ?

The rebels defeat the troops sent against them.

advised the king to march in person against him, and attempt the recovery of Syria. He thought there would be no danger in invading a prince, who was wholly immersed in pleasures of all kinds. The opinion of Hermias prevailing, Antiochus marched in person into Cæle-Syria with one part of his army, and sent Zeno and Theodotus, two of his generals, with the other, to suppress the rebellion in the east <sup>1</sup>. Being arrived, on his march towards Cæle-Syria, at Seleucia near Zeugma, he there found Laodice daughter to Mithridates king of Pontus, who had been some time betrothed to him. He made some stay there to solemnize the nuptials; but the joy of his marriage was soon interrupted with bad news from the east; for his generals there, being overpowered by the joint forces of Molo and Alexander, had been forced to retire, and leave them masters of the field. Antiochus then saw the error he had committed in not following the advice of Epi- genes, and was for laying aside his expedition into Cæle-Syria, in order to march directly with all his forces into the east, and there crush the rebellion before it gathered greater strength; but Hermias persisting in his former opinion, and telling the king, that it became kings to march in person against kings, and to send their lieutenants against rebels, Antiochus was so weak as to acquiesce again in the opinion of Hermias, and, sending another army into the east, to proceed in his intended expedition into Cæle-Syria. The general who commanded this army was one Xenætas an Achæan. His commission was to join the forces which were there before under the two generals, and take upon him the command of the whole army. he had never before commanded in chief, and his only merit was his being the prime minister's friend and creature. Being thus raised to a post which he never expected, he behaved with great haughtiness towards the other officers, and by his insolent behaviour, incurred the hatred of the soldiery. The success was such as might be expected from so bad a choice; in crossing the Tigris he fell into an ambuscade, and was cut off with his whole army. This victory opened to the rebels the province of Babylonia and all Mesopotamia, of which they made themselves masters without the least opposition <sup>2</sup>.

*Antiochus
disappointed in his attempt upon Cæle-Syria.*

IN the mean time Antiochus having advanced into Cæle-Syria, as far as the valley which lies between the two ridges of mountains called Libanus and Antilibanus, found the parties

<sup>1</sup> POLYB. l. v. p. 387, 388, 389. JUSTIN l. xxx. c. 1. <sup>2</sup> POLYB. ubi supra p. 390, 391, 392, 393, &c.

there so well fortified and guarded by Theodotus the Ætolian, whom Ptolemy had intrusted with the government of this province, that he was obliged to march back, without attempting to make any farther progress that way. The bad news, which he had by this time received, of the defeat of his troops also hastened his retreat ; being therefore now resolved to lay aside the Syrian enterprize, he turned his thoughts wholly on the war with the rebels ; wherefore assembling his council once more to deliberate about it, and requiring every one to deliver their real opinion, Epigenes again spoke the first, saying, That it had been well for the king's service if they had followed his first advice without any delay or loss of time ; for, in that case, the enemy would not have had time to strengthen himself in the provinces which he had usurped ; that he was still of the same opinion, viz. that the king should desist from any other enterprize, and march without delay in person against the rebels. Hermias fancying himself affronted by the speech of Epigenes, began to exclaim against him, and renew the antient charge, as if he designed to deliver up the king to the rebels. He conjured the prince not to quit the enterprize of Cæle-Syria, since the abandoning of it would be ascribed to fickleness and inconstancy, a character which no ways suited a prince of his wisdom and knowledge ; but notwithstanding all he could say, the advice of Epigenes prevailing in the council, the king resolved to put off his march into Syria, and head his army in person against his rebellious subjects. Hermias, Resolves to finding that all opposition would be vain, became all on a march in sudden quite another man, seeming the most sanguine of them person a- all in hastening the execution of what he had hitherto opposed gainst the with incredible warmth. Accordingly the troops were, with rebels. the utmost expedition, assembled at Apamea ; but before they began their march, a sedition broke out in the army about the soldiers arrears. This unlucky accident threw the king into the utmost consternation, and filled him with the deepest melancholy ; which Hermias perceiving, offered to satisfy the army out of his private fortune, provided he would not take Epigenes with him in this expedition, pretending, that the quarrel which had happened between them would be the occasion of new disputes, and greatly hinder him in the management of his affairs. His view in this was to lessen, by absence, the esteem and affection which Antiochus had shewn on all occasions for Epigenes, men being apt to forget, and especially princes, the services of such as are removed out of their sight. This proposal gave the king great uneasiness, he being very sensible how much he wanted the presence of such a general as Epigenes, who was not only an experienced commander, but an able counsellor ; but as Hermias had a great ascendant over him, and had likewise gained those about him, he was not master of his own resolutions : Wherefore yielding to the present necessity, he complied with the request of Hermias, and ordered Epigenes to remain at Apamea. This incident alarmed the other officers, who were apprehensive of meeting with the same fate ; but the common soldiers having received all their arrears, expressed great obligations to Hermias, by whose means they had been satisfied<sup>c</sup>.

Epigenes
treacherously murdered.

Hermias having thus gained the good-will of the soldiery, set out with Antiochus and the army, after having charged Alexis governor of the citadel of Apamea, a man entirely at his devotion, to destroy under some plausible pretence, Epigenes during the king's absence. Alexis, pursuant to his orders, having, by the promise of a great reward, bribed one of the domestics of Epigenes, gave him a letter, with orders to lay it among his master's papers. This was a forged letter from Molo, wherein he thanked Epigenes for forming a conspiracy against the king, and pointed out to him by what methods he might safely put it in execution. Some days after Alexis went to Epigenes, and asked him, whether he had not received a letter from Molo. Epigenes replied with the greatest indignation, that he had no intercourse with rebels ; but Alexis acquainting him that he had orders to look into his papers, entered his lodgings by force, and a search being made, the forged letter was found ; whereupon Epigenes without being tried, or even heard, was immediately put to death. The king, at the bare sight of the letter, approved of his death, and greatly commended the zeal of Alexis ; but the great men of the court understood the whole matter, tho' none of them dared to undeceive their master, being awed into silence by the great power of the minister<sup>d</sup>.

In the mean time, Antiochus arriving with his army at the Euphrates, joined the troops he found there, and pursuing his march, came to Antioch in Mygdonia (R), where, as the year

<sup>c</sup> POLYB. ubi subra.

<sup>d</sup> POLYB. l. v. p. 393, 394.

(R) Antioch of Mygdonia stood in the north part of Mesopotamia. St Jerom carries the antiquity of it as high as Nimrod. It was as considerable for the number of its inhabitants as its great extent. The Gyro-Macedonians, when they became masters of Mesopotamia, gave this city the name of Antioch in Mygdonia, to distinguish it from the capital of Syria. Before that time it was called Nisibis, or, as we find it wrote on some antient medals, Nabe. It served as a barrier against the incursions of the Parthians and Persians. down year was now far spent, he put his troops into winter quarters, proposing to open the campaign very early next spring. As soon as the season allowed him to take the field, having assembled his troops, he advanced to Liba (S), and there summoned a council to deliberate with his officers what course was best to take to find out Molo, and by what means they might supply the army with provisions in their march, Molo being master of all the country about Babylonia. Hermias proposed to keep along the Tigris, by which means, said he, we shall have the benefit of that and two other rivers, the Lycus and the Capros (T), to cover our camp. Such danger there was in following this advice, that Zeuxes, though he had the fate of Epigenes before his eyes, could not help opposing it, and shewing the great difficulties they should meet with in holding their march along the river. He urged several reasons, chiefly, that after a long and tedious march through a continued desert, they should come to a place called the King's Ditch, which if it should happen to be possessed by the enemy, would put a stop to their further progress, and oblige them to return by the same desert, where they should be in great want of all things. On the other hand, he made it appear, that in case they passed the Tigris, they should be well supplied with provisions; and besides, that it was more than pro-

to the time of the emperor Julian, who, by a shameful treaty, gave it up to the latter. Some modern writers, by mistake, place it on the Tigris; but it is plain, both from Polybius and the emperor Julian's first oration, that it stood on the river Mygdonius, which springs from mount Mafius between the Tigris and the Euphrates, and running from north to south, discharges itself into the latter of these rivers. The Mygdonius divides Mygdonia, which is a small province of Mesopotamia, into two unequal parts. Pliny is of opinion, that this country was originally peopled by a colony of the Mygdonians in Macedon. Antioch of Mygdonia still retains its most antient name, being called by the people of the east Nassibin, which is plainly a corruption of Nasibis.

(S) Liba was a chief city of Carmania, a province lying beyond Persia, and bounded by Parthia on the north, by Gedrosia on the east, and by the Persian and Indian seas on the south. The city of Liba stood near the confines of Gedrosia.

(T) The Lycus and Capros were two rivers of Affyria, properly so called, running between the cities of Ninus and Seleucia, and discharging themselves into the Tigris, they were so called by the Greeks, as Strabo (38) and Pliny (39) inform us, from two rivers of the same name in Phrygia.

(38) Strabo, l. xii. in fine      (39) Plin l. v. c. 29

habile,

Molo being overcome, lays violent hands on himself.

bable, that those of the country of Apollonia would return to their duty, since it was very plain, that out of necessity, and not by inclination, they had declared for Molo. He added, that when Molo should see his passage back into Media cut off, and find himself straitened for want of provisions, he would be constrained, either to venture a battle, or to see himself abandoned by his troops<sup>u</sup>. The advice of Zeuxes was approved of; and accordingly the army being divided into three bodies, passed the Tigris in three different places, and pursued their march to Dura (U), which was at that time besieged by one of Molo's officers, who, on their approach, raised the siege, and retired. From Dura they advanced to Orricum, and from thence to Apollonia. Molo being informed of the king's arrival, marched with all possible expedition to the mountains of Apollonia; but, before he reached them, was overtaken by the king, who encamped over-against him. Molo apprehending it dangerous for rebels to march against their prince in broad day, and give him battle, resolved to fall on Antiochus in the night, and accordingly putting himself at the head of a body of chosen troops, he marched, by private ways, towards the neighbouring mountains, with a design to fall on the enemy's camp from those eminences; but his soldiers deserting in troops to the king, he thought it advisable to return by break of day to his camp. In the mean time the king being resolved to venture an engagement, drew out his forces, and advanced in battalia to the enemy's trenches. Molo likewise, at the approach of the king, marched out in good order to meet him. Both armies engaged with the utmost fury; but a body of chosen men, which Molo had placed on his left to make head against the king, going over to him, that wing was soon put in disorder, and obliged to retire. Hereupon Molo, after having attempted several times, in vain, to lead them back to the charge, was obliged to retire with them; but being closely pursued by the king, and fearing to fall alive into his hands, out of despair killed himself, as did many of his accomplices; so that the king gained a complete victory without any considerable loss. Neolaus or Nicolas, the brother of Molo, escaping from the battle, fled to Alexander, another of their brothers, who was then in Persia, and carried

<sup>u</sup> Idem. ibid. p. 395.

(U) Dura was a city in the province of Affyria, called by Ptolemy, Apolloniatis, no doubt from the city of Apollonia its metropolis. Some writers place Dura in Mesopotamia.

him

him the bad news of the death and defeat of their brother. These two finding their affairs quite desperate, first killed their mother, afterwards their wives and children, and lastly dispatched themselves, to prevent their falling into the hands of the conqueror. After the king had pillaged the camp, he ordered Mala's body to be fixed on a cross, and placed on one of the highest mountains of Media; which was done accordingly, the body being carried into the country of the Chalontidi (W), and there placed on a cross on the most conspicuous part of mount Zagra. Such was the end of this rebellion, which proved the ruin of all who had engaged in it. After this victory, the remains of the conquered army submitted to the king, who, after having severely reproved them, granted them his pardon, ordering them into Media, under the command of those he sent to regulate the affairs of that province. He then returned to Seleucia on the Tigris, and having spent some time there in re-establishing his authority in the provinces which had revolted, and settling all things on their former foot, he resolved to attack the Barbarians bordering on his dominions, in order to deter them for the future from taking part with his rebellious subjects, or entering into alliance with them. He proposed to begin with Artabazanes king of the Atropatis (X) and other neighbouring nations, and by far the most powerful of all those princes. Hermias was at first very unwilling to engage in this war, in regard of the danger that attended it, and because he was still bent on the

(W) Chalontidis was the most southern province of Assyria, so called, according to Isidorus Characenus (40), from the city of Chala its metropolis, and divided from Media by mount Zagrus or Zagra, the highest in the whole country.

(X) Atropatis was a part of Media; for Strabo (41) divides all Media into two parts; the one he calls Media Magna, and the other Media Atropatis and Atropatane (42). It borrowed this name from one Atropatus, who being governor of that province for the king of Persia in Alexander's time, defended it against that conqueror, and, upon the downfall of the Persian empire, seized it for himself and transmitted it to his posterity. Artabazanes was one of his descendants, and another of the same race reigned in Strabo's time, the kingdom being held even then by the same family. This country, according to Polybius (43), extended on one side as far as the Pontus Euxinus, and on the other to the Caspian sea, was plentifully stored with all sorts of provision, and its inhabitants were deemed good soldiers.

(40) Isidor. Charac. p. 5. (41) Strabo. l. xi. p. 360. (42) Idem ibid. p. 363. (43) Polyb. l. v. p. 402.

recovery of Cæle-Syria ; but on the news of the queen's being brought to bed of a son, he changed his mind, and warmly promoted a war with the Barbarians, in hopes that the king might lose his life in that dangerous expedition, in which case the regency and tuition of the infant prince would fall to his share. All things therefore being got ready for this invasion, the army marched over the mountain Zagra, and entered the country of the Atropatii. Artabazanes their king being then very old, and greatly terrified at the approach of the king at the head of a victorious army, made his submission, and concluded a peace on such terms as Antiochus thought proper to impose w.

By this time Hermias, through his insolent and haughty behaviour, growing intolerable to his master, as well as to his fellow-subjects, Apollophanes the king's physician, in whom he reposed great confidence, and who, by his employment, had free access to him, took a proper time to represent to him the general discontent of his subjects, and the danger he himself was in from his ambitious and wicked minister ; he therefore advised him to take care of himself, lest the same fate should attend him which his brother had met with in Phrygia, he having fallen a victim to the ambition of those on whom he most relied. He added, that it was plain to every one, that Hermias was hatching some wicked design, and that no time was to be lost in the preventing of it. Antiochus, as we have already observed, had begun to entertain some suspicions of his chief minister, but had suppressed them, not knowing whom to trust, though surrounded with courtiers whom he had loaded with favours. He was therefore extremely well pleased that his physician had given him this advice, and after having commended him for the care he shewed for his safety, and his resolution in opening so frankly his thoughts, immediately entered on measures with him for the ridding himself of a minister who was so universally detested, and whose attempts were so much to be dreaded. Accordingly the very next morning, the king, under pretence of taking the air, walked out of the camp, and Hermias not failing to attend him, as he usually did, when they came to a solitary place where none of the minister's creatures could lend him any assistance, the king stepping aside as on some necessary occasion, those who attended him falling upon Hermias, as it had been agreed on before-hand, put him to death, to the great satisfaction of all the provinces of the Syrian empire. He had governed, not only the kingdom, but the king himself, with great

Hermias
p. 17 killed by the king's order.

w Idem, ibid. p. 398 ---400.

haughtiness,

haughtiness, treating him on several occasions in a very insolent manner ; and whoever of the subjects dared to oppose his sentiments or designs, was sure to fall a sacrifice to his resentment, which drew on him an universal hatred ; but no where was there a more signal instance of it than at Apamea in Syria, for there they no sooner heard of his death, than the whole city rose with the utmost fury, and the women, falling upon his wife and children, stoned them to death*.

Antiochus having now happily re-established his affairs in the east, and raised to the government of those provinces persons of merit, in whom he could repose the greatest confidence, marched back into Syria, and putting his army into winter-quarters, spent the remaining part of the year in consulting with his ministers and officers about the operations of the ensuing campaign ; for he had two other very dangerous enterprises to put in execution for the restoring of the Syrian empire to its former splendor ; one was against Ptolemy, for the recovery of Cœle-Syria, and the other against Achæus, who had usurped the sovereignty of Asia Minor ; for Ptolemy Euergetes having seized on all Syria in the beginning of the reign of Seleucus Callinicus, as we have related above, a great part of it was still held by his successor Ptolemy Philopator. And as to Achæus, we have already observed how he refused the crown that was offered him on the death of Seleucus Callinicus, and with great fidelity put it on the head of Antiochus the lawful heir, who, to reward his zeal and services, appointed him governor of all the provinces of Asia Minor. In this station he wrested from Attalus king of Pergamus all the countries in Asia which he had seized, and annexed them again to the crown of Syria. The success that attended him on this occasion drew on him the envy of the prime minister, and others, who had the king's ear at court ; and therefore, resolutions being taken to ruin him, forged letters were produced to prove, that he entertained treacherous designs against his prince, and held a correspondence with Ptolemy. Achæus having notice of what was plotting against him at court, thought that he had no other way to secure himself against the evil designs of his enemies than by doing what he was charged with, and accordingly, in his own defence, taking the crown, which he had before refused, he caused himself to be proclaimed king of Asia, and was crowned at Laodicea in Phrygia, assuming ever after the regal title in all his letters to the cities of Asia, and obliging them to give it him in all their addresses†. These were the two dangerous wars Anti-

* Idem ibid. p. 400, 401.

† Idem ibid.

Antiochus resolves on a war with Ptolemy
king of Egypt.

Antiochus had on his hands ; and which of these he should first undertake was the matter under debate in the king's council. Upon mature deliberation it was resolved, first to reduce all the countries belonging to the Syrian empire on that side mount Taurus, before they marched over it against Achæus, to whom, for the present, they only sent menacing messages. Pursuant to this scheme all the forces were ordered to assemble at Apamea, and hold themselves in a readiness to march into Cæle-Syria. Before they set out, a council of all the chief officers was assembled, to consult about the first operations of the campaign, when Apollophanes, the king's physician, represented, that the design on Cæle-Syria was vain, and would prove an unprofitable expedition, while they left Ptolemy in quiet possession of Seleucia, a royal city, and in effect the metropolis of the kingdom ; that, not to mention the dishonour of leaving that city in the hands of an Egyptian king, the recovery thereof would redound greatly to the king's advantage ; that, while it was held by the enemy, it would be a great hindrance to the progress of his arms in the enterprize he was upon ; for which way soever he had a mind to carry his arms, he would find it necessary, over and above all other preparations, to strengthen all his towns with numerous garisons, merely on account of the danger which would threaten them from Seleucia : Whereas if Antiochus made the recovery of that place his first business, it would not only serve as a bulwark and frontier against the enemy, but enable him to prosecute the enterprize both by sea and land. This city stood on the same river as Antioch, at the distance only of fifteen miles below it, near the mouth of the Orontes. When Ptolemy Euergetes invaded Syria, as we have related above, to support the rights of his sister Berenice, he seized upon that important place, and having put a strong Egyptian garison into it, kept it full twenty seven years. As it was the port of Antioch, it not only was a constant annoyance to the Antiochians, but entirely cut off their communication with the sea, and quite ruined their trade. All which things being set forth by Apollophanes, the king and council resolved to follow his plan, and open the campaign with the siege of Seleucia<sup>2</sup>. Accordingly the whole army marched thither, invested the place, and carried it by a general assault, some of the officers, who commanded in the city, having been gained over by Antiochus. The king treated the inhabitants with the utmost humanity, and restored them to their antient privileges<sup>3</sup>.

Seleucia
taken.

<sup>2</sup> POLYB. ubi. supra. p. 405.

<sup>3</sup> Idem. p. 406.

Antiochus being now master of this important place, marched with all possible expedition into Cæle-Syria, being invited thither by Theodotus the Ætolian, whom Ptolemy had appointed governor of that province. We have seen above how vigorously he repulsed Antiochus the year before; nevertheless the court of Egypt had not been satisfied with his conduct on that occasion, and therefore called him to Alexandria to answer for it at the peril of his head. 'Tis true he was acquitted, and sent back to his government; but nevertheless he was so exasperated at the affront, that he resolved to revenge it. The luxury and effeminacy of the court, to which he had been an eye-witness while he attended his cause in Alexandria, heightened his resentment and indignation, it being intolerable to him to depend on so base and contemptible a set of men: And indeed the most abominable debaucheries of every kind were practised by Ptolemy Philopator during his reign; and the whole court followed his example. Theodotus therefore could not but abhor so vile a conduct, and being a gallant man, resolved to seek for a new master, who might better deserve his services. Accordingly he was no sooner returned to his government, but he seized on the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais, and declaring for Antiochus, dispatched a messenger to him, inviting him into those parts. Nicolaus, one of Ptolemy's generals, though of the same country with Theodotus, would not join with him in this defection; but still adhering to Ptolemy, according to his first engagement, marched against Theodotus, and closely besieged him in the city of Ptolemais, which he had lately taken. Antiochus hastened to his relief, but met with a vigorous resistance from Nicolaus, who, on the news of his march, had seized Ptolemais the passes of mount Libanus. However the Ætolian, after a most gallant defence, being bore down by the superior power of Antiochus, was at length obliged to retire; whereupon Antiochus the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais were by Theodotus delivered into the king's hands, and with them the magazines which Ptolemy had prepared in those two places for the support of his army, and likewise a fleet of forty sail which lay in the two harbours. The ships he delivered to Diognetus his admiral, ordering him to sail to Pelusium, whither he himself intended to march by land, with a view to invade Egypt on that side; but being informed, that at that time of the year the inhabitants used to cut down the banks of the Nile, and lay the whole country under water, and consequently that the invading of Egypt was at that season impracticable, he abandoned this project, and employed all his forces in reducing the rest of Cæle-Syria. Some places surrendered of their own accord, accord, others were taken by force, and Damascus itself, the capital of that province, fell into his hands by a stratagem with which he over-reached Dion, who was governor of it for Ptolemy <sup>b</sup>. The last action of this campaign was the siege of Dura, a maritime city in the neighbourhood of mount Carmel, called Dor in scripture <sup>c</sup>; but the place being well fortified by Nicolaus, and defended by a numerous garison, the king could not master it, and was therefore glad to accept of a proposal which was offered him, of making a truce for four months with Ptolemy. This served him as an honourable pretence to march back to Seleucia on the Orontes, where he put his army into winter-quarters, after having appointed Theodotus the Ætolian governor of all the places he had taken in this campaign <sup>d</sup>.

DURING this truce a treaty was set on foot between the contending princes, but with no other view on either side than to gain time, which Ptolemy wanted to make the necessary preparations for the carrying on of the war, and Antiochus to put a stop to the conquests of Achæus; for he, not satisfied with Asia Minor, of which he was already master, was making great preparations to invade Syria, and dispossess Antiochus, if possible, of all his dominions. To check these ambitious views, it was necessary for the king to give over all thoughts of distant conquests.

IN this treaty the main point was, to whom Coele-Syria, Phœnice, Samaria, and Judæa did belong, in virtue of the partition of Alexander's empire between Ptolemy, Seleucus, Cassander and Lysimachus, after the death of Antigonus, and defeat of Demetrius in the battle of Ipsus. Ptolemy claimed these provinces, as having been, by that division, allotted to Ptolemy Soter his great-grandfather. On the other side, Antiochus pretended, that they had been given to Seleucus Nicator, and were therefore his right, he being heir and successor to that prince in the kingdom of Syria. The affair of Achæus was likewise a great clog to the negotiation; for Ptolemy insisted upon his being comprized in the treaty, while Antiochus could not brook so much as to hear him named, thinking it a scandalous thing that Ptolemy should entertain the least thought of giving protection to one in rebellion against his prince <sup>e</sup>.

Both kings prepare for war.

WHILE these pretensions and contests were carrying on by both parties, and neither would yield to the other, the time of the truce elapsed, and nothing being concluded by the treaty, they began again to provide for the war. Nicolaus the Ætolian had given such proofs of his valour and fidelity in the last campaign, that Ptolemy appointed him commander in chief of all his forces, and committed to his care the government of the contested provinces. The command of the fleet was given to Perigenes, who was ordered to carry on the war by sea, and supply Nicolaus with provisions, and such military stores as he should stand in need of. Nicolaus having assembled his forces at Gaza, whither all the necessary provisions had been sent from Egypt, marched from thence to mount Libanus, and seized on all the passes between that chain of mountains and the sea, through which it was necessary for Antiochus to pass, firmly resolved to wait for him there, and, by the advantage of the place, obstruct his farther progress that way<sup>f</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> POLYB. l. iv. c. 15.      <sup>c</sup> JOSHUA xi. 2. xii. 22. JUD. i. 27, &c.      <sup>d</sup> POLYB. ibid. p. 408.      <sup>e</sup> POLYB. p. 409, 410, 411.

In the mean time Antiochus was not inactive; but having made the necessary preparations for a vigorous invasion both by sea and land, he gave the command of his fleet to Diognetus his admiral, and then marched himself with his army by land. On his arrival at Marathum, the Aradians met him with tenders of their friendship and alliance; and he not only received them with great kindness, but composed, by his mediation, some differences of a long standing between them and the neighbouring cities. From Marathum he continued his march into Syria, by that pass which is called by Polybius Thott-prosopon, arrived at Berytus, and, advancing to Botris, possessed himself of that city, after having burnt Trieres and Calamitis. From Botris he dispatched Theodotus and Nicarchus, with orders to seize on the streights which lead to the river Lycus, while he himself, pursuing his march, reached the river Damura, where he encamped, his fleet keeping always near him. From thence, taking with him Nicarchus and Theodotus, he advanced at the head of the light-armed troops to view the streights where Nicolaus was posted, and returned the same day to his camp. Early next morning, leaving Nicarchus with the command of his heavy-armed troops, he marched with the rest to the streights possessed by Nicolaus, and having, in sight of the enemy, divided his army into three bodies, he ordered Theodotus, at the head of one, to attack the enemy's forces which were posted on the eminences; the other he gave to Menedemus, enjoining him to dislodge Nicolaus, who had fortified himself in a narrow pass between mount Libanus and the sea; the third he kept for a reserve under the command of Diocles, who was

<sup>f</sup> Item, ibid. p. 413.

The Egyptians defeated by Antiochus.

to carry succours wheresoever they should be wanted. Antiochus himself, attended only by his guards, posted himself on an eminence, whence he had a fair view of all that passed either by sea or land; for the two admirals, Diognetus and Perigenes, had drawn their fleets up in a line as near the shore as they could, that they might be ready at hand to assist their land-forces. By this means the battle by land and sea became, as it were, one single engagement. The signal being given, they advanced to the attack on all sides. At sea it was a drawn battle, the fleets being pretty equal; but at land the forces of Antiochus having dislodged Nicolaus, that brave commander was obliged, after a most gallant defence, to retire to Sidon, whither Perigenes followed him with the Egyptian fleet. About two thousand Egyptians were slain in the engagement, and the like number taken prisoners. The rest, under the conduct of Nicolaus, who retired in good order, got safe into Sidon. Antiochus pursued them, with a design to lay siege to that city; but finding it well stored with all sorts of provisions, and Nicolaus resolved to hold out to the last extremity, he altered his mind, and sending his fleet to Tyre, marched with his army into Galilee, where he reduced the cities of Philoteria, Scythopolis, and Attabyrium, which struck such terror into the inhabitants, that the whole country submitted to the conqueror. From Galilee he crossed the Jordan, and entering Gilead, possessed himself of all that country, which had been formerly the inheritance of the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh on that side of the river. He afterwards marched against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, which Polybius calls Rabath-ben-Ammon or Rabatamana, which, as it was a very strong and populous place, made a vigorous defence against the victorious army, but was at length obliged to submit for want of water. As the season was now far advanced, Antiochus, leaving the government of Samaria to Hippolechus and Keræas, who had lately come over to him from Ptolemy, and five thousand men to keep the country in subjection, marched back to Ptolemais, where he put his troops into winter-quarters<sup>8</sup>.

EARLY in the spring both armies again took the field. Ptolemy, having drawn together an army of seventy thousand foot, five thousand horse, and seventy three elephants, advanced to Pelusium, whence he led them in person through the deserts which part Egypt from Palestine, and encamped at Raphia, a city lying between Rhinocorura and Gaza. Here

<sup>8</sup> Idem, ibid. p. 414, 415.

Antiochus met him with an army somewhat superior to his; for he had with him seventy two thousand foot, six thousand horse, and an hundred and two elephants; he encamped first within ten furlongs, and afterwards within five of the enemy. While they lay thus near each other, many skirmishes happened between parties as they went out to forage; but without any considerable advantage on either side. Here Theodotus the Ætolian, who had served many years under Ptolemy, gave a signal instance of his intrepidity and resolution; for being well acquainted with the customs of the Egyptians, he took the advantage of a dark evening, when he could not be well known, and, entering the enemy's camp with two companions, advanced as far as Ptolemy's tent, with a design to kill him, and, by this bold attempt, put an end to the war; but the king lying that night elsewhere, he killed his first physician, mistaking him for Ptolemy, wounded two other persons, and then, amidst the alarm and confusion which this attempt occasioned, escaped to his own camp. At length both kings agreed to a decisive battle, and drew up their armies accordingly; both rode before their respective lines, encouraging their soldiers to behave manfully. Arfinne, the sister and wife of Ptolemy, not only exerted herself in animating the Egyptians before the engagement, but did not abandon her husband even in the heat of the battle, attending him in the midst of the greatest dangers. Antiochus, at the head of his right wing, defeated the enemy's left; but while he pursued them too far, Ptolemy, who had been as successful in the other wing, charged in flank the center of Antiochus, which was then uncovered, and broke that body before it was possible for the prince to succour it. An old officer of Antiochus's army, observing which way the cloud of dust flew, concluded from thence that the main body was routed, and shewed it to the king, who faced about that instant; but came too late to retrieve his error, the rest of his army being broke and put to flight before his arrival. Hereupon he was obliged to retreat first to Raphia, and next to Gaza, after ten thousand of his men had been cut to pieces, and four thousand taken prisoners. After this defeat Antiochus, being no longer in a condition to make head against Ptolemy, abandoned all his conquests, and withdrew with the remains of his shattered army to Antioch. This battle was fought at the same time, according to Polybius, that Hannibal defeated Flaminius the Roman consul at the lake of Thrasymenus in Hebruria<sup>b</sup>.

The battle of Raphia.
Year of the Flood 2782.
Before Christ 217.

Antiochus defeated.

<sup>b</sup> Idem, p. 424, 425. & 3 MACCAB. c. iii. ver. 5, 6.

UPON the retreat of Antiochus the cities of Cœle-Syria and Palestine strove, as it were, which of them should first submit to Ptolemy, being more inclined to him, as they had been long subject to the Egyptians, than to Antiochus, whom they had received after the defeat of Nicolaus, only because they were not in a condition to oppose him. Ptolemy's court, as soon as the news of this victory was spread abroad, was crowded with ambassadors from all the cities of Cœle-Syria and Judæa, making their submission to him, and congratulating him on his late success. The conqueror not only received them all with great kindness, but resolved to make a progress through all the provinces which had submitted to him; and accordingly visited all the states and cities of note, and, amongst the rest Jerusalem, where he took a view of the temple, and even offered sacrifices to the God of Israel, making at the same time oblations, and bestowing rich donatives on that holy place. But not being satisfied with viewing it only from the outer court, beyond which no Gentile was allowed to pass, he shewed a great inclination to enter the sanctuary, and even the holy of holies itself, to which no one was allowed access but the high-priest, and he only once a year on the day of the great expiation. This occasioned a great uproar all over the city: the high-priest informed him of the holiness of the place, and the express law of God, by which he was forbid to enter it. The priests and levites drew together in a body to oppose his rash design, which the people also conjured him to lay aside. But this opposition serving only to inflame his curiosity, he forced in as far as the second court, where, while he was preparing to enter the temple itself, he was struck by God with such terror, that he was carried off half dead. On this he left the city, highly exasperated against the whole Jewish nation, on account of the accident which had befallen him, and loudly threatening to revenge it at a more proper season<sup>1</sup>.

Concludes a Antiochus no sooner returned to Antioch, but he sent em-peace with bassadors to Ptolemy to sue for a peace. What prompted him
Ptolemy. to this was his suspecting the fidelity of his own people, finding on his return his authority and interest much lessened by his late defeat. Besides, it was high time for him to turn his arms against Achæus, and put a stop to his conquests. For he being already master of all Asia, Antiochus foresaw, that if he gave him time to settle his authority in those provinces, it would not be long ere he must expect him in Syria, there to push for the whole empire. To prevent this he thought it adviseable to strike up a peace with Ptolemy upon any terms, lest having two such powerful enemies to contend with at the same time, he might be at last overpowered and stript of all his dominions. He therefore invested his embassadors with full powers to give up to Ptolemy all those provinces which were the subject of their contest, that is, all Cæle-Syria and Palestine. Cæle-Syria, as we have hinted before, comprehended that part of Syria, which lies between the mountains Libanus and Antilibanus; and Palestine all the country, which was antiently the inheritance of the children of Israel; and the coast of these two provinces was what the Greeks called Phœnice. All this country Antiochus was willing to part with to purchase a peace in his present circumstances, chusing rather to give up his claim to one part of his dominions, than run the risk of losing the whole. Accordingly a truce was agreed on for a year, and before that expired a peace concluded on the same terms. Ptolimy, who might have taken advantage of this victory, and easily conquered all Syria, was no less desirous than Antiochus of putting an end to the war, that he might be again at liberty to follow his pleasures<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Mem. p. 426, 427. & 3 MACCAB. c. i. & ii.

Antiochus having thus concluded a peace with Ptolemy, bent all his thoughts and attention on carrying the war into Asia Minor against Achæus, and having made vast preparations for that expedition, he crossed mount Taurus, and having concluded a league with Attalus king of Pergamus, by virtue of which they were both to act with all their forces against the common enemy, he so distressed Achæus, that he was obliged to quit the field, and shut himself up in Sardis, where he was closely besieged by the confederate princes. However, he held out above a year in spite of the utmost efforts of two victorious armies, during which time frequent battles were fought under the walls, and many brave men killed on both sides. At length the city being taken by a stratagem of Ligoras, one of Antiochus's commanders (Y), Achæus retired in-Marches against A-chæus.
Takes Sardis.

<sup>k</sup> Idem, p. 428. JUSTIN. l. xxx. c. 1,

(Y) The castle, and the adjoining wall of the city, were on the top of a rock deemed inaccessible, both hanging over a deep valley, into which dead horses and other beasts were usually thrown. Lagoras, who was stationed on that side, observed that the ravens, and other rapacious birds, which haunted that valley for the food they found there, used to fly from thence up to the top of the rocks, and pitch upon the walls, resting there undisturbed. From thence betrayed by two Cretans.

Achæus

to the castle, where he defended himself with incredible bravery, till he was by the treachery of two crafty Cretans delivered up to Antiochus in the following manner. Ptolemy Philopator, who had entered into a strict alliance with Achæus, was much concerned to hear he was so closely blocked up in the castle of Sardis, and therefore enjoined Sofibius his prime minister to deliver him at all events from the imminent danger he was in; he added, that if he could but rescue his person he cared for no more, knowing that if he only appeared in the countries about mount Taurus, he would soon have an army strong enough to keep Antiochus employed. There being at that time in Ptolemy's court a crafty Cretan called Bolis, well acquainted with the roads of that country and the by-paths among the rocks, on which the castle of Sardis stood, Sofibius consulted him about this matter, and asked him whether he could not think of some method to procure Achæus's escape. The Cretan desired time to consider of it, and at the next conference undertook the business, and communicated to Sofibius in what manner he designed to proceed in it. He told him, that he had an intimate friend, who was also a near relation of his, Cambylus by name, a captain of the Cretan mercenaries in Antiochus's army, and at that time commanding a fort behind the castle of Sardis; and that he would prevail with him to let Achæus make his escape that way. Sofibius, approving of the project, sent Bolis with the utmost expedition to Sardis to put it in execution, and gave him ten talents to defray his thence he concluded, that those parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought inaccessible, and acquainted Antiochus with what he had observed. Hereupon in a council of the chief officers it was resolved that a general assault should be made, during which Lagoras, with such men as he thought proper for the enterprize, should attempt to scale the rocks on that side, and enter the town. The success was agreeable to what Lagoras had imagined; for having with great difficulty scaled the rocks, he entered the city on that side without resistance, and then advancing at the head of his men into the market place, struck the inhabitants with such terror, that in many places they abandoned the walls, and gave an opportunity to the rest of Antiochus's army to enter the city and join their companions, by which means the place was reduced. In the same manner had Sardis been taken many ages before by the Persians under the conduct of Cyrus, when Craesus thought himself secure on that side. But the citizens had forgot what had happened so many ages before (44).

(44) Polyb. l. xvii. p. 506, 507.

expences.

expences. At the same time he wrote to Achæus by a trusty messenger called Arianus, whom Bolis found means to convey into the castle. As the letter was wrote in characters, or rather cyphers, which none were acquainted with, save he and Sofibius, he was very well assured that this was no feigned device of his enemies in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, he was a trusty man, and one, whom Achæus found upon examination, heartily affected to his cause. But the contents of the letter, which were, that he should repose an entire confidence in Bolis and one Cambylus, whom Bolis had won over from Antiochus, gave him no small uneasiness. They were both quite strangers to him, and the Cretans he thought, were not blindly to be relied on. However, as he could not escape any other way, he resolved to follow their directions; the messenger therefore having often passed to and fro, it was at length concluded that Bolis himself should come and conduct Achæus out of the castle. This being agreed on, the two treacherous Cretans consulting together how to make their most of it, resolved in the first place to share equally between them the ten talents, which they had already received in hand, and then to reveal the whole matter to Antiochus, and on his promising a suitable reward, to turn the plot, and put Achæus into his hands. Antiochus was overjoyed when they first made their proposal, and promised them most ample rewards. At length when all things were ready on both sides, Bolis, Cambylus, and Arianus, went privately up into the castle, in order to convey from thence Achæus that very night. As Achæus was not acquainted either with Bolis or Cambylus, he had a long conference with them about the business in hand, and after having examined them on several heads, concluded that he had no reason to distrust their fidelity or judgment. However, to proceed with all possible caution, he told them, that he designed to stay in the castle a little longer, and send in the mean time with them three or four of his friends, from whom, when he should receive an account of their being safely got out, he would then, and not till then, venture his own person. Accordingly he appointed three of his friends to go that night with Bolis and Cambylus, and disguising himself, so as not to be known by his guides, as he had agreed with his friends before-hand, joined them when they were ready to depart. The other three were likewise disguised, and one of them only took upon him to understand the Greek tongue, the others feigning to be Barbarians, lest Achæus should be known by his speech. At length they set out, Bolis and Cambylus being very greatly per-

And delivered up to Antiochus.

Achæus put to death by Antiochus.

The Expeditions of Antiochus into Media, Parthia, Hyrcania, &c.

perplexed, as not knowing whether Achæus was there or no. If they betrayed those they were conducting into the hands of Antiochus, they well knew that Achæus, if he was not among them, would never trust himself with them; if they conveyed them away, they might, for ought they knew, by that means save Achæus, and lose the reward promised them by Antiochus. While they were under this uncertainty, Bolis observed, that where the paths among the rocks were dangerous, three of them were very officious to the other, lending him their hands to help him up or down, and taking such care of him as gave Bolis to understand that he was Achæus. Accordingly when they came to a certain place, where Cambylus had posted some soldiers that served under him, Bolis clasping Achæus about the middle, gave the signal agreed on, and the soldiers falling out of the ambuscade, put him in irons, and carried him to Antiochus, who had watched all night expecting the issue of this affair. The king, when he saw Achæus loaded with chains, burst out into a flood of tears, and seemed to be touched with compassion at the misfortunes of a man to whom he was indebted for his crown. But motives of state prevailing over his natural tenderness, he caused him to be beheaded that very morning, and thereby put an end to the war of Asia. For as soon as those who were in the castle heard of his death, they surrendered to Antiochus, and all the places in the Asiatic provinces, which had declared for Achæus, did the same. Thus the king recovered his dominions in Asia, and having left persons to govern them, whom he could confide in, returned with his army to Antioch<sup>1</sup>.

Antiochus, being now disengaged from this troublesome war, began to make the necessary preparations for the reducing of those provinces in the east, which had shaken off the Syrian yoke. As the Parthians had lately seized on Media, his first attempt was upon that province. Arsaces, the son of that Arsaces who first founded the Parthian empire, was at that time king of Parthia, and, taking advantage of Antiochus's being engaged in war with Ptolemy and Achæus, had entered Media, and made himself master of that country. On the approach of the enemy he commanded all the fountains and wells in the desert, through which they were to pass, to be stopped and spoiled (Z) ; but Antiochus having sent before several parties of horse to secure them, marched safely through those great deserts with his whole army, and entering Media, drove Arsaces from thence, and spent the remainder of the year in settling all things there in their former order, and providing for the further operations of the war. Early next spring he marched into Parthia, where he was as successful as he had been the year before in Media. Arsaces was forced to retire into Hyrkania, where he thought to secure himself behind the mountains, which parted that country from Parthia, and accordingly posted parties in all the passes, through which the Syrian army was to march, not doubting but by that means he should obstruct their further progress that way. But Antiochus, as soon as the season would permit, taking the field, advanced to the narrow passes, and dividing his army into as many bodies as there were attacks, he soon forced them all. He then assembled his army again in the plains, and with all his forces invested Syringis the capital of Hyrkania, which he soon obliged to surrender at discretion. In the mean time Arsaces was not idle, but all the way as he retreated having gathered what forces he could, made up at length an army of an hundred thousand foot and twenty thousand horse. With these thinking himself strong enough to make head against the enemy, he took the field, and with great bravery put a stop to their further progress. His resistance drew out the war into a great length, insomuch, that no further advantage being gained by Antiochus, after many conflicts, he began to think it would be impossible for him to over-power so valiant an enemy, and drive him quite out of the provinces, in which he had by length of time so well established himself. He therefore gave ear to the overtures which were made him for the putting an end to so troublesome a war, and a treaty being set on foot, it was agreed, that Arsaces should hold Parthia and Hyrkania, on condition of

<sup>1</sup> POLYB. ibid p. 445, 446. & l. vii. p. 506, 507. & l. viii. p. 522, 523.

(Z) We are told by Polybius (45), that the Persians, when they first conquered Asia, finding many parts of it quite destitute of water, engaged to allow those, who should either discover water in places where none was then known to be, or find means to convey it thither, the profits arising from thence to the fifth generation. Our author adds, that the inhabitants, animated by this promise, spared neither labour nor expence to convey water under ground from mount Taurus as far as the desert here mentioned, there being no springs in that vast tract of country.

his assisting Antiochus to recover the other provinces which had revolted <sup>m</sup>.

Antiochus, having thus concluded a peace with Arsaces, turned his arms against Euthydemus king of Bactria. We have already shewn in what manner Theodotus first usurped the province of Bactria, caused himself to be acknowledged king of that country, and left it to a son of the same name. This son had been vanquished and driven out by Euthydemus, who, as he was a man of great courage and prudence, maintained a long war against Antiochus, who carried it on with great vigour, and on several occasions gave proofs of an extraordinary courage. In one of the battles fought with this prince his horse was killed under him, and in another he was dangerously wounded in the mouth, while he was encouraging his men in the first line. At length finding that he wasted his army without gaining any advantage by it, he grew weary of the war, and therefore admitted ambassadors from Euthydemus to treat of an accommodation. These represented to him, that the war he was carrying on against their sovereign was not just, since he had never been subject to the kings of Syria; that Bactria had thrown off the yoke under other monarchs long before him; that he possessed the kingdom by right of conquest, having vanquished and driven out the descendants of those who first revolted, and held it as the reward of a just victory, &c. They likewise insinuated, that the Scythians, taking advantage of the war, by which they were now weakening each other, were preparing to invade Bactria with a powerful army, and that therefore, if they persisted obstinately in contesting for it, a fair opportunity would be offered those Barbarians to take it from both. This consideration, added to the desire which Antiochus had to get rid, under some honourable pretence, of this tedious and unprofitable war, induced him to agree to such terms as ended in a peace; for the confirming and ratifying of which, Euthydemus sent his son to Antiochus, who, being taken with his majestic mein and agreeable conversation, gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and granted his father the title of king. The other conditions were agreed on to the great satisfaction of both princes, and confirmed by the usual oaths. After this, Antiochus, having received all the elephants of Euthydemus, which was one of the articles of the peace, crossed mount Caucasus, and entered India, where having renewed his alliance with Sophagasenus king of that country, and received likewise his elephants, which, with those he had from Euthydemus, amounted to an hundred and fifty, he marched from thence into Arachosia (A), afterwards into Drangiana, and lastly into Carmania, settling in all those countries due order and discipline. He passed the winter in Carmania, and thence returned by Persia, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia to Antioch, after having spent seven years in this expedition. The boldness of his attempts and the wisdom of his conduct, during the whole course of this long war, gained him the reputation of a wise and valiant prince; so that his name became formidable to all Europe, as well as Asia. And thus far by his whole conduct he well deserved the surname of Great, which was given him, and which he might have carried with great glory to his grave, had he not unfortunately engaged in a war with the Romans.

<sup>m</sup> JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 5.

Not long after the return of Antiochus died Ptolemy Philopator king of Egypt, and was succeeded by Ptolemy Epiphanes his son, a child but five years old. Hereupon Antiochus, taking advantage of his minority and the domestic troubles which rent the kingdom into several factions, entered into an alliance with Philip king of Macedon, in virtue of which they were to strip the infant king of his dominions, and divide them between them: Philip was to have Caria, Libya, Cyrene, and Egypt, and Antiochus all the rest. Pursuant to this agreement, Antiochus marched forth-into Cæle-Syria, and Palestine, and in less than two campaigns made an intire conquest of these provinces with all their cities and dependencies. In the mean time, Scipio having put an end to the second punic war in Africa, the name of the Romans began to be every-where known, and their victories spoke of not only in Europe and Africa, but all over Asia. The guardians therefore of the young king, finding themselves reduced to great straits by the confederate princes, sent an embassy to Rome, imploring the protection of that republic, and offering them the guardianship of their king and the regency of the kingdom during his minority; and lest the senate should refuse the offer, they added, that the deceased king had recommended both to them at his death. The Romans, thinking this would redound greatly to their glory, complied with the request of the ambassadors, and taking on them the tuition of the young king, immediately acquainted Antiochus and Philip therewith, requiring them to desist from

Antiochus enters into an alliance with Philip of Macedon against

Ptolemy Epiphanes.

Year of the Flood, 2797.

Before Christ, 202.

(A) We shall have occasion to describe Arachosia, Drangiana, Paropamisus, Aria, Gedrosia, and other countries on this side of the river Indus, when we come to the history of Bactria, Hyrkania, Alshos, &c.

invading the dominions of their pupil, otherwise they should be obliged to make war upon them for his protection. Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, who was one of the ambassadors sent to both kings, after having delivered his embassy, repaired, agreeable to the instructions he had received from the senate at his first setting out, to the court of Egypt, there to take upon him the office of guardian to the young king, and regent of the kingdom (B). After he had regulated affairs there in the best manner he could, he appointed Aristomenes an Acarnanian to be chief minister to the king, and then returned to Rome. Aristomenes was an old experienced minister of that court, and, being well acquainted with the affairs of Egypt, acquitted himself in this charge with great prudence and fidelity <sup>o</sup>.

THE first thing he did was to provide against the invasion of the two confederate kings; and for this purpose he took care to recruit the army with the best soldiers he could raise;

<sup>o</sup> POLYB. l. iii. p. 159. & l. 15. p. 707. LIV l. xxxi. JUSTIN. l. xxx. c. 3. VAL. MAX. l. vi. c. 6. HIERONYM. in cap. 11. Daniel.

(B) Livy takes no notice of the guardianship of Lepidus, whence the authors of the Roman history, which is now publishing in France, call in question the truth of the fact, thinking Livy's silence a strong proof against the single testimony, say they, of Justin. But herein they are greatly mistaken; for Valerius Maximus (46) tells us in express words, that Lepidus was appointed by the senate guardian of the young king of Egypt, and sent into that kingdom to take upon him the regency. King Ptolemy, says he, having left the people of Rome guardian to his son during his minority, the senate sent M. Æmilius Lepidus high pontiff, and one who had been twice consul, to Alexandria to take care of their pupil's kingdom, depriving themselves of a most upright man, who had been long conversant with their own affairs, &c. Besides, there are still extant several medals representing Lepidus putting a crown on a young man's head with this inscription, S. C. M. Lepidus Pont. Max. Tutor Reg. On the reverse of these medals is the city of Alexandria, where the kings of Egypt resided in those days. Our author here supposes, that M. Lepidus executed the office of guardian to the young king while he was high pontiff, and after he had been twice consul; whereas Ptolemy Epiphanes was dead before that time; perhaps he had seen some of the coins we have mentioned, and was by them led into this mistake (47).

(46) Valer. Max. l. vi. c. 6. (47) Vide Usher. Annal. ad Ann. I andi. 3803.

he sent Scopas an Ætolian with vast sums of money into Ætolia to levy there all the troops he could, the Ætolians being reputed the best soldiers of that age. Scopas had been formerly prætor of Ætolia, and was famous all over Greece for his skill in military affairs; when the time of his prætorship was expired, being disgusted with his countrymen for not confirming him, as he expected, in that office, he left Ætolia and went into the service of the king of Egypt, and being employed on this occasion, he had such success in his levies, that he brought in a very short time six thousand chosen men from Ætolia, which was a considerable reinforcement, to the Egyptian army<sup>p</sup> (C).

IN the mean time Antiochus having passed into Asia Minor, and there engaged in a war with Attalus king of Pergamus, Aristomenes, taking advantage of the king's absence, sent Scopas with an army into Palestine and Cæle-Syria to recover those provinces. In this expedition the Ætolian was attended with such success, that he recovered several cities, reduced all Judæa, put a garison into the castle of Jerusalem, and on the approach of winter returned to Alexandria, loaded with the spoils of the conquered provinces. But it soon appeared, that the success of this campaign was chiefly owing to the absence of Antiochus, and the small resistance the Egyptian army met with. For Antiochus no sooner marched in person into Cæle-Syria, but the face of affairs was changed, and victory declared in his favour. Scopas, who returned with a powerful army, was defeated at Paneas near the source of the Jordan, and great part of his army cut in pieces. The general himself with much ado escaped to Sidon, where he shut himself up with ten thousand of his men, all the rest having been killed or taken prisoners. Antiochus laid siege to the city, and reduced the numerous garison to such straits, that they were forced by famine to surrender on terms of having only their lives spared. Accordingly they delivered up the city to Antiochus, who dismissed them stript of their effects and quite naked. However the regency of Alexandria was not wanting in using their utmost efforts for the relief of the place. They no sooner heard that Scopas was besieged, but three of their best generals at the head of the choicest troops of the state were sent to raise the siege. But Antiochus had disposed things so that all their attempts proved unsuccessful, and Scopas was obliged to submit to the dishonourable terms abovementioned <sup>9</sup>. From Sidon Antiochus marched to Gaza, and being provoked at the resistance he met with there, he gave up the city, after he had taken it, to be plundered by his soldiers. From Gaza he sent several detachments to secure the passes through which troops might be sent out of Egypt to disturb him in the possession of his conquests, and then marching back reduced Betanea, Samarina, Abila, Gadera, and the remaining parts of Palestine and Cœle-Syria <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> LLV. l. xxxi. HIERONYM. ibid. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. LIV. l. xxxii.

(C) Livy tell us, that Scopas would not have left one man in the country able to bear arms, had not one Damocritus put his countrymen in mind of the war which Ætolia itself was ready to engage in, and represented to them the danger to which their own country would be exposed, if left naked and destitute of so many brave men. Hereupon great numbers, who had determined to follow Scopas into Egypt, remained at home. Scopas had not bribed and courted Damocritus as he had done the other heads of the Ætolian state.

The Jews submit to Antiochus who treats them kindly. THE Jews, who were at this time much alienated from the Egyptians, probably on account of the ravages committed the year before by Scopas, when he took Jerusalem, no sooner heard that Antiochus was advancing towards their country, but they went in crowds to meet him, delivering to him the keys of their cities; and when he approached Jerusalem, the priests and elders received him with great demonstrations of joy, paid him all kinds of honours, and entertained both him and his whole army in their city, supplying them plentifully with all sorts of provisions; nor was this all, they even took up arms and joined his forces in reducing the castle, which had been strongly garisoned by Scopas. In return for these services, Antiochus, in a decree directed to Ptolemy one of his lieutenants, granted them many privileges and favours; and in another he particularly ordained, that no stranger should be allowed access to the inner part of the temple; a prohibition which seems to have been made on account of Philopator's attempt which we have mentioned above. Antiochus had in his eastern expedition granted most ample privileges to the Jews, who were settled in Babylonia and Mesopotamia, and by that means gained the affection of the whole nation; no wonder therefore that, contrary to their former inclination, they were more desirous of having him to rule over them, than the Egyptian king who had used

Year of
the Flood, 2801.
Before
Christ,
198.

<sup>9</sup> VALESII Excerpt. in POLYB. p. 77, 78. &c. HIERON. in cap. 11. Daniel. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xi. c. 3. JUSTIN. l. xxxi. c. 1. LIV. l. xxxiii. POLYB. Legat. 72. p. 893.

them

them ill. Antiochus depended so much on their fidelity, that, when a sedition broke out in Phrygia and Lydia, he sent two thousand Jewish families out of the provinces of Babylonia and Mesopotamia, to quell it and keep the country in peace. They were transported thither at the king's charges, and by his order placed in the strongest fortresses of the country, had lands and possessions divided among them for their subsistence, and maintained at the king's expence, till they received the fruits of the lands allotted them<sup>r</sup>. From these Jews were descended those whom we find scattered in great numbers all over Asia, when the gospel was first preached in those parts.

Antiochus having thus reduced all Cæle-Syria and Palestine, Antiochus conceived hopes of doing the same in Asia Minor, his great invades aim being to restore the Syrian empire to the full extent, in Asia Mi- which it had been held by any of his ancestors, especially by nor. Seleucus Nicator its founder. But as he could not succeed in this design, unless he found some means to prevent the Egyptians from molesting him in his new conquests, while he was at a distance from them, he sent Eucles the Rhodian to Alexandria with proposals of a marriage between Cleopatra his daughter and king Ptolemy, to be consummated as soon as they were both of age, promising to give up those provinces on the day of the nuptials, by way of dowry with the young princess. This proposal being approved of at Alexandria, the treaty was concluded and ratified; and the Egyptians, relying on the promises of Antiochus, suffered him to carry on his conquests without molestation<sup>u</sup>.

Antiochus, having thus settled all in peace behind him, early next spring sent his two sons, Arduas and Mithridates, before him to Sardis with his land-forces, ordering them to wait for him there; while he himself set out with a fleet large enough to strike terror into all the coasts of the Mediterranean; for it consisted of an hundred large ships of war and two hundred other vessels of all sizes. His design was first to conquer the cities of Cilicia and Caria, and then advance in person to the assistance of his old ally Philip, who was engaged in a war with the Romans. As he sailed along the coasts of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria, many of the maritime cities of those provinces voluntarily submitted to him. Among these were Zephyrium, Soli, Aphrodisias, and Corica. From the latter he doubled the promontory Anemurium, and made himself master of the city of Selinus. Upon the bare report of his approach the cities sent deputies to him from all parts, acknowledging his authority, and declaring themselves ready to receive his troops within their walls. Coracesium (D) was the only city in those parts, which sustained a siege, though invested with all the forces of that mighty monarch. While he was employed before this place, the Rhodians, not in the least terrified at his formidable power, sent an embassy to him, requiring him not to extend his conquests farther, and to withdraw his troops out of Cilicia, else they should be obliged to take up arms against him, and put a stop to his further progress. The proud monarch, who was used to give law to others, was highly provoked at this bold message from so small a state; but, however, had command enough over his passions not to express any great resentment; he only answered, that he desired not to quarrel with the Rhodians, but to keep up always a good intelligence with them, and would therefore take care to order his ambassadors to renew the antient treaties his ancestors had made with Rhodes. He then sent ambassadors to Rhodes, but in the mean time continued the siege of Coracesium, which was at length taken by assault; several other cities of Ionia and Æolis underwent the same fate; but Caunus, Myndus, Halicarnassus, and the island of Samos were preserved by the good offices of the Rhodians, and the large supplies of men and provisions, which they sent them. Antiochus, having thus reduced most of the maritime cities of Asia Minor, at length failed to Ephesus, and having likewise made himself master of that city, took up his winter-quarters there, spending the remainder of the year in concerting with his officers such measures as might be most proper for the pursuing and accomplishing of his vast designs; for nothing less than the intire conquest of all those kingdoms, which had formerly belonged to the Syrian empire, would satisfy his ambition *.

<sup>r</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3.
Daniel.

<sup>u</sup> HIERON. in cap. ii.

The free cities of Asia improve the protection of the Romans.

Smyrna, Lampascus, and other Greek cities of Asia, which at that time enjoyed their liberty, finding that Antiochus designed to reduce them all to the condition they were in under his ancestors, resolved to stand out against him; but not be * LIV. l. xxxiii. Hieron. in cap. xi. Daniel. Appian. Syriac.

(D) Coracesium was a strong place situated near the sea on the top of a steep rock, which, according to Strabo, parted Cilicia from Pamphylia. This fort is now called Scanderos.

ing able to resist so powerful an enemy with their own strength, they implored the protection of the Romans, who willingly granted them it; for they plainly saw that it was their interest to check the progress of Antiochus towards the west, and that if they suffered him to settle on the coast of Asia, according to the plan he had laid down, he would have an easy passage from thence into Europe, and disturb them in the possession of the provinces they had already conquered, or might for the future conquer in Thrace and the adjacent countries. They therefore gladly laid hold of this opportunity, which the free cities offered them, of opposing his further progress; and immediately dispatched ambassadors to him; but before their arrival, Antiochus having sent two detachments from his army to besiege Smyrna and Lampsacus, had with the rest left Ephesus, and, crossing the Hellepont, seized all the Thracian Chersonesus. His pretence for it was to take possession of the old inheritance of his ancestors. We have already observed, that Seleucus Nicator had vanquished in Phrygia Lyfimachus king of Thrace; and this Antiochus thought a sufficient title to justify his claim upon Thrace as being his great-grandfather's conquest. The city of Lyfimachia which stood on the isthmus leading into the Thracian Chersonesus, had been founded by this Lyfimachus, but then lay in ruins, having been taken and reduced to this condition a few years before by the Thracians. Antiochus therefore had a design to rebuild Lyfimachia, and make it the capital of a great kingdom, which he intended as a portion for his second son Seleucus. He was bent upon these projects when he left Ephesus, and brought his troops by land into the Chersonesus, his fleet arriving before him at Lyfimachia. Here he made it his first business to rebuild and repopulate that great city. It was by its situation the most advantageous place he could have pitched upon in Europe; he therefore undertook to make it a convenient port for ships of all sizes, and a magazine of arms and provisions for the armies he intended to employ in the recovery of Thrace. With this view he assembled together its old inhabitants, who were dispersed and scattered in several places, rescued from slavery such as had been made captives, brought thither new citizens from the neighbouring countries, gave them most ample privileges, and furnished them with cattle, with instruments of husbandry, and whatever else was necessary for their encouragement*.

WHILE Antiochus was thus busied in the restoring of Lyfimachia, the Roman ambassadors, with some deputies from

* L. IV. & APPIAN. ubi supra.

Embassadors sent from

Rome to Antiochus.

Year of the Flood, 2803.

Before Christ, 195.

the

the Greek cities in Asia, arrived in Thrace, and finding Antiochus then at Selymbria, a city of that country, did all that lay in their power to dissuade him from settling in Europe. Antiochus received them very graciously, and entertained them in an hospitable and polite manner ; but in the very first conference their minds were sowed against each other, the Romans giving themselves those imperious airs, which they assumed where-ever they came. They told him, that their republic was dissatisfied with his conduct ever since he came into Europe, demanded the restitution of all the cities and provinces which he had taken from Ptolemy during his minority, and above all, insisted upon his giving up those places which he had usurped from Philip ; since the Romans, who had conquered the Macedonian, had a right to dispose of them. What ! said L. Cornelius, who spoke on this occasion, shall Rome have been at all the expence of the war with Philip, and Antiochus reap the advantages of it ? We should perhaps have connived at your conquests in Asia. But those you are come to make in Europe we will not suffer. Is not this step a declaration of war with the Roman senate and people ? To this Antiochus, putting on a haughty air in his turn, replied, I have long observed that Rome is very watchful of my steps, but quite regardless of her own. Know then, proud Romans, that it no more concerns you to examine what I do in Asia, than it concerns me to controul you in any of your undertakings in Italy. You complain of my proceeding with regard to the king of Egypt ; he is my friend, and will soon become my son-in-law ; and then we shall settle our differences between ourselves. As to the Thracian cities, which I have lately taken from king Philip, I must let you know, that the Chersonesus was never a part of his dominions : Nicator, my great-grand-father, formerly conquered it, and took it from Lyfimachus, whom he overcame in Phrygia. Ptolemy, indeed, and Philip divided Thrace between them, while my predecessor was busy elsewhere. But that does not alter the nature of their usurpation ; and I am come now justly to recover what they unjustly invaded. The Thracians have demolished Lyfimachia, a city belonging to me ; and I am come to rebuild it. I will make it the capital of a kingdom, which is my right, and which I design for my younger son. The Romans desired that the ambassadors from Smyrna and Lampsacus might be called in ; and they, being admitted accordingly, spoke with so much freedom, that Antiochus, not able to bear it, cried out in a violent passion, that the Romans were not to be his judges ; upon which the assembly broke up in great disorder, no satisfaction being given on either ther side, but all things tending to an open rupture <sup>1</sup>. It must be owned, that according to the laws settled among the captains of Alexander, who survived that prince and divided his conquests, the claim of Antiochus to Thrace was not ill grounded. The strongest took from the weakest the share he had usurped upon the division of Alexander's dominions; and by this rule Thrace, which Lyfimachus had seized belonged to Nicator, who had conquered him, and consequently to Antiochus his great-grandson. Nevertheless this dispute would have lasted a great while, if Antiochus had not been obliged to leave Lyfimachia for another enterprize, which was of more consequence to him than even this <sup>2</sup>. A report was spread, that the king of Egypt was dead; whereupon Antiochus looking upon Egypt as his own, hastened on board his fleet to take possession of it, and having left his son Seleucus with the army at Lyfimachia to carry on the work begun there, he first sailed to Ephesus, where he joined to his fleet all the ships he found in that harbour, and made all the sail he could for Egypt; but on his arrival at Patera in Lycia, certain advice being brought him, that the report which was spread of Ptolemy's death was false, he changed his course, and made for the island of Cyprus, with a design to seize it; but meeting in his way thither with a violent storm, his fleet suffered shipwreck near the mouth of the river Sarus, which discharges itself into the Cilician sea. After a considerable loss of ships and men, he was glad to put in at Seleucia (E), to repair his shattered vessels, and from thence return to Antioch, without attempting any thing else that year <sup>3</sup>.

WHAT occasioned the report of Ptolemy's death was, a conspiracy which had been formed against the life of that prince, and was first supposed, and afterwards reported, to have taken effect. Scopas the Ætolian was the author of this conspiracy, who being commander in chief of all the

<sup>1</sup> POLYB. Legat. 10. p. 800. & l. xvii. p. 769. LIV. & APPIAN. ibid. <sup>2</sup> LIV. & APPIAN. ubi supra. <sup>3</sup> POLYB. l. xvii. p. 771, 772. & VALESII Excerpt. p. 61.

(E) Several cities, as we have observed elsewhere, bore this name, being all built by Seleucus Nicator. The city here spoke of stood in Cilicia, about twelve miles from the sea, on the banks of the Calicadnus. The ancient geographers, to distinguish it from the other cities of the same name, call it Seleucia Trachiotis; an appellation which well agrees with the mountainous and rocky country in which it stood.

foreign forces in the service of the Egyptian king, most of which were Ætolians, imagined, that with so formidable a body of well-disciplined troops, it would be easy for him to usurp the crown, and make himself master of the whole kingdom during the king's minority. He had already formed his scheme for the attempt, and no doubt would have succeeded in it, had he executed his treason with the same boldness and resolution with which he contrived it. But though he was a very bold and daring man, yet when he came to the execution, his heart failed him, and, instead of going resolutely through with it, as such a desperate attempt required, he began to consult at home, and debate with his friends and accomplices, how he might best manage it, and by that means let slip the opportunity. For Aristomenes, the prime minister, having in the mean time got information of the plot, caused Scopas to be seized, and, having examined him before the council, and found him guilty, ordered him and all his accomplices to be executed. As for the rest of the Ætolians, they having forfeited the good opinion which the Egyptians had entertained of them on account of their fidelity till that time, most of them were disbanded, and sent back into their own country. Scopas was found at his death possessed of vast riches, which he had amassed by plundering the countries where he commanded as general. As he had, during the course of his victories, reduced Judæa and Jerusalem, the greatest part of his treasures arose, no doubt, from thence. One of his chief accomplices in this plot was Dicæarchus, who had formerly been admiral in the service of Philip king of Macedon. We are told by Polybius, that Philip having commanded him to make war on the Cyclades, contrary to the most sacred and solemn treaties, to shew how little he regarded either piety or justice, before he sailed out of the port on that expedition, he erected two altars, one to iniquity, and the other to impiety, and sacrificed on them both, to insult, we may say, at the same time both gods and men. As this wretch had so signally distinguished himself by his crimes, Aristomenes very justly distinguished him from the rest of the conspirators in his punishment. For the others were dispatched by poison; but Dicæarchus tormented to death <sup>b</sup>.

Hannibal
puts himself under the protection of Antiochus.
Year of
the Flood, 2804.

Before
Christ,
195.

EARLY next spring Antiochus set out from Antioch on his return to Ephesus, and was scarce gone, when Hannibal arrived there, claiming his protection. This great general had lived six years unmolested at Carthage, ever since the last

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid.

peace with the Romans. But being now suspected to hold a secret correspondence with Antiochus, and in concert with him to form projects against Rome, his enemies sent privately advice of this to the senate. Hereupon ambassadors were immediately dispatched to Carthage, under pretence of settling some small differences between Masinissa and the Carthaginians, but in reality to watch Hannibal's conduct. If they found that he had entered into any engagements with Antiochus, the ambassadors were ordered to demand him to be delivered up to them. But Hannibal no sooner heard of their arrival than he suspected their business, and knowing that he was guilty of the practices which had been laid to his charge, resolved to withdraw before the ambassadors could make any inquiries. As he was Suffes, that is, the chief magistrate of the republic, he was obliged to appear continually in public; and this made his escape the more difficult. He therefore managed it with a great deal of address; he ordered his gold and silver to be carried to Thapsus, a city near a country-seat, which he had on the sea-shore at a small distance from Carthage. There he equipped two small vessels, manned them with good rowers, and concealed them in a little gulf within reach of his house. When the day came on which he designed to set out, he appeared before the senate and people as usual, and even had a conference with the Roman ambassadors. In the evening he went out on horseback, as it were to take a turn to Thapsus, from whence he was to return immediately, and therefore he ordered his attendants as Suffes to wait for him at the gate of the city. Being arrived at his country-house, he immediately imbarqued with a few chosen servants, and set sail for the island of Cercina; from Cercina he steered his course to Tyre, where he was received with all the respect due to so great a warrior, the Tyrians, who were originally the founders of Carthage, looking upon him as one of their own citizens. However, he did not stay long there, but pursued his journey to Antioch, hoping to find Antiochus there. But he being already gone for Ephesus, one of the king's sons kept him some days at Antioch, being desirous that this great man should be present at the festival celebrated near Daphne in honour of Apollo and Diana. As soon as the ceremony was over, Hannibal set sail for Ephesus, where he found Antiochus yet wavering between peace and war. But Hannibal's presence, and the reasons that great adversary of the Romans offered him, with the high opinion Antiochus had of his conduct and valour, soon determined the king's resolution for war. He did not doubt but, with the counsel and assistance of a man, who had so often defeated the Romans, and thereby justly gained the reputation of being the greatest general of the age, he should be able to accomplish all his designs. He now thought of nothing but victories and conquests; accordingly war being resolved on, all that year and the following were employed in making the necessary preparations: (F).

Embassadors sent by Antiochus, first to Flaminius and afterwards to Rome.

IN the mean time, Antiochus being informed at Ephesus that Flaminius, who was then at the head of the Roman troops in Greece, was making great preparations for a new war, and apprehending that he might fall upon his son Seleucus, who was busy in rebuilding Lyfimachia in Thrace, sent deputies to Flaminius to propose an alliance with Rome. By this embassy Antiochus designed only to gain time, and discover what the Romans were doing. Flaminius answered the envoys, that his power was expired since the departure of the ten commissioners, who had been sent to settle the affairs of Greece and Macedon; wherefore, if their master desired to treat with the republic, he might send an embassy to Rome, where the senate would examine his proposals<sup>d</sup>. When the ambassadors returned to Ephesus with this answer, Antiochus, not having yet made the necessary preparations for the war he designed, in order to gain more time, resolved to send a new embassy to Rome, and accordingly ordered Menippus, Hegesianax, and Lyfias to depart immediately, and desire of the Roman senate in his name the friendship and alliance of the republic. On their arrival at Rome they were not received with that civility and regard, which the dignity and reputation of their master deserved; the proposal they made was not at all relished by the major part of the senators; the senate pretended to compound with them, and set bounds to their master's pretensions;

<sup>c</sup> LIV. l. xxxiii. in fine. JUSTIN. l. xxxi. c. 1. & 2. ÆMIL. PROB. in Hannib. <sup>d</sup> LIV. l. xxxiv. c. 24.

(F) Cicero tells us (48), that, while Hannibal was at Ephesus, a peripatetic philosopher by name Phormio, having made an elegant, and, as he thought, wise speech in his school, concerning the duty and office of a commander, how he should draw up his men in battalia, advance against the enemy, retire, rally, &c. Hannibal, who was present, after having heard him some time with a great deal of patience, could not help crying out at last, I have heard in my days many an old fool, but never such a fool as Phormio. Whence Tully concludes, that the military art is not to be learnt from books in the closet, but by action in the field.

(48) Cic. de Oratore, l. ii.

may, before they gave their answer, they took indirect means to affront the ambassadors, they would not admit them into the senate, but referred them to the ten commissioners, who had been formerly sent into Macedonia, to conclude a peace with Philip and settle the affairs of Greece. Flaminius, who was then at Rome, was at the head of the commission, which did not a little displease the ambassadors; for they remembered how he had received the embassy sent him by their master, while he commanded the Roman forces in Greece. However, the ambassadors appeared before this new court, when Menippus expressed himself in the following manner: Why are all these delays made, and indirect methods taken to give us a plain answer? Our proposal is very plain, and contains no manner of difficulty; we desire the friendship and alliance of the Roman people. We do not come to treat with you as a conquered people with their conqueror, or as nations at war with one another, to settle their differences in an amicable manner. Antiochus and the Romans are neither upon the foot of enemies, or of conquerors. Why then do you pretend to give law to us? What right have you to dispose of the cities of Asia and Europe? What authority have you to direct us to withdraw our garisons from some places, and not to seize others? You may indeed treat Philip in this manner; but do the laws of nations give you a right to assume such an authority over Antiochus? Flaminius answered this discourse of Menippus with an imperious air, in the following terms: Since you insist upon a direct answer, I will give you one: Antiochus shall not be our friend and ally, but upon two conditions. The first is, that he keep within the bounds of Asia. The second, that if he comes into Europe, he shall not take it amiss, that the Romans protect the Greek cities in Asia, and enter into an alliance with them. At these words Hegesianax could not help crying out, What injustice! your design plainly is to dispossess Antiochus of the dominions of his ancestors. The Chersonesus and all Thrace belonged to his great-grandfather, whose right has descended intire to him. The possession which he has lately taken of his inheritance, was no more than rescuing it out of the hands of usurpers. Has Rome so good a right as this to the Greek cities in Europe and Asia? By what title do you pretend to justify your conquering them, or your depriving the king of Syria of them? He desires indeed your friendship, but in an honourable way; he is not fond of purchasing it at so dear a rate. To these solid reasons Flaminius could give no other answer, but that Rome was determined to pursue the resolution she had taken of procuring all the Greeks their liberty. Æolis and Ionia, said he, are inhabited inhabited by colonies from Greece ; and we have formed a design of setting all the Greeks at liberty. Those of Europe are already secured against the tyranny of Philip, and it is now our business to protect those of Asia against the power of Antiochus : what can be more humane or commendable ? This speech of Flaminius confounded, if Livy is to be credited, Hegesianax, who, by his silence, says he, shewed his confusion. But, with that great historian's leave, nothing can be weaker than the principle on which Flaminius argued ; for if Thrace, Æolis, and Ionia belonged to Antiochus by an antient conquest, could the pretence of restoring them to their liberty be a just reason for withdrawing them from their obedience to their lawful sovereign ? the design of setting a prince's subjects at liberty, is not surely a sufficient reason for others to make war upon him : it must therefore be owned, that the war, which Rome waged with Antiochus, was founded on ambition, and not on justice. The final answer of the ten commissioners was this : Take your choice, either let Antiochus forbear ever setting foot in Europe, or not be surprized if we send our troops over into Asia. The ambassadors declared, That their master would not enter into an alliance with Rome upon such dishonourable terms, but would prefer a war to the loss of his antient right to vast countries in Europe and Asia<sup>c</sup>. It is not improbable, that Antiochus made these first advances in asking the friendship of the Romans, purely to throw all the blame of a rupture upon them ; for in effect he was already determined upon a war, and making great preparations for the carrying it on both by sea and land.

Hannibal
endeavours to draw Carthage into a confederacy with An-tiochus.

Hannibal, who kept constantly with Antiochus, encouraging him to declare war with Rome, and inspiring him with the hatred he himself bore to that imperious republic, made an attempt to engage his own nation in the party he had lately embraced. He had still many friends at Carthage ; however, he did not think it safe to treat with them by letters, but pitched upon a foreign merchant, who was come to trade at Ephesus, where Hannibal was then residing with Antiochus. His name was Aristo, and he seemed to be mighty well qualified for any difficult negotiation. As he was by birth a Tyrian, he understood the Carthaginian language, the Tyrians and Carthaginians being, as it were, but one people. Besides, he was a man of great address, intrepidity and resolution, and Hannibal had more than once experienced his skill in business, having employed him in the execution of several important commissioners.

<sup>c</sup> Liv. ibid. c. 59

commissions; he therefore gave him proper instructions, told him the names of those he might confide in, and of such as he ought to suspect, and, without committing any thing to writing, taught him several signs, by which he might satisfy his friends that he acted in his name. Aristo, with these instructions, set out for Carthage, and arriving there was taken for a Carthaginian. He did not therefore make himself known to any but Hannibal's friends, soliciting them, in his name, to take up arms once more against their old enemy, and join many other nations that were ready to fall upon Rome, and in all likelihood to overpower her. He discovered to them the design Antiochus had formed of sending Hannibal to revive the war in Italy, &c. But tho' the Tyrian carried on his negotiation with all the secrecy and circumspection he could, yet his frequent visits to the leading men of Hannibal's faction betrayed him, and at length one of the opposite party declared in the public senate, that he had certain intelligence of dangerous intrigues, which were carrying on by one Aristo in favour of Antiochus, and that a storm was ready to break out, which would utterly destroy the Carthaginian republic. Hereupon the senators all with one voice cried out, that Aristo ought to be seized, and embassadors sent to Rome to deliver him up to the senate. Aristo was therefore cited to appear, which he did without betraying the least fear; nay, he defied them all to produce any proof of his being sent by Hannibal, or carrying on intrigues of any sort whatsoever; but as he could not give a good account of his business at Carthage, and had been observed to make frequent and private visits to those of Hannibal's faction, some were for seizing, and punishing him, as an emissary sent by Hannibal to draw their republic into new troubles; but others pleaded in his behalf, remonstrating, that, if they arrested him upon bare suspicions, no foreign merchants would, for the future, venture to come into their ports, by which means they should be deprived of the most valuable branch of their revenues; besides, as the subjects of their republic were continually trading to all the ports of the Mediterranean, other nations, especially the Tyrians, would not fail to make reprisals, which would put a stop to their trade, without which their republic could not subsist. These considerations suspended, for some days, the arrest of the Tyrian, who took this opportunity to make his escape, having kept, the whole time he was at Carthage, his ship in a readiness to set sail; but, before he went off, he made use of a stratagem, which seemed calculated to make the Romans suspect the whole senate. In the dusk of the evening he went privately into the hall where public audiences were were given, and, over the president's seat, affixed the following words in capitals: Aristo had no orders to treat with private persons, but with the senate of Carthage. His design in this was to prevent Hannibal's friends from being suspected, or brought into trouble, and to raise disturbances in the city. Accordingly the sight of this writing put the whole city in a ferment; some were for taking part with Antiochus in his wars with Rome, others for keeping to their late engagements with a republic, whose superiority they had already experienced, and whose vengeance they dreaded. The latter party prevailed, and an embassy was sent to Rome, to inform the senate of what had passed. As for Aristo, he set sail that very night, and got safe to Ephesus, where he was amply rewarded by Hannibal, though his negotiations had failed of the desired effect †.

Antiochus in the mean-time, without declaring his intentions, continued his preparations for the war he was resolved to make upon the Romans; and, in order to strengthen himself by new alliances, went to Raphia (G), and there married his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes king of Egypt, to whom she had been some years before betrothed. The princess's portion was Cæle-Syria, Phænice, Judæa and Samaria, but upon this condition, that the revenues of these four provinces should be equally divided between the father and son-in-law. Some writers tell us, that Antiochus had no other view at first in marrying his daughter to Ptolemy, but to have a fair opportunity, by her means, of dispatching him, and seizing the kingdom for himself; but that the virtuous queen preferred the regard she owed to her husband to the ambitious designs of her father. On his return from Raphia to Antioch, he married Antiochis his second daughter to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. The third was designed for Eumenes king of Pergamus, in order to draw off that brave prince from his ancient alliance with Rome. With this view he caused the match to be proposed to the king of Pergamus and his two brothers Attalus and Philetærus. His two brothers highly approved of it, thinking it a very honourable and an advantageous match; but the young king himself judged otherwise of it.

† LIV. l. xxxiv. JUSTIN. l. xxxi. c. 3. 4. APPIAN. in Syria p. 89, 90.

(G) Strabo and Livy place Raphia in Phænice; Ptolemy makes it a city of Samaria, and Pliny of Idumæa; but as it stood near Gaza, it is counted by other geographers among the cities of Palæstine.

thinking it adviseable to prefer the alliance of the Romans to that of Antiochus. He told his brothers, that, if he married the daughter of Antiochus, he could not help engaging with him in his wars against the Romans, who, if they should get the better of Antiochus, as he had reason to believe they might, would certainly drive him out of his kingdom. On the other hand, if Antiochus should conquer, no advantage would accrue from thence to him, it being manifest, that Antiochus aimed at the sovereignty of all Asia; and if he accomplished his designs, he might perhaps leave him, as being his son-in-law, on the throne, but would, at the same time, require such subjection and dependance from him, as would, sour all the pleasure of reigning. These reflections made Eumenes reject the offer made him by the king of Syria, and continue attached to the Romans. The event sufficiently proved the wisdom of his choice <sup>g</sup>.

Antiochus had no sooner solemnized these marriages, but he hastened back into Asia Minor, and arrived at Ephesus in the depth of the winter. From thence, in the beginning of the spring, he marched against the Pisidians, who still held out against him, and made himself master of all the country round Selga, a city on the banks of the river Cestrius (H). The Romans, hearing of the progress he made in Pisidia, and being informed by their friends in Asia, that most of the eastern princes were ready to declare for Antiochus, in order to avert the evil consequences of an alliance, into which all Asia seemed to have entered, and at the same time to have a certain knowledge of the state of affairs in those distant regions, thought it necessary to send ambassadors to the king of Syria, with orders to visit the coasts of Asia and Greece, and there see what states or republics seemed to waver between Antiochus and Rome. Three persons of distinction, who had been already employed in negotiations with the princes of the east, were pitched upon for this embassy, viz. P. Sulpicius, A new embassy sent by the Romans to

<sup>g</sup> LIV. l. xxxv. & xxxvii. APPIAN. in Syriac p. 88. HIERON. in Daniel. c. 11. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. POLYB. chas. legat. 25.

(H) The name of Selga is corrupted in most copies of Livy. Gelenius is of opinion, that Livy means the city of Selga, which stood on a mountain near the borders of Pamphylia; and for this reason some modern geographers place it among the cities of that province. Niger calls it Philadelphia. Glarean, instead of Sica and Sita, which we find in the text, reads Sida, which was a city of Pamphylia near Pisidia, at a small distance from the mouth of the river Eurymedon.

Hannibal
convinced that by the Roman envoys.

P. Villius, and P. Ælius, three of the ten commissioners who had settled affairs in Greece and Macedon. Livy, on the authority of some historians, tells us, that Scipio was in this embassy, and that, on this occasion, Hannibal gave him that celebrated answer, when, speaking of great commanders, he named Alexander in the first place, Pyrrhus in the second, and himself in the third. Some authors are of opinion that Scipio was not in this commission, and consequently look upon the conference between him and Hannibal as a mere fiction; but this point we shall examine in a more proper place. The ambassadors set out from Rome, and, pursuant to their directions, landed at Elæa (I) in the kingdom of Pergamus, where they found king Eumenes ready to take up arms against Antiochus. As this prince was still in Pisidia, and Hannibal waited for him at Ephesus, the Roman ambassadors went thither to visit Hannibal, being ordered by the senate to gain him over, if possible, or at least, by their civilities, to make Antiochus suspect him as keeping a secret intelligence with his enemies. The last of these designs had the desired effect, as we shall soon see, Villius, and, if Claudius Quadrigarius is to be credited, Scipio paying him frequent visits, and shewing a particular regard for him. In one of these visits they reproached him, in a friendly manner, with his flight from Carthage, assuring him, that Rome would have protected him against his domestic enemies; they advised him to return to his own country, where he should, under the protection of Rome, be reinstated in all his former honours; they told him, that Rome never spoke of him but with admiration, the terror which he had formerly struck into her, being changed into esteem, &c. Hannibal was greatly pleased with these fine speeches; but nevertheless could not be prevailed upon either to return to Carthage, or abandon the cause of Antiochus, which he had espoused. He often appeared in public with the Roman ambassadors, frequently conversed with them in private, and lastly, even suffered them to lodge with him in the same house, not being well apprized, as cautious as he was, of the bad consequences that might attend his conversing thus familiarly with the Roman envoys. In effect, Antiochus was informed of it in Pisidia, and, from that time, began to suspect him, fancying that he had reconciled himself to Rome; he was therefore no more employed in making the necessary preparations for the war, Antiochus not thinking it safe to depend upon him in matters of such importance.<sup>b</sup>

(I) Elæa bordered upon Great Mysia, about twenty miles from Pergamus, and stood on the Ægean sea, near the mouth of the Gaius, over against Metelinæ, and had a convenient harbour. It is at present a small village, known by the name of Alca. The ancient city of Elæa was divided from Lesbos by an arm of the sea, called the gulf of Elæa.

FROM Ephesus the embassadors advanced to Apamea in Phrygia, with a design to wait there for Antiochus, who being informed of their arrival, went thither to hear their proposals. As the Romans were too proud to abate any thing of their pretensions, they still insisted on Antiochus's confining himself to Asia; on his giving up some cities which he actually possessed, and his renouncing all his rights in Europe, particularly to Thrace and the Cheronesus; so that the conference between the king and the embassadors was warm, but not long, a melancholy piece of news which the king received having soon put an end to it. He received advice, that his son Antiochus, a prince of great merit, and one who had signalized himself by a conduct worthy of an hero, was dead in Syria, whither he had been sent to keep those provinces in their duty. What heightened the king's grief on this occasion was, a report spread abroad, that he, growing jealous of his rising merit, had caused him to be poisoned by the eunuchs of his court. Tho' this report had no good foundation, it was necessary for the king to destroy it, by the appearance of an extraordinary grief. The embassadors were therefore dismissed without concluding any thing, and Antiochus pursued his rout to Ephesus, where Hannibal, who was still in that city, soon found, that he was not the same favourite as formerly; for Antiochus, under pretence of solitude, shut himself up in his palace, and refused the Carthaginian admittance. The king spent his whole time there in private conferences with one Minio his sole confidant. Minio was a courtier, who had no knowledge of foreign affairs, and judged of his master's war with the Romans only by the victories he had gained in the east. He did not doubt in the least, but Antiochus, who had defeated Achæus, Molo, Alexander, and often the king of Egypt, would, in like manner, humble the haughty Romans; being therefore big with this expectation, he desired the king to send for the Roman embassadors, who were then at Pergamus, and undertook to answer them in his name. Antiochus, being tired with so many useless conferences, and his mourning serving him for a just pretence to treat with the Romans for the future only by his favourites, complied with his request, and the ambassadors were accordingly sent for. When they arrived, the proud Minio received them with more haughtiness than Antiochus himself would have done. What he chiefly urged in behalf of his master's pretensions was, That he had as good a right to the countries possessed by the eastern Greeks, whom he or his ancestors had conquered, as the Romans had to those of the western Greeks in Italy and Sicily. All the Greek colonies, said Minio, have, according to you, a right to the general liberty of Greece; but does not Rome herself act in a direct opposition to this pretty speculation? Are there not cities in Italy which are as much Grecian as those in Asia? Were not Rhegium, Naples, and Tarentum built by Greeks? and yet you exclude them from this general enfranchisement, and keep them in subjection to your republic. What! can you keep the eastern part of Italy, and Sicily, the finest island in the sea, in slavery, and, at the same time, make war upon Antiochus, because he keeps Ionia, Æolis, and Thrace under his jurisdiction? What is the difference between the slavery of Smyrna and Lampsacus on one side, and that of Tarentum and Syracuse on the other? The right Antiochus has to Ionia, Æolis, and Thrace was derived to him from his ancestors; whereas Rome owes her possessing of Great Greece in Italy, and all the whole island of Sicily, to conquest. He concluded his speech by desiring them not to use querks or impertinent words, but to give a direct answer to this question, Why does not Rome maintain the liberty of the western Greeks, since she is so zealous for that of the eastern? Sulpicius endeavoured to answer this demand, by saying, That Rome, ever since she conquered those cities, had held them without any interruption, they never having passed into any other hands from the time they were first subdued by the republic; whereas the Greek countries possessed or claimed by Antiochus, tho' formerly conquered by his ancestors, had undergone, since that time, many changes. Some, said he, have been subject to Philip or Ptolemy; others have recovered their liberty; can therefore any thing be more just and humane than to restore it to them? The reasoning of the Roman was, as every one sees, more specious than solid; so that all things considered, the war which the Romans made upon the king of Syria was unjust, and the effect only of their unbounded ambition. However, Minio, by his master's order, offered to give up his claim to some Greek cities in Asia, and to maintain the liberty of Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus; nay, he even consented, that these free states should enter into an alliance with Rome; but the ambassadors were not satisfied, and still insisted, that Ionia and Æolis should partake of the common liberty of Greece. This Antiochus opposed, and the ambassadors returned to Italy, leaving matters in the same situation they had found them on their first arrival<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Liv. l. xxxiv, xxxv. Justin. l. xxix c. 4. Front. Strateg. l. i. c. 8. Appian. in Syriac. p. 90, 91.

THEY were no sooner gone but Antiochus called a council of war, composed of all the chief officers of his army, as well foreigners as Syrians. Hannibal alone was excluded from it, his too familiar conferences with the Roman envoys having made Antiochus jealous of him. The question which the king put to the council was, Whether it was proper to make war with the Romans? The council knew the king's inclinations, and were therefore all zealous for a war, that being the surest way to make their court, and gain his confidence. Alexander of Acarnania, who had formerly served Antiochus Philip and was now in great favour with Antiochus, assured the king, that the Macedonians would join him as soon as he landed in Greece; and that, as the Ætolians and Nabis tyrant of Sparta had taken up arms, and were ready to declare for him, he could not fail of success; but at the same time he advised him to dismiss Hannibal, and send him back to his own country. His presence there, said he, will alone be sufficient to keep the Romans in awe, and increase their diffidence. The hopes, in all likelihood, of commanding the army himself, was what induced the Acarnanian to give this advice; but, however that be, Antiochus from that time resolved to declare war with the Romans.

IN the mean time Hannibal plainly seeing, by the king's behaviour to him, that he had taken umbrage at his conduct, thought it necessary to undeceive him; having therefore demanded, and, with much-ado, obtained a private audience, he told the king, that when he was scarce nine years old, he began to be an irreconcilable enemy to the Romans, his father Hamilcar having made him swear upon the altars, that he would never lay aside his hatred to Rome but with his life; that he had ever acted suitable to that oath, having made war with those republicans for thirty years together; that he had now left his native country for no other reason but to keep more strictly to these engagements; that this animosity brought him into Asia, and the eager desire he had of doing what mischief he could to that proud and imperious republic, had led him into his dominions. If you, said the Carthaginian,

<sup>k</sup> Idem ibid.

His opinion with relation to the war.

disdain my assistance, guided by the same hatred, I will fly to every part of the world where there are soldiers and arms, to raise up new enemies against Rome. I hate them, and am hated by them. So long as you are resolved to make war upon them, you may consider Hannibal as the first of your friends; but if there be any motives which incline you to peace, take counsel of others, not of me. I seek for nothing but war, and if I cannot find it here, I will be gone, and leave the place, I ought to hold near you, to courtiers, who seek my ruin only to aggrandize themselves. Antiochus, struck with these words, seemed to be reconciled to him. He then told the king, That he did not, by any means, approve of the advice which Alexander the Acaranian had given him. No, said he, it is not in Greece, but in Italy that you can make yourself formidable. The Romans are invincible every-where but on their own continent. You must employ the forces of the Italians against the masters of Italy. Indeed any other nation would find it difficult to transport troops into the east; but the Romans will tire you out even here by their constancy. Their troops will over-run these countries like a torrent in a few months. This I take the liberty to tell you now in private, and shall not be afraid to repeat the same things in public in the face of your court. Have I not some right to teach your generals how to make war with the Romans? They were never able to conquer me so long as I kept footing in Italy; but Carthage recalled me and I met with a conqueror in Africa, who could not hurt me in Italy. Take therefore my advice, carry your troops over into Italy, and stop the inundation which threatens you at the spring head<sup>1</sup>. This discourse would have made a lasting impression in the mind of Antiochus, had not the many flatterers about him, who were jealous of Hannibal, effaced it; and lucky it was for Rome that Hannibal's scheme was thus opposed; for the Brutii, Salestini, Lucani, Samnites, and the greatest part of the east of Italy were ready to follow his standards, while the Gauls in the west would have obliged the Romans to divide their forces; so that Rome would have relapsed into the same danger from which Scipio had delivered her.

THE Romans, not knowing yet for certain whether Antiochus would accept or not the conditions offered him, made no preparations for war till the return of their ambassadors; but then they began to take proper measures to prevent the evils that threatened them, both in Greece where the Ætolians

<sup>1</sup> Liv. ibid.

were ready to revolt, and in Asia, where Antiochus was making vast preparations. Nothing now kept this prince in Asia, but an expedition which he had undertaken against the cities of Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Alexandria in Troas, which Antiochus thought dangerous to leave behind him un-reduced. The Ætolians being, from confederates of the Romans, now become their enemies, had sent ambassadors to him, inviting him over into Greece. Thoas, the brother of Dicæarchus, then prætor of Ætolia, who was at the head of this embassy, assured Antiochus, that the Ætolians would join him, as soon as he landed in Greece, with all their forces, and act in concert with him; that Philip king of Macedon, Nabis king of Lacedæmon, and several other Greek powers, who hated the Romans in their hearts, would declare against them. He observed in his speech to the king, that the Romans, by drawing their forces out of Greece, had left it in a defenceless condition; that this was the best opportunity he could wish for to possess himself of that country; that the Greeks would all receive him with open arms the instant he came among them, &c. This soothing description of the state of Greece, prevailed so far with Antiochus, that he resolved to drop the design of reducing the three above-mentioned cities, and hasten into Europe, without even waiting for the forces that were in full march from Syria to join him. According-having first gone to Ilium, and there offered a sacrifice to Minerva, he embarked for Greece with no more than ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six elephants, which were scarce enough to take possession of the country, had it been wholly unguarded. With these forces he arrived in the island of Eubæa, about the end of the summer, and from thence passed to Demetrias in Thessaly, where he summoned all the chief officers of his army, to consult with them about the future operations of the war. On this occasion Hannibal, who was admitted to the council, and asked his opinion in the first place, insisted on what he had often declared, viz. That the Romans were not to be conquered but in Italy, and therefore it had been his constant advice to begin the war there; however, since other measures had been taken, and the king was then in Greece it was his opinion, in the present state of affairs, that the king should send immediately for all his forces out of Asia, without depending upon the Ætolians, or other Greek allies, who, he foresaw, would deceive him; and that the instant these forces arrived, he should march with them to those coasts of Greece which lie over-against Italy, and there likewise keep his fleet, one half of which should be employed to ravage and alarm the coasts

Antiochus crosses over into Greece.

Year of the Flood, 2807.

Before Christ, 192.

coasts of Italy, and the other kept in some harbour near him, to make a shew of passing over, and to be, in effect, ready to cross over, in case a favourable opportunity should offer. By this means, said he, the Romans will be kept at home to guard their own coasts; and this, at the same time, will be the best method of carrying the war into Italy, the only place where they can be conquered. This advice was undoubtedly the best that could then be given to Antiochus; but he complied with it only in that particular which related to the troops of Asia, sending immediately orders to Polyxenidas his admiral to transport them into Greece. With regard to all the rest of Hannibal's plan, the flatterers about the court diverted the king from putting it in execution, assuring him, that he could not fail of success; that, should he follow Hannibal's plan, all the glory would be ascribed to the Carthaginian who had formed it; that it was proper the king should have all the honour of this expedition, and therefore they advised him to follow his own counsels, without hearkening any more to Hannibal. After this the king went to Lamia, and there being invested with the chief command of the Ætolians, and declared their generalissimo, he returned to Eubæa, where he made himself master of Chalcis, and took up his winter-quarters in that city<sup>m</sup>. There he fell in love with the daughter of a Chalcidian called Cleoptolemus, in whose house he lodged; and, notwithstanding the disproportion of her age, she being under twenty, and he upwards of fifty, married her, and passed the remainder of the winter in nuptial rejoicings and revellings, with as much security as in the most peaceable times. The example of the king infected the whole army, both officers and soldiers abandoning themselves to idleness and debauchery. He was not roused out of this lethargy, till news was brought him, that Adius the Roman consul was advancing full march against him at the head of twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. All he could do on this alarm, was to seize the famous straits of Thermopylæ, and send to the Ætolians for more forces; for the inclemency of the weather, and contrary winds having prevented the arrival of the Asiatic troops, which Polyxenidas was bringing over, the king had only those forces with him which he had brought the year before: but before the Ætolians could come to his assistance, the Romans having forced, with incredible bravery, the passes of Thermopylæ, cut the king's army in pieces, Antiochus himself defeated at Thermopylæ.

Antiochus
Year of
the Flood,
2808.
Before
Christ,
191.

<sup>m</sup> LIV. l. xxxvi. JUSTIN. l. xxxi c. 5, & 6. APPIAN in Syriac. p. 93, 94.

having

having narrowly escaped with only five hundred men to Chalcis<sup>a</sup>. But of this battle, and the surrender of the cities and strong holds that followed it, we have already given a particular and distinct account in our history of Greece<sup>o</sup>. Antiochus did not stay long at Chalcis, but from thence made all the haste he could to his fleet, and, going on board with the poor remains of his shattered army, passed over to Ephesus, carrying with him his young wife, and, thinking himself safe there from the Romans, he entirely neglected every thing that could secure him against so formidable an enemy. His flatterers had made him believe, that they would never venture over into Asia; but Hannibal, who had regained his confidence, roused him out of the idle and indolent life, into which he was relapsed, telling him, that as the Roman fleet was no less formidable than their land-forces, he was surprized that they had not yet crossed over into Asia; that they would, without all doubt, soon appear on the coasts, and oblige him to fight both by sea and land for the dominion of Asia; and that he must resolve either to renounce his pretensions to so wealthy a country, or to defend it sword in hand. The king was struck with this speech, and therefore sent to hasten the march of his troops from the eastern provinces, which were not yet arrived. He likewise caused his fleet to be equipped with all possible expedition, and, going on board of it himself, set sail for the Thracian Chersonesus, where he fortified Lyfimachia, as also Sestos and Abydos, and the other cities in that neighbourhood, to prevent the Romans from crossing the Hellepont into Asia. In the mean-time Polyxenidas, who was then at Ephesus, having received advice, that the Roman fleet had appeared off Delos, dispatched a messenger to acquaint Antiochus therewith. Upon this intelligence the king hastened back to Ephesus, and having there summoned a council of war, it was unanimously resolved, that Polyxenidas, the Syrian admiral, should sail out in search of the Roman fleet, and venture an engagement. Accordingly the fleet, to the number of an hundred, or, as others will have it, two hundred sail, weighed anchor, steering their course towards Phocæa in Æolis. The Roman fleet, commanded by C. Livius, and consisting of fourscore ships, upon intelligence that the Syrians were in search of them, left the road of Delos, and, having doubled the cape of Corycus in Ionia, met the enemy's fleet near Cyffus. Both fleets advanced in line of battle, and engaged with the utmost fury; victory was long doubtful, Livius having the advantage in the right wing, and Polyxenidas in the left. At length Eumenes king of Pergamus, who had been placed in the rear with fifteen ships, falling upon Polyxenidas, put the enemy's right wing in disorder, and thereby determined the fate of the day. The Syrians on all sides betook themselves to flight, and Livius, pursuing them, took thirty of their ships, after having sunk ten in the engagement. The Romans lost but one ship, which was taken in the very beginning of the fight; but the whole crew leaped over-board, and escaped slavery by swimming to the other Roman vessels. Polyxenidas put in no-where till he got to Ephesus, whither Livius pursued him; but, finding that he would not venture out, he sent Eumenes and the Rhodians home, and retired himself to Canæ, a port in Mysia, where he drew his ships ashore for the ensuing winter, after having fortified the place with a ditch and rampart<sup>p</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Liv. ibid. PLUT. in Catone. APPIAN. ibid. FRONT. l. ii. stratag.

<sup>o</sup> See Vol. VI. p. 583. & seq.

The fleet of Antiochus defeated by that of the Romans.

IN the mean time Antiochus was at Magnesia assembling there his land-forces. When news was brought him, that his fleet had been defeated at Corycus, he hastened to the sea-coast, and applied himself with great care to the fitting out of a new fleet, being unwilling to part with the mastery of those seas. He refitted the ships which had escaped the late defeat, built new ones, and dispatched Hannibal into Syria to bring from thence the Syrian and Phœnician fleets for their reinforcement. He likewise ordered his son Seleucus with one part of the army into Æolis, to watch the Roman fleet, and keep that country in awe; the rest of the troops he kept some time with himself, and then put them into winter-quarters in the neighbouring towns of Phrygia<sup>q</sup>.

THE next year the Romans appointed L. Cornelius Scipio consul to command the land-forces in room of Acilius, and L. Æmilius Rhegillus to carry on the war by sea in the place of C. Livius. The great Scipio Africanus served under Cornelius his brother in quality of his lieutenant, to the unspeakable joy of the Romans, who were highly delighted with the expectation of seeing Scipio and Hannibal once more enter the lists. They were now both subalterns, one under a consul, the other under a king; and this new scene drew the attention of all nations.

THE two brothers imbarqued at Brundisium with thirteen thousand men, including auxiliaries and volunteers, and landed at Apollonia. From thence they marched through Epirus and Thessaly to Amphissa, where Acilius, who was besieging that place, resigned the command of his two legions to the consul. The two Scipios, who were in haste to pass over into Asia, which was the chief object of their ambition, granted the Ætolians a six months truce, that they might have full time to send a new embassy to Rome, and pursued their march through Macedon and Thrace to the Hellepont. Philip had prepared every thing that could render their passage through his dominions agreeable to them. He came in person to meet them on his frontiers, and seemed to make it his duty, as well as pleasure, to attend them, discovering in the entertainments, which he gave the chief officers of the army, such a politeness as was very pleasing to Scipio Africanus. In return for the extraordinary kindness he had shewn them, the two brothers remitted him, in the name of the republic, the sums which yet remained to be annually paid by him, according to the agreement between him and Flaminius. In the mean time Livius, the Roman admiral, being joined by the Rhodian fleet and that of Eumenes, sailed with the latter from Canæ in Mysia, where he had wintered, to secure the straits of the Hellepont. With this view he made himself master of Sestos on the side of Europe, and invested Abydos on the opposite shore ; for these two cities stood opposite to one another in that part of the strait where the passage into Asia was the safest. While Livius was thus employed on the Hellepont, Polyxenidas, having repaired the Syrian fleet, and being in a condition to put to sea again, destroyed by a piece of treachery the greatest part of the Rhodian fleet, with Pausistratus, who commanded it, as we have related at length in the history of Rhodes *. This disaster obliged Livius to raise the siege of Abydos, and hasten to the defence of the ships he had left in the harbour of Canæ in Mysia. Besides, Seleucus was making some progress on the coast of Asia, and had already taken Phocæa, Cyme, and some other maritime places. It was therefore necessary to put a stop to the progress of the young prince, and retake Phocæa. But Livius finding, upon his arrival, the garison of Phocæa very numerous, he only made a descent, and ravaged the neighbouring territory. From thence he sailed to Samos, being attended thither by the fleet of the king of Pergamus. As for the Rhodians, the defeat of their fleet, and the loss of their admiral, sunk them almost into despair. However, they did not renounce their alliance with Rome, but fitting out twenty new gallies, they gave the command of them to Eudamus, who immediately joined the Roman fleet at Samos.

<sup>p</sup> LIV. l. xxxvi. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 99. xxxvi, & xxxvii. APPIAN. ibid. & p. 100.

<sup>q</sup> LIV. l.

* See Vol VII. p. 345, & seq.

Livius with this reinforcement left Samos, and, sailing to Ephesus, insulted the Syrian fleet in that harbour. Some of the Romans landed, and laid waste the neighbouring country; but the garison of Ephesus, marching out against them, obliged them to quit their booty, and retire with precipitation on board their ships. The next day Livius challenged the Syrians to an engagement ashore, but they declining it, he returned to Samos, and there resigned the command of the fleet to Æmilius his successor (K), who immediately detached him with some ships to attempt the reduction of Patara in Lycia, a place which was a great check upon the Rhodians, while in the enemy's hands. But Livius failed in his attempt, and soon after returned to Rome. As for Æmilius, he first appeared before Ephesus with the rest of the Roman

(K) Livy tells us (49), that Æmilius no sooner took upon him the command of the fleet, but he summoned a council of war, to advise with the chief officers about the first enterprize he should undertake. On this occasion Livius, whose command was just expired, being asked his opinion the first, gave it, says our historian, like an artful man, who was jealous before-hand of the success Æmilius might have. His pretence was very specious, but his real design was, to make Æmilius lose the whole campaign by engaging him in a trifling project; and it was therefore rejected. Had I continued in the command, said Livius, my design was to shut up the mouth of the port of Ephesus, and there keep the Syrian fleet confined. To this end I would have sunk some old barks filled with stones at the entrance into the harbour. Being by this means become sole master of the seas, I would have ravaged the coasts, and forced the maritime cities to surrender. Eumenes, who saw into Livius's design, replied thus: After we have stopped up the mouth of the port, shall the Roman fleet continue before it, or not? If it continues there, the enemy's fleet will be in better condition than ours. They will be covered and sheltered by a great city, which will be supplied by land from all parts of Asia. Whereas we shall be exposed to winds and tempests, and lose time in a road without gaining any advantage but that of continuing inactive, and giving the enemy leisure to make the necessary preparations against the ensuing campaign. If we do not continue before Ephesus, the Syrian fleet will, without all doubt, clear the mouth of the port, and sail out; so that we shall have lost our time, labour, and expence to no purpose. Eudamus, the Rhodian admiral, disapproved the project of Livius, without proposing any other. But Epicrates, an inferior officer in the Rhodian fleet, was for sending part of the fleet against Patara, and reducing that city. This proposal was approved of, and Livius ordered to put it in execution.

fleet, but was forced by a storm to put out to sea. Then calling to mind the affront the Romans had received before Patara, he flew thither with a design to besiege the place; but the officers remonstrating against the enterprize as dangerous to the allies, who, in the absence of the Roman fleet, would be left to the mercy of the enemy, he returned to Samos, where he was near enough to watch the motions of the Syrians<sup>c</sup>.

WHILE these things were doing, Antiochus on one side, Antiochus and his son Seleucus on the other, thinking that the Roman invades the fleet was engaged in the siege of Patara, invaded the king- kingdom of Pergamus. Seleucus passing the Caicus from Æolis, Pergamus, where he had wintered, entered the dominions of Eumenes by the way of Elæa, while Antiochus advancing to Sardis, and from thence to the banks of the Caicus, incamped at a small distance from his son. The king had in his army about four thousand Gauls, whom he employed in plundering and laying waste the country, while Seleucus at the head of his body appeared before Pergamus, the capital of the kingdom, threatening to besiege it. But Eumenes, upon the first notice of the danger from his brother Attalus, whom he had left to take care of his dominions during his absence, sailed back to the port of Elæa, landed there, and reached his capital before the enemy had notice of his march. The Roman and Rhodian fleets followed him without delay; all the troops they had on board made a descent without opposition, and at the same time news came from all parts, that the Scipios were advancing by great marches thro' Macedon, would soon reach the Hellepont, and be ready to enter Asia. Upon this Antiochus, being struck with as much terror as he had given Eumenes, retired to an eminence near Elæa, and having intrenched himself there, sent an embassy to Æmilius, desiring to enter into a treaty with him. Æmilius, thinking it would greatly redound to his glory to conclude a peace before the Scipios arrived, readily hearkened to the proposal, and desired Eumenes and the Rhodians to come to his camp, and assist at a council on the subject of Antiochus's proposal. The Rhodians were not disinclined to a peace; but Eumenes opposed it, and by his arguments prevailed upon the council to return this answer to the messengers of Antiochus, that they could not determine any thing before the arrival of the Scipios. Hereupon Antiochus, leaving his son to ravage the kingdom of Pergamus, marched into the country of Lycia, which adhered to the Romans, and encamped near Adramyttium at the foot of mount Ida. Æmilius therefore accompanied by Eumenes hastened to the assistance of those faithful allies. But Attalus continued at Pergamus to make head against Seleucus, and was there reinforced by a thousand foot and an hundred horse sent him from Achæa, under the command of one Diophanes, an officer of great courage and skill in military affairs; for with this small body he sallied out of the city, gained a considerable advantage over Seleucus, and obliged him to raise the siege of Pergamus, and quit the dominions of Eumenes <sup>c</sup> (L).

<sup>c</sup> Liv. l. xxxvii.

Antiochus

<sup>c</sup> Liv. ubi supra.

(L) The defence of Pergamus was chiefly owing to a reinforcement of the Achæans, who came thither very seasonably, to the assistance of the young prince. Their commander, by name Diophanes, was an officer of distinction in his own country, had made his first campaigns under the famous Philopæmen, and seemed to have imbibed all the excellencies of his great master. With his body of a thousand foot and a hundred horse, he harassed Seleucus to such a degree, that he at length forced him to abandon the country which he infested. Diophanes spent the two first days after his arrival in observing the Syrian intrenchments, and the steps they took to make themselves masters of the city, which they kept invested. He observed from the ramparts, that they posted an advanced guard at the foot of an hill to keep the city in awe, and then dispersing themselves in the plains, pillaged the country. As no-body durst venture out against the advanced guard, the Syrians pillaged the country without opposition. This inaction of the besieged lulled the besiegers into a security; insomuch that they spent great part of their time in diversions, and were often observed to fall asleep even upon guard. Diophanes therefore concluded that it would be no difficult matter to surprize them. He acquainted Attalus with his resolution of attacking the advanced guard. That prince looking upon such an expedition as a rash attempt, was with much ado prevailed upon to consent to it. However, submitting his judgment to that of an old experienced officer, he at length gave him leave to march out at the head of his Achæans. All the citizens crowded to the ramparts to be spectators of the action, and there saw that the approach of so small a body did not even draw the Syrians off from their sports. At first Diophanes stood still, as if he had marched out only to watch the enemy's motions. But when he observed that the enemy took no notice of him, he marched at the head of his hundred horse directly up to a body of three hundred of the enemy, ordering his thousand foot to attack 4000 Syrians, who were posted near their three hundred horse.

Antiochus had no better success in Troas; for Æmilius, supported by the confederate fleets, forced him to abandon Adramyttium; so that after he had taken by assault several defenceless cities in his way, he returned to Sardis. Here upon the confederate fleets sailed back to Samos, where they separated; Æmilius continued there to watch the motions of Polyxenidas, Eumenes sailed towards the Hellespont, to get every thing ready for the passage of the Roman troops into Asia, and Eudamus returned to Rhodes, there to receive fresh reinforcements. The latter, receiving intelligence that a fleet was coming from Syria under the command of Hannibal, hastened the equipment of his ships, sailed out to meet the Carthaginian, who was now indeed out of his proper element, and with fewer ships intirely defeated him off Sida, a maritime city of Pamphylia, as we have related elsewhere*.

The Rhodians defeated the Phœnician fleet commanded by Hannibal.

UPON the news of this defeat, Antiochus, who was then at Sardis, being sensible of the imminent danger he was in, used all possible means to engage in the same war all the powers of Asia. He began with Prusias king of Bithynia, a potent prince, and then in a condition to bring into the field and maintain a numerous army. In order to draw him into his measures, Antiochus used the strongest argument horse. The onset was so sudden, and the shout of the Achæans so formidable, that the enemy's horse was immediately put in disorder. Their infantry, having scarce had time to draw up, after a faint resistance betook themselves to flight, and were pursued with great slaughter by Diophanes. The next day the enemy posted themselves at a greater distance, and observed better discipline. However, Diophanes invited the citizens of Pergamus to march out with him, promising them a second advantage. But the garison refusing to follow him, he took with him his Achæans alone, who were glad to venture a second action under his conduct. All the day was spent in watching one another, without any attack on either side. At sun-set the Syrians withdrew to their camp; and this was the opportunity which Diophanes waited for. As the Syrian troops filed off in a line, the Achæans fell on their rear, and there made a most dreadful havock, the foremost hastening their pace to reach the camp without daring to face about and relieve their companions. These repeated advantages gained by Diophanes and his brave Achæans obliged Seleucus at last to raise the siege of Pergamus, and quit the dominions of Eumenes (50).

Antiochus endeavours to gain over Prusias king of Bithynia.

* Hist. Univers. Vol. VII. p. 348.

(50) Appian. in Syriac. & Liv. l. xxxvii c. 20.

1301

that can be made use of with sovereign princes. He represented to him the ambitious views of the Romans, telling him that their main aim was to overturn monarchy in all places, and, under the specious pretence of liberty, to solicit all nations to shake off the yoke of their kings ; that after having subdued Philip and Nabis, they were now coming against him ; and that if he should be unfortunately overcome, the haughty conquerors would soon penetrate into the heart of Bithynia. The two Scipios, who were then on their march into Asia, being informed of the endeavours Antiochus was using to engage Prusias in the war, thought proper to put a stop to the intrigues of the king of Syria ; and with that view dispatched a messenger with a letter to Prusias, wherein they observed, that it was the constant practice of the Romans to bestow the greatest honours on such kings as sought their alliance ; Africanus mentioned several instances, which he himself had been concerned in ; he said, that in Spain several princes, who before they were favoured with the protection of the Romans, had made a very inconsiderable figure, were since become mighty kings ; that Masiniſſa had not only been restored to his kingdom, but that of Syphax had been given him, whereby he was become one of the most powerful potentates of the universe ; that Philip and Nabis, though vanquished, had nevertheless been suffered to sit peaceably on their thrones ; that the tribute, which he had agreed to pay, had been lately remitted, and his son, who was an hostage at Rome, sent back to him ; that as for Nabis, they had left him in possession of his crown, which he would have still enjoyed, had he not lost his life by the treachery of the Ætolians. This letter made a strong impression on the mind of Prusias ; but he was still wavering between Antiochus and the Romans, till a new embassy quite fixed him. C. Livius, who had the last year commanded the fleet on the coasts of Asia, came from Rome to Bithynia, and made such proposals to the king in the name of his republic, as prevented him from entering into any engagements with the king of Syria <sup>u</sup>.

Antiochus being thus disappointed in the hopes he had entertained of winning over Prusias to his interest, his whole dependence was on his fleet. He thought he could more effectually keep the Romans out of Asia by recovering the mastery of the sea, than by guarding the shores of the Hellepont with his land-forces. With this view he left Sardis and came to Ephesus, where Polyxenidas was waiting for him with a good number of ships, all well equipped, and stored with arms and provisions. Hannibal had not yet joined him with the Phœnician fleet, being still blocked up in the ports of Pamphylia. But, on the other hand, the Romans had not yet been reinforced by the gallies they expected from Rhodes, and the fleet of Eumenes was waiting for the Scipios on the coasts of the Hellepont. Antiochus therefore ordered Polyxenidas to engage the Romans once more at sea. As for himself, he marched with his land-forces to Notium between Smyrna and Ephesus, and from thence to Colophon, which he invested. This was one of the most considerable cities of Ionia, and had been long troublesome to Antiochus's fleet; for as it was situated on an eminence, the Colophonians discovered all that passed in the port of Ephesus, and gave the Romans notice of it. Antiochus expected that the Roman fleet would fly to the assistance of their allies, and his aim was to draw it out of the port of Samos, that his admiral might have an opportunity of attacking it. And indeed the Colophonians immediately dispatched some of their citizens to Æmilius, desiring his assistance against an enemy, which they had drawn upon themselves only by their fidelity to Rome. This message broke the admiral's measures, for he had determined to sail to the Hellepont with the first favourable wind, and assist the Scipios in their passage. However, he was prevailed upon by Eudamus, the Rhodian admiral, who had joined him with some gallies, to alter his scheme; and accordingly he ordered the fleet to be in a readiness to set sail. But before he attacked Antiochus, he resolved to touch at Chios, and take in there some provisions, the general magazine of the Romans both for their sea and land-forces being there. From Chios he sailed to the island of Teos, being informed that those islanders had promised the king of Syria about five thousand hogsheads of their best wine. He was resolved either to force them to deliver up the wine to him, or take and demolish their city, the vessels which were bringing wine to the Roman fleet being kept back by contrary winds. In the mean time Polyxenidas, being informed that the Roman fleet was at Teos, left Ephesus, and sailed to that island in hopes of being able to shut up the enemy's fleet in the harbour. For the city of Teos had two ports, whereof the safest and most capacious was formed by two promontories, which came so near each other, that two gallies could scarce sail out of it a-breast; and in this Æmilius first anchored,

<sup>u</sup> POLYB. Legat. 22. LIV. l. xxxvii. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 150. 151.

The Syrian fleet defeated by the Roman.

but before the arrival of Polyxenidas he had by the advice of Eudamus changed his post. Wherefore the Syrian admiral instead of blocking up the harbour was obliged to keep his fleet sheltered under the island of Macris over-against Myonnesias, till the Roman fleet sailed out. There he continued two days in hopes of surprizing the Romans as they sailed by from Teos to Colophon. But in the mean time Æmilius, being informed that the Syrian fleet waited for him at Macris, left Teos, and steered his course towards that island with his ships drawn up in line of battle. As Polyxenidas had positive orders to engage the Romans, he laid hold of this opportunity, and attacked them with great resolution. The Roman fleet consisted of eighty ships, and the Syrian of eighty-nine, some of which were of an enormous size, two of them being heptaremes, and three hexaremes. The Rhodians had then invented a kind of fire-ships, which struck great terror into the Syrian fleet; cauldrons full of combustible and burning materials were hung out at their prows, so that none of the enemy's ships durst approach them. These fell on the enemy's gallies, struck their beaks into them, and at the same time set them on fire. The Syrian gallies left their ranks, and crowded round them, not with an intent to board them, but to discharge their arrows, darts, and javelins against their crews; in the mean time the Roman ships, sailing into the spaces which the Syrians had left, put their whole fleet in confusion, Polyxenidas did all that lay in his power to encourage his men, but in spite of all his efforts the left wing being in great disorder, clapped on all the sails they could, and quitted the fight. Then Polyxenidas endeavoured to retire in good order, but the Rhodian fire-ships advancing against him, and setting some of his gallies on fire, the rest betook themselves to a precipitous flight. The historians, who most lessen the advantage gained by Æmilius on this occasion, agree, that he sunk thirty-nine of the enemy's ships, and took thirteen; but others say, that the Syrians lost forty-two ships and thirteen gallies, whereas the Romans lost but two ships, which were sunk in the very beginning of the engagement<sup>w</sup>.

Antiochus was so struck with the news of this defeat, that, as if he had been quite deprived of his senses, he took such measures as were quite opposite to his interest. For in this consternation he sent orders for drawing his forces out of Lyfimachia and the other cities of the Hellepont, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands, tho' Lyfimachia alone might have stopped the whole consular army for a great

<sup>w</sup> LIV. & APPIAN. ibid.

while. Then he complained of his hard fate in these words: I know not what god has infatuated me ! every thing happens contrary to my expectations. Heaven persecutes me, and what can I infer from all this, but that my ruin approaches ? Being greatly dejected by these reflections, he raised the siege of Colophon, and retired first to Sardis, and then to his son-in-law Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, where he made it his whole business to assemble all the land-forces he could with a design to make head against the Scipios, who were already arrived at the Chersonesus near the Hellepont. Here Scipio Africanus received advice of his son's being taken prisoner by the Syrians, an accident which gave him great uneasiness. He had brought him with him into Greece to form him from his tender years to the military profession, and had sent him in a Chalcidian ship to Demetrias, being unwilling to expose him to any hazards in Asia. But in his passage, the ship, which carried him, being attacked and taken by a Syrian galley, the young Roman was brought to Antiochus, who treated him with all the marks of honour that were due to his birth, and the reputation of his father. But after all the detention of a son, so tenderly beloved, sensibly affected the father. This accident, however, did not abate the ardor of Scipio, and the desire he had of fighting Antiochus. The Roman troops pursued their march, not doubting but they should meet with a vigorous resistance at Lyfimachia. They approached the city in battle-array, but were never more surprized than when they found that the sea was unguarded, and that Lyfimachia opened her gates to them. Antiochus had drawn the garison out of that important place, as we have related above, and the Syrians had evacuated it with such precipitation, as to leave all the provisions behind them ; so that the Roman army, which was fatigued with a long march, found there all sorts of refreshments, and waited in that neighbourhood for the coming up of their stragglers and sick. During their stay they received another piece of news no less surprizing than the abandoning of Lyfimachia. On the opposite shore stood the city of Abydos, the key of Asia, which was to be taken before they could enter the Syrian dominions. This city likewise Antiochus had deserted, and ordered the garison to evacuate the place and join him ; so that the inhabitants sent to acquaint the Roman generals, that they were ready to receive them as soon as they arrived. Hence the Scipios concluded, that Antiochus without Hannibal was no formidable enemy ; for the resolution of evacuating these cities, and waiting for the Romans in the heart of Asia, had been taken in his absence. As the Romans found no enemies at the Hellepont to dispute

The Romans enter Asia.
Year of
the Flood, 2809.
Before
Christ,
190.

their passage, they crossed over in good order by the care of Eumenes and the Rhodians, who had waited for them there* (M). The Romans being now in Asia, went up to Troy, and stopt some time there, looking upon that city as their primitive country, and the place they originally sprung from. The consul offered up sacrifices to Minerva, who presided over the citadel. Both parties were overjoyed much after the same manner as parents and children when they meet after a long separation. The inhabitants seeing those who were descended from the same ancestors with themselves conquerors of the west, and of Africa, laying claim to Asia, imagined they saw Troy rise from its ashes in greater splendor than ever. On the other side, the Romans were highly pleased to see themselves in the antient abode of their forefathers, who had given birth to Rome; and to view and contemplate the temples and deities which they had in common with that city† (N).

Antiochus sends an embassy to WHEN advice was brought to Antiochus that the Romans had crossed the Hellepont, and were encamped at Abydos, he was seized with fresh terror; and being fully convinced that some deity was contriving his ruin, he turned all his thoughts on peace. He seldom employed any but foreigners in the most important negotiations, and the person he now pitched cs.

* Livii ibid & APPIAN. p. 105      † JUSTIN. l xxxi c. 8. & Liv. ubi supra.

(M) We are told by Livy, that Scipio Africanus did not cross the Hellepont with his brother, but remained some days on the European shore, being detained there by religious duties! He was one of the Salii, that is, one of the priests of Mars, who every year after a solemn sacrifice carried through the city of Rome those sacred shields, which Numa was supposed to have received from heaven. During this solemnity the Salii, though generals of armies, did not undertake any enterprize, or even stir from the place they were in. This was a troublesome superstition, but Scipio complied with it, and continued some days in Europe, while his brother and the Roman troops were in Asia (51). We shall have occasion to speak of this and other Roman festivals in the history of Rome.

(N) Demetrius Scopsius, as quoted by Strabo (52), tells us, that he, being then very young, happened to come to Ilium or Troy to visit the curiosities of the place, while Scipio was there; and adds, that the inhabitants were at that time so wretchedly poor, that they had not even tiles wherewithal to cover their houses, which were filled with filth and nastiness.

upon was one Heraclides, by birth a Byzantine, and of Thracian extraction. His instructions were to address himself in the first place to Scipio Africanus, to make his court to him with great assiduity, and when he found him disposed to hearken to his proposals, to assure him, but in private, that Antiochus was ready to restore him his son, whom he so tenderly loved, without ransom; that all the king of Syria's treasures were at his service, and that he was willing to share his dominions with him, and whatever else he had. The proposals which he was to make to the Roman council were, that Antiochus was ready to deliver up to them the cities of Lampascus, Smyrna, and Alexandria, and was not averse from evacuating such places in Ionia and Æolis as the Romans had demanded; and, lastly, that he would consent to pay half the expence which Rome had been at in bringing the war into Asia. With these instructions Heraclides set out for the Roman camp on the banks of the Hellepont; but was surprized not to find the eldest Scipio there, he having staid on the European shore to perform some religious ceremonies. Heraclides therefore prolonged his stay at Abydos under various pretences, till the arrival of Publius, and then he demanded audience, and being admitted into the council of war, spoke agreeable to his instructions<sup>2</sup>.

THE ambassador thought his proposals so advantageous, His proposals re- that they could not be rejected; but the Romans judged posals re- otherwise, and gave him this final answer; that a peace jected. would not be granted to Antiochus upon any but the following conditions: 1. That since he had drawn the war upon himself, he would defray the whole expence of it: 2. That he should restore liberty in general to all the Greek cities in Asia: 3. That to prevent all future hostilities he should relinquish all Asia on this side mount Taurus.

Heraclides finding that the council would not comply with any of his demands, endeavoured, pursuant to his private instructions, to win over Scipio Africanus singly. He was very assiduous at his tent, and being always well received by him in regard of the kindness his master had shewn to his son, he at last disclosed his instructions to him, telling him that Antiochus was not only ready to restore him his son without ransom, but to share all his treasures with him, and even place him on the same throne. To these overtures Scipio returned the following answer; If the king of Syria restores me my son, it will be a personal obligation, which, as a father, I shall ever acknowledge with the deepest sense of gratitude; but he is not to expect any gratification from me as a servant of the public. As a good citizen I can neither receive any thing from an enemy, nor promise any thing to him. But let me give him a piece of advice, since that is all I can do in the condition to which he has reduced himself. He ought to have kept possession of Lyfimachia, which would have stopt us, or appeared on the banks of the Hellefpont, to dispute our passage into Asia; in that case he would have perhaps obtained more favourable terms. But now that we have entered Asia, and are, as it were, masters both of the horse and his rider, all he has to do is to submit to whatever conditions we shall think fit to prescribe to him. As for the kindness he shews my son, all I can do is to pray the gods that he may never be in his situation, nor want that protection which he so generously gives the child. And if he would preserve himself from so great a misfortune, let him avoid coming to a pitched battle with the Romans. This advice is the strongest testimony I can give him, both of my esteem and gratitude *.

<sup>2</sup> Liv. ibid. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 126. POLYB. legat. 23.
 ther,

THE ill success of this embassy sunk Antiochus into a deep melancholy. He thought that the Romans could not have prescribed him worse terms had they conquered him, and such a peace appeared to him as disadvantageous as the most calamitous war. He therefore turned all his thoughts from projects of peace to the necessary preparations for opposing the enemy, and preventing his further progress. He encamped near Thyatira in Lydia, and there assembled all his forces. On the other hand, the Roman army leaving Troy, advanced in six days to Elæa near the mouth of the Caicus. As this city was subject to the kings of Pergamus, Eumenes went immediately to wait on the Scipios, and then returning to Pergamus, sent from thence all manner of provisions for the army, which he soon joined with all his forces. While they were encamped in the neighbourhood of Elæa, Scipio Africanus falling sick was sent to that city, which Antiochus no sooner heard than he sent his son to him without ransom. A most noble instance of generosity in an enemy so lately provoked. Scipio received him with inexpressible joy, and after having embraced him a thousand times, he strictly charged the Syrian, who brought him, to return his most hearty thanks to Antiochus, and to tell him that he could no otherwise shew his gratitude at present, than by giving him one piece of advice, which was, that the king should by no means hazard a battle, till he was recovered, and returned to the camp <sup>b</sup>. Perhaps Scipio, thought that a delay for some days would give the king an opportunity of reflecting more seriously than he had hitherto done ; and incline him to conclude a solid peace. But however that be, the transports of joy, which Scipio felt on this occasion, gave a turn to his distemper, and quite cured him. But before he was in a condition to return to the camp, the consul appointed Cn. Demitius to be his lieutenant in the room of his brother, and marched against Antiochus, who was encamped at Thyatira, without him, not doubting but he should be able to conquer without sharing the glory of the victory with his brother. Although the superiority of Antiochus's forces, which were much more numerous than those of the Romans, might naturally induce him to venture a battle, yet the wisdom and authority of Scipio, whom he considered as his last refuge, in case any calamitous accident should befall him, prevailed over all other considerations. He therefore would not wait for the consul in the plains of Thyatira, but moved from thence, and leaving the river Hermus between him and the Romans, encamped near Magnesia, within reach of mount Sipylus. In order to prevent his being attacked in this new post, he dug a ditch round his camp six cubits deep, and twelve broad, which was guarded on the outside by a double row of pallisades, the second row being defended at proper distances by strong walls and towers to keep off the enemy. In the meantime the consul, leaving the banks of the Caicus, advanced by great marches towards Thyatira, where he supposed the king was still encamped. But being informed of the new situation of the Syrian army, he turned towards the Hermus, and posted himself at first within five miles of the enemy. While he was forming his camp a party of Gauls mixed with some Scythians appeared in sight of the Romans, and advanced in good order to attack them. The Romans repulsed them, and while they were endeavouring to repass the river, killed great numbers of them. After this skirmish both parties continued inactive for some days, till the consul passing the river posted himself within two miles and an half of the enemy's camp. While he was fortifying his new camp, three thousand Syrians attacked the workmen, but were soon obliged to retire with the loss of two hundred men partly killed, and partly taken. Both armies marched out of their camps every morning, and drew up in order of battle, but so near their trenches, that it was plain they had no mind to come to an engagement. At length the Romans marched into the plain, and challenged the Syrians, but Antiochus notwithstanding this challenge continued near his intrenchments. These delays tired out the consul's patience, who dreaded the arrival of his brother, being unwilling to share with him the glory of the victory. He therefore summoned a council of war in all haste, and proposed attacking the enemy's intrenchments: the winter, said he, approaches, and the season will soon force us either to discontinue the war till the next spring, or to spend the winter in our tents. Let us therefore march out immediately against these effeminate Asiatics, and attack them in their trenches, since they have not the courage to meet us in the field. The Romans never shewed so much contempt for an enemy as on this occasion; they were all to a man for forcing the Syrian camp, if they continued to decline a battle. Accordingly the next day the consul after viewing the situation of the enemy's camp, advanced to it in order of battle. On the other hand, the king thinking it would be shameful for him to decline an engagement, being at the head of an army far more numerous than that of the enemy, in a friend's country, and in the midst of his allies, resolved at all events to accept the challenge, and accordingly prepared for a decisive battle.

* Liv. l. xxxvi. xxxvii.

<sup>b</sup> POLYB. legat. 23. LIV. l. xxvii. JUSTIN. l. iii. c. 7. APPIAN. p. 105. 106. AUREL. VICT. p. 609.

*The battle
of Magnesia.*

THE Roman army consisted of four legions partly Romans, and partly Latins, each legion at this time containing five thousand five hundred men, and of seven thousand auxiliaries sent by the kings of Pergamus and Macedon; but of these two thousand were ordered to guard the camp during the action. The Romans were posted in the centre, and the Latins in the two wings, the left of which extended to the river. On the side of the right wing, to cover and support it, the consul posted the auxiliary troops of Eumenes, a small body of horse, and some Trallians and Cretans lightly armed. He did not think it necessary to strengthen in like manner the left wing, the river and banks, which were very steep, seeming a sufficient defence on that side. The sixteen elephants, which the Romans had, were placed behind the army by way of corps-de-reserve, the consul not thinking it proper to oppose them to those of the enemy, which were far more numerous, being in all fifty two; and besides excelled the

• LIV. & APPIAN. ibid.

Roman

Roman elephants in strength, height, and courage, the former being brought from India and the latter from Africa. As for the Syrian army, all the nations of the east seemed to be assembled to support the cause of Antiochus. But the main strength of it consisted in sixteen thousand foot, armed after the Macedonian manner, who composed the phalanx. This body faced every way, was armed with long pikes, and taught to fight in close order as the soldiers of Alexander the Great had formerly been. Antiochus did not draw up his phalanx as usual ; but divided it into ten companies separated from each other, placing in the spaces between each of the companies an elephant loaded with a tower full of armed men. On the right of the phalanx was drawn up in a line part of the cavalry, viz. fifteen hundred Asiatic Gauls, three thousand horse armed cap-a-pee, and a thousand horse more, the flower of the Median cavalry. At some distance from these followed the cavalry of the king's household, richly cloathed, and wearing bucklers plated over with silver. In the same line twelve hundred Scythians on horseback, armed with bows and arrows, made a great figure, being all chosen men, and of an extraordinary size. The light-armed troops, to the number of three thousand, partly Trallians, and partly Cretans, with ten thousand Mysian archers, and four thousand men more, partly Cyrtæans armed with slings, partly Persians armed with bows, and partly Arabians mounted on dromedaries closed the right wing, which was led on by the king in person, surrounded by a body of Syrians and Lydians well mounted, but not heavily armed. The left wing was commanded by Seleucus and Antipater, the former the king's son, and the latter his nephew, and disposed thus. Close to the phalanx were posted fifteen hundred Galatians, and 2000 Cappadocians, which king Ariarathes had sent to the assistance of his father-in-law. Next to these were placed two thousand seven hundred auxiliaries sent from different countries. These were followed by three thousand cuirassiers well mounted. And, lastly, in the flank of this wing marched two thousand horse lightly armed. At some distance were placed several small bodies of light-armed troops both foot and horse ; among which were two thousand five hundred Galatian horse, some Tarentines, Cretans, Carians, Cilicians, &c. The phalanx which was in the centre, was commanded by three officers of distinction, viz. Minio, Zeuxis, and Philip. A vast number of chariots, armed with hooks and scythes, were drawn up before the first line, as were likewise a great many elephants carrying towers with several floors, all filled with slingers and archers ; and besides many camels, animals then unknown to the Roman troops, mounted by Arabians, armed with swords six foot long, that the riders might from their backs reach the enemy. The Romans had never seen a more numerous army, nor one more finely adorned (O) ; and nevertheless they never shewed so great a contempt for an army as for this, which they were now going to attack.

ON the day of the battle the weather proved very favourable to the Romans ; for a thick fog rising in the morning, the day was almost turned into night, so that the Syrian commanders could not have all the corps under their command in view, on account of their great extent, and send them proper orders in time ; whereas the fog was not thick enough to prevent the Roman generals from seeing their several bodies at the greatest distance, as they took up but little ground. Besides the damp, which was occasioned by the fog, slackened the strings of the enemy's bows, so that the Asiatics, who used them, could shoot their darts and arrows but faintly. The whole dependance of Antiochus in the first attack was on his armed chariots, which were to cut their way into the Roman army. For this purpose they had long halberts fastened to their poles, and sharp hooks to their axle-trees ; the former were about the height of a man's head, and the latter almost swept the ground, and cut off the legs of all who stood in their way. But Eumenes undertook to render them useless, and even fatal to the enemy. This brave prince, putting himself at the head of the bow-men and slingers, ordered them to charge not in a body, but divided in platoons, and to aim only at the horses in the chariots. Accordingly, as soon

(O) Florus tells us (53), that Antiochus strengthened his army with elephants of a monstrous size, all covered with gold, silver, scarlet, and their own ivory. We read in the first book of the Maccabees (54), that he had an hundred and twenty elephants. And indeed when he fought with Ptolemy he had an hundred and two, and afterwards, as Polybius assures us, an hundred and fifty. But in this engagement Livy writes, that he had only fifty-four elephants, seventy-thousand foot, and upwards of twelve thousand horse. According to Appian he had in all but seventy thousand men. Florus most hyperbolically raises the number of his forces to three hundred thousand men ; and adds, that he had as many horses and iron chariots in the field that day. The Romans were between eight and twenty and thirty thousand men, horse and foot, whereof two thousand were left to guard the camp.

(53) Flor. Hist. Rom. l. ii. c. 8,

(54) 1 Maccab. c. 8. v. 6

as the chariots moved, Eumenes advanced at the head of his men, who pouring on them from every quarter darts, stones, and javelins, and at the same time shouting as loud as they could, so frightened the horses, that they could no longer be kept in order, but scouring up and down, and turning against their own troops, fell on the Arabians, who supported them, which occasioned a great confusion in that quarter. Those in the Syrian army, who were at a distance, hearing the noise and outcries, and not knowing the cause of them, were struck with no small terror. After this advantage, the Roman cavalry advanced, and fell on those whom the chariots had put in disorder. The Syrians, being already intimidated, after a faint resistance gave way, and the Romans made a great slaughter of their men and horses, both being bore down with the weight of their heavy armour. Eumenes charged the left wing, in which Seleucus commanded, with such vigour, that he put it to flight, and the fugitives flying to the phalanx for protection, put that body likewise in disorder, which Domitius observing, advanced against it at the head of his legionaries, but could not break it till he ordered his men to attack the elephants, which, as we have observed above, were placed in the spaces between the companies. The Romans had learnt in their wars with Pyrrhus and Hannibal not to fear those monsters, which were once so terrible to them. They attacked them therefore with great resolution, and driving them against the phalangites, put that body into disorder, by means of those very animals which had been posted there for its defence.

BUT in the mean time advice was brought that the left wing of the Romans was in great danger. Antiochus, who had observed that the flanks of the left wing were quite open and uncovered, the four squadrons which covered it, having joined the rest of the cavalry to fall upon the enemy's left wing, had charged it at the head of all his auxiliaries not only in front, but in flank. The Roman infantry, seeing themselves in imminent danger of being surrounded and hemmed in on all sides, fled in great disorder to their camp, which was guarded by two thousand men under the command of a legionary tribune called Æmilius. This man seeing the Romans flying towards him, marched out at the head of all his troops to meet them, and after having bitterly reproached them for their cowardice and ignominious flight, ordered his men to draw their swords, and cut in pieces such as should advance one step farther, or refuse to face about against the enemy. This order given so seasonably, and put

Antio-
chus.
defeated

in execution without mercy against some, had the desired effect. Those who were flying first halted, and then, being both reinforced and encouraged by Æmilius, returned under his conduct to wipe off the dishonour of their flight. At the same time Attalus the brother of Eumenes, having left the right wing on his receiving advice that the left was in danger, arrived very seasonably with two hundred horse. Antiochus observing that the troops, which had fled, were returning to the battle, and that the enemy's right wing was ready to fall upon him, turned his horse about and fled. This served in a manner as a signal for the rest of the troops, for the whole Syrian army immediately turned their backs. Eumenes alone pursued them at the head of the cavalry, and made a most dreadful havock of the fugitives. The Romans walked over heaps of dead bodies, especially where the phalanx stood, marched up to the Syrian camp, attacked and plundered it. The riches they found in it are not to be described, but the taking of it cost the Romans a new battle, which proved more fatal to the Syrians than that in the field, for the Romans, having in spite of a most desperate resistance forced the intrenchments, gave no quarter, but put all to the sword without distinction. There fell this day in the battle, in the pursuit, and in the plunder of the camp fifty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, fifteen hundred were taken prisoners, and fifteen elephants. In the consular army there were but three hundred foot killed, and twenty five horse. Eumenes had only fifteen of his men killed, so that this victory, as we are told by the antients, seemed a prodigy to all nations both of the east and west <sup>d</sup>.

Antiochus retired to Sardis with as many of his forces, that had escaped the slaughter, as he could draw together. From Sardis he soon marched to rejoin his son Seleucus, who had fled to Apamea. As for the consul he took advantage of the king's defeat and flight, making himself master of all the neighbouring countries. Deputies hastened to him from all parts; the cities of Thyatira, Magnesia, Trallis, Magnesia in Caria, all Lydia, and Ephesus itself, though highly favoured by Antiochus, declared for the Romans. Polyxenidas, upon the news of the king's defeat, left the port of Ephesus, and sailed to Patara, where he landed with a very small guard, and returned by land into Syria. The consul took the road to Sardis, which opened its gates to him. As he stopped there, his brother Africanus, as soon as his health allowed him, came and joined him in that city, and congratulated him on the glory he had so lately acquired. But after all, the consul, we may say, had but a small part in the victory; for all the historians, who speak of the battle of Magnesia, ascribe the whole success of it to Eumenes king of Pergamus and Attalus his brother, without mentioning any valiant action or prudent order, by which the consul signalized himself on that occasion. However, he took the surname of Asiaticus as his brother had done that of Africanus.

<sup>e</sup> LIV. APPIAN, & JUSTIN. ubi supra.

Antiochus finding his affairs in a bad situation both by sea and land, and not daring to appear before the consular army in the field, sent Antipater, his brother's son, and Zeuxis, who had been governor of Lydia and Phrygia, to sue for a peace. They were ordered to treat chiefly with the elder brother, of whose clemency and good nature Antiochus entertained a high opinion. Accordingly on their arrival at Sardis, where the consul then was with his brother, they addressed the latter, and were by him presented to the consul. Their speech was very submissive, and such as became a vanquished people. To you, O Romans, said they, we apply to know by what means we may appease the wrath of your republic. All the kings you have hitherto conquered have experienced your clemency after their defeat. Shall Antiochus then be the only prince on whom you will wreak your vengeance? No victory has given you so much reason to favour the vanquished as this. It assures you of the conquest of the universe. It even puts you upon a level with the immortal gods. Learn therefore to be like them, slow to punish, and ready to forgive<sup>c</sup>.

HEREUPON a council was summoned, and after long debates the ambassadors were called in, and Scipio Africanus, being desired by the consul to acquaint the deputies with the resolutions of the assembly, is said to have expressed himself in the following terms: We are sensible that the victory, which we have lately gained, is owing to the gods; and therefore shall treat the vanquished with moderation, demanding little more of them now than we did at our first entering into Articles of Asia. Antiochus shall obtain a peace upon the following terms: the peace That he gives up his pretensions to Europe, confines his do- between minions to Asia beyond mount Taurus, pays us fifteen thou- Antiochus sand Euboic talents for the expences of the war, five hundred and the down, two thousand five hundred when the senate and people Romans. shall confirm the articles, and one thousand more every year for twelve years together. We also insist upon his satisfying king Eumenes, and his paying him the four hundred talents he owes him, and what remains due for the corn, which his father sent to the king of Syria. It is likewise the pleasure of the council, that you deliver up to us Hannibal the Carthaginian, Thoas the Ætolian, Mnesilochus the Acarnanian, and Philo and Eubulis two Chalcidians; for these have been the authors of our divisions, the incendiaries who kindled the present war. Lastly, the king of Syria for a further proof of his sincerity shall give us twenty such hostages as we shall chuse, of whom Antiochus his youngest son shall be one †.

<sup>c</sup> APPIAN, in Syriac. III. POLYB. Legat. 4. LIV. l. xxxviii.

THE ambassadors of Antiochus had been ordered to refuse no terms, and therefore these were accepted, and the whole affair concluded. So that the Syrian ambassadors now prepared to set out for Rome to get the conditions of peace proposed by Scipio ratified there. In the mean time the consul dividing his army into three bodies, put it into winter-quarters; one part continued at Magnesia, another was sent to Trallis, and the third to Ephesus, where the Scipios took up their quarters. There they received a new embassy from Antiochus with the hostages he had promised, the Roman prisoners and deserters, and the strangers, which the consul had demanded, except Hannibal, who, after the king's defeat, had fled out of his dominions, and Thoas the Ætolian, who, as soon as he heard that a treaty was on foot between Antiochus and the Romans, had returned to Ætolia, where a war was likely to break out between that republic and Rome. L. Aurelius Cotto was sent with the ambassadors to Rome, to acquaint the senate with the particulars of the treaty. When they appeared before the conscript fathers. they spoke with great submission, and only desired them to ratify the articles which the Scipios had offered to their master. The senate, after examining them, ordered that a treaty of peace should be concluded with Antiochus, and the articles of it engraved on brass, and fixed up in the capitol. They only added one clause, which was, that the Syrians should change every year all their hostages, except the son of king Antiochus, who should continue at Rome, as long as the republic thought fit. The peace being thus ratified, and all Asia, on this side of mount Taurus, delivered into the hands of the Romans, the Greek cities were by them restored to their liberty, the provinces of Caria and Lydia given to the Rhodians, and all the rest that had belonged to Antiochus bestowed upon Eumenes ‡.

† POLYB. legat. 24. DIONOR. SICUL. legat. 9. LIV. l. xxxvii. JUSTIN. l. xxxi. c. 8. APPIAN. ibid. * APPIAN. & LIV. ubi supra

IN the mean time the consulship of Scipio being expired, Cn. Manlius Vulso was sent into Asia, to succeed him in the command of the army, and with him ten commissioners to regulate affairs there. Manlius hearing, on his arrival, that the city of Perga (P) was still under the dominion of Antiochus, contrary to the treaty of peace, advanced with his troops to that place, being desirous to pick a new quarrel with Antiochus; but the governor of the city shewing himself ready to deliver it up to the Romans, as soon as he received proper orders from his court, thirty days were allowed him for that purpose, and the city was given up at the time appointed. From Perga Manlius returned to Apamea, where the ten commissioners and king Eumenes then were; and they all together put the last hand to the treaty, which was brought from Rome; with the additions and alterations which the senate had, after the departure of the ambassadors, thought fit to make in it (Q). Nothing now remained but to ratify the treaty

(P) The city of Perga stood on the banks of the Cestrius, and still retains in some degree its antient-name, being called by the inhabitants Pirgi. The river Cestrius or Cestrus had its spring on mount Taurus, towards the confines of Isauria. It washed Pisidia and Pamphylia, and discharged itself into the Attalic gulph, or the gulph of Sattalia.

(Q) As this is a very material part of history, we shall set down the treaty at full length, with the alterations and additions which the senate thought fit to make in it, such as it has been transmitted to us by the Greek and Latin historians. It was couched in the following terms: "Peace and friendship shall be established between the Roman people and Antiochus king of Syria, on the following conditions. I. The king shall not suffer any army of any enemy to the Roman people, or their allies, to pass through his territories; neither shall Rome, or her allies, suffer any army to pass through their territories to make war on Antiochus. II. The king of Syria shall have no right to extend his conquests to the islands near Asia; and he shall renounce all his pretensions to Europe. III. Antiochus shall withdraw his troops from all the cities, towns, and castles on this side of mount Taurus, as far as to the river Halys, and out of all the plain which separates Pamphylia from Lycia on one side, and from Lycaonia on the other. IV. When the Syrian troops evacuate any place, they shall not carry the machines of war with them; and if they have done so in any case, they shall restore them. V. Antiochus shall not receive or harbour in his dominions any fugitive of the kingdom of Eumenes. VI. The inhabitants of the cities given up by the king of Syria shall not continue in Syria, but repair to Apamea, on a day appointed, to be sent home to their native treaty by religious ceremonies, and to begin to put it in execution. The proconsul took the usual oath of the Romans, that

“ native countries. VII. But the Syrians, who have a mind to “ continue in the cities subject to Rome, or to the allies of Rome, “ shall be suffered to do so without molestation. VIII. Antiochus “ shall, if it be in his power, deliver up into the hands of the “ proconsul, Hannibal, the Carthaginian and son of Hamilcar, “ Mnesilochus the Acaranian, Thoas the Ætolian, Eubulis and Philo,
 “ two Chalcidians, and all persons who have enjoyed any ma“ gistracy in Ætolia. IX. The king of Syria shall deliver up all “ his elephants to the Romans, and train up no more for war:
 “ X. He shall put the Romans in possession of all his armed gal-
 “ lies; shall have no more than ten ships at sea, which shall only “ be of thirty oars; and shall not sail beyond the promontories
 “ of Calycadmus and Sarpedon, unless it be to bring to Rome money, “ ambassadors, or hostages. XI. Antiochus shall not raise merce“ naries in the countries subject to Rome, or receive the volunteers “ who shall offer to serve him. XII. The houses and other edi“ fices which were built before this treaty by the Rhodians, and “ other allies of Rome, in the Syrian territories, shall still belong to “ the Rhodians, or those other allies who built them. XIII. Both “ parties shall be at liberty to demand the money that shall be re“ spectively due, and to demand the restitution of any thing that “ has been taken from them. XIV. Those to whom Antiochus has “ given the possession of any cities, shall evacuate them, and put “ them into the hands of their old possessors. XV. Antiochus “ shall pay the Romans for twelve years the annual sum of a thou“ sand talents (that is, 258,333 l. 6 s. 8 d.) of the purest silver, “ such as that of Athens, and a hundred and forty thousand modii “ (35,000 English bushels) of the best wheat. XVI. He shall pay “ king Eumenes, in the space of five years, three hundred and fifty “ talents, and an hundred and twenty seven talents more, by way
 “ of satisfaction for the corn he received from Attalus. XVII.
 “ Antiochus shall put into the hands of the Romans twenty hos“ tages, of which his son Antiochus shall be one; shall exchange “ them all, except his son Antiochus, every three years; and these “ hostages shall all be between eighteen and forty five years of “ age. XVIII. If he is defective in the sums he is to pay an“ nually, or brings any bad money, he shall make satisfaction
 “ the next year. XIX. If any of the allies make war upon Antiochus, “ he shall have a right to defend himself; but he shall not “ keep any of their cities to himself, or take them into friendship,
 “ or draw them over to his party by corruption. The dispute “ shall be determined by pitched battles. XX. If any party “ chuses to add any further articles to these, it may be done by “ mutual content (55). ”

(55) Appian. in Syria. p. 112. Polxb. legat. 35. Liv. l. xxxviii.
 c. 32.

that is, struck a sowl on the head with flint, saying, If I break my word, may Jupiter strike me as I strike this victim. Then Q. Minucius Thermus, one of the ten commissioners, and L. Manlius, were dispatched to the court of Syria, where they made Antiochus swear, That he would inviolably observe all the articles of the treaty. The Syrian fleet was then in the port of Patara, whither Fulvius Labeo repaired, on board the Roman galleys, and burnt, according to the conventions, all Antiochus's ships, choosing rather to give this instance of severity to all the maritime nations, than to apply the navy of the conquered king to their own use. They affected to shew the same disinterestedness with regard to the king of Syria's elephants; for they made a present of them to the king of Pergamus. Thus ended the war with Antiochus, which cost the Romans but little blood, and yet contributed more than any other to the aggrandizing of their republic; but, at the same time, this conquest proved, in a manner, fatal to Rome; for, from this period, the Roman writers date the depravity and corruption of manners, which ended at last in the total destruction of the republican state. The Romans, who served in Asia, brought from thence great wealth, and introduced into Rome a taste and love for luxury and effeminate pleasures. Luxury, says a Roman poet, entered triumphant into Rome with the pompous spoils of Asia, and, dragging after it all manner of vices, made greater havock in the city than the greatest armies could have done; and thus revenged the conquered world<sup>h</sup>.

As for the unhappy Antiochus, he did not long survive his Death of fall. Being greatly puzzled how to raise the sum which he Antiochus.

<sup>h</sup> JUVEN. l. ii. satyr. 6.

Most of the copies of Livy, instead of the river Halys, mentioned in the third article, have the river Tanais; which must certainly be a mistake, since the Tanais divides Asia from Europe, and falls into the Palus Mæotis, and neither the Romans nor Antiochus had at that time any intercourse with the nations in that neighbourhood, which lay at a great distance from the provinces of Asia Minor; whereas the Halys divided Asia Minor into two parts; and Antiochus was not only to retire beyond mount Taurus, but to withdraw his troops from all the places lying between that mountain and the river Halys, which was on this side of it. The promontory Calycadnus, spoke of in the tenth article, stood at the mouth of a river in Cilicia bearing the same name, and near it was the promontory of Sarpedon. The river is now known to the Italians by the name of Fiume del Ferro. The promontory of Calycadnus is the same with Strabo's cape Zephyrium.

treaty by religious ceremonies, and to begin to put it in execution. The proconsul took the usual oath of the Romans, that

“ native countries. VII. But the Syrians, who have a mind to “ continue in the cities subject to Rome, or to the allies of Rome,
 “ shall be suffered to do so without molestation. VIII. Antiochus “ shall, if it be in his power, deliver up into the hands of the “ proconsul, Hannibal, the Carthaginian and son of Hamilcar, “ Mnesilochus the Acarnanian, Theas the Ætolian, Eubulis and Philo,
 “ two Chalcidians, and all persons who have enjoyed any ma“ gistracy in Ætolia. IX. The king of Syria shall deliver up all
 “ his elephants to the Romans, and train up no more for war:
 “ X. He shall put the Romans in possession of all his armed gal-
 “ lies; shall have no more than ten ships at sea, which shall only “ be of thirty oars; and shall not sail beyond the promontories
 “ of Calycadnus and Sarpedon, unless it be to bring to Rome money, “ ambassadors, or hostages: XI. Antiochus shall not raise merce“ naries in the countries subject to Rome, or receive the voluntiers
 “ who shall offer to serve him. XII. The houses and other edi“ fices which were built before this treaty by the Rhodians, and “ other allies of Rome, in the Syrian territories, shall still belong to
 “ the Rhodians, or those other allies who built them. XIII. Both “ parties shall be at liberty to demand the money that shall be re“ spectively due, and to demand the restitution of any thing that “ has been taken from them. XIV. Those to whom Antiochus has “ given the possession of any cities, shall evacuate them, and put “ them into the hands of their old possessors. XV. Antiochus “ shall pay the Romans for twelve years the annual sum of a thou“ sand talents (that is, 258,333 l. 6 s. 8 d.) of the purest silver,
 “ such as that of Athens, and a hundred and forty thousand modii
 “ (35,000 English bushels) of the best wheat. XVI. He shall pay “ king Eumenes, in the space of five years, three hundred and fifty “ talents, and an hundred and twenty seven talents more, by way
 “ of satisfaction for the corn he received from Attalus. XVII.
 “ Antiochus shall put into the hands of the Romans twenty hos“ tages, of which his son Antiochus shall be one; shall exchange “ them all, except his son Antiochus, every three years; and these “ hostages shall all be between eighteen and forty five years of “ age. XVIII. If he is defective in the sums he is to pay an“ nually, or brings any bad money, he shall make satisfaction
 “ the next year. XIX. If any of the allies make war upon Antiochus,
 “ he shall have a right to defend himself; but he shall not “ keep any of their cities to himself, or take them into friendship,
 “ or draw them over to his party by corruption. The dispute “ shall be determined by pitched battles. XX. If any party “ chuses to add any further articles to these, it may be done by “ mutual consent (55). ”

(55) Appian. in Syriac. p. 112. Polyb. legat. 35. Liv. l. xxxviii. e. 32. Moll

that is, struck a sowl on the head with flint, saying, If I break my word, may Jupiter strike me as I strike this victim. Then Q. Minucius Thermus, one of the ten commissioners, and L. Manlius, were dispatched to the court of Syria, where they made Antiochus swear, That he would inviolably observe all the articles of the treaty. The Syrian fleet was then in the port of Patara, whither Fulvius Labeo repaired, on board the Roman gallies, and burnt, according to the conventions, all Antiochus's ships, choosing rather to give this instance of severity to all the maritime nations, than to apply the navy of the conquered king to their own use. They affected to shew the same disinterestedness with regard to the king of Syria's elephants; for they made a present of them to the king of Pergamus. Thus ended the war with Antiochus, which cost the Romans but little blood, and yet contributed more than any other to the aggrandizing of their republic; but, at the same time, this conquest proved, in a manner, fatal to Rome; for, from this period, the Roman writers date the depravity and corruption of manners, which ended at last in the total destruction of the republican state. The Romans, who served in Asia, brought from thence great wealth, and introduced into Rome a taste and love for luxury and effeminate pleasures. Luxury, says a Roman poet, entered triumphant into Rome with the pompous spoils of Asia, and, dragging after it all manner of vices, made greater havock in the city than the greatest armies could have done; and thus revenged the conquered world<sup>h</sup>.

As for the unhappy Antiochus, he did not long survive his fall. Being greatly puzzled how to raise the sum which he <sup>Antiochus.</sup> Death of

<sup>h</sup> JUVEN. l. ii. satyr. 6.

Most of the copies of Livy, instead of the river Halys, mentioned in the third article, have the river Tanais; which must certainly be a mistake, since the Tanais divides Asia from Europe, and falls into the Palus Mæotis, and neither the Romans nor Antiochus had at that time any intercourse with the nations in that neighbourhood, which lay at a great distance from the provinces of Asia Minor; whereas the Halys divided Asia Minor into two parts; and Antiochus was not only to retire beyond mount Taurus, but to withdraw his troops from all the places lying between that mountain and the river Halys, which was on this side of it. The promontory Calycadnus, spoke of in the tenth article, stood at the mouth of a river in Cilicia bearing the same name, and near it was the promontory of Sarpedon. The river is now known to the Italians by the name of Fiume del Ferro. The promontory of Calycadnus is the same with Strabo's cape Zephyrium.

was to pay the Romans, he made a progress through the eastern provinces, in order to levy the tribute which they owed him, leaving the regency of Syria to his son Seleucus, whom he had declared his successor. Being arrived in the province of Elemais, he was informed, that a very considerable treasure was lodged in the temple of Jupiter Belus. This was a strong temptation to a prince, who had not much regard for religion, and was in extreme want of money. Accordingly upon a false pretence, that the inhabitants of that province had taken up arms against him, he entered the temple in the dead of the night, and seized on all the riches, which had been religiously kept there during a long series of years. The populace, highly exasperated at this sacrilege, rising up in arms, slew him, and all that were with him. This is the account of his death which St. Jerom gives us, upon the testimony of Strabo<sup>1</sup>. But Aurelius Victor tells us, that this unfortunate prince, after his retreat beyond mount Taurus, gave himself up to all manner of debauchery, and was killed at an entertainment by one of his guests, whom he had struck and abused. The difference of these accounts has made the most judicious among the Greek and Latin historians pass over his death in silence. He died in the thirty seventh year of his reign, and fifty second of his age, and is highly commended by most of the antient historians for his humanity, clemency, and liberality. A decree, which he is said to have enacted, giving his subjects permission, and even commanding them, not to obey his orders when they interfered with the laws, shews that he had an extraordinary regard for justice<sup>2</sup>. Till the fiftieth year of his age he behaved on all occasions with such courage and prudence, as crowned with success all his enterprizes, and gained him the title of the Great; but, after that age, as he declined in the wisdom of his conduct, as well as in his application to business, all his affairs were proportionably unsuccessful. His conduct in the war with the Romans, the contempt in which he held the wise counsels of Hannibal, and the ignominious peace which he was forced to accept, drowned all the glory of his former expeditions. The prophet Daniel had foretold both his great exploits and misfortunes, and his prophecies were fully accomplished, as the reader will find in our notes (R).

HE

<sup>1</sup> HIERON. in Daniel. c. xi.
illustr.

<sup>2</sup> AUREL. VICTOR. de viris

(R) The prophecies of Daniel, from the tenth verse of the eleventh chapter to the nineteenth inclusive, relate to the actions of this

He was succeeded by Seleucus surnamed Philopator, or, as Seleucus Josephus styles him, Soter<sup>1</sup>, which indeed was the surname of Philopator.

<sup>1</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 4.

Year of
the Flood, 2812.

Before
Christ,
187.

this prince, and were all fully accomplished. But his sons, says the prophet, speaking of the king of Syria, or the king of the north, shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces; and one (Antiochus the Great) shall certainly come and overflow, and pass through: then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress. This king of the north was Seleucus Callinicus, who left behind him two sons, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus, afterwards surnamed the Great. The former reigned but three years, and was succeeded by Antiochus his brother. The latter, after having quelled the troubles of his kingdom, waged war with Ptolemy Philopator king of the south, that is, of Egypt, dispossessed him of Cœle-Syria, which was delivered to him by Theodotus governor of that province, defeated Ptolemy's generals in the narrow passes near Berytus, and won part of Phœnice, advancing as far as the fortresses, or, as we read in the Hebrew, as far as the fortresses, that is, to the frontiers of Egypt. The victory gained by Ptolemy over Antiochus is plainly pointed out in the following lines: And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north; and he shall set forth a great multitude, but the multitude shall be given into his hand. Ptolemy Philopator was an indolent effeminate prince; his subjects were forced to drag him, as it were, into the field, to repulse the enemy, who was marching into his country. At last he put himself at the head of the army, and by the valour and conduct of his generals, gained a signal victory over Antiochus at Raphia. There a great multitude, that is, the great army which Antiochus led into the field, was given into his hands, and Ptolemy did cast down, that is, slew many thousands of them, and put the rest to flight. And when he has taken away the multitude his heart shall be lifted up, &c. but he shall not be strengthened by it. Antiochus lost upwards of ten thousand foot, and three hundred horse, and four thousand of his men were taken prisoners. Philopator, after this victory, hastened back into Egypt, and there gave himself up to sloth and idleness, without taking the advantages which it gave him; and therefore was not strengthened by it. For the king of the north shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come, after certain years, with a great army, and with much riches. Antiochus, having ended the war which he had waged with the nations beyond the Euphrates, raised a mighty army in those provinces, and, fourteen years after the ending of the former war, returned against Egypt during the minority of Ptolemy Epiphanes, defeated Scopas near Paneas, and regained the whole country which Philopator had reduced after the his son Demetrius. This prince reigned eleven years, and some months ; but made a very poor figure, by reason of the low victory gained at Raphia. And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south. This prophecy was fulfilled by the league made by the kings of Syria and Macedon against the infant king of Egypt, by the conspiracy of Agathocles and Agathoclea for the regency, and by that of Scopas who wanted to dispossess him of his dominions, and seize them for himself. Also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision, but they shall fall. Several apostate Jews, to ingratiate themselves with the king of Egypt, complied with every thing he required of them, in opposition to the sacred ordinances of the law. But they fell ; for when Antiochus got again possession of Judæa and Jerusalem, he either cut off, or drove out of the country, all the partisans of Ptolemy. So the king of the north shall come and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities ; and the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people ; neither shall there be any strength to withstand. — But he that cometh against him, shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him ; and he shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed. Antiochus, after having defeated the Egyptian army at Paneas, besieged and took, first Sidon, then Gaza, and afterwards all the cities of those provinces, notwithstanding the opposition made by the chosen troops, which the king of Egypt sent against him, under the command of his best generals. He did according to his own will in Cæle-Syria and Palestine, and, pursuing his conquests, entered Judæa, that glorious land, and there established his authority, by driving out of the castle of Jerusalem the garison which Scopas had left there ; but that garison having made such resistance, as obliged Antiochus to send for the rest of his army to reduce it, and the siege continuing some time, the country was destroyed and consumed by the stay the army was forced to make in it, and the city of Jerusalem suffered greatly, as appears from the decree which Antiochus afterwards enacted in favour of the Jews, granting them leave to repair their demolished city, and raise it from the ruinous condition to which it was reduced. This decree was directed to one Ptolemy, who seems to have been governor of those provinces at that time, and is still extant in Josephus (56). He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him : thus shall he do, and he shall give him the daughter of women corrupting her ; but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him. St. Jerom tells us (57), that Antiochus gave his daughter in marriage to Ptolemy, corrupting her with bad principles, and instructing her how she should betray her husband, and put him in possession of the kingdom ; but he was not successful in his design, for low state to which the Syrian empire had been reduced by the Romans, and the exorbitant sum of a thousand talents he was obliged to pay annually, by virtue of the treaty of peace between the king his father and that republic. It was under this prince that the famous accident happened concerning Heliodorus, which is mentioned in the second book of the Maccabees <sup>m</sup>. The city of Jerusalem enjoyed, at that time, a profound tranquillity, Onias the high-priest causing the laws of God to be observed, and prompting even kings and idolatrous princes, by his exemplary piety, to have the holy place in the highest veneration, and to honour it with rich donations. Seleucus supplied, out of his private revenues, whatever was necessary for the pomp and magnificence of the solemn sacrifices, notwithstanding the difficulties he laboured under, by reason of the heavy tribute he was obliged to pay annually to Rome; but this scene was all on a sudden changed, and great disturbances raised in the city by one Simon of the tribe of Benjamin, and chief governor or protector of the

(56) Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 3. Danielis.

(57) Hieronym. in c. xi.

<sup>m</sup> 2 MACCAB. iii. iv.

he was no sooner married to Ptolemy, but she forsook her father's interest, and engaged in that of her husband; and hence it is that we find her joined with him in an embassy which was sent from Egypt to Rome, congratulating the Romans on the victory which Acilius had gained over her father at Thermopylæ (58). After this shall he turn his face to the isles, and shall take many; but a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach, which Antiochus had offered him, to cease: without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him; for after having put an end to the war in Cœle-Syria and Palestine, he sent his two sons with his army, by land, to Sardis, while he himself, with a great fleet, sailed to the Ægean sea, where he reduced several islands, and extended his empire on that side; but the prince of the people to whom he had offered reproach by that invasion, that is, Lucius Scipio the Roman consul, made the reproach turn upon him, by defeating him in the battle of Magnesia, and driving him out of all Asia Minor. Then he shall turn his face towards the fort of his own land; but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found. Antiochus, after his defeat, returned to the fort of his own land, that is, to Antioch, the capital of his kingdom, and strongest place in it. From thence going into the eastern provinces to levy money, wherewithal to pay the Romans, he was slain, so that he returned not into Syria, nor was afterwards found there. These are, as it were, the out-lines of Antiochus's picture, and as they resemble none but him, we cannot imagine that they were drawn undesignedly, or at random.

(58) Liv. l. xxxvii. c. 3.

temple.

temple. This man falling out with Onias, to be revenged upon him for opposing his unjust enterprizes, fled from Jerusalem, and went to Apollonius, who was governor of Cæle-Syria and Palestine for Seleucus, and told him, that there were immense treasures laid up in the temple, which were not designed for the sacrifices, but squandered away by the priests, and therefore might be better lodged in the king's coffers. Hereupon Apollonius immediately gave notice of what he had heard to the king, who sent Heliodorus his treasurer to Jerusalem, with orders to seize on the treasures, and bring them to Antioch. Heliodorus, on his arrival at Jerusalem, acquainted the high-priest, who had received him with great demonstrations of respect and esteem, with the motive of his journey, and asked him, Whether the information which had been given to the king was true? Onias told him, That there was indeed some money lodged in the temple, but that it was only deposited there in trust, being allotted for the maintenance of widows and orphans; that he could not, by any means, dispose of it in wrong of those to whom it belonged; that the whole amounted to no more than four hundred talents of silver, and two hundred of gold, and was, in great part, the private property of Hyrchanus, a man of great honour and probity; and lastly, that such was the holiness of the place, revered throughout the whole world, that no man, ought to lay hands on what was deposited there. But Heliodorus alledging the positive orders he had received from his master, told the high-priest in plain terms, that he must seize the money, whatever might be the consequences of such a seizure, and carry it to the king at Antioch. When Heliodorus, on the day appointed, came to the temple, with a design to execute his commission, the whole city was seized with dread. The priests, dressed in their sacerdotal robes, fell prostrate at the foot of the altar; and the people, covered with sackcloth, flocked to the temple, and jointly with the priests besought the Almighty, not to suffer so holy a place to be violated and exposed to contempt. But, in the mean time, Heliodorus, attended by his guards, was got to the gates of the treasury, and preparing to break it open, when the Lord of spirits revealed his power by most sensible marks, striking all those, who dared to obey Heliodorus, with such terror as deprived them of their senses; for there appeared to them a horse richly caparisoned, which, rushing upon Heliodorus, struck him several times with his fore-feet. His rider had a terrible aspect, and his weapons seemed to be of gold. At the same time appeared two young men, whose beauty dazzled the eye. These, standing on each side of Heliodorus, leant-ged him incessantly with their whips in a most violent manner. Heliodorus fell to the ground speechless, and without the least symptoms of life, and being in this condition put into a litter, was by his guards carried off, while the temple, which before resounded with lamentations, now echoed with the joyful shouts of all the people, who returned thanks to the Almighty for having thus displayed his power in defence of the sanctuary. Some of Heliodorus's friends besought the high-priest to invoke God in his favour; whereupon he offered a sacrifice for his health, and while he was praying, the two young men above-mentioned appearing to Heliodorus, spoke to him thus: Return thanks to Onias the high-priest, since, for his sake, the Lord has granted you life; and since you have been scourged from heaven, declare to all men the mighty power of God. Having spoke these words, they disappeared. Heliodorus offered up sacrifices, made solemn vows to him who had saved his life, and returning thanks to Onias, departed from Jerusalem, declaring to every one the wonderful works of the Almighty, to which he himself had been an eye-witness. On his return to court, the king, persisting still in his former resolution of plundering the temple, asked him, Who, in his opinion, was the most proper person for that attempt? Heliodorus replied, That if he had any enemy or traitor, he might send him, since that was the most expeditious way of getting rid of him, He, who dwells in heaven, being present in that place, and protecting it against such as come to profane it. Josephus, who also relates this event, instead of Heliodorus, names Apollonius, who, as we have hinted above, was governor of Cæle-Syria and Palestine; and with Josephus agree the Fasti Siculi. Tho' the hand of God had appeared on this occasion in a very miraculous manner, yet Simon did not lay aside his animosity against Onias, but carried it so far as to murder several of those who favoured the high-priest, being backed therein and encouraged by Apollonius. Hereupon Onias took a journey to Antioch, to complain to the king of these violences; but he had not been long there ere Seleucus died. The epitomizer of Jason of Cyrenia tells us, that Seleucus was dead before Onias reached Antioch; but Eusebius says, that he found him alive, and prevailed upon him to banish the perfidious Simon<sup>a</sup>. But, be that as it will, heaven did not long defer punishing Seleucus for his sacrilegious attempt upon the temple, by that very hand which he had employed in it. We have observed above, that when Antiochus the Great, the father of Seleucus, <sup>a</sup> 2 MACCAB. iv. EUSEB. in Chron.

Seleucus
poisoned.
Year of
the Flood 2823.
Before
Christ
176.

made peace with the Romans, after the famous battle of Magnesia, among other hostages that were then given for the observance of the articles, one was Antiochus the king's son, and younger brother to Seleucus. This prince had been now thirteen years at Rome, was twenty seven years of age, and Seleucus was desirous of having him home, and sending to Rome, by way of exchange, his own son Demetrius, who was but ten years old. Some authors are of opinion <sup>o</sup>, that Seleucus in this had no other view but to give his son a Roman education. Others conjecture, that he <sup>o</sup> wanted Antiochus, to employ him in an expedition against Egypt during the minority of Philometor <sup>p</sup>; but what prompted him to send for Antiochus is not recorded by any authentic history of those times. The affair was warmly debated in the senate at Rome; but at length the exchange was accepted, and Antiochus set out for Asia, about the same time that the young Demetrius set out for Rome. During the absence of the two heirs to the crown, Heliodorus thinking this a fair opportunity of seizing the throne, by cutting off Seleucus, accordingly poisoned him, and placed the crown on his own head. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Daniel, who, speaking of the death of Antiochus the Great, Then shall stand up, says he, in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom; but within few years he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle. These words evidently denote the short and obscure reign of Seleucus, and the kind of death which befel him; for he reigned only eleven years, and his death was neither in anger nor in battle; that is, neither in war abroad, nor in rebellion at home, but by the treachery of one of his own friends. The prophet calls him a raiser of taxes, or, as we read in the Hebrew text, a collector of taxes; and such he was during the whole time of his reign, being obliged to pay the Romans, agreeable to the articles of peace between them and his father, a thousand talents annually; and the last of these twelve years was the last of his life. He is said to have once raised a considerable army with a design to assist Pharnaces king of Pontus against Eumenes; but when he was ready to pass mount Taurus, dreading the vengeance of the Roman people, he returned home, and disbanded his troops <sup>r</sup>. Josephus tells us, that he employed Hyrchanus the son of Joseph, and nephew to Tobias, to gather the taxes on the east side of the Jordan, where Hyrchanus on that occasion built a strong castle of white marble not far from the land of Heshbon; the same author adds, that Seleucus appointed him governor of all that country, which he held the seven last years of that prince's reign, living all the time in war with the Arabians, and gaining signal victories over them.

<sup>o</sup>SALIAN ad Ann Mund. 3878      <sup>p</sup>VAILLANT, in hist. reg. Syr.      <sup>r</sup>DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii. p. 302.      <sup>s</sup>JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 4, 5.

It is manifest from the second book of the Maccabees, and also from Josephus<sup>c</sup>, that Seleucus had been in possession of Cæle-Syria, Phœnice, and Judæa, some time before his death. For Apollonius was governor of those provinces for Seleucus, Heliodorus, was sent by him to plunder the temple, and Onias, when oppressed by Simon, had recourse to Seleucus king of Syria, and not to Ptolemy king of Egypt. But by what means, or on what occasion those provinces became subject to Seleucus, is what we find no where recorded. After the battle of Paneas, Antiochus, as we have related above, made himself master of all Cæle-Syria and Palestine; but when Ptolemy Epiphanes married his daughter, he agreed to restore them to him by way of dowry. And if they were restored, how came Seleucus to be possessed of them a-new? Polybius<sup>d</sup> seems to insinuate, that this agreement was never executed; for that author tells us, that the above-mentioned provinces continued subject to the king of Syria ever after the battle of Paneas; and adds, that Antiochus Epiphanes, who succeeded Seleucus, in the answer he gave to the ambassadors, who came from Greece, to compose the difference that arose between him and Ptolemy Philometor, denied that Antiochus had ever agreed to deliver up Cæle-Syria to Ptolemy Epiphanes on the marriage of his daughter. The authority of Polybius would prompt us to believe that Cæle-Syria and Palestine, notwithstanding the above-mentioned agreement, had been retained by the Syrian kings, if the contrary were not plain from the book of the Maccabees, and likewise from Josephus<sup>e</sup>, who tells us, that Hyrcaus and all the nobles of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, when news was brought them of the birth of Philometor, flocked to Alexandria to congratulate on that occasion king Ptolemy Epiphanes, and Cleopatra his queen, which they certainly would not have done had those provinces been subject to the king of Syria. Diodorus Siculus<sup>f</sup> tells us, that Ptolemy Epiphanes raised a powerful army with a design to make war upon Seleucus, but was prevented by death from putting his design in

<sup>c</sup> 2 MACCAB. C. 3, 4.

<sup>d</sup> POLYB. legat. 72 p. 893.

<sup>e</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. I. XII. C. 4.
Valesii. p. 294, 297.

<sup>f</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt

execution. Now it is not unlikely that Seleucus, being provoked thus by Epiphanes, taking advantage of the minority of his son Philometor, pursued the war, which his father was ready to begin, and seized on those provinces. For it is certain from the book of the Maccabees, and likewise from Josephus, that Seleucus was in possession of those provinces, when he died. But to resume the thread of our history.

Antiochus Antiochus, brother of Seleucus, being arrived at Athens on his return from Rome, received there the news of his brother's death, and was at the same time told that Heliodorus had seized the crown, and was supported by a strong party; but that another was forming in favour of Ptolemy, who claimed the kingdom of Syria in right of his mother, the deceased king's sister. Hereupon Antiochus had recourse to Eumenes king of Pergamus, and to Attalus that king's brother, who conducted him into Syria at the head of a powerful army, drove out the usurper, and seated him on the throne<sup>1</sup>. As this king proved a cruel persecutor of the Jews, the prophet Daniel<sup>2</sup> foretold every thing that was to befall him. He expresses himself with relation to his accession to the crown in the following words<sup>3</sup>: And in his (Seleucus's) estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries. It is said here, that to him they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; and truly he did not come to the crown either by right of birth, since his brother Seleucus had left behind him a son, who was his lawful heir; nor by the election of the people; but by the powerful assistance of Eumenes and Attalus, whom he gained by flattering speeches, and great promises. On his being settled on the throne he assumed the surname of Epiphanes, that is, the illustrious, which title, as will soon appear, was never worse applied. The whole series of his life shews, that the epithet of vile, or, more agreeable to the original, despicable, given him by the holy prophet, suits better with his character. Polybius<sup>4</sup>, Philarchus<sup>5</sup>, Livy<sup>6</sup>, and Diodorus Siculus<sup>7</sup>, all heathen writers, and the two first his contemporaries, tell us that he frequently used to go out of his palace, attended only by two or three of his domestics, and ramble about the streets of Antioch; that he

<sup>1</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 116, 117.

<sup>2</sup> DANIEL. c. xi, xii.

<sup>3</sup> DANIEL. c. xi. v. 21.

<sup>4</sup> Apud Athenæum. l. v. p. 193.

<sup>5</sup> Apud eundem, l. x p. 438.

<sup>6</sup> LIV. l. xli.

<sup>7</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in Excerpt. Valesii. p. 304.

spent whole days in the shops of goldsmiths and engravers, disputing with them about the mysteries of their trades, which he ridiculously pretended to understand as well as they ; that he was not ashamed to stoop so low as to converse with the very dregs of the people, and mix indiscriminately with them in the places, to which they resorted, drinking and carousing with them, though he had never seen them before ; that when he heard of any young rakes met together on a party of pleasure, he never failed to intrude himself, and join in all their wanton frolics, without any regard to common decency, or his royal character ; that sometimes divesting himself of his royal robes, and putting on a Roman gown, he ran from street to street, as he had seen done in the elections of magistrates at Rome, taking some by the hand, embracing others, and begging all he met to favour him with their votes ; for sometimes he set up for ædile, at other times for tribune, or some such employment ; having thus got himself elected, he used to call for the curule chair, and sitting down in it, decide petty suits relating to contracts, bargains and sales made in the market, with as much gravity and attention, as if they had been matters of the highest concern. We are likewise told <sup>f</sup>, that he was much given to drunkenness ; that he squandered away great part of his revenues in riotous excesses, and that when intoxicated with liquor, he scowled up and down the streets, throwing money by handfuls among the populace, and crying out, Let him take it to whom fortune gives it. At other times he appeared in a Roman gown with a garland of roses on his head, and in that garb walked about the streets quite unaccompanied. If any one offered to follow him, they were sure to be well pelted with stones, which he carried under his gown for that purpose. He took pleasure in going into the public baths among the common people, where he exposed himself by his indecent and ridiculous behaviour. This odd and extravagant conduct made his subjects look upon him as a madman ; whence instead of Epiphanes or the Illustrious, they used to stile him Epimanes, that is, the Madman <sup>g</sup>. S. Jerome tells us, that he was a most lewd prince, and did not even scruple to gratify his lust publicly, and in the sight of the people <sup>h</sup>. From what we have related, we leave our readers to judge, whether he best deserved the title of Illustrious, which he assumed, or that of the Vile and Contemptible, which the prophet Daniel gave him.

<sup>f</sup> ATHEN. l. x. p. 438.
c. 11. p. 37.

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>h</sup> Hieron. in Dan.

SCARCE was Antiochus seated on the throne, when the brother of the high-priest Onias, whose name was Jesus, which he afterwards changed into that of Jason, being ambitious of the high-priesthood, to which was annexed, in those times, the regal power, applied to the king for it, and by an offer of three hundred and sixty talents, besides eighty more which he promised on another account, prevailed upon Antiochus to displace the righteous Onias, and advance him to that dignity. Nor was this all; as Onias was universally revered for his exemplary piety and strict justice, Jason well knew that his authority would be of no weight so long as his brother continued at Jerusalem; the intruder therefore procured from the king an order for his removal from Jerusalem to Antioch, and his confinement to that place. As the public treasury was quite empty when Antiochus came to the crown, by reason of the heavy tribute paid to the Romans the twelve foregoing years, Jason found the king disposed to grant any thing for ready money; and therefore proposed to advance an hundred and fifty talents more, on condition that the king would empower him to make as many of the inhabitants of Jerusalem freemen of Antioch as he should think fit, and give him leave to erect at Jerusalem a gymnasium, or place of exercise, and an ephæbeum, or a place for the training up of youth after the Greek manner. The king complied as readily with these proposals, as he had done with the former; and by this means Jason, on his return to Jerusalem, drew over many of his countrymen from the party of Onias. For the Jews were at that time, generally speaking, mighty fond of the Greek fashions; whence they began to be reconciled to Jason, when they found him bent upon introducing the Greek customs among them. Besides, the freedom of Antioch, which he could grant to whom he pleased, was attended with many valuable privileges under the Syro-Macedonian kings; whence many, in hopes of having it conferred upon them, espoused the party of Jason with great animosity; so that under his detestable reign the manners of the Jews were totally corrupted, and the customs of the Gentiles introduced among them. They were ashamed of their circumcision, which was the distinguishing mark of the people of God. They built amphitheatres in Jerusalem for profane shews, and places for the most infamous debaucheries. The priests themselves were not ashamed to leave their sacred function, and run to the public sports, in which they often became actors<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> 2 MACCAB. c. iv. 10, 11, 12. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. ii. c. 6.

IN Egypt, ever since the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes, Cleopatra his widow, sister to Antiochus Epiphanes, had taken upon her the government of the kingdom, and the tuition of her infant son, and had conducted herself with great care and prudence. But she dying this year, the management of affairs fell into the hands of Lennæus, an Egyptian nobleman of great distinction, and Eulæus an eunuch, who was appointed to superintend the king's education. These no sooner entered on the administration, but they demanded Cæle-Syria and Palestine of Antiochus; a demand, which soon occasioned a war between the two crowns. As Cleopatra was mother to one, and sister to the other of these two kings, she had prevented them so long as she lived from coming to a rupture. But the new regents did not shew so much regard for Antiochus, nor scruple to demand what they took to be their sovereign's right. It must be owned, that the kings of Egypt had always possessed these provinces ever since the first Ptolemy, till the time that Antiochus the Great wrested them out of the hands of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and left them to Seleucus his son, with no other right than that of conquest. The Egyptians, to make good their claim, argued, that in the last division of the empire between the four successors of Alexander, after the famous battle of Ipsus, these provinces had been assigned to Ptolemy; that he and his successors had held them ever since that partition, till Antiochus the Great made himself master of them after the battle of Paneas, and that Antiochus had stipulated on the marrying of his daughter to Ptolemy Epiphanes, and made it the main article in the marriage-contract, to restore to him those provinces by way of dowry. Antiochus denied both these particulars, and pretended, that in the general division, which had been made of Alexander's empire, all Syria, including Cæle-Syria and Palestine, had been allotted to Seleucus Nicator, and therefore belonged to him as his lawful heir in the Syrian empire. As to the marriage-contract, by virtue of which the Egyptians demanded the restitution of those provinces, he maintained, that there was no such article in that agreement. Having thus laid down their respective claims without coming to any conclusion, the decision of the controversy was at last referred to the sword *.

IN the mean time the king of Egypt being declared of age, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the solemnity of his coronation, as was usual among the Egyptians. On this occasion Antiochus sent Apollonius, one of the chief noblemen of his court, with the character of ambassador to assist at the solemnity, and congratulate the young king in his name on his taking the administration into his own hands. This in outward appearance was done in honour of his nephew; but the real motive was to discover the designs of the court, and the measures they were taking with regard to the provinces of Cœle-Syria and Palestine. And accordingly being informed on the return of Apollonius, that war was intended against him, he immediately imbarqued for Joppa to visit the frontiers towards Egypt, and put them in a state of defence against any attempts, which the Egyptians might make on that side. In this progress he took Jerusalem in his way, and was received there by Jason with all the marks of honour which the basest flattery could dictate, and that blind people were profuse of their acclamations to an idolatrous prince, whose tyranny they were soon to experience. From Jerusalem he went into Phœnice, and having settled all things in the places he passed through, he returned to Antioch<sup>1</sup>. The next year Jason sent his brother Menelaus to Antioch to pay the tribute to the king, and negotiate some other affairs in his name. But Menelaus in the audience which he had, instead of pursuing his commission, supplanted his brother, and obtained his office by offering three hundred talents more than Jason had given for it. Menelaus, on his return to Jerusalem, was opposed by his brother, and even obliged to quit the city; but having recourse to Antiochus, and promising to embrace his religion and the worship of the Greeks, he so far gained the king's favour, that he was sent back with such a power as Jason could not resist; who thereupon left Jerusalem, and retired into the country of the Ammonites. Upon his flight Menelaus took possession of the high-priesthood, and made good his promise to Antiochus, by apostatizing from the law of Moses to the superstition of the Greeks, and seducing as many of his countrymen as he could. Having thus taken possession of the high-priesthood, he neglected paying the money he had promised, and was on that account summoned to appear before the king at Antioch. But before he reached that city, Antiochus was gone from thence to quell an insurrection at Mal-lus and Tarsus, two cities of Cilicia. For the revenues of these two cities having been allotted to Antiochis, one of the king's concubines, for her maintainance, the inhabitants out of indignation, or perhaps because Antiochis exacted upon them, rose up in arms, and committed great disorders. Antiochus therefore hastened thither in person to appease the sedition, leaving the government of Antioch, during his absence, to Andronicus, one of the chief men of his court. In the mean time Menelaus, by selling many of the gold vessels of the temple, at Tyre and in the neighbouring cities, raised a sufficient sum, not only to pay the king, but to bribe Andronicus and the other courtiers to reinstate him in the king's favour. Onias, who was then confined to Antioch, could not help reproving the apostate for the sacrilege he had been guilty of in plundering the temple of the sacred vessels; which Menelaus not being able to brook, applied to Andronicus, and by promising a large sum of money engaged him to dispatch Onias, who upon intelligence of what was plotting against him, took sanctuary in the asylum at Daphne. But Andronicus, having by fair promises prevailed upon him to quit the asylum, treacherously slew him, and thereby earned the money which the impious Menelaus had promised him. His death was universally regretted by the Greeks, as well as the Jews of Antioch, who therefore joined in petitioning the king to take cognizance of the murder which had been committed in his absence. Antiochus, wicked as he was, had a great esteem and even veneration, for Onias; and therefore, to gratify his own resentment, as well as that of the Antiochians, who had presented him the petition, caused Andronicus, after he had been convicted of the crime laid to his charge, to be conducted with infamy to the place where the murder had been committed, and there put to death in such manner as his crime deserved<sup>m</sup>. Upon the authority of the second book of the Maccabees, we have rejected the testimony of Josephus, who tells us<sup>n</sup>, that Jason was not created high-priest till after the death of Onias. Nay in this Josephus contradicts himself; for in his small treatise of the Maccabees he relates this affair agreeable to the history we have followed. Antiochus, says he in that treatise, abrogating the high-priesthood of Onias, put his brother Jason in his room, who promised to pay him a yearly tribute of three thousand six hundred and sixty talents; when he was in possession of the high-priesthood, he led the nation, estranged from their ancient manners and institutions, into all sorts of iniquity; and not only established a gymnasium in the fortress of our country, but introduced a total neglect of the temple. Thus far Josephus, agreeable to the history of the Maccabees in every particular, save the annual tribute, which he increases, if the copy is not corrupted, beyond all measure.

* HIERONYMUS in Dan. & Polyb. legat. 82. p. 308. legat. & 72. p. 893.

<sup>1</sup> 2 MACCAB. iv. 21.

<sup>m</sup> 2 MACCAB. iv. 32, 33, 34, & seq.      <sup>n</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. ii. c. 6.

Epiphanes sent an embassy to Rome.

Antiochus having ever since the return of Apollonius from the Egyptian court been making the necessary preparations for the war, which he saw himself threatened with by Ptolemy on account of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, and finding himself in a condition to begin it; resolved to defer it no longer, but to carry it into the enemy's country instead of waiting for it in his own. He imagined that as Ptolemy was then but sixteen years of age, and governed intirely by weak ministers, he should be able to bring him to what terms he pleased. Besides, the Romans, under whose protection the Egyptians had put themselves, were not at leisure to afford them any assistance, by reason of the war which they had on their hands with Perfes king of Macedon; thinking therefore that he could not have a more favourable conjuncture for putting an end to the quarrel, he resolved forthwith to begin the war. However, to keep as far with the Romans as the case would admit, he sent an embassy to Rome to pay the arrears of the tribute that was due to the republic, and at the same time to lay before the senate the right he had to the provinces of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, then in his possession, and to justify the war which he was obliged to engage in to maintain them<sup>o</sup>. Apollonius, who was at the head of the embassy, carried with him besides the tribute, considerable presents for the republic. When the Syrians arrived at Rome, and were introduced to the senate, their speech consisted chiefly of apologies in the name of the king their master, for having so long delayed satisfying the Romans. For Seleucus had neglected to pay this debt, and Antiochus his successor had not yet been in a condition to discharge it. After Apollonius had paid down the whole sum, he offered, as a free gift, several vases of gold, which weighed five hundred pounds, returned the republic thanks for the excellent education their king had received at Rome, and the marks of honour that were paid him during his abode there, and concluded with laying before the senate his claim to Cæle-Syria and Palestine, and demanding that the alliance between Rome and Syria might be renewed. The senate received the envoys very graciously, defrayed their expences, and made them presents of a considerable value. The prætor Attilius was ordered to draw up the act of confederacy upon the same foot on which it had been made with Antiochus the Great. The money which the ambassadors delivered was put into the hands of the quæstors, and the gold vessels consigned to the censors, who offered them to such of the gods as they thought fit. As for the king's claim to the provinces of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, the senate put off the discussing of that point to a more proper season, returning no answer on that head <sup>2</sup>.

<sup>o</sup> LIV. l. xlii. c. 29. POLYB. legat. 71 p. 892 JUSTIN, l. xxxiv. c. 2. DIODOR. SICUL. legat. 18. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 6. HIERONYM. in DAN. c. 11.

BEFORE the ambassadors returned from Rome, Antiochus, putting himself at the head of his army, had marched towards the frontiers of Egypt. There he was met by the forces of Ptolemy between mount Casius and Pelusium. Hereupon an engagement ensued, in which the Egyptians were routed at the very first onset. Antiochus, taking advantage of this victory, fortified the frontiers of his dominions so well on that side, that they served ever after as a barrier to check the utmost efforts of the Egyptians attempting to recover those provinces. This was his first expedition into Egypt, after which, without engaging in any other enterprize that year, he returned to Tyre, and put his army into winter-quarters <sup>3</sup>.

*Invades
Egypt.*

DURING his stay at Tyre, three deputies from the sanhedrim of Jerusalem waited upon him to complain of Menelaus, whom they convicted, in the king's presence, of impiety, sacrilege, and many violences and disorders. Hereupon the king resolved to put him to death; but Menelaus, having bribed Ptolemy Macron (S), one of the king's ministers, with a large

<sup>2</sup> LIV. POLYB. JUSTIN. ibid. <sup>3</sup> HIERONYM LIV. POLYB. ibid.

(S) This Ptolemy Macron having been formerly governor of the island of Cyprus under king Ptolemy Philometor, had during his minority kept in his own hands all the revenues of that island; and could never be prevailed upon to deliver them up to the minister, notwithstanding their earnest call for them. But as soon as the king was declared to be out of his minority, he brought the whole sum to Alexandria, and paid it into the royal treasury. As it was a supply very much wanted at that time to answer the exigences of the government, he was highly commended for his conduct. But afterwards exasperated at some ill treatment he met with from the ministers, or because he was not rewarded for so important a service according to his expectation, he revolted from Ptolemy, went over to Antiochus, and delivered up to him the island of Cyprus. The king received him with great favour, took him into the number of his principal friends, and appointed him governor of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, sending Crates, who had commanded in the castle of Je- large sum of money, not only escaped the sentence which was ready to be pronounced against him, but prevailed upon the king to put the three deputies to death, as if they had accused him unjustly, which was such a bare-faced piece of oppression and injustice, that the Tyrians, touched with compassion at their unhappy fate, caused them to be honourably interred<sup>r</sup>.

His second expedition into Egypt.

Antiochus having spent the whole winter in making fresh preparations for a second expedition into Egypt, as soon as the season allowed him to take the field, marched to the frontiers of that country, where he gained a second victory over the forces of Ptolemy, took Pelusium, and led his army in to the very heart of the kingdom. In this last overthrow it was in his power to have cut off all the Egyptians to a man; but instead of pursuing this advantage, he took care to put a stop to the slaughter, riding about the field in person, and forbidding his men to put any more to death. This clemency gained him the hearts of the Egyptians so far, that when he advanced up into the country, all the inhabitants voluntarily submitted to him; by which means he made himself master of Memphis and all the rest of Egypt, except Alexandria, which held out against him<sup>r</sup>. In this second invasion Philopator fell into the hands of the conqueror; but whether he was taken prisoner, or surrendered himself to him of his own accord, is uncertain. The latter seems to some most likely; for Antiochus entertained him very kindly, allowed him his liberty, kept him at his own table, and carrying him with him to Memphis, affected to be extremely careful of the interest of the young king, and to manage the affairs of the kingdom as tutor and guardian to him. But when he once saw himself in possession of the country, he seized all that was valuable for himself, pillaged the cities, and caused such desolations as are not to be expressed, enriching himself and his army with the spoils of the plundered people. Philometor all this time made a pitiful figure; in the field he had always kept as far as possible from danger, and had not even shewn himself to those who fought for him. Af-

<sup>r</sup> 2 MACCAB. iv. 45-50. <sup>r</sup> 1 MACCAB. i. 17, 18. & 2. MACCAB. v. 1. HIERONYM. in Dan. xi. 24, 25. DIODOR SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii p. 311.

Jerusalem under Sostratus, to be governor of Cyprus in his stead (59). Great mention is made of Ptolemy Macron in the books of the Maccabees.

(59) Valesii. excerpt. ex. Polyb. p. 126.

1614110

terward he submitted to Antiochus in a most abject manner, suffering himself to be deprived of so large a kingdom, without making one single effort to preserve it. This, however, was not so much owing to his want of courage, and natural capacity, for he afterwards gave many instances of both, as to the effeminate education he had received under Eulæus his governor. For that eunuch, who was also his prime minister, had taken care, by corrupting him with all manner of luxury, to make him as unfit for business as he was able, that when the young prince was grown up, he might be as necessary to him, and consequently have the same power in the kingdom, as he had during his minority <sup>c</sup>.

WHILE Antiochus was thus employed in Egypt, a false report of his death prevailing all over Palestine, Jason thought this a proper opportunity to recover his station at Jerusalem, and therefore marched thither with above a thousand men; and, having by the assistance of the party he had in the city made himself master of it, and obliged Menelaus to retire into the citadel, practised all sorts of cruelties on his fellow citizens, unmercifully putting to death all those who fell into his hands, and whom he considered as enemies <sup>u</sup>. When advice of this was brought to Antiochus in Egypt, he concluded, that the Jews had made a general insurrection, and therefore marched with all haste out of Egypt into Judæa to quell it. What most provoked him was his being told, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem upon a false report of his death had made great rejoicings. He therefore in a great rage laid siege to the city, took it by storm, and in three days time slew forty thousand of the inhabitants, and taking as many prisoners sold them for slaves to the neighbouring nations. Nor did he stop here, but entering forcibly into the temple and the most sacred places, polluted with his presence the holy of holies itself, whither the wicked Menelaus led him. And to offer the greater indignity to that sacred place, he sacrificed a sow on the altar of burnt-offerings, and having caused part of it to be boiled, he ordered the temple to be sprinkled all over with the water in which it had been boiled, that he might thereby utterly defile it (T). After this adding sacrilege to profanation, he and profanes the temple.

Takes Jerusalem

carried

<sup>c</sup> 1 MACCAB. i. 19 JUSTIN. l. xxxv. c. 2.      <sup>u</sup> 1 MACCAB. i. 20---25. 2 MACCAB. v. vi. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 8.

(T) This circumstance is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus in the following words: “Antiochus Epiphanes, having overcome the “Jerus, entered the holy oracle of God, to which the priests on’y carried away the altar of incense, the shew-bread table, the candlestick of seven branches belonging to the sanctuary, which were all of gold, and several other vessels, utensils and gifts of kings likewise of gold, to the value of eighteen hundred talents. To complete the calamity of the Jews, Antiochus on his departure from Jerusalem appointed governor of Judæa one Philip a Phrygian, who was a man of a most cruel and inhuman temper, and Andronicus, another of the like disposition, governor of Samaria, and left Menelaus, the most wicked of the three, in the office of high-priest.

IN the mean time the Alexandrians, seeing Philometor in the hands of Antiochus, whom he suffered to govern his kingdom as he pleased, looked upon him as lost to them; and “ had access. There he found the statue of a man with a long “ beard, holding a book in his hand, and sitting upon an ass; “ which he took to be Moses, who built Jerusalem, founded the “ nation, and established those laws which are hated by all nations.

 “ But he desiring to take away what all nations abhorred, did his “ utmost to abrogate the laws. Therefore he sacrificed a great “ sow to the founder, on the altar of God, which stood in the o“ pen air, and poured blood both upon the statue and the altar, “ and boiling the flesh commanded the holy books containing their “ laws to be sprinkled with the water; the immortal taper, as “ they term it, which always burnt in the temple, he commanded “ to be put out, and compelled the chief-priest and other Jews to “ eat hog’s flesh”. Thus far Diodorus Siculus (60), who in this particular agrees with Josephus. This author tells us, that Antiochus, after he had made himself master of the city, sacrificed a sow upon the altar, and caused the temple to be sprinkled with the water, in which it had been boiled (61). And here we cannot help observing, that Josephus in his account of Antiochus’s taking the city of Jerusalem, not only contradicts all the antients, but even himself. For Polybius, Strabo, Timagenes, Apollodorus, Nicolaus Damascenus, &c. tell us, that Antiochus took Jerusalem by storm after he had lain a considerable time before it; and Josephus in his history of the Jewish war (62), writes in express terms, that Antiochus took the city by force, and represents him as enraged by what he had suffered in the siege; and in another place (63), he speaks of those who were slain in the siege fighting against Antiochus in defence of the place. But for all this, in his antiquities he tells us, that Antiochus entered the city without force, those of his party within opening the gates to him. But this is not the only place where that writer is inconsistent with himself.

(60) Diodor. Sicul. l. xxxiv. apud. Photium cod. 244.

(61)

Joseph. Antiquit. l. xiii. c. 16

(62) Joseph. de bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 1.

(63) Idem ibid. l. vi. c. 11.

therefore placed his younger brother on the throne, giving him the name of Euergetes, which was afterwards changed into that of Physcon or great-bellied, his luxury and gluttony having made him remarkably corpulent, and by this name he is most commonly mentioned in history. On his ascending the throne, Cineas and Cumanus were appointed his chief ministers, and to them was committed the care of restoring, if possible, the affairs of the kingdom to their former flourishing condition <sup>w</sup>.

Antiochus being informed of what was transacting in Egypt, took occasion from thence to return a third time into that country upon the specious pretence of restoring the deposed king; but in reality to make himself master of the kingdom. Having therefore defeated the Alexandrians in a sea-fight near Pelusium, he again entered that unhappy country at the head of a powerful army, and advanced directly to Alexandria with a design to besiege it. Whereupon the young king, consulting with his two ministers, agreed to summon a council composed of all the chief officers of the army, and to deliberate with them on the most proper means to extricate himself out of his present difficulties. After long debates in the council they came at last to this resolution; that as their affairs were in a very bad situation, it was absolutely necessary for them to make up matters with Antiochus, and that for this purpose the ambassadors, who were then at Alexandria, from several of the Greek states to the Egyptian court, should be desired to interpose their mediation. The ambassadors readily complied with the king's request, and being accompanied by two ambassadors from Ptolemy forthwith sailed up the Nile to wait on Antiochus with proposals of peace. Antiochus received them in his camp very kindly, and having given them the first day a noble entertainment, appointed the next to hear their proposals. The Achæans spoke the first, and afterwards the rest in their turns. All agreed in ascribing the calamities of the war to the ill conduct of Eulæus, and the minority of Ptolemy Philometor, made artful apologies in favour of the young king, and did all that lay in their power to soften Antiochus, and bring him to terms of peace with his nephew, laying great stress on their affinity. Antiochus in his answer to them acknowledged all to be true that they had said, as to the origin and cause of the war, and then took the opportunity of laying before them his title to the provinces of Cæle-Syria, and Palæstine, exhibiting the various reasons which we have already taken notice of, and producing some authentic instruments in proof of all that he alledged, which were judged so strong, that all there present were of opinion that he had the best right to those provinces. As for the proposals of peace, he referred them to a future treaty, which, he said, he would readily enter into with them, when two persons then absent, whom he named, should be with him, without whom, he told them, he would not take a single step in so important a negotiation. Having returned this answer, he raised his camp, went to Naucratis, and from thence marched to Alexandria, which city he closely besieged. In this extremity Ptolemy Euergetes and Cleopatra his sister, who were in the city, sent ambassadors to Rome, representing their case, and imploring the assistance of that powerful republic. The ambassadors being, soon after their arrival at Rome, introduced to the senate, appeared there dressed in the deepest mourning, and carrying olive-branches in their hands. After they had fallen prostrate before the conscript fathers, they expressed themselves in the following terms: Egypt, said they, which you have protected, and whose kings have been under your tuition, is now upon the very brink of ruin. Alexandria is besieged; and, to complete our misfortunes, the enemy, who threatens us, has found favour here. Antiochus, king of Syria, who has been brought up here as your hostage, is the scourge which the gods have brought upon us. If therefore Egypt has deserved your compassion, as she has always been faithful to you, ward off the blow that threatens her with destruction. Nothing is more easy to you than to fix on the head of our sovereign, and your friend and ally, a crown which an ambitious uncle would bereave him of. Antiochus reveres your authority, and pays a deference to your orders; one word from you will put an end to his unjust conquests and our fears. How glorious will it be for Rome to restore, with one word, tranquillity to Egypt! On the contrary, what a reflection would it be on your republic, if our sovereign should be forced to fly hither for refuge against an invasion, which you might with so much ease have prevented! The danger is imminent, and the least dilatoriness in your deliberations will make the disease incurable*. Both compassion and policy inclined the senate to favour the suppliants. They plainly saw, that it would be dangerous to suffer Antiochus to grow so powerful as the uniting the crown of

His third expedition into Egypt.

<sup>w</sup> PORPHYRIUS in GRÆC. EUSEB. SCALIGER. p. 60 & 63. POLYB. legat. 81. p. 907. LIV. l. xlv. c. 19.

The Egyptians apply to the Roman senate.

* POLYB. legat. 90. p. 915. & legat. 84. p. 909. LIV. l. xlv. c. 19. JUSTIN, l. xxxiv. 2.

Egypt to that of Syria would make him. The senate therefore resolved to send without delay an embassy into Egypt to put an end to the war. The persons appointed for this important negotiation were Caius Popilius Lænas, Caius Decimius, and Caius Hostilius, their instructions were, that they should first wait on Antiochus, and afterwards on Ptolemy, should order them in the name of the senate to suspend all hostilities, and put an end to the war; which if either of them should refuse to do, they were to let him know, that the Romans would no longer look upon him as their friend and ally. As the danger was imminent, three days after the resolution was taken in the senate they set out together with the Egyptian ambassadors from Rome † (U).

IN the mean time ambassadors arrived in Egypt from Rhodes, sent by that republic on purpose to make up matters between the contending parties. These landing at Alexandria went from thence, after having received the proper instructions from the ministers of that court, to the camp of Antiochus before the town, and used their utmost endeavours to make a thorough reconciliation between him and his nephew, insisting on the long friendship and alliance which had subsisted between them and both crowns, and the obligations which they thought themselves under on this account to use their best offices, in order to settle a good understanding between them. But while they were making long harangues on these topics, Antiochus interrupting them, declared in few words, that there was no occasion for long speeches on that subject, that the kingdom belonged to Philometor the elder brother, with whom he had concluded a peace, and contracted a strict friendship, and that if they would restore the crown to him, the war would be ended at once. Thus he spoke, but harboured very different designs in his heart. The resistance he met with at Alexandria, which city he plainly † LIV, I, xliv. c. 9. POLYB. legat. 90. p. 915.

(U) The time of the departure of the ambassadors from Rome is thus expressed in an antient diary, which Pighius has inserted in the second volume of his annals (64). The third day before the nones of April, C. Popilius Lænas, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, are sent ambassadors to the kings of Syria and Egypt to put an end to the war between them. The ambassadors early in the morning, attended by a troop of their clients and relations, sacrificed in the temple of Castor to the household gods of the Roman people a bull, and thus concluded their sacrifices.

(64) Vide Pighii Annal. ad Annam urbis 587.

saw he should never be able to master, had made him change his plan, and conclude, that the surest way to compass his design was to keep up an animosity between the two brothers, and engage them in a war against each other, which as it would soon exhaust the kingdom, would give him a fair opportunity of overpowering both, and seizing the whole for himself. With this view he raised the siege of Alexandria, marched towards Memphis, and there put Philometor in possession of the whole kingdom, except Pelusium, which he retained, that he might re-enter Egypt, having the key of that country in his hands, the instant matters were ripe for his purpose. Having thus settled things agreeable to his new scheme, he returned to Antioch <sup>a</sup>.

Philometor being roused at length from the deep lethargy into which his indolence and effeminacy had plunged him, had penetration enough to see into Antiochus's design. His keeping of Pelusium was a sufficient indication to him, that he held this gate of Egypt with no other view but to invade the country, when his brother and he should have wasted their strength by their domestic broils, and not be in a condition to make head against him; in which case they would both fall victims to his unbounded ambition. The instant therefore that Antiochus left Egypt he sent to his brother, intreating him to lay aside all animosity, and make a thorough reconciliation, lest Antiochus taking advantage of their domestic feuds, should dispossess them both of the kingdom. Ptolemy Physcon readily embraced the proposal, and by the mediation of Cleopatra, who was sister to both, an agreement was made upon terms, that the two brothers should reign jointly. After this Philometor returned to Alexandria, and Egypt was restored to its former tranquillity, to the great joy of the inhabitants, particularly of the Alexandrians, who had greatly suffered by the war <sup>a</sup>. But the two brothers, not doubting but Antiochus would soon invade the kingdom anew, sent ambassadors into Greece to hire there some auxiliaries (W), which indeed

<sup>a</sup> LIV. l. xlv. c. 11.      <sup>a</sup> LIV. ibid. JUSTIN. l. xxxiv. c. 2. PORPHYR. in GREC. EUSEB SCALIGER p. 60. & in EUSEB Chron. p. 68. POLYB. legat 89 p. 912.

(W) These ambassadors were sent into Achaia, desiring, in the two kings names, only a thousand foot under the command of Lycurtus, and two hundred horse under the conduct of his son Polybius the historian. The assembly of the Achaians was then sitting at Corinth, and Callistrates, who presided in it, opposed the request of deed was a very prudent step ; for Antiochus hearing of the reconciliation of the two brothers, and finding his fine scheme thereby intirely defeated, fell into a great rage, and resolved to pull off the mask, and employ the whole force of his kingdom against both. Accordingly early in the spring he sent his fleet to Cyprus to secure that island, and at the same time marched in person by land at the head of a powerful army to reduce the kingdom of Egypt, and seize it for himself, without pretending, as he had done before, to espouse the cause, and support the interest, of one of his nephews. On his arrival at Rhinocorura he was met by embassadors from Philometor, who after having complimented him in

of the embassadors, pretending that it was not for the interest of the Achæan confederacy to concern themselves with foreign affairs ; but that they ought to keep their troops at home, that they might be in a readiness to assist the Romans against Perses. Lycortas and Polybius answered Callicrates, and in their answer observed, that Polybius, having waited on the Roman consul Marcus, who commanded the army in Macedon, and offered him the succours which the Achæans had agreed to send him, the consul had thanked him, and at the same time told him, that since he had got footing in Macedon, he should not want any foreign aid ; and hence they concluded, that the Achæans ought not, on that pretence, to refuse the kings of Egypt the succours they required. They added, that as the Achæan republic could, without the least inconvenience, raise thirty or forty thousand men, so small a number, as was desired by the princes, could not lessen their strength ; that they ought to seize this opportunity of assisting them ; that it would be a monstrous piece of ingratitude to requite in this manner the many favours which they had received from the kings of Egypt ; and that their refusal, on this occasion, would even be an infringement of the treaties concluded between them and that crown. This speech moved the members of the assembly, who were all for sending immediately to the kings the succours they required ; which Callicrates observing, dismissed the assembly, pretending that it was not lawful to debate on an affair of this nature in a general meeting. It was therefore referred to a particular assembly, that was soon after held at Sicyon. In this all the members were of the same opinion with Lycortas and Polybius, when Callicrates produced a forged letter from Marcus the Roman consul, wherein he exhorted the Achæans to interpose their mediation, and use their good offices, in order to put an end to the war between the Ptolemies and Antiochus. This letter, which no one suspected to be forged, determined the Achæan confederates to send an embassy only to the contending princes (65).

(65) Polyb. legat. 89 — 91.

their master's name, and told him that their sovereign owed his restoration to his good offices, conjured him not to destroy his own work, but to suffer him peaceably to enjoy the crown, which he wore by his favour. But Antiochus, now throwing off the mask, and laying aside those tender and affectionate expressions which he had hitherto made shew of, returned the ambassadors this haughty answer; that he would not grant peace to either of the brothers, but upon condition that the island of Cyprus, the city of Pelusium, with all the lands on that branch of the Nile on which it stood, and the provinces of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, were delivered up to him for ever. Having thus declared his real design, he fixed a day for their returning him an answer to his demand, which not being satisfactory, he entered Egypt in an hostile manner, and, having reduced the whole country as far as Memphis, received there the submission of most of the other cities and provinces. From Memphis he marched to Alexandria, with a design to besiege that city, the reduction of which would have made him absolute master of all Egypt. And this he would, without all doubt, have accomplished, had not the Roman ambassadors put a stop to his further progress, and dashed at once all the designs which he had been so long carrying on, in order to possess himself of that country<sup>b</sup>.

The Roman em-bassadors oblige him to quit E-SYP:

THE ambassadors came up with him at Eleusina, a village but four miles distant from Alexandria, and Popilius accosted him with an air of gravity proper to gain himself respect. As the king was intimately acquainted with Popilius, and had contracted great familiarity with him, while he was an hostage at Rome, as he drew near him, he offered him his hand, which was an uncommon mark of familiarity and distinction from so great a prince. But Popilius, disdaining this kind reception, told him, that the public interest of his country must take place of private friendship, and that he would not join hands with him till he had first read to him the decree of the senate, with which he was sent. I shall judge, said he, by your submission or refusal, whether you ought to be treated as a friend or an enemy. If you obey, I shall receive all marks of your friendship with joy. These words were very shocking to a victorious and powerful king at the head of a numerous army. However, Antiochus took the decree which Popilius offered him, and, after having read it, told him that he would advise with his council about it, and return him an answer in a short time. But the proud republican insisting on an immediate answer, drew a circle round him in the sand with a rod, which he held in his hand, and, raising his voice, You shall not go out of this circle, said he, till you either accept or reject the proposal I have made to you. I expect you will pay me the respect that is due to the authority of the Roman people and senate. The king, struck with this strange and peremptory way of proceeding, hesitated a moment, and then gave this answer, which would better have become a slave than a great king. Then I must satisfy you, Popilius, I will do what your republic expects from me. He had no sooner spoke than all the three ambassadors offered him their hands at once, and Popilius behaved thenceforth according to his former friendship with him. The Roman ambassadors, after Antiochus had left Egypt, returned to Alexandria, and, having there put the last hand to the treaty of peace and reconciliation between the two brothers, sailed to Cyprus, which Antiochus had conquered, obliged him to withdraw his troops from that island, and then returned to Rome to acquaint the senate with the success of their negotiations. They were soon followed by ambassadors from Antiochus, and the two Ptolemies. The former being introduced to the senate, made the following speech, which sufficiently shewed what a mean-spirited prince Antiochus was: Though Popilius, said they, communicated your pleasure to the king our master at a time when all Egypt was ready to sink under his arms; yet he preferred obedience to victory. He thought himself as indispensibly obliged to submit to the decisions of Rome, as to fulfil the will of the immortal gods. To this fulsome speech the senate returned the following answer; Antiochus did wisely in putting our orders in execution. The senate and people of Rome are satisfied with his conduct. After the Syrian ambassadors those from Egypt were introduced; they addressed the senate in the like extravagant strain; To you, conscript fathers, said they, we owe the deliverance of Egypt, and the concord that now reigns among us. The departure of Antiochus, and the union between the two rival princes by you brought to a happy issue, have secured our liberty, and restored peace to the kingdom. A double benefit! for which the kings and people of Egypt are as much indebted to you, as children to their parents, or mortals to the immortal gods. The senate answered in a few words, Rome, said they, shares your happiness, and is pleased with your gratitude. Egypt may always depend on her protection. After these compliments were paid, the prætor was ordered to make the embassadors the usual presents<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> LIEB & JUSTIN. ubi supra.

* POLYB. legat. 92. p. 916. LIV. l. xlv. c. 11, 12. JUSTIN l. xxxiv. c. 3. APPIAN. in Syriac. VAL. MAX. l. vi. c. 4. VELLEIUS PATERCUL. l. i. c. 10. PIUT. in apophtheg. c. 32. HIERONYM. in DAN. xi. 27.

Vents his rage upon Jerusalem. Antiochus, on his return from Egypt, being highly provoked to see himself thus obliged to quit a kingdom, which he looked upon as his own, vented his rage upon the unhappy city of Jerusalem, which had no ways offended him. On his march through Palestine he detached twenty two thousand men under the conduct of Apollonius, with orders utterly to destroy the place. Apollonius, arriving at Jerusalem, carefully concealed his orders, and behaved in a friendly manner till the next sabbath, when, seeing all the people assembled in their synagogues to perform the religious duties of the day, he thought that the most proper time for putting his bloody commission in execution. Accordingly he let loose all his troops upon the unarmed and defenceless multitude, ordering them to put all the men to the sword, and seize the women and children, who, by the king's orders, were to be sold for slaves. This barbarous command was executed with the utmost rigor and cruelty; the soldiers inhumanly butchered all the men they could meet with; infomuch, that the very channels in the streets flowed with blood. They afterwards plundered the city, and set it on fire in several places, pulled down the houses, demolished the walls, and built with the ruins, which the fire had spared, a fortress on the top of one of the hills of the city of David, over-against the temple, which it commanded. This fortress they made their place of arms to keep the whole nation in awe, stored it with all manner of provisions, and laid up in it all the spoils which they had taken in the plunder of the city. From hence the garison used to sally out upon those who came to worship the true God in the temple, sprinkling the sanctuary with blood, and defiling it with all manner of pollutions, which their malice and hatred to the Jewish nation could suggest. The temple was therefore deserted, and a stop put to the daily sacrifices, none of the true servants of God daring to go thither to worship<sup>e</sup>. But the desolations he caused in Judæa, the cruel persecution which he stirred up against the true believers, and the bloody war which he carried on against the people of God, with the generous resistance made first by Mattathias, and afterwards by his son, the brave Judas Maccabæus, we shall de-describe at length in the history of the Jews, as in a more proper place.

<sup>d</sup> LIV. l. xlv. POLYB. legat. 92. VAL. MAX: l. vi. c. 4.

<sup>e</sup> POLYB. ibid. 1 MACCAB. i. 29, 40. 2 MACCAB. v. 24, 25, 26. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7. & in præfat. ad histor. de Bell. Judaic. & l. i. c. 1. & l. vi. c. 11. ejusdem histor.

AFTER several of Antiochus's generals had been defeated, and the armies they commanded cut to pieces by Judas Maccabæus, the king of Syria sent at length Lysias, one of the greatest lords of his court, to complete the abolition of the law of God, and the destruction of its few defenders. The Syrian army designed for this purpose consisted of sixty thousand men ; and these preparations alarmed Tiberius Gracchus, whom the Roman senate had sent to visit all the kings, republics, and free cities in the east. He immediately flew to Antioch to watch the steps, and examine the designs of the king, whom he soon found to be no ways a formidable enemy. During the stay of Gracchus at Antioch, Antiochus hearing that Paulus Æmilius the Roman general, after having conquered Perses king of Macedon, and subdued that kingdom, had celebrated games at Amphipolis on the river Strymon, caused the same to be exhibited at Daphne near Antioch, having first sent emissaries into all parts to invite spectators, and to bring, at an immense expence, the best actors and most skilful workmen in Europe and Asia. The games were celebrated with incredible pomp and magnificence, and were by far the finest that had ever been in Syria (X). The part

(X) Polybius gives us the following account of the solemn procession which preceded the sports. In the first place marched five thousand men, all in the flower of their age, and in the attire of Roman soldiers ; these were followed by the like number of young men in the Myfian dress ; next to them came three thousand Cilicians in light armour, with crowns of gold on their heads ; then came three thousand Thracians, five thousand Galatians, many of them having silver shields, two hundred and forty couple of gladiators, a thousand young men mounted on Nicean horses, three thousand riding other horses, most of them with gold trappings, and gold crowns. These were succeeded by a thousand of the king's friends all on horseback with most costly trappings ; four thousand choice horsemen, all in purple robes interwoven with gold ; a hundred chariots drawn by six horses abreast, and forty two by four horses ; eight hundred youths with crowns of gold, walking before the statues of the Syrian and Greek deities and heroes, which were carried by men in most rich and costly robes, and attended by a thousand pages, all belonging to Dionysius the king's secretary, and each of them carrying a silver vessel, weighing a thousand drachmas ; the king's pages, to the number of six hundred, carrying vessels of gold, two hundred women on foot, with chalices of gold full of sweet smelling waters to sprinkle the spectators. The part the king there acted during the whole time, answered in every respect the character which Daniel had given of him, calling him a vile and despicable person. He exposed himself by a thousand indecent actions to the scorn and ridicule of that numerous assembly, and caused more laughter than the best pantomimes; insomuch, that many of the spectators shocked at a conduct so unworthy of a prince, and so repugnant to all rules of modesty and decorum, fled from the shows and returned home. On this occasion he brought out before the people all the vases and valuable moveables in his treasury, which had never before been seen in public; and there is no doubt but the spoils of the temple of Jerusalem were the finest part of the show. Towards the Roman deputy Antiochus behaved himself with the meanest flattery, attending him like a slave, and giving him his own palace to live in, while he himself lodged in a borrowed house the whole time Tiberius continued at Antioch; nay, he even of-

The procession was closed by fourscore women in a very rich and expensive attire, carried in litters with legs, according to the fashion of those days, of massy gold, and five hundred more in litters with legs of silver. Besides the procession, sports, shews, and diversions of all kinds were exhibited every day for the space of a month; during which time the king entertained all the spectators of any note or rank at fifteen hundred tables, which were daily served at an immense charge with the most expensive dishes of Europe and Asia. In the rooms were placed fifteen large jars of gold, filled with precious ointments for the use of the king's guests. In short, the whole was performed with such order, elegance, and splendor, as can hardly be expressed. But most of the spectators were more offended at the mean and unbecoming behaviour of the king, than pleased with all the rest. At the procession he appeared on a little palfrey, riding full speed up and down, as if he had not been in his right senses. He waited in person sometimes at one table, and sometimes at another, walking in his royal robes, and with the diadem on his head, before those who brought in the dishes. Sometimes he took it in his head to lie down on the floor, and there with a thousand indecent actions put his guests quite out of countenance. He was once carried into the room, where his guests of most distinction were entertained, in the disguise of a pantomime, and laid down on the floor as if he had been dead; but being roused by a sudden flourish of instruments, he started up, and began to dance with so many ridiculous gestures, that the whole company, shocked to the highest degree at such a mean behaviour in a king, rose up at once, and left the room (66).

(66) Polyb. apud Athenæum, l. v. c. 4. & l. x. c. 12. Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valerii, p. 321.

ferred to resign his crown to him ; which offer the wise Roman rejected with the utmost indignation, and judging of the king from what he himself had seen, he acquainted his republic, that they had no reason to be under the least apprehension of any danger from the king of Syria <sup>d</sup>.

SCARCE was the Roman envoy gone, when news was brought to Antiochus, that the armies, which he had sent against the Jews, were intirely cut off. Hereupon the king in a great rage drew all his troops together, which formed a very numerous army, being fully determined to destroy the whole Jewish nation, and settle new colonies in their country. But when he came to pay his army, he found his treasury so exhausted that there was not money in it sufficient for that purpose, he having expended vast sums in his late shows, and besides squandered away the greatest part of his revenues in the presents he bestowed on his friends and followers. For he was naturally very generous, and in this particular excelled, as the author of the book of the Maccabees tells us, all the kings before him ; and the prophet Daniel speaks of him as scattering among his followers, the prey, and the spoil, and riches. How he came by these riches, spoil, and prey, Athenæus tells us : All these expences, says he, speaking of Antiochus, were made partly out of the prey, which contrary to the promise he had made to Philometor, he took in Egypt, partly out of the gifts of his friends, but chiefly out of the spoils of the many temples which he had sacrilegiously robbed <sup>e</sup>.

BESIDES the straits and difficulties to which the want of money reduced him, he was greatly perplexed, according to the prophecy of Daniel, by tidings that came to him out of the east, and out of the north. For in the north Artaxias king of Armenia had revolted from him, and Persia, which was in the east, paid no longer the usual tribute, all things being there, as in the other parts of the empire, in the utmost confusion, by reason of a decree which the king had enacted, injoining all the nations subject to him to renounce the religion of their ancestors, and conform to that of the Greeks. To put a speedy end to these evils, and prevent their spreading, Antiochus resolved to divide his army into two parts, leaving one of them with Lyfias to reduce the Jews, and marching in person with the other, first into Armenia, and afterward into Persia, to restore the affairs of those provinces to their former condition. Accordingly having left Lysias governor of all the provinces on this side of the Euphrates, and committed to his care the education of his son Antiochus Eupator, who was then but seven years old; he crossed mount Taurus, and entering Armenia defeated Artaxias (Y), and took him prisoner. From Armenia he marched into Persia, in order to oblige the inhabitants of that rich province to pay him the arrears of their yearly tribute. He there was informed, that the city of Elymais was greatly renowned for its wealth, and that there was in the place a temple, dedicated, according to Polybius, to Diana, according to Appian, to Venus, in which immense sums were lodged. Upon this notice he flew to Elymais with a design to plunder both the city and the temple, as he had done at Jerusalem. But his design having taken vent, the inhabitants of the city and the neighbouring villages, taking up arms in defence of their temple, repulsed him with the greatest ignominy. Antiochus, greatly grieved at this disgrace, withdrew to Ecbatan in Media. Soon after his arrival thither, news was brought him of the defeat of Nicanor and Timotheus, two of his generals, in Judæa; which enraged him to such a degree, that he immediately set out from Media with all possible expedition, in order to make that nation feel the most dreadful effects of his wrath, breathing nothing on his march but total ruin and utter destruction. As he was thus hastening towards Babylonia, through which he was to pass on his return, he was met on the road by fresh messengers, bringing him an account that Lysias had been defeated, that the Jews had retaken the temple, thrown down the images and altars which he had erected, and restored their former worship. At this news his fury and rage increased, and being impatient to reach Antioch, that he might from thence march in person against the Jews, and execute his vengeance upon the whole nation, he commanded his charioteer to drive with the utmost speed, threatening to utterly extirpate the whole nation without leaving one single person of the Jewish race alive. He had scarce uttered these words when he was seized with a great pain in his bowels, which no remedy could cure or abate. But notwithstanding this violent shock, suffering himself to be hurried away by the wild transports of his fury, he gave orders for proceeding with the same precipitation in the journey. But while he was thus hastening forwards, he fell from his chariot, and was by the fall so bruised, that his attendants were forced to put him into a litter. But not being able to bear even the motion of the litter, he was obliged to halt at a town called Tabæ (Z), situate among the mountains of Parætacene on the confines of Persia and Babylonia, and there keep his bed, suffering inexpressible torments, occasioned chiefly by the vermin which bred in his body, and the stench which made him insupportable even to himself. But the torments of his mind, caused by his reflecting on the former actions of his life, surpassed by many degrees those of his body. Polybius, who in his account of this wicked prince's death, agrees with Josephus, and with the authors of the first and second book of the Maccabees, tells us, that the uneasiness of his mind grew at last to a constant delirium or state of madness, by reason of several specters and apparitions of evil genii or spirits, which, he imagined, were continually reproaching him with the many wicked actions he had been guilty of. Polybius indeed ascribes all this to the sacrilegious attempt which he made on the temple of Diana

<sup>d</sup> POLYB. apud Athen. l. v. c. 4. p. 104, 107. & l. x. c. 12. p. 439. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valefii. p. 321. DANIEL. XI. 21. MACCAB. I. i. c. i. v. 21. <sup>e</sup> MACCAB. I. i. c. 3. v. 27. & seq. ATHENÆUS Deipnosoph. l. v. p. 195.

(Y) Artaxias the first of that name, of whom mention is made here, had, according to Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, and Appian, commanded the troops of Antiochus the great in the provinces of Asia, which were subject to the crown of Syria, and with the consent of his master made himself sovereign of a small state in Upper Armenia; while Thariades, another of the same king's generals, established a new kingdom, likewise with the consent of Antiochus in Lower Armenia. After the defeat of Antiochus, they both put themselves under the protection of the Romans. Nevertheless Epiphanes made war upon Artaxias, cut his army in pieces, and took the prince himself prisoner. But his captivity, in all likelihood, lasted no longer than the life of Epiphanes. For we find him soon after at war with Mythrobuzanes, the son of Thariades, whom he forced to abandon his dominions, and fly for refuge to Ariarathes king of Cappadocia. Artaxias did all that lay in his power to prevail upon Ariarathes to destroy the fugitive prince. But the king of Cappadocia was so far from being seduced with the flattering hopes Artaxias gave him of sharing with him the provinces of Lower Armenia, that he even had the generosity to re-establish at the head of a powerful army Mythrobuzanes on his throne.

The unhappy death of Antiochus Epiphanes
Year of the Flood, 2834.
Before Christ,
165.

(Z.) Polybius and Porphyrius agree with the author of the second book of the Maccabees, as to the place where Antiochus ended his day. Castaldus is of opinion that Tabæ and Ecbatan are one and the same city. It is plain from the history of the Maccabees that Tabæ stood in a mountainous country, and such was the province of Ecbatan in Media. But Niger thinks that the situation of Tabæ agrees better with that of the present city of Ispahan. 2. Curcius places Tabæ in Parætacene, which is the most northern province of Persia.

in Elymais, without taking any notice of the many sacrileges and profanations which he had not only attempted, but actually committed at Jerusalem. But Josephus, with much more reason and justice, imputes his cruel death to what he did at Jerusalem; and of this Antiochus himself, as we read in the first book of the Maccabees, seems to have been well apprised. To what a condition, said he to his friends in the height of his torments, am I reduced! what a change of fortune have I undergone! Alas! I now remember with grief the calamities I brought on Jerusalem. I am but too sensible of the vengeance of the God, whom I have provoked; and it shall be now my whole business to appease him. I will restore to the Jews, whom I have persecuted, their antient privileges and liberties: I will make them as happy and independent as the city of Athens: I will restore the temple of the true God to its former lustre, and return the sacred vessels, and even increase their number. Nay, I will embrace the law of the circumcised myself, and zealously promote it in others. Thus spoke Antiochus, hoping he should appease the Almighty by these great promises; but as they were extorted from his mouth, and not from his heart, by the violence of his unrelenting torments, he did not obtain mercy, though he sought it with tears; and therefore, after having languished some time in this deplorable condition, he ended his unhappy life after having reigned eleven years and some months<sup>t</sup>. Porphyrius, Eusebius, Jerom, Sulpitius Severus, and others tell us, that he reigned only eleven years; but the author of the first book of the Maccabees says, that he began his reign in the 137th year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and died in the 149th, which lengthens his reign to twelve years. To reconcile the abovementioned writers with the author of the history of the Maccabees, we must say with the learned Usher, that Antiochus began his reign in the end of the 137th year, and died in the beginning of the 149th year of that æra, after having reigned, according to that computation, eleven years and some months (A). As Antiochus

<sup>t</sup> MACCAB. I. i. c. 6. & ii. c. 9, &c. POLYB. in excerpt Valesii, p. 144. APPIAN. in Syriac. JOSEPH. Antiq. I. xii. c. 13. Hieronym. in Dan. xi. 36. EUSEB. in Chron.

(A) As Antiochus the great attempted the same sacrilege in the country of Elymais, which Antiochus his son is said to have attempted in the city of Elymais, some have imagined that the identity of names may have led writers into a mistake, and made them ascribe to both the sacrilege, which was attempted only by one. On this

sup

chus Epiphanes was a violent persecutor of the Jewish church, and a type of the Antichrist, who in after-ages is to afflict the christian church, more is said relating to him in the prophecies of Daniel, than to any other prince. But of this more at length in our notes (B). Antiochus supposition Scaliger (67) finds fault with S. Jerom, for saying in his comment on the eleventh chapter of Daniel, that Antiochus the great was cut off with his whole army by the Elymæans, which he pretends not to be true of Antiochus the great, but only of his son Epiphanes. But what Jerom says is vouched by many other writers of no mean character, viz. that Antiochus the great was thus cut off in attempting to plunder the temple of the Elymæans, and none ever said that Epiphanes lost his life in such an attempt; for he escaped, with the loss indeed of many of his men, and died some time after, as Appian (68), Polybius (69), Josephus (70), and the authors of the first and second book of the Maccabees witness. Besides, though the attempt was made by both princes in the same country, yet it was not on the same temple; for that of Antiochus the great was on the temple of Belus, and that of Epiphanes on the temple of Diana, which goddess is said by Strabo to have had a very rich temple in the country of the Elymæans (71). The same author tells us, that this temple was plundered by one of the Parthian kings, who found in it ten thousand talents. This temple, as the same Strabo informs us (72), was called Azara, or, as Casaubon reads it (73), Zara; whence Diana was called by the Persians Zaretis (74).

(B) The eleventh chapter of Daniel from the twentieth verse to the end, is wholly concerning Antiochus Epiphanes. The whole may be divided into two parts, whereof the first relates to his war in Egypt, and the other to the persecution carried on by him against the Jews. And first as to his wars with Egypt, the prophet after having spoke of his accession to the crown in the twenty-first verse; And in his estate (Seleucus Philopator's) shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries (75); after having thus, I say, pointed out his accession to the throne, the prophet goes on thus: and with the arms of a flood shall they (the Syrians) be overflown before him, (Antiochus Epiphanes) and shall be broken; yea also the prince of the covenant. Heliodorus, who had murdered Seleucus, and his adherents, as also the partisans of the king of Egypt, who had formed designs against Syria, were defeated by the forces of Attalus, and dispersed by the arrival of Antiochus, whose

(67) Scaliger. in animadver. ad Euseb. chron p. 140. (68) Appian. in Syriac. (69) Polybius. in excerpt. Valesii. p. 144. (70) Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 13. (71) Strab. l. xvi. p. 744. (72) Idem ibid. (73) Casaub. in notis ad pag. 744. (74) Hesych. in voce Ζαρητις. (75) Daniel. c. xi. v. 21. v. 22. v. 23. v. 25. v. 40.

Antiochus Eupator. Antiochus before he expired, having sent for Philip, who was his chief favourite, and had been brought up with him from presence disconcerted all their measures. By the prince of the covenant, some suppose to be meant Heliodorus, the ring-leader of the conspirators ; others Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, who lost his life by a plot laid by his own subjects, while he was bent upon a war with Syria. In the following verses Daniel evidently speaks of Antiochus's four different expeditions into Egypt ; And after the league made with him (with Ptolemy Philometor his nephew, king of Egypt) he shall work deceitfully ; for he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people. Antiochus, though he was already determined in his own mind to wage war, assumed a specious appearance of friendship for the king of Egypt ; nay, he even sent Apollonius to congratulate his nephew on occasion of his coronation, and to assist in his name at that ceremony. Nevertheless soon after, on pretence of defending him, he marched into Egypt, defeated his forces, and returned to Tyre loaded with the spoils of the plundered people. What is said in the twenty fifth, fortieth, forty-second and forty third verses, was accomplished in his second expedition into Egypt, viz. And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army, and the king of the south shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army, but he shall not stand : for they shall forecast devices against him : and at the time of the end shall the king of the south push at him, and the king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind with chariots, and with horsemen and with many ships : and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over. Antiochus, after having employed the whole winter in making preparations for a second expedition into Egypt, invaded that country both by sea and land as soon as the season allowed him, and entered into Egypt, as we read in the first book of the Maccabees (76), with a great multitude, with chariots, with elephants, and horsemen, and a great navy,--and made war against Ptolemy king of Egypt. If we compare the history of the Maccabees, and indeed the profane writers, with Daniel's prophecies, we shall find a perfect agreement among them, with this difference alone, that the prophet is more clear and particular than any of the historians. He shall stretch forth his hand, continues the prophet, also upon the countries, and the land of Egypt shall not escape. But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt. Antiochus after the victory, which he gained over Ptolemy's forces in his second expedition into Egypt, made himself master of all that country, Alexandria alone excepted, over running it with an astonishing rapidity, which his forefathers had not done, nor his father's fathers, as the prophet expresses it. What we read in the twenty-sixth verse, viz.

(76) Maccab. i. c. i. v. 17, 18, 19.

from his infancy, appointed him regent of the Syrian empire during the minority of his son, and delivered into his hands the

Yea, they that feed of the portion of his (the king of Egypt's) meat shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow; and many shall fall down slain; this I say was fulfilled by the revolt of Ptolemy Macron from Philometor, and the treachery and male-administration of Lenæus, Eulæus, and other ministers employed under them. What is said in the twenty-seventh verse was fulfilled in the meeting of Antiochus and Philometor at Memphis; and both these kings hearts shall be to do mischief, says the prophet, and they shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper; for yet the end shall be at the time appointed. The two princes, in the time of the second and third expedition of Antiochus into Egypt, met at Memphis, eat frequently at the same table, and behaved towards one another with all the outward marks of a sincere friendship. The uncle seemed to have the nephew's interest at heart, and the nephew to repose an intire confidence in his uncle. But all this was mere shew and out-side; they both spoke lyes; the design of Antiochus being to seize on the kingdom for himself, and Philometor's to lay hold of the first opportunity that offered, to disappoint him; as he did accordingly by agreeing with his brother and the Alexandrians, as we have observed in the text, out of Livy and other profane historians (77). Hereupon followed what is foretold in the twenty-ninth and thirtieth verses; At the time appointed he shall return, and come towards the south, but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter. For the ships of Chittim shall come against him; therefore he shall grieve and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant. For advice being brought to Antiochus, that the two brothers were reconciled, he pulled off the mask, and openly owned that he intended to take possession of Egypt himself, and with this view he returned and came again towards the south, that is, into Egypt; but he did not prevail as in the former, and in the latter attempts upon that country, by reason of the ships that came from Chittim, or the country of the Greeks against him, having on board Popilius Lænas and the other Roman ambassadors. For these, having embarked on some Greek ships, which they found at Delos, sailed from thence to Egypt, and finding Antiochus before Alexandria, obliged him to leave the country, to his great grief, and return to his own dominions. However, what the prophet foretold in the forty second and forty-third verses, of his stretching forth his hand upon the land of Egypt, and his having power over the treasures of gold and silver, and all other the precious things of that country, had its thorough completion; for in all his expeditions into Egypt, he miserably harassed that country, returning from thence loaded with spoils, and carrying treasures of gold and silver taken by him and his followers (78). And thus far the prophecies of Daniel the diadem, the seal of the empire, and the other ensigns of royalty, charging him above all things to give his son, then nine years old, such an education as might qualify him to govern his subjects with justice and moderation. But Philip, on his arrival at Antioch, found the employment, which the king had conferred upon him, usurped by another. For Lysias, upon the first advice of the king's death, had placed his son Antiochus, who was then under his care, on the throne, giving him the name of Antiochus Eupator, and assuming to himself the tuition of his person and the government of his kingdom. Philip well knew that he was not at that time in a condition to contend with so powerful a rival, and therefore retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding at that court the assistance he wanted to drive out the intruder, and take upon him the government which the king had intrusted him with <sup>g</sup>.

(77) Liv. l. xliv. c. 19. Athenæus, l. v. p. 195. (78) Athen. l. v. p. 195. Hieronym. in Dan. c. xi. v. 27.

Demetrius demands in tor, who had been an hostage at Rome ever since his father's vain leave death, and was now in the twenty third year of his age, hearing of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes and the accession of his son Eupator to the crown, which of right belonged to him, as the son of the elder brother, applied to the senate, and strongly represented to them the indisputable title he had to the crown of Syria. The same destiny, said he, when he was introduced to the conscript fathers, which formerly deprived Syria of Seleucus my father, has just now taken from her my uncle Antiochus. They succeeded one another in the throne, and each of them left a son a minor. I was of the same age as young Antiochus is now, when upon the death of my father I was judged incapable of governing so great an empire. Afterwards I was brought from my native country to this place as an relating to the wars between the kings of Syria and the kings of Egypt, or as the prophet styles them, between the kings of the north and the kings of the south. As to the other part of Daniel's prophecy, which relates to the cruel persecution he brought upon the Jews, we shall take notice of it in the history of that people. In the mean time we cannot help observing, that by the prince of the covenant, mentioned in the twenty-second verse, the prophet most likely pointed out Onias the high-priest of the Jews, who was deposed and banished by Epiphanes, and at last murdered by one of his lieutenants; and not Heliodorus, or the king of Egypt, as some interpreters would have it.

<sup>g</sup>APPIAN in Syriac. EUSEB. in Chron. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 14. MACCAB. l. i. c. 6. v. 17.

hostage,

hastage, and have here had the happiness to grow up under your eyes, and form myself by your examples. All the senators of this great metropolis are fathers to me, and all their children brothers. I am by the education you have given me become intirely Roman, and if I fill by your favour the throne of my ancestors, I shall only sit there to dispense your laws. How glorious will it be for you, and how advantageous for Syria to see two of your pupils succeed one another ! Can you in equity suffer a child to usurp my rights, and let my residence among you be prejudicial to me ? I am informed that Antiochus is already proclaimed king, and has taken the name of Eupator. My absence alone could authorise his friends to give him a diadem, which, by right of birth and order of nature, can belong only to me. I am the son of a king, and of the eldest of the two brothers, who have successively reigned in Syria. There is the same objection against the promotion of young Antiochus to the throne after his father, as there formerly was against my succeeding mine. He is too young to sustain the weight of public affairs. He has no right to the crown, but what he derives from Epiphanes ; and Epiphanes himself pretended at first to hold the crown only in trust. Upon his death therefore my right revives, and I am now able to bear the burthen of the state ; I am three and twenty years old, and have learnt the art of reigning from you. Let young Antiochus be brought to Rome for an hostage ; his youth will make him susceptible of your instructions ; and give me leave, conscript fathers, to go into Syria, and there take quietly possession of my crown, or make good my right by dint of sword <sup>b</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING the justice of this demand, the senators were divided in their opinions. The most sequitable among them thought they could no longer detain Demetrius at Rome, since by that means they debarred him from the crown, to which he had an indisputable right. But the less scrupulous, upon principles of policy and motives of interest, were for keeping the young prince still at Rome. These remonstrated, that such a king of Syria as Demetrius, who was in the flower of his age, of an aspiring genius, and of extraordinary parts, might in the end prove a formidable enemy to the republic, and raise new troubles in the east ; whereas a child on the throne would court their friendship, and seek for protectors at Rome. Nay, these refined politicians went further, and without any regard to justice proposed declaring Antiochus

<sup>b</sup> JUSTIN. [l. xxxiv. c. 3. POLYB. legat. 107. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 117.

The Ro- ward of the republic, and sending guardians to govern his mans usurp dominions in the name and under the direction of the Roman the guardi- senate. This opinion, though repugnant, in a most flagrant anship of manner, to all the laws of common justice and equity, pre-young Eu- vailed in that venerable body ; and accordingly three persons pator. of consummate experience were immediately named to give law to Syria, under pretence of assisting and advising the new king during his minority. These were Cn. Octavius, who had discharged the consulate with great reputation, Sp. Lu- cretius, and L. Aurelius. This iniquitous decree was enacted by the senate, and confirmed by the people without the consent or even privity of the Syrians, who had no thoughts of desiring any foreign guardians for their king. So despotic a power did the haughty Romans assume over kings, after the defeat of Perfes, and reduction of Macedon. Neither was the senate satisfied with opposing the just claim of Demetrius to the crown of his father, and setting it on the head of a child, to whom it did not belong ; but moreover gave the guardians, who were to take care of the affairs of Syria, such instructions as tended to the weakening of the kingdom of their ward. For they were ordered by the senate to burn all the ships with decks, which the king of Syria had, as soon as they should be in possession of the guardianship, to hamstring all his elephants, and in short to weaken by all means possible the strength of that powerful kingdom. With these instructions Octavius, who was at the head of this commission, set out with his colleagues to govern in quality of guardians, the most powerful state in Asia .

Celebrated IN the mean time Lysias, who, as we hinted above, had victories of usurped the tuition of the young king and the government of the Judas kingdom, was pursuing with the utmost ardor the war against Maccabæ- the Jews, which Antiochus Epiphanes had begun. He had us. entered Judæa with fourscore thousand men, with all the cavalry of the kingdom, and fourscore elephants, proposing to make Jerusalem the habitation of Gentiles, and utterly abolish the worship of the true God. He had opened the campaign with the siege of Bethsura, a strong fortress between Jerusalem and Idumæa ; but being there defeated by the brave
Judas Maccabæus, with the loss of eleven thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse, he had struck up a peace with the conqueror, one of the articles of which was, that the decree of Antiochus Epiphanes, which obliged the Jews to conform to the religion of the Greeks, should be revoked, and free liberty allowed them to live according to their own laws. But this peace was of no long duration ; for the governors of the neighbouring provinces, not being satisfied with it, assembled all their forces to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand foot, and five and twenty thousand horse, and marching, under the command of Timotheus, into Judæa, put all to fire and sword. But Judas Maccabæus, full of confidence in the God of armies, attacked and defeated them with a handful of Israelites. On this occasion the Syrians lost upwards of thirty thousand men, and the victory was attended with many advantages on the side of Judas, who pursuing the remains of the shattered army, came up with them at the city of Carnion, and finding that many of them had there taken refuge in the temple of Atargatis (C), he caused fire to be set to it, which soon consumed the temple, and all who were in it. After this severe execution he fell upon the Syrians in the town, and put them all without distinction to the sword ; and on this occasion five and twenty thousand more of Timotheus's forces were slain<sup>k</sup>. On his return to Jerusalem the city of Ephron, which had been well garisoned by Lysias, refused him admittance, though he promised to abstain from all hostilities, since he could not possibly march his army any other way but through the city itself, which lay directly in the road. This refusal exasperated the Jewish general, who thereupon assailing the place, took it sword in hand, and after having put all the males, to the number of twenty five thousand to death, caused the city to be razed to the ground<sup>l</sup>. After this Judas made himself master of all the southern parts of Idumæa and the country of the Philistines, with the important city of Azotus, or Ashdod, demolishing

<sup>k</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 5. v. 37—43. & l. ii. c. 12. v. 24, 25, 26.
<sup>l</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 5. v. 45—51. & l. ii. c. 12. v. 27, 28, &c.

(C) This deity is said by Strabo (79) to be a Syrian goddess. Pliny (80) takes her to be the same with Derceto, and adds (81), that she was worshipped at Joppa in Phœnice. Diodorus Siculus tells us (82), that the inhabitants of Ascalon paid her a special worship, and that she was represented in that city by an image, having in the upper part the form of a woman, and that of a fish in the lower. Hence Selden conjectures this deity to have been the same with Dagon worshipped by the Philistines (83).

(79) Strab. l. xvi. p. 748. (80) Plin. l. v. c. 23. (81) Ilem.
ibid. c. 13 (82) Diodor. Sicul. l. ii. (83) Vieille Saison de Dais
Syris Syntag. 2 c. 3.

every-where the heathen altars, burning their carved images, and enriching his army with the spoils of the plundered cities. But the Syrian garison, which still kept possession of the fortress of Jerusalem, and frequently sallied out upon the Jews, as they went up to worship in the temple, was a great thorn in their sides. Wherefore Judas, to redeem himself from this annoyance, having first made the necessary preparations, laid close siege to the place. But some of the apostate Jews who served among the Syrians in the fortress, knowing that they were to have no quarter, if the place were taken, found means to make their escape, and flying to Antioch acquainted the king and his council with the posture of affairs at Jerusalem, and represented the distress to which the garison was reduced so effectually, that forthwith an army was drawn together of an hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, with thirty two elephants, and three hundred chariots of war. The king in person, with Lysias the regent of the kingdom, put himself at the head of this formidable army, and entering Judæa, laid siege to Bethsura. Here Judas, with a small number of resolute men fell on the king's army in the night, and having killed four thousand of them, and thrown the whole camp into the utmost confusion, retired by break of day without the loss of one single man in so hazardous an attempt <sup>m</sup>.

THOUGH the Syrians were well apprised of the extraordinary valour of the Jews, yet they did not doubt but they should overpower them with the great number of their forces and elephants, and therefore leaving Bethsura, resolved to venture a general engagement, which Judas did not decline; nay he at the head of his small army began the onset, and killed about six hundred Syrians. But finding that notwithstanding all his efforts, he must at length be bore down, and perhaps hemmed in, by so numerous an army, he chose to withdraw in time, and retire in good order to Jerusalem. Upon his retreat the king returned to the siege of Bethsura, which after a long and vigorous defence was obliged to surrender for want of provisions <sup>n</sup>. From thence Antiochus marched against Jerusalem, and besieged the temple, which the garison was ready to deliver up for want of provisions when providence relieved them by an unforeseen accident <sup>o</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. v. 65, 68, &c. &c. l. ii. c. 13. v. 15—17. &c. <sup>n</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 6. v. 49, 50. & l. ii. c. 13. v. 18, 22. <sup>o</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 6. v. 48—54.

WE have observed above, that Philip, whom Epiphanes, a little before his death, had intrusted with the education and guardianship of his son, had retired into Egypt, in hopes of finding assistance there against Lysias. But being disappointed in his expectation, by reason of the divisions which had again broke out between the two brothers, who reigned jointly at that time, he left Egypt. and hastening into the east, drew together a considerable army of Medes and Persians, and taking advantage of the king's absence on his expedition into Judæa, seized Antioch the capital of the empire, and there took upon him the government of the kingdom. When news of this attempt was brought to Lysias, he thought it necessary to make peace with the Jews, that he might be at liberty to turn his arms against his rival in Syria. A peace was accordingly granted to the Jews upon very advantageous and honourable terms, and sworn to by Antiochus. After this Antiochus was admitted within the fortifications of the temple, which seemed so strong to him and his officers, as truly they were, that contrary to the articles which he had sworn to, he caused them to be demolished before he set out for Syria <sup>P</sup>. Lysias on his return to Antioch defeated Philip in a pitched battle, retook the metropolis, and having got Philip into his hands, by his death put an end to all the disturbances he had raised <sup>Q</sup>.

WHILE Lysias was carrying on this war with the Jews and his rival Philip, the Roman ambassadors, or rather guardians, arrived in the east, and were there kindly entertained by Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, through whose dominions they passed in their way to Antioch. As this young prince had nothing more at heart than to gain the good-will of the Romans, he expressed great joy at the guardianship which they were going to take upon them over Antiochus his near relation. As he knew the temper of the Syrians, and suspected the intrigues of Lysias, he offered to conduct Octavius with an army into Syria, or to put the army under his command, in order to prevent disturbances, and guard the envoys against any treacherous attempts. For he thought nothing could be more bold than the enterprize they had in hand. They were going of their own authority, without any invitation from the king, or the Syrian nation, to assume the government of a people, who were subject only to their own king. Ariarathes therefore pressed Octavius to accept of a guard at least; but the Roman, relying on the majesty of

<sup>P</sup> MACCAB. I. i. c. 6. v. 62.      <sup>Q</sup> JOSEPH. I. vii. c. 17.

Rome, which he thought a safer guard than a numerous army, with those only who had attended him from Rome crossed Cappadocia, and entered the kingdom of Syria. Their arrival raised no small jealousy in the heart of Lysias, who as he was himself of the blood royal, could not brook that foreigners should come so far to deprive him of what he thought his right on many accounts. But Octavius, without even giving Lysias notice of his arrival, or the commission on which he was come, advanced towards Antioch with all the pride of his republic, fancying that every thing would give way before him at the bare name of a Roman. Lysias was then master of the person of the young king, of all the wealth of the kingdom, and had the troops at his command. However, as he was too wise to oppose the designs of Rome sword in hand, he hired an African born at Leptis, and then residing in Syria, to dispatch Octavius, without appearing to have any hand in the murder himself. The assassin soon found a favourable opportunity for making good his engagements with Lysias. For Octavius, with an unheard-of presumption, arriving at Laodicea, a maritime city between Tripolis (D) and Antioch, began there to put in execution the unjust orders of his republic, and to act the sovereign before he had even taken possession of the regency. He caused all the Syrian ships which he found there to be burnt, and the elephants to be disabled from serving in war, under pretence that, by the treaty made with the Scipios, Antiochus the Great had engaged to build no more ships of war, nor to tame more elephants. This bold step exasperated the populace to a great degree, and the African in the height of the public indignation, falling upon Octavius, killed him in the gymnasium at Laodicea<sup>r</sup>. This Octavius had been consul some years before, and was the first of his family who had attained to that honour<sup>r</sup>. Octavius, who afterwards became emperor, and is well known by the name of Augustus, was of the same family with this Octavius, but of another branch, which had not as yet been honoured with

Octavius, ambassador of the Romans in Syria, killed.

<sup>r</sup> APPIAN. Syriac. p. 117. POLYB. legat. 114. p. 944. & legat. 122. p. 954.

<sup>r</sup> CIC. Philip. 6. n. 4.

(D) Tripolis stood at the foot of mount Libanus at a small distance from the sea, and was so called because it consisted of three great quarters, which were like so many cities, being about a stadium distant from each other, as Strabo informs us; but Diodorus Siculus tells us, that it was called Tripolis, because inhabited by three different nations, viz. Arabians, Tyrians, and Sidonians. It still bears the same name.

the consular dignity. Lysias, foreseeing the evil consequences of this attempt, did his utmost to clear himself from all suspicion of being any ways concerned in it. He caused Octavius to be buried with extraordinary pomp, and immediately dispatched ambassadors to Rome to assure the senate, that neither he nor the king had any hand in the assassination. But Rome sent back the ambassadors without any answer, reserving the whole to a future enquiry. But in the mean time to honour the memory of Octavius, they commanded his statue to be placed among those of the great men, who had sacrificed their lives for their country; and this statue was still standing near the tribunal of harangues in the time of Augustus<sup>1</sup>. In the mean time the assassin did not leave Laodicea, but publicly owned the action, which he maintained to be very commendable, and done at the instigation of the gods. Nay, one Isocrates, a Rhetorician, made a public panegyric on the assassin, and exhorted the people to dispatch in like manner the other ambassadors and all their attendants, that none might survive to stir up the Roman senate against them, or give any information of what had happened<sup>2</sup>.

Demetrius, thinking that the murder of Octavius might have so far alienated the minds of the Romans from Eupator, that they would no longer detain him at Rome for his sake, resolved to address the senate a second time, and beg permission to return into Syria. But as he had contracted an intimate acquaintance and friendship with Polybius the historian, who was then a prisoner at Rome, and generally deemed one of the best politicians of his age, he first advised with him; and that great man and sincere friend, when the young prince asked his opinion, whether he thought it proper for him to apply to the senate once more for leave to return into Syria, and take possession of a crown to which he had an indisputable right, returned him the following answer: Take care not to stumble twice against the same stone. Have you but one way of getting into Syria? Should a man of your age depend on the capricious will of an unjust senate like a child? Only dare to set yourself at liberty, and you will reign of course. These words struck the prince, who had a great opinion both of the fidelity and wisdom of Polybius, and had long governed himself intirely by his counsels. But the advice of a more timorous friend effaced the impressions they made. This was Apollonius, a young nobleman of Syria, <sup>1</sup> Cic. ibid.<sup>2</sup> POLYB. legat. 122. JUSTIN. l. xxxiv.

who had been bred up with Demetrius, and was afraid his master might, by stealing privately away, disgust the senate, and thereby ruin his affairs. He therefore told him, that it was impossible Rome should be so unjust as to detain him in the present circumstances ; and that she would be glad to see an avenger of Octavius and an enemy to Lysias set out for Syria, now that he stood in no need of her armies or fleets to recover his right at her expence. The advice of Apollonius prevailed, and Demetrius had again recourse to the senate, joining entreaties to all those motives of mutual interest, which might well induce him to desire leave to depart, and the senate to grant it. But Demetrius was not so well acquainted with the Romans as Polybius ; for they, having still the same reasons for keeping him in Rome, persisted in the same resolution. After all, said they, when the matter was debated in the senate, the powerful kingdom of Syria is governed by a child, and Rome has nothing to fear during a minority. Besides, are we sure that Demetrius, who is a young man of uncommon parts, will be as pliant on the throne, as he affects to be at Rome ? Upon these considerations the second request of the prince met with a second refusal. When the decree of the senate, ordering him to continue in Italy till it pleased the conscript fathers to dismiss him, was read to him, he could not forbear exclaiming with great indignation against the unjust and undeserved usage he met with. He then remembered the advice of Polybius, and resolved to court the republic no longer, but to make his escape as soon as he could. He was greatly confirmed in this resolution by Diodorus his governor, who being just then returned from Syria, whither his master had sent him, told him that all Syria was in a flame, assuring him at the same time, that if he only shewed himself to his people, they would all receive him with open arms as their deliverer. However, before he took any step in so nice a matter, he desired the advice of Polybius, as to the manner in which he might best elude the vigilance of the Romans. The faithful Achæan took the whole management of the affair upon himself, and having communicated the design of Demetrius to an intimate friend of his, by name Menithyllus, who then resided at Rome, in quality of agent from the eldest of the two Ptolemies, he found out by his means an expedient to facilitate the prince's flight. There was at that time a Carthaginian ship riding at anchor in the port of Ostia, and bound for Tyre with the first fruits, which the Carthaginians annually sent to the gods of the city from whence they originally came. Menithyllus, pretending business

ness in the east, desired the commander of the ship to transport him and his attendants thither, and agreed with him on a price for his passage. As no body entertained any suspicion of him, he was allowed to carry on board what baggage and provisions he pleased. When every thing was got ready, Demetrius, to conceal his design from the many domestics he had in his household, sent most of his retinue with his hunting equipage to Anagnia, as if he designed to follow them thither the next day. Diodorus, who was a man well versed in business, was sent into Syria in another ship, that he might get there before him, and pave the way for his reception. Polybius, who was at the bottom of all this without ever appearing in it, being informed by Menithyllus that Demetrius the evening before his departure was to give a grand entertainment to his friends in a hired house, began to be very uneasy, lest he should let slip the opportunity ; for he knew that the young prince, when in company with his friends, used to indulge himself in mirth and jollity without bounds or reserve. Being therefore at that time indisposed and obliged to keep his house, he sent him a letter, as night was already far spent, containing several sentences out of the antients touching the courage, secrecy, and sobriety, which were necessary for the executing of great designs (E). The bearer was desired to give it to the master of the house, and he to deliver it into the prince's own hands. Demetrius having perused it, knew from what hand it came, and with what intention it was wrote, and therefore pretending to be out of order, he immediately rose from table, took leave of his friends, and returned home. There he imparted his design of leaving Rome that very night Demetri- to some Syrian noblemen of his retinue, inviting them to us escapes accompany him, which they readily consenting to, Deme- from trius set out in the dead of the night for Ostia. Rome.

(E) The sentences, which Polybius made use of on this occasion, were the following :

Ὁ δρῶν, τὰ τῇ μελλοντῇ, ὕψεται φέρων
 Εἰς ὃ φέρει νύξ, τοῖς δὲ τιμῶσι τὸ πλέον.
 Τολμα τι, κινδυνεύει, πράτ, αποτύγχανει,
 Ἐπίτυχει πάντα μᾶλλον ἢ σκαυτὸν πρὸς.

To these he added the famous saying of Epicharmus : Ναφί, κ. μέμνηται ἀπιστίας. οὐδὲν γὰρ τὰ τῶν φρονῶν.

Menithyllus

Menithyllus had gone some days before to acquaint the commander of the Carthaginian vessel, that he had received fresh orders from the king his master, which would keep him some time longer at Rome; but, however, he would put on board of him the same number of passengers, at the same price and on the same conditions. These he earnestly recommended to him, telling him that they were officers of distinction, who were going to serve in the Egyptian army. The prince and his retinue to the number of sixteen persons arrived early in the morning, and by break of day the Carthaginian weighed anchor to the great joy of Demetrius, who already considered himself as sitting on the throne of his ancestors. Three days passed before he was missed at Rome, every one believing he was gone, according to his custom, to divert himself with hunting in the neighbourhood of Anagnia. The secret was not discovered till the fourth day, when one of his servants, who had been ill used by his fellow-servant, went to Anagnia to complain to his master of the ill treatment he had met with; but not finding him there he returned to Rome, and discovered how long Demetrius had been absent. Hereupon a strict search was made after him, but no one in the city, except Polybius and Menithyllus, being privy to his escape, the messengers, who were dispatched into all parts, returned without having heard any tidings of him. The senate met the sixth day, and being fully convinced that he had made his escape, thought it needless to send after him since he had got the start of them by six days. They therefore resolved to take no further notice of it for the present; but only to send three ambassadors into Syria to observe what effect the return of Demetrius would produce there, and to watch that prince's steps. Pursuant to this resolution, Tiberius Gracchus, who had been two years before consul, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucia were a few days after appointed to go first into Greece, to appease the minds of the people there, who were dissatisfied with the Roman government, and from Greece to cross over into Syria *.

Writes to the senate. IN the mean time the fugitive prince landing in Lycia, wrote from thence a very polite letter to the senate: My design, said he, in making my escape, was only to revenge the death of Octavius, who was inhumanly murdered contrary to the law of nations. Lysias was the author of the assassination, and my aim is wholly at him. As to young * Polyb. legat. 114.

Eupator, though he has usurped my right, I respect him on account of his age and the protection with which you honour him. These promises had no great weight with the senate, no one doubting but Demetrius, when he once saw himself seated on the throne; would sacrifice to his own safety the life of his young rival. But they thought it did not become Rome to oppose by force of arms the settling of the lawful sovereign on the throne of Syria; and therefore waited without much uneasiness to hear of the prince's arrival and adventures there. From Lycia Demetrius continued his voyage, and landed at Tripolis, a Syrian city on the confines of Phœnice. He no sooner appeared there; but he was acknowledged and proclaimed king by all the inhabitants. In order to gain a strong party; he gave out in all the places he passed through, that he was sent by the Roman senate to take possession of his hereditary dominions, and that Rome was resolved to support him to the utmost of her power. This report was no sooner spread abroad; but Eupator's cause was looked upon as lost, both officers and soldiers abandoning him in troops to join the new king. His army increased daily; the cities and strong holds strove which should first submit to him, and the whole kingdom with great joy acknowledged him for their lawful sovereign. He no sooner appeared before Antioch, the metropolis of the kingdom; but the citizens, throwing open their gates, crowded out to him, inviting him to take possession of the palace of his ancestors. At length Lysias and his ward Eupator, being seized by their own soldiers, were delivered up to the new-comer; who ordered them to be put to death. Thus Josephus, Justin, and Appian relate the unhappy end of young Eupator and his guardian †. But the author of the first book of the Maccabees tells us, that they were taken prisoners by the soldiers of Demetrius, and by them put to death after the prince had declared that he would not see them ‡. So that according to this writer they were slain by the soldiery, without any orders from Demetrius. Eupator reigned, according to Josephus ‡ and Eusebius §, two years, according to Porphyrus ¶, and Sulpitius Severus ¶, one year and six months. The author of the second book of the Maccabees tells us, that both

Commander's Eupator to be put to death.

Year of
the Flood, 2836.

Before
Christ,

163.

~~~~~

† JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xii. c. 13. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 117.
JUSTIN. l. xxxiv. c. 3.      ‡ MACCAB. l. i. c. 7.      ‡ JOSEPH. ibid. c. 16.
EUSEB. in Chron.      ¶ In Græc.
EUSEB. SCALIGER.      ¶ SULPITIUS SEVER. histor. Sacra
l. ii.

he and his guardian Lyfias were killed in the third year of his reign, or, as others read it, after he had reigned three years <sup>e</sup>.

Honoured by the Babylonians with the surname of Soter.

No sooner was Demetrius fixed upon the throne, but he delivered the Babylonians from the tyranny of Timarchus and Heraclides, two brothers, whom Antiochus Epiphanes had raised to great honours, upon no other merit but that of a ready compliance with his unnatural lust. The first he had made governor, and the other treasurer, of the province of Babylon, and their administration was insupportable to the inhabitants. Demetrius therefore, giving ear to the just complaints of his subjects, caused Timarchus, who was the most guilty, to be put to death, and banished the other. This deliverance was so acceptable to the Babylonians, that they gave Demetrius the title of Soter or Saviour, which he bore ever afterwards <sup>f</sup>. After this Demetrius, at the instigation of Alcimus, who on the death of Menelaus had been by Eupator appointed high-priest of the Jews, renewed the war with that nation, which had been carried on for so many years by Epiphanes and Eupator his predecessors. In this war the famous Judas Maccabæus, after repeated victories over the numerous armies of the king of Syria, lost his life, as we shall relate at length in the history of the Jews. Upon his death his brother Jonathan took upon him the command of the army, but the Syrians soon after withdrew their forces from Judæa, which, without all doubt, was owing to the letters sent by the Roman senate to Demetrius in behalf of the Jews. For that prince was at this time very cautious not to give the Romans any offence, and therefore ready to grant any thing they desired. His point in view was to get himself acknowledged king of Syria by the republic, knowing that this was the most effectual method to stifle all remaining factions at home, and keep up a good understanding with his neighbours abroad. Being therefore informed, that the Romans had three ambassadors at the court of Arriarathes king of Cappadocia, he sent Menochares, one of the chief lords of his court, thither to treat with them on this subject; and finding on his return by the report he made, that the good offices of the ambassadors were absolutely necessary for the gaining of his point, he sent again deputies to them, first into Pamphylia, and afterwards to the city of Rhodes, assuring them of his inviolable attachment to the interest of Rome. At length by thus continually pressing and Demetrius soliciting them, he obtained what he desired. First the em- is acknow- bassadors, and afterwards their republic, acknowledged the ledged king sovereignty of Demetrius, and gave him the title of king. by the Ro- To cultivate the amity of that powerful republic, he sent mans. the next year the same Menochares and others on an embassy to Rome, with a crown of gold of great value, in acknowledgment of the kind entertainment he had received while an hostage in that city. With the present he sent the assassin, who had murdered Octavius, and Isocrates, who in his public declamations had maintained the justice of that action, and exhorted the people to treat the other ambassadors in like manner. The African was not under the least concern, but appeared gay during the whole journey, and boasted that he would make even the Roman senate approve of what he had done. But the Rhetorician sunk into a deep melancholy from the moment he was seized, in order to be delivered up to the republic, which he had offended. He let his beard and nails grow, and could not be prevailed upon without force to take any nourishment ; by which means he grew so thin before he reached Rome, that he looked like a skeleton. This was perhaps an artifice in the declaimer to raise compassion. But the senate would see neither of them, thinking that the punishment of these two men was too small a satisfaction for the murder of their ambassador. They therefore rejected the two unhappy victims that were offered them, and kept Syria in fear of a more severe vengeance. As to the ambassadors, the senate received them with all the usual honours, accepted of the king's present, and gave him proofs of a perfect reconciliation <sup>g</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> MACCAB. I. ii. c. 14 v. 1, 2.
P. 117.

<sup>f</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac.

Demetrius, after the orders he had received from Rome, Sets up a had given Judæa some respite, as we have hinted above ; pretender but as he was in the flower of his age, and had a martial to the genius, he could not live long in peace. He therefore crown of turned his arms against Cappadocia, where young Ariarathes Cappado- then reigned. He was a prince endowed with many excel- cia. lent qualities, of a sweet disposition, very gracious to his subjects, and highly esteemed and beloved by them. His kingdom under so mild a government would have soon become one of the most happy and flourishing states of Asia, had not great disturbances been raised by a pretender to his crown, supported in his unjust pretensions by the whole

<sup>g</sup> POLYB. legat. 122 p. 954, 955. APPIAN. in Syriac. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. legat. 25.

power of Syria. His rival's name was Holophernes, or, as others write it, Orofernes, and his claim was this: Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus the Great, was married very young to the king of Cappadocia named Ariarathes, as well as his son. The queen having lived some time without children, and on that account believing herself barren, to gain the affection of her husband and subjects, feigned herself twice to be with child, and pretending to be delivered first of one son, and afterwards of another, impoted two supposititious children on the king her husband; the first of whom was called Ariarathes, and the other Holophernes. They were both brought up at the court of their supposed father, as heirs to his crown. But afterwards the queen proving truly to be with child, and being delivered first of one daughter, and then of another, and at last of a son, of whom she became passionately fond, declared to the king, that the two children, he had brought up as his eldest sons, were neither his children nor hers, and gave him strong proofs of the cheat she had put upon him. Hereupon the king immediately sent the two supposititious children out of the kingdom, with a sufficient sum of money to support them. The eldest, called Ariarathes, was sent to Rome, where he was carefully kept, and as he was a young man of a weak mind and slender parts, he was very little affected with his loss. But Holophernes, who was endowed with many great qualities, and had an enterprizing genius, was sent into Ionia, and commanded never more to set foot in the kingdom of Cappadocia. The true son, at first called Mithridates, taking thenceforth his father's name, was declared presumptive heir to the crown. Nay, the loving father, out of an excess of tendernefs, as soon as the young prince was capable of governing, offered to resign the crown to him, and lead himself a private life. But young Ariarathes protested that he would rather die a thousand times than rob his father of his dignity; and by this generous behaviour he merited the name of Philopator, which the Greeks afterwards gave him <sup>h</sup>.

NOT long after Ariarathes, upon the death of his father, had ascended the throne, Demetrius, who had just then taken possession of the kingdom of Syria, offered him his sister Ladice in marriage. But she being the widow of Perfes king of Macedon, an avowed enemy to the Romans, and Demetrius himself not being yet acknowledged by them king of Syria, Ariarathes was afraid this match might give them offence, and therefore rejected the offer. This Demetrius resented, and under pretence of settling Holophernes on the throne, as he said, of his ancestors, made war on the king of Cappadocia. Besides, Holophernes tempted the Syrian with great promises, engaging to pay him a thousand talents, if he placed him on the throne. Demetrius therefore made great preparations for the carrying back of Holophernes to his native country; and on the other hand Ariarathes, entering into an alliance with Eumenes king of Pergamus, raised a considerable army to maintain his right. But Demetrius carried all before him; and driving Ariarathes out of Cappadocia, placed Holophernes on the throne. The dethroned prince fled to Rome, where, after long debates, the affair was determined, rather according to the inclinations of the judges, than the rules of equity, as we shall relate in the history of Cappadocia <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> POLYB. l. iii. p. 161. & legat. 126. Appian. in Syriac. JUSTIN. l. xxxv. c. 1. Epitome LIVII, l. xlvii. DIODOR. SICUL. l. xxxi. apud Photium cod. 244. p. 1160. ZONAR. l. ix.

Demetrius, having now no wars to carry on, gave himself up intirely to pleasures and ease, leading a strange, or rather gives himself up to fantastick, kind of life. For he caused a castle to be built near Antioch, flanked it with four strong towers, and there shutting himself up cast off all care of the public, being seldom sober the whole time he lived in that retirement. As no petitions were admitted, no grievances redressed, nor justice administered, the whole government was at a stand; which giving just cause of offence to all his subjects, they formed a conspiracy for the deposing of him. Holophernes, who had been driven out of Cappadocia and at that time lived at Antioch, entered into this plot against his benefactor, flattering himself that, in case the conspiracy took effect, the Syrians would place him on the throne in the room of the deposed king. But the whole conspiracy being soon discovered, Holophernes was seized, and kept under close confinement at Seleucia, Demetrius not caring to put him to death, that he might again, when a proper occasion should offer, let him loose upon Ariarathes <sup>2</sup>. Demetrius, on examining the conspirators, found that Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, Attalus king of Pergamus, and Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt were at the bottom of the plot; and concluding from thence, that if any misfortune should befall him, his son, named also Demetrius, might meet with opposition in his succession to the throne, unless his title was approved by the Roman senate,

<sup>1</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 118. POLYÆ. legat. 126.
l. xxxv. c. 1.

<sup>2</sup> JUSTIN.

Alexander Balas lays claim to the crown.

resolved to deprive himself of his child, and send him to Rome to be brought up there. Accordingly the young prince set out soon after for that metropolis with a retinue suitable to his quality. But the Romans reviving their former resentment against his father for making his escape, and taking possession of a sceptre which they had not put into his hands, received the king's son very coldly, and scarce treated him as a nobleman. These proceedings greatly provoked the young prince's governors, who thereupon carried him back to Syria, when they had scarce shewn him at Rome. This sudden escape of the son was no less resented by the senate than that of the father had been some years before. While the republic was thus full of resentment both against the father and the son, Heraclides, who had been some time at Rome watching an opportunity to raise new disturbances in Syria, thought this the most proper time to succeed in a plot against Demetrius, which had been contrived by the abovementioned kings, Ptolemy, Attalus, and Ariarathes, and privately carried on by Heraclides. These princes being highly incensed against the king of Syria, the former for an attempt he had made upon the island of Cyprus, and the two others for the war he had waged with them in behalf of Holophernes, employed Heraclides to find out some young man of parts and address, and suborn him to personate the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and under that title to lay claim to the crown of Syria. This Heraclides, as we have related above, had been a great favourite of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his treasurer in the province of Babylon, while Timarchus his brother was governor of it. But on the coming of Demetrius to the crown, the two brothers being found guilty of malversation and other crimes, Timarchus had been executed, and Heraclides banished. The latter being obliged to quit the dominions of the king of Syria, took up his residence at Rhodes, and there having found a young man named Balas, of mean extraction, but every way qualified for the abovementioned design, he thoroughly instructed him to act the part that was given him<sup>1</sup>.

HAVING thus formed him for the imposture, he caused him in the first place to be acknowledged by the three kings abovementioned, who acted underhand in concert with him; and then carrying him to Rome with Laodice, the real daughter of Antiochus Epiphanes, whom he had gained over, introduced them both to the senate, a few days after the flight of young Demetrius. As Rome was at that time highly incensed against Demetrius for the sudden escape of his son, the senate received them very graciously. Heraclides, who presented them to the senate, made on that occasion a very artful speech, which he concluded with the following words, after having expatiated on the inviolable attachment of Antiochus Epiphanes to the interest of Rome, and the cruelties supposed to have been practised by Demetrius, both over his subjects and the children of Epiphanes: But you, conscript fathers, are already too well acquainted with Demetrius, and my complaints will add nothing to the opinion you entertain of that subtle and crafty usurper. You have already openly discovered your sentiments by the reception you gave young Demetrius. You did not think the son of an usurper worthy of your education; nor would you form for the throne a person designed to perpetuate injustice on it. Nevertheless you did not then know, that two children of Antiochus Epiphanes had survived their father and their brother Eupator, who was cruelly assassinated. Appear then, you illustrious offspring of one of the heroes of Asia, I have rescued you from want and oppression, only to present you before the powerful and equitable tribunal of Rome. Make your demands yourselves; and be assured that the protection you will meet with, will be as favourable as your cause is just. Accordingly Balas spoke for himself, The impostor Balas and addressed the senate thus: The only favour I ask is, that you would remember king Antiochus my father. If his conduct was agreeable to you, you may as much depend on the submission of his son. Assist him with your protection, and he will soon give you proofs of his gratitude. If you desire to see Syria united in a close confederacy with Rome, give me only leave to return home. Polybius, who was then at Rome, tells us, that the whole city was fully convinced of the imposture, and therefore greatly surprized to hear that the senate had passed a decree in favour of the two pretenders. This famous decree was couched in the following terms: The senate and people of Rome having examined the petition of Alexander and Laodice, the children of Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, the friend and ally of the Roman people, give the son leave to recover the rights of his father; and our will and pleasure is, that our allies assist him therein<sup>m</sup>. Balas had changed his name, and taken that of Alexander, as Justin informs us; whence he is commonly called by the ancients

<sup>1</sup> LIV. Epitome, l. lii, POLYB. legat. 142. p. 966. JUSTIN l. xxv c. 1. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 131. ATHENÆUS, l. 211. SULPITIUS SEVERUS, Hist. Sacr. l. ii. c. 22. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 3.

<sup>m</sup> POLYB. LIV. APPIAN. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

Alexander Balas ; the latter was, according to Appian, his mother's name.

Alexander being thus countenanced by the Roman senate, met with no difficulty in raising troops as soon as he landed in Syria. Ariarathes, Ptolemy, and Attalus, sent him immediately powerful succours ; so that he was soon in a condition to appear before Ptolemais in Palestine, and even make himself master of that important place ; the reduction of which was no sooner heard of in Syria, but great numbers of Syrians, out of disaffection to Demetrius, flocked to him from all parts. This brought Demetrius out of his castle to provide for his own defence ; he drew together all the forces he could, took the field, and, at the head of a formidable army, marched out to meet the impostor. He was well apprised that Rome had set up this rival to his crown ; and therefore to appease the republic, he sent to Rome an impostor, named Andriscus, who pretending to be the son of Perfes was come to the court of Syria to solicit his establishment on the throne of his father in Macedon. The senate was well pleased to have this mock-king in their hands, but did not on that account discountenance in the least the pretender to the crown of Syria ; nor shew any inclination to assist Demetrius. This prince, finding the Romans bent on his ruin, had recourse to Jonathan, who had succeeded the famous Judas Maccabæus in the command of the Jewish forces, and made him most tempting offers. He wrote a very obliging letter to him, appointing him commander in chief of all his forces in Judæa ; and empowering him to raise what troops he thought fit. At the same time he commanded the governor of the fortrefs of Jerusalem to deliver up into his hands all the hostages of the Jewish nation, which were kept there as pledges of their fidelity to the Syrian interest. As the assistance of Jonathan was like to carry great weight with it, and turn the balance in favour of that side for which he should declare, Alexander, hearing what Demetrius had done to gain so powerful an ally, sent also his proposals to him, appointing him high-priest of the Jews, honouring him with the title of the king's friend (F), and presenting him with a purple robe, and a crown of gold, as ensigns of the high dignity conferred upon him, none but

(F) The title of the king's friend was highly esteemed under the Syro-Macedonian kings, being bestowed upon persons only of the first quality ; and to wear a purple robe was a mark of great distinction, not only among the Macedonians, but other nations ; whence the word Purpuratus, in the Latin tongue, signifies a man of quality, or a prince.

princes

princes and nobles of the first rank being in those days allowed to wear purple. Demetrius, being informed of the advantageous offers of Alexander, resolved to out-bid him, hoping, by that means to secure to himself an ally of such weight; he therefore sent a second message to Jonathan, offering to confirm all the grants of his rival, and adding to them many extraordinary gifts and privileges to be enjoyed for ever by him and the whole Jewish nation, provided he would espouse the cause, and maintain the undoubted rights of his family; but as he had, on all occasions, betrayed an irreconcilable hatred to the Jews, and endeavoured to extirpate the whole nation, Jonathan looked upon all these offers as extorted only by the necessity of his affairs, and which he would certainly revoke, as soon as he saw himself again in quiet possession of the crown. He therefore rejected the proposals of a prince, on whom he could not, by any means, depend, and resolved to enter into an alliance with Alexander. Of him he accepted the high-priesthood, and, with the consent of the people, on the feast of tabernacles, which happened soon after, he put on the pontifical robes, and officiated as high-priest, after that office had been vacant seven years<sup>a</sup>.

THE two kings having taken the field at the head of their respective armies, Demetrius, who wanted neither courage nor conduct, when his reason was not impaired by immoderate drinking, gained the victory in the first battle; but it was of no advantage to him, for Alexander being speedily reinforced by the three kings who first set him up, and vigorously supported both by Jonathan and the Romans, he still maintained his ground. The Syrians likewise, notwithstanding the overthrow of Alexander, continued to desert in troops from Demetrius, who, by his surly temper, had rendered himself odious to all his subjects; wherefore Demetrius, beginning to apprehend the event of the war, sent his two sons, Demetrius and Antiochus, to Cnidus, a city of Caria, and there committed them, with a great treasure, to the care of a friend of his in that place, that, in case any misfortune should befall him in this war, his children might be out of the reach of his rival, and wait in a place of safety for some favourable turn of fortune<sup>b</sup>.

Demetrius, having thus secured his children, and recruited his army the best he could, took the field anew, and being resolved to put the whole to the issue of a battle, engaged his rival at the head of an army far superior in number to his own. Both parties fought with incredible bravery, being encouraged by the example of their leaders. At first Demetrius's left wing put the enemy's right to flight; but, pursuing them too far, a fault which has occasioned the loss of many victories, on their return they found the right wing, in which Demetrius fought in person, quite routed, and the king himself killed in the flight. As long as he could prevail upon his men to keep their ground, he distinguished himself in a very eminent manner; and when they began to give way, being bore down by the enemy's numbers, he displayed an extraordinary skill in military affairs, by retiring in good order, and keeping his men together, in hopes that his left wing might return in the mean time from the pursuit; but in the retreat his horse having unluckily plunged into a bog, he was abandoned by his own men, and surrounded on all sides by the enemy. In this situation, quitting his horse, he fought a considerable time on foot with incredible bravery, putting all those to death who dared to approach him; insomuch that none venturing to come within his reach, they kept at a distance, discharging incessantly showers of darts, arrows, and javelins against him from all quarters. He fell at length, after having received a great many wounds, and for some time made head alone against the enemy's whole army<sup>p</sup> (G). Polybius and Porphyrius, who were both intimately acquainted with this prince, give him a most extraordinary character, and tell us, that he was killed after he had reigned twelve years; but Josephus, upon what authority we know not, will have him to have reigned eleven years only.

<sup>a</sup> MACCAB. I. i. c. 10. ver. 21. & c. 7. ver. 14. JOSEPH. Antiq. I. xv. c. 3.      <sup>b</sup> JOSEPH. Liv. ibid. & EUROP. I. iv.

Demetrius
defeated and killed
Year of
the Flood, 2846.
Before
Christ,
153.

Alexander, by this victory, having made himself master of the whole Syrian empire, sent a solemn embassy into Egypt, to demand Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy, in marriage. The king not only complied with his request, but conducted her to him in person; and the nuptials were celebrated at Ptolemais with great pomp and rejoicings. Jonathan, the Jewish

<sup>p</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 10. ver. 48, 49, 50. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 5. JUSTIN. l. xxxv. c. 1. APPIAN in Syriac. p. 131. POLYB. l. iii. p. 165.

(G) Polybius, Justin, and Josephus agree with the author of the first book of the Maccabees concerning the unfortunate death of Demetrius; and Appian tells us in express words, that Demetrius lost at the same time his crown and his life, though the Latin translator makes this author say, that the dethroned prince died in banishment; a sense which the Greek original will not by any means bear.

high-

high-priest, being invited by Alexander, to assist at the ceremony, went thither, and was received by both kings with all possible marks of honour, especially by Alexander, who caused him to be clad in purple, and inrolled among the first princes of his kingdom. He likewise honoured him with the chief command of all his forces in Judæa; and because many, out of envy, presented petitions against him, the king not only refused to peruse them, but issued a proclamation, forbidding any one to speak ill of him, or offer any complaints against his conduct <sup>9</sup>.

Alexander Balas, seeing himself in the quiet possession of the crown, thought that his only business now was, to glut himself with all the pleasures which the plenty and power he had attained to could afford him; and therefore, abandoning himself to his natural inclination for luxury, idleness, and debauchery, he shut himself up in the inner parts of his palace with lewd women, spending his whole time with them, and leaving the intire management of affairs to a favourite called Ammonius, who, to use the expression of Justin, discharged the office of a sovereign in his room. As this Ammonius was a man of a suspicious, cruel, and savage disposition, he behaved more like a despotic tyrant than a minister, putting all those to death whom he imagined capable of disturbing his master in the possession of the crown which he had usurped. All those of the blood-royal, who fell into his hands, were most inhumanly massacred, and, among the rest, Laodice, the sister of Demetrius, and Antigonus, one of his sons, who had remained in Syria, when the other two were sent to Cnidus: This conduct soon drew, both upon the king and his minister, the hatred of the whole nation; of which Demetrius, the eldest of the deceased king's sons, being informed, he thought this a favourable opportunity to recover his right; and therefore having, by means of Lasthenes (H), hired some

<sup>9</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 10. ver. 59—66. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 7.

(H) The person with whom Demetrius intrusted his children, is supposed to be that Lasthenes, of whom mention is made in Josephus, and the history of the Maccabees. He was a native of Cnidus, and zealously attached to the interest of Demetrius, whose children he brought up with great care. Hence Demetrius Nicator, the eldest of the two, looked upon him, even after he came to the crown, as his father, and honoured him with this title in the letter which is still extant in the history of the Maccabees. And indeed Lasthenes could not expect less gratitude from a pupil who owed his some companies of Cretans, he left Cnidus, where he had been educated, and set sail for Cilicia, which he soon made himself master of, the inhabitants flocking from all parts to join him. This roused Alexander from his lethargy; he quitted his seraglio, drew together what forces he could, and, having committed the government of Antioch to Hierax and Diodotus, who was afterwards called Tryphon, he took the field; but, upon advice that Apollonius (1) governor of Cæle-Syria and Phænice, had declared for Demetrius, crown to him. This zealous tutor did not conceal from him any of those large sums, which Demetrius Soter, uncertain of the event, had deposited in his hands, but employed them all in making the necessary preparations for a war with the usurper of the crown of Syria. But, after all, Lasthenes no sooner got the power into his hands, upon his pupil's accession to the crown, but he proved a most cruel and oppressive tyrant, and, by his cruelties and oppressions, estranged the minds of the Syrians from their lawful sovereign.

(1) As the name of Apollonius often occurs in the history of these times, it being very common among the Greeks and Syro-Macedonians; to avoid confusion, we shall give an account of the persons who bore it, and are mentioned in the occurrences of the times which we are now writing of. The first we meet with of this name in the history of the Maccabees, is Apollonius the son of Thraseas, who was governor of Cæle-Syria and Phænice, under Seleucus Philopator, when Heliadorus was sent to Jerusalem to plunder the temple, and who supported Simon against Onias the high-priest (84). He was also prime minister to the same king, but on the accession to the crown of his brother Antiochus Epiphanes, he left Syria, and retired to Miletus, finding himself in all likelihood excluded from the administration, and some way obnoxious to the new king. While he resided at Miletus, a son of his bearing the same name resided at Rome with Demetrius the son of Seleucus Philopator, then an hostage in that city. As this Apollonius was a great favourite of Demetrius, as soon as that prince recovered the crown of his ancestors, he bestowed on the son the same government of Phænice and Cæle-Syria, which the father had enjoyed under Seleucus Philopator (85). And this we take to be the Apollonius, who, being continued in the same government by Alexander Balas, revolted from him, as we have related, to side with Demetrius the son of his old master (86). Another Apollonius is mentioned in the second book of the Maccabees (87), and said to be chief minister to Antiochus Epiphanes; but he seems to have been of another fa-

(84) Maccab. l. ii. c. 3. ver. 5. & c. 4. ver. 4. (85) Polyb. legat. 114. p. 944, 945. (86) Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 69. (87) Maccab. l. ii. c. 4. ver. 21.

Demetrius, he began to suspect the fidelity of the Syrians, and thereupon called in king Ptolemy, his father-in-law, to his assistance<sup>r</sup>.

Apollonius's first attempt, after he had declared for Demetrius, was to reduce Jonathan, who, mindful of the many favours he had received at the hands of Alexander, persisted in his attachment to that prince's interest. Apollonius having assembled all the troops that were dispersed in Cæle-Syria, Phœnice, and the neighbouring provinces, advanced to Jamnia, a maritime city between Azotus and Joppa. From thence he sent a proud message to Jonathan, challenging him to an engagement. Hereupon Jonathan, marching out of Jerusalem with ten thousand men, advanced to Joppa, and being there joined by his brother Simon, who commanded a separate body, besieged and took the place in the sight of Apollonius and his army. Being master of Joppa, he fell upon Apollonius, and routed him with great slaughter. The remains of the enemy's army fled to Azotus, and not thinking themselves safe within the walls of the city, they took sanctuary in the temple of Dagon; but Jonathan, not thinking himself obliged to pay any respect to an idolatrous asylum, entered Azotus by force, and setting fire to the city, reduced mily being called, in the above-mentioned history, the son of Meneſtheus. He was sent by Epiphanes, with the character of ambassador, first to Rome (88), and afterwards to Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt (89). This Apollonius is in all likelihood the same, who, in the history of the Maccabees, is said to have been over the tribute, and who, on Antiochus's return from his last expedition into Egypt, was sent with a detachment of twenty-two thousand men to destroy Jerusalem, and build the citadel on mount Acra, which kept the whole Jewish nation in awe for many years. Besides these, there are two others bearing the same name in the history of the Maccabees, one of whom, being governor of Samaria under Antiochus Epiphanes, was slain in battle by Judas Maccabæus (90), and the other called the son of Gennaüs, being likewise governor of some seigniory in Palestine, distinguished himself by his hatred to the Jewish nation (91).

<sup>r</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 10. ver. 67. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 8. JUSTIN. l. xxxv. c. 2. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii. p. 346.

(88) Liv. l. xliii. c. 6. (89) Maccab. l. ii. c. 4. ver. 21.
(90) Maccab. l. i. c. 3. ver. 10. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 7. §
10. (91) Maccab. l. ii. c. 12. ver. 2.

it to ashes, together with the temple ; all those who had fled thither for shelter, perishing in the flames. All the neighbouring places which had declared for Demetrius underwent the same fate ; so that Apollonius lost on this occasion above eight thousand men. And now Jonatban, being master of the field, turned his arms against Ascalon ; but the inhabitants, being struck with terror at his approach, opened their gates to him, and received him and his army within their walls. And now, having no more enemies to contend with in those parts, he led back his army to Jerusalem, loaded with the spoils of the conquered enemy and the riches of the plundered cities. Alexander, when informed of these successes, testified his gratitude with new marks of distinction, sending him a clasp of gold, such as the princes only, who were of the royal family, used to wear, and bestowing upon him the sovereignty of the city of Accaron and its territory<sup>f</sup>.

IN the mean time Ptolemy Philometor, to whom Alexander had applied for succours, advanced to his relief, at the head of a mighty army. The author of the second book of the Maccabees emphatically compares his troops to the sand of the sea-shore. As he entered Palestine, all the cities, through which he passed, received him with loud acclamations. As he marched by the place on which Azotus formerly stood, some persons of his retinue, disaffected to the Jews, shewed him the ruins of that city, and of the once magnificent temple of Dagon, telling him, that these were the sad effects of Jonathan's fury ; but notwithstanding these complaints, and the sight of many dead bodies, which still lay unburied on the road and in the adjoining fields, Ptolemy gave Jonathan, when he came to wait on him at Joppa, as favourable a reception as he could desire. Both princes spent the night in that city, and leaving it the next day, Jonathan accompanied the king as far as Eleutherus a river of Phœnice, and then returned to Jerusalem. Ptolemy pursued his march, hastening to the defence of his son-in-law and ally ; but, upon his arrival at Ptolemais, he was, to his great surprize, informed, that Alexander had a design upon his life, and that Ammonius, the king of Syria's great favourite, had taken upon him to execute this detestable piece of treachery ; Perhaps Alexander fearing that Ptolemy, coming with so powerful an army, might seize on Syria for himself, had resolved to prevent this danger, by cutting him off at Ptolemais ; for in that city the conspirators were all assembled. Ptolemy could not be persuaded at first, that Alex- ander had any hand in the plot, ascribing the whole to the jealous temper of his imperious minister, who, without any orders from his master, nay, even without his privity, had put to death many Syrian lords of great distinction. He therefore wrote a letter to the king of Syria, complaining of the attempt, and demanding the criminal to be delivered up to him; but Alexander refusing to comply with so just a demand, Ptolemy concluded from thence, that he was privy to the plot, and that Ammonius had only executed his master's orders. Hereupon, being highly exasperated, he resolved to turn his arms against the prince he was come to defend, and accordingly sent ambassadors to young Demetrius, offering him his daughter Cleopatra, Alexander's wife, in marriage, and promising to settle him on the throne of his ancestors. Demetrius willingly embraced this advantageous offer, went immediately to wait on Ptolemy, and received from him his daughter, who, too easily complying with her father's will, was not ashamed to break through her former engagements, and, abandoning her first, marry a second husband<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> MACCAB. I. I. C. 10. ver. 69—89 JOSEPH. Antiq. I. xiii. c. 8. DIODOR. in excerpt. Valesi p. 346.

WHEN news of this was brought to Antioch, the inhabitants of that city, who had long groaned under the oppressions of the favourite minister, thinking this a proper opportunity to revenge the many violences he had committed in their city, rose up in arms in a tumultuous manner, surrounded his palace, and killed him, as he was attempting to make his escape from the rage of the incensed multitude in the attire of a woman<sup>2</sup>. Nor did the death of Ammonius put a stop to the sedition; the Antiochians were uneasy to see a prince on the throne, whom his wicked ministers and his own indolence had rendered odious to the whole nation, and therefore thought of nothing but shaking off the yoke. Ptolemy, taking advantage of the present disposition of the Antiochians, did all that lay in his power to engage them in favour of Demetrius; but they, remembering the many evils they had suffered under Demetrius Soter his father, were afraid the son might prove a no less cruel tyrant when once fixed on the throne, and therefore refused to declare in his favour. However, their hatred to Alexander so far got the better of their prejudices against Demetrius, that they entered into a confederacy against the former, and opened their gates to Ptolemy, offering to place the crown on his head; but that prince, who, as Josephus tells us, knew how to set bounds to his ambition, when not agreeable to the rules of the strictest equity, rejecting their offer, and assembling all the inhabitants of that great metropolis, with a generosity scarce to be paralleled, declared, that he could not, without the most flagrant injustice, place himself on the throne of Syria, by excluding the lawful heir. He represented Demetrius to them as a young prince of such amiable qualities as promised a mild and peaceable reign ; and, to calm their fears, he offered to be their guarantee for their new sovereign's conduct, undertaking to assist him with his advice, and teach him the art of governing. The disinterested representations of Ptolemy had the desired effect ; Demetrius was proclaimed king of Syria, and placed on the throne of his ancestors <sup>w</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 8. LIV. Epit. lib. l.
MACCAB. l. i. c. 11. ver. 13.

<sup>2</sup> JOSEPH. ibid. &

IN the mean time Alexander, who was then in Cilicia, having assembled a numerous army, advanced to Antioch ; and being met in the neighbourhood of that city by Ptolemy and his new son-in-law, a bloody engagement ensued, in which Alexander being vanquished, all those, who had hitherto stood by him, abandoning his party, came over to Demetrius. The unhappy Alexander, instead of gathering together the remains of his shattered forces, betook himself to a precipitous flight, and, being attended only by five hundred horse, never halted till he got into Arabia. He there thought himself safe in the house of a chief lord of that country, whom the author of the history of the Maccabees calls Zabdiel, Josephus, Zabel, and Diodorus Siculus, Diocles ; but the place proved fatal to him, for the treacherous Zabdiel stabbed him with his own hand, and made this base act matter of merit with Ptolemy and Demetrius ; but the former was scarce able to taste the fruits of the victory, for his horse, terrified in the heat of the battle at the braying of an elephant, started and threw him ; and, while he was on the ground, Alexander's men having surrounded him, wounded him mortally on the head, and would have killed him on the spot, had not his own guards rescued him out of their hands. But this only prolonged his life a short time ; he lay senseless four days, the fifth he seemed to recover, and in this interval the head of Alexander, which Zabdiel had caused to be struck off, was brought to him as a present from the Arabian ; but the joy he felt on this occasion soon put an end to his life *. As for Demetrius, he took, without any further opposition, possession of his father's dominions, styling himself from this victory Nicator, that is, the Conqueror. Alexander Balas had reigned, according to Josephus, five, according to the history of the Maccabees, six years, reckoning from the one hundred and sixtieth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, or the Æra of the Seleucidæ, to the one hundred and sixty-seventh, which was the first of the reign of Demetrius Nicator (K).

<sup>w</sup> MACCAB. I. i. c. 11. ver. 8——19. JOSEPH. ubi supra: DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Photii. cod. 244. * JOSEPH. I. xiii. c. 8. LIV. Epit. I. lii. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

THIS

(K) Alexander Balas is called, in the first book of the Maccabees, (92), the son of Antiochus Epiphanes; but as all the profane historians are unanimous in this, viz. that he was an impostor, and no ways related to the family of the Seleucidæ, we have, upon their authority, contradicted the writer of that book. Polybius, who was then at Rome, tells us, that the whole city was fully convinced, that Alexander Balas had no right to the crown of Syria, and that the whole was a cheat carried on by Heracides, who had long waited in Rome for some opportunity of raising disturbances against Demetrius by whom his brother had been put to death, and himself banished. The same author adds, that the people of Rome were much surprized to hear, that the senate had passed a decree in favour of the impostor, and even began to suspect, that Heracides, being well apprised of the present disposition of the senate, had set up this impostor to please them (93). Livy tells us, that he was meanly born, and that his descent was not well known (94). Athenæus calls him the supposititious son of Antiochus Epiphanes (95). Appian says, that he intruded himself into the family of the Seleucidæ (96). Sulpitius Severus calls him a Rhodian, and adds, that he impudently passed himself upon some for the son of Antiochus Epiphanes (97). Some modern writers urge the following argument to prove, that he was truly the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, Jonathan, say they, the virtuous high-priest of the holy nation, preferred his alliance to that of Demetrius; whence it is plain, that he had a just title to the crown (98). But herein they run counter to their own principles; for allowing him to have been the true son of Epiphanes, yet, as he was the son of the younger brother, who had himself usurped the crown, he could have no right to it in the life time of Demetrius, who was the son of the elder brother. Epiphanes himself knew, that Demetrius had an indisputable right to succeed his father in the kingdom of Syria, and therefore pretended at first to govern the empire only as guardian to the young prince, who was then under age. Besides, Jonathan, that virtuous high-priest of the holy nation, did not afterwards scruple to side with the son of Demetrius against the son of Balas, as we shall see in the sequel of this history. The conduct therefore of Jonathan pian. in Syriac. p. 31. (97) Sulp. Sever. Hist. Sacr. l. ii.

(92) Maccab. l. i. c. 10. ver. 1. (93) Polyb. legat. 140.

(94) Liv. in Epit. l. iii. (95) Athenæus l. v. c. 10. (96) Ap-

(98) The authors of the Roman history publishing at Paris. i. xlvii.

THIS is the account which Josephus gives us of the troubles of Syria, and the death of Alexander Balas. But the author of the history of the Maccabees varies greatly from him, especially in what relates to the character of Ptolemy Philometor king of Egypt, whom Josephus highly commends, as we have seen, and the author of the first book of the Maccabees represents as an ambitious and perfidious prince, trampling under foot the most sacred laws of nature and justice, to raise himself on the ruins of his own son-in-law. The account which the latter author gives us of this famous revolution, which put an end both to the life and reign of Alexander Balas, is as follows.

Ptolemy Philometor, being a prince of an unbounded ambition, had formed a design of uniting in his person the crowns of Syria and Egypt. As Alexander Balas had married Cleopatra the daughter of Ptolemy, and was in imminent danger of being driven from the throne by Demetrius Nicator the son of Demetrius Soter, the king of Egypt laid hold of this opportunity to put his design in execution. Accordingly, having raised a numerous army, he entered Syria, under the specious pretence of assisting his friend and relation against the attempts of his rival. All the cities through which he passed opened their gates to him, Alexander having commanded them to pay the king of Egypt the honours that were due to him as the father-in-law of their sovereign; but the treacherous Ptolemy, under plausible appearances, only took advantage of the credulity of the unfortunate Alexander, putting Egyptian garisons into the cities which had received him as a friend, and by that means securing the possession of them to himself. Thus he advanced into Syria, making himself master of all the places he found in his way as far is no proof of Alexander's right, nor could those authors have alledged it as such, but out of a supine and unpardonable inadvertency.

Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Alexander having some time before his death, consulted a famous oracle in Cilicia, was warned by the god to beware of a place which had given birth to a creature of two shapes. It was generally thought, that the city of Abas, where Alexander was killed, was pointed at by this answer; for, after his death, upon enquiry, they found, that a woman called Herais the daughter of Diophantus a Macedonian, and of an Arabian woman, after she had been some years married to one Samiadas, all on a sudden changed her sex, and took her father's name (99).

(99) Diodor. Sicul. in fine. l. xxxii. apud Photium. cod. 244.

as Seleucia, a maritime city on the mouth of the Orontes. And now it was in vain for him to dissemble any longer, the least sagacious being fully apprised of his wicked design; he therefore pulled off the mask, and sending deputies to Demetrius, inviting the young prince to join him against their common enemy, he offered him, in order to convince him of his sincerity, his daughter Cleopatra, Alexander Balas's wife, in marriage; and, the better to palliate his injustice, he pretended, that Alexander and his prime minister had formed a plot against him, and hired assassins to take away his life, without any regard to their affinity and ancient friendship. Demetrius, not daring to withstand the solicitations of the ambassadors from so powerful a prince, went to wait on Ptolemy, who had nothing in view but his own interest in this alliance; for not caring to contend with two enemies at once, he made use of Demetrius to hasten the destruction of Alexander, not doubting, but when he had once got rid of him, the other would fall an easy victim to his ambition. After the ceremonies of the marriage were over, Ptolemy set out for Antioch, and there treacherously caused himself to be crowned king of Syria, without any regard to the most sacred rights, and the solemn promises given to the unhappy Demetrius.

ALL these things were transacted in the heart of the kingdom, while Alexander Balas, deceived by the false promises of his father-in-law, was reducing the cities of Cilicia but the news of the unfaithfulness of his wife, and the treachery of Ptolemy, made him drop that enterprize; however, he did not sink under this shocking news, but assembling his troops without loss of time, he advanced, by great marches, to stop the progress of the usurper. Ptolemy met him, and offered him battle, which Alexander accepted, having no other resource but in his courage, which fortune did not prosper. His troops were entirely defeated, and himself forced to take refuge in Arabia, where he miserably perished by the hands of Zabdiel, one of the lords of that country. The Barbarian cut off his head, and sent it to Ptolemy, who did not long enjoy the fruit of his crimes, death three days after putting an end both to his ambitious projects and his life. Upon his death Demetrius took possession of the throne, and was by all the Syrians acknowledged for their sovereign.

THIS is the account which the author of the first book of the Maccabees gives us of the troubles of Syria. The disagreement between him and Josephus, especially with relation to Ptolemy, is very palpable; and therefore, in this opposition, we leave the reader to judge which of the two deserves the preference. As for us, we cannot help thinking it highly improbable, that Alexander Balas should hire assassins to murder Ptolemy, while he was actually marching to his assistance with the whole strength of his kingdom. What great advantage could that prince propose to himself by cutting off so powerful an ally, and the only true friend he then had, as Josephus himself is pleased to tell us? Some writers have endeavoured to reconcile Josephus with the book of the Maccabees, by saying, that Alexander formed the design of assassinating Ptolemy by means of his favourite minister Ammonius, after the unjust proceedings of the king of Egypt had convinced him, that this prince had entered his dominions with a design to seize them for himself. But this is rather contradicting Josephus than reconciling him with the other writer; for the former tells us in express terms, that Alexander had received no provocation from Ptolemy, and this, in our opinion, has not the least appearance of truth. But Josephus is not the only author who contradicts the history of the Maccabees; for Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Alexander Balas, having retired after the battle to Aba a city of Arabia, put himself there under the protection of Diocles, one of the chief lords of the country, whom he had a little before entrusted with the care of his son Antiochus, who was then a child. While he was here, the officers, who had attended him in his flight, entering into a conspiracy against him, sent privately messengers to the conqueror, offering to rid him of an enemy, who was formidable even in his retreat. Demetrius, who had no other view but to secure to himself the crown of Syria, accepted the offer made him in the name of the conspirators; whereupon Alexander was seized, and barbarously murdered by those, who, to that time, had acknowledged him for their sovereign. Eusebius<sup>a</sup> tells us, that Alexander survived Philometor four years; and that he married the daughter of Ptolemy Euergetes the brother of Philometor; and in this he not only contradicts the book of the Maccabees and Josephus, but all the profane historians whose works have reached us.

<sup>a</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii. l. xxxii. p. 194.
<sup>b</sup> EUSEB. in Chron.

---

---

A N

I N D E X

T O T H E

E I G H T H V O L U M E.

The Numbers direct to the Page, and the great Letters to the Notes.

- A Bdalominus made king of Sidon, by Alexander, 100.
K. His answer to him, ibid.
Abissures's submission to Alexander, 209.
Abreas killed by the Malli, 220.
Abulites put to death for oppression, 234, 235.
Abydos forsaken by Antiochus, 531.
Accaron given to Jonathan, 606.
Acesines's river pass'd by Alexander, 210.
Achæus regent of Syria's valour and fidelity, 473. Forced to take the government, 483. Besieged in Sardis, 492.
Betrayed to Antiochus, ib. Beheaded, 494.
Ada, the Carian queen's conduct towards Alexander, 85.
Made by him governess general of all Caria, ib.
Admetus general of Alexander, killed at the siege of Tyre, 108.
Æacides, king of Epirus, driven out, 337. Slain by the Macedonians, 340, 341.
Ægyptians, why disaffected to the Persians, 115, & seq.
—astronomers flattery to Alexander, 124.
Æmilius sent against Antiochus, 524. Defeats his fleet, 530.
Æschines's character of king Philip, 16. Sent to the Amphyctians

- phyetions* court, 36. Betrays the interests of Greece to Philip, 37.
- Ætolians* distressed by Antipater, 323. Make peace with him, ib. Invade Thessaly, 324. Defeated, ib. Treacherous to the Acaruanians, 339. Punished by Philip, 340.
- Agathocles*, the son of Lyfimachus, his success against Demetrius, 309. Suspected by his father of a design to usurp the crown, and poisoned, 355.
- Agis* defeated by Antipater, 132.
- Agrion* king of Illyria, his short success against the Macedonians, 366.
- Alcetas*, Brother of Perdiccas betrays Eumenes, 267. Proscribed, 270. Joins himself to him, 271. Defeated by Antigonus, 2 3. His death, ib.
- II. Murdered, 341.
- Alcimalus* sent, by Alexander the Great, to settle democracy in Greece, 81.
- Alcyonius* generously reproved by Pyrrhus, 362.
- Alexander the Great* born, 8, & C. Made regent during Philip's absence, 25, & seq. Saves his life, 36. Commands the left wing at Cheronea, 39. His rencounter with Attalus, 46. Recalled to court, 47. Whether privy to his father's murder, 54. P. His education and character, 49, N. 59. Punishes his father's murderers, 61. Declared general of Greece, 62. Invades the Triballi and Illyrians, 63. Makes a general peace with the barbarous nations, 65. His sudden return into Greece, 66. Takes and sacks Thebes, 67. Spares the house of Pindar, ibid. Continued generalissimo at Corinth, 70, 71. Visits Dio-genes, 71. Account of his troops, 72. His expedition into Asia, ibid. & seq. Spares Lampsacus, through the art of Anaximenes, 75. Victory at the Granicus, 76. Consequences of it, 79. Comes to Ephesus, 80. Dismisses his fleet, why, 81, & seq. Invades Caria, 85. Sends his married soldiers to winter at home, 86. Discovers a conspiracy, 87. His passage thro' the ladders, whether miraculous, 88, H. March thro' Phrygia, 90. Cuts the Gordian knot, 92. Enters Cilicia, 93. Cured by Philip, 94. Fights Darius at Iffus, 96, & seq. His generosity to his family, 97, I. Invades Cæle-Syria, 100. His letter to Darius, 102. Moderation towards the Greek ambassadors, 103. Besieges Tyre, 105. Cruelty to the Tyrians, 108. Answer to Darius, 111. Respectful behaviour to the Jewish high-priest, ib. & seq. Takes Gaza, 113, & seq. Cruelty to Betis, 114. Goes into Egypt, 115, & seq. Builds a new city there, 116. Con-

sults

sults the Hammonic oracle, 118, & seq. Settles the Egyptian government, 121. Punishes the Samaritans, 122. Passes the Euphrates and Tigris, 123. Defeats Darius at Guagamela, 126, & seq. Goes to Babylon, 130. To Susa, 133. Destroys Persepolis, 138. Marches into Media, 139. Pursues Darius's traytors, 143. Reduces Hyrkania and the Mardi, 144, 145. His vain attempt against luxury, 149. Conspired against, 151. Punishes the conspirators, 153, & seq. Pursues his designs, 157. His cruelty to the Branchidæ, 160, S. Ill success against the Scythians, 167, & seq. Degenerates, and affects the Persian customs, 172, & seq. Kills Clytus, 174, & seq. W. Challenges divine honours, 180, & seq. Conspired against, 185. Re-enters Sogdia, 188. In love with Roxana, 193. Marches towards Indus, 195, & seq. His cruelty to the Indians, 200. Passes the Indus, 203. The Hydaspes, ib. & seq. His treatment of king Porus 209. Penetrates further into India, 209, & seq. Stops at the river Hyphasis, 213, & seq. His strange vanity, 214, E. Embarkes his army, 217. In imminent danger from the Malli, 220. Sails down the Indus into the ocean, 225. Goes by land to Babylon, 227, & seq. Takes two wives, 235. Endeavours to unite the Macedonians and Persians, ib. Generosity to his army, ib. & seq. Quells a mutiny on the Tigris, 236, & seq. Goes into Media, 238. Babylon, 241. Threatened with ill omens, ib. & seq. and N. His death, 246, & seq. and O. Character, 248. His vast designs set aside, 261. His corps buried in Egypt, 266.

———— the son of Alexander the Great, 250. Imprisoned by Cassander, 286. Murdered by him, 293, 342.

———— the son of Polysperchon, his character, 327. Favoured by Antigonus, 338. Made general of Peloponnesus, ib. Murdered, ib.

———— the son of Cassander, drives his brother out of Macedon, 348. Put to death by Demetrius, 305, & seq. & 349.

———— the son of Pyrrhus invades Macedon, 363.

———— the son of Perseus sent prisoner to Rome, 413. Forced to lead a private life, 415.

———— a sham son of Perseus invades Macedon, 425.

———— prince of Syria revolts against Antiochus, 474, & seq. His tragical end, 480.

---

- Balas set up against Demetrius, 598. Acknowledged by the Romans, 599. Courts the Jews, 600. Defeats and kills Demetrius, 602. Marries Cleopatra, ib. Degenerates, 603. Abandoned by Philometor, 607. Defeated and killed, 608. His character, 609, K.
 ——— the Pherean murdered, by his wife and brethren, 10.
 ——— the son of Æropus conspires against Alexander the Great, 87.
Alexandria, when and by whom built, 160. Besieged by Antiochus, 565.
Alexandrians, their fidelity to Philometor, 562.
Amastrius married to Craterus, 235.
Ammon, Jupiter, the temple and oracle of, 120. Consulted by Alexander, ib.
Ammonius's cruelties, 603. Murdered by the Antiochians, 607.
Amphimachus's lot after Alexander's death, 270.
Amphipolis taken by Philip, 6.
Amphyetions condemn the Locrians, 37. Chuse Philip general, ib.
Amyntas, Alexander's governor murdered, 66.
 ——— general suspected of treason, 156. Makes his defence and is cleared, ib.
Anaxarchus the sophist's flattering speech to Alexander, 180.
Anaximenes saves Lampsacus, 75.
Anchor, why and how born by the Seleucidæ, 433, & A.
Andriscus set up for Philip the son of Perseus, 417. Sent prisoner to Rome, 418. Escapes into Thrace, ib. Invades Macedon, 420. Defeats the prætor Juventius, 423. Turns tyrant, ib. Defeated twice by Metellus, 424. Sent prisoner to Rome, 425.
Andronicus forced to surrender Tyre, 288.
 ——— Perseus's governor in Thessaly put to death, 391.
 ——— murders Onias, 559. Put to death for it, ib.
 ——— a cruel governor of Samaria, 564.
Anicius sent to Illyria, 396. His success there, 411, E. Carries Gentius to Rome and triumphs, ib.
Annius's forged history, how discovered 458, M.
Antigenes's lot after Alexander's death, 270. Treachery to Eumenes, 283. Cruel punishment, 284.
Antigonia razed by Seleucus, 443.

Antigonus,

Antigonus, his lot after Alexander's death, 258, 270. Defeats Alcetas, 272, & seq. Outwitted by Eumenes, 273. Repulsed with loss, 277. Defeated by Eumenes, 280. His treachery to him, 282, & seq. And to his own friends, 284. Marches into Babylon, 285. Calls Seleucus to an account, ib. Seizes Syria and Phœnice, 286. Repels Cassander, 287. The provinces recovered from him by Ptolemy, 287, 288. Makes a new partition with the confederates, 293. Invaded by them, ib. Takes the title of king, 296. His extraction and character, 297, & seq. Ill success against Egypt, 298, & seq. Invaded by the confederates, 301, & seq. Slain at the battle of Ipsus, 302.

———— Gonatus the son of Demetrius, his filial piety, 314. Gentleness, 351. Seizes the crown of Macedon, 359. Defeats the Gauls, 360. Invaded by Pyrrhus, ib. Expelled by him, 361. Defeats him at Argos, 362. Deserted by his men, 363. Takes the citadel of Corinth, 364. His death, 365.

———— Doson chosen regent of Macedon, 367. Afterwards king, ib. His character, ib. Courted by the Achaëans, 368. Friendship to Aratus, 369. Success against Cleomenes, ib. & seq. Kindness to the Spartans, 370. Defeats the Illyrians, 371. Overstrains his voice in the battle, and dies with a spitting of blood, ib.

Antioch, metropolis of Syria, 432. By whom built, 442. Described, ib. & seq. & E.

———— metropolis of Mygdonia, where situate, 479, R.

Antiochis, her spurious brood, 596.

Antiochus Soter's pretensions to Macedon, 359. Succeeds his father Seleucus in Syria, 458. Yields Greece to Antigonus, 460. Why surnamed Soter, ib. Defeats the Gauls, ib. His death, 461.

———— Theos, why so called, 461. Wars with Egypt, 462. Loses several provinces, 463, & seq. Makes peace with Ptolemy, 464. Poisoned by his wife, 465.

———— Hierax, why so called, 469. Wars against his brother, 470. Expelled Syria, 472. His death, ib.

Antiochus the Great invades Egypt, 476. Forced to retire, 477. Defeats his rebellious subjects, 480. Wars against Ptolemy 484, & seq. Takes Ptolemais and Tyre, 485. Defeats the Egyptians, 488. Marches into Judæa, ib. Defeated by Ptolemy, 489. Makes peace with him, 490. Marches against Achæus, 491. Against Arfaces, 494, & seq. Puts Achæus to death, 494. Invades Bactria, 496. India, ib. Joins Philip against Egypt, 497. Recovers Palestine, &c. VGL. VIII. 4 J 500.

500. Allies with Ptolemy, 501. His conquests in Asia Minor, ib. & seq. In Chersonesus, 503. Answer to the Roman ambassadors, 504. Sends ambassadors to Rome, 508. Declares war against it, 510. Invades Pisidia, 513, & seq. His conference with the Roman deputies, 515. Marries a young wife, 520. Defeated at Thermopylæ by the Romans, ib. At sea, 522. Invades Pergamus, 525, & seq. Defeated at sea, 527. His ill conduct, 530. Sues to the Romans, 532, & seq. His proposals rejected, 533. His gallant army, 535. Defeated at Magnesia, 536. Makes peace with Rome, 541, & 543, Q. His death and character, 545, & seq. Reign foretold by Daniel, 546, R.
-
- Epiphanes*, the son of Antiochus the Great, sent hostage to Rome, 542. Exchanged for Demetrius, 552. Mounts the Syrian throne, 554. His character, ib. & seq. Surnamed Epimanes, 555. War with Egypt, 561, & seq. His embassy to Rome, 560. Injustice to the Jews, 561, & seq. Conquers Egypt, 562. Marches into Judea, 563. Profanes and plunders the temple, ib. & seq. Returns into Egypt, 565. His career stopt by the Romans, 570. Wreaks his revenge on the Jews, 572. His gambols at the games of Daphne, 573, & seq. Repulsed at Elymais, 576. His miserable end, 577.
-
- Eupator* succeeds his father in Syria, 580. The Romans usurp the guardianship of him, 584. His ill success against the Jews, ib. & seq. Treachery to them, 587. Put to death, 593.
- Antipater's* character, 43. Conduct in Greece, 132. Victory over Agis, ib. Whether guilty of Alexander's death, 246, O, & 247. His post after that prince's death, 258. Chosen protector to his son, 270. Divides the provinces a-new ibid. His descent and character, 316, & seq. Marches against the revolted Greeks, 318. Defeated by Leosthenes, 319. By Antiphilus, ib. Makes peace with them, 320. Wars with the Ætolians, 323. Marches against Perdiccas ib. & seq. Chosen protector, 324. His death and successor, 325, 326, & B.
-
- the son of Cassander, his bloody parricide, 348. Expelled by his brother, ib. Flies to Lyfimachus, 349. Put to death by him, 350.
-
- the son of Philip, chosen king of Macedon, 358.
- Antiphilus's* success against Antipater, 319.
- Aornus*, a city in India, described, 201. The rock of, taken by Alexander, 202.

Apamea,

- Apamea*, by whom built, 445.
Apellonia, the country submits to Glaucias, 341.
Apollonius's bloody expedition against the Jews, 572, & seq.
 Defeated by Jonathan, 605. Several generals of that name, 604, I.
Apollophanes's advice to Antiochus, 482.
Appius Claud. sent against Perseus, 390. Sadly distressed, 393.
Arabs invaded by Antigonus, 289, & seq.
Arachosia, surrendered to Alexander, 158.
Aratus, his policy against the Macedonians, 365, & seq. Revenge on the treacherous Athenians, 366. Surprizes Corinth, 365. Joins with Antigonus, Doson, 369. Conference with him, ib. Poisoned by Philip, 372.
Arbela, the battle of, 126, & seq.
Archidamus, defeated by Demetrius, 305.
Argos, treacherously entered by Pyrrhus, 362. Relieved by Antigonus, ibid.
Arians defeated by Alexander, 147. By Erigyne, 158.
Ariarathes II. crucified by Perdiccas, 263, 264.
 — VI. his character, 595, & seq. Dethroned by Demetrius, 597.
Arideus, Alexander's brother, appointed to succeed him, 254. Called Philip by the army, ib. Put to death by Olympias, 334.
Aristomenes, sent guardian of Egypt, 498.
Aristotle, whether conversant with Moses's writings, 86, & F.
Arsaces revolts from Antiochus, 463. Founds the kingdom of Parthia, 464. Invades Syria, 471.
 — II. Invades Media, 494. Makes peace with Antiochus, 495, & seq.
Arsanes, brought bound to Alexander, 170.
Artabazanes, invaded by Antiochus, 481.
Artabazus's fidelity to Darius, 142. Rewarded by Alexander, 144.
Artaxias I. king of Armenia, revolts against Antiochus, 575, 576, & Y. Defeated by him, 576.
Ascalon, taken by the Jews, 606.
Aspendus, its strong situation, 89. Surrenders to Alexander, ibid.
Asphaltes, the lake of, measured by Demetrius, 290. Computes the profit of its bitumen, 291.
Aspii, invaded by Alexander, 197.
Assaceni, invaded by Alexander, 198.
Aster, a famed archer, the story of, 9, note, D.

- Atalanta*, sister of Perdiccas, put to death, 269.
Atargatis, the temple of, burnt, 585.
Atheneus sent against the Arabs, 289. Slain by them, 290.
Athenians outwitted by Philip, 7. Assist the Olynthians, 13.
 13. Send Phocion against Philip, 34. Beaten at Cheronæa, 39, 40. Their rank flattery to Philip, 50. To Alexander, 68. Treachery to Demetrius, 303. Punished, 305.
 Forced to submit to Antipater, 322.
Athens taken by Demetrius, 305. Its government altered by Antipater, 322. Garisoned by Antigonus Gonatus, 363.
Atropatia, where situate, 481, X.
Attalus's speech to Philip, 46. Abuse of Pausanias, 52.
 Treasonable views, 62. But to death, 63.
 ——— Alexander's admiral, 269. Joins with Eumenes, 271. Defeated and taken by Antigonus, 273.

B.

- B Abylon, the ruins of, described, 447, & 448, H.
Babylonians submit to Alexander, 131. Forced to abandon their city, 291. Freed by Demetrius, 594. Submit to Seleucus, 440.
Bactra, metropolis of Bactria, taken by Alexander, 162.
Bactria, the kingdom of, when and by whom founded, 464.
 Invaded by Alexander, 162.
Bagdad, where situate, 450, sub fin. note.
Bagoas's revenge on Orsines, 233, note.
Balas, vid. Alexander Balas, 598.
Balm of Gilead, a plantation of, near Asphaltes, 291.
Barsina married to Alexander, 235. Her issue by him, 250.
 Murdered by Polyperchon, 343.
Baryaxes put to death by Alexander, 234.
Barzaentes murders Darius, 143. Put to death by Alexander, 148.
Bastarnæ invited into Macedon by Philip, 376. Fall out with the Thracians, 382. Ill treated by Perseus, 395.
Bazira taken by Alexander, 201.
Belus, the temple of, at Elymais, 546.
Berenice's intrigues at the Egyptian court, 355.
 ——— princess of Lydia, assassinated Demetrius, 463:
 ——— daughter of Ptolemy married to Antiochus, 464.
 Murdered by Laodice, 466.
Berosus, his character, writings, &c. 461, & note.
Bessus's treason to Darius, 142. Proclaims himself king, 146.

146. His cowardly conduct, 162. Delivered up to Alexander, 164. His punishment and death, 171, & T.
Bethsura besieged by Lyfias, 584.
Betis defends Gaza, 113. Alexander's cruelty to him, 114.
Brachmans put to death by Alexander, 224, & H.
Branchidæ massacred by the same, 160, S.
Bucephalus taken and restored by the Mardi, 145.
 ——— a city built by Alexander, 209.
Bythis defeats the Achæans, 366.

C.

CALANUS burns himself alive, 234.
Calisthenes's free speech against adoring Alexander, 180, & seq. His character, 184, Y. Death, 187.
Callas's success against Polysperchon, 334, & seq.
Callicrates prevents the Achæans succouring Egypt, 568, W.
Callines's speech to Alexander, 237.
Capros, a river in Assyria, 479, I.
Caramanians complain to Alexander, 231.
Carnion taken and burnt by the Maccabees, 585.
Cassander, whether he poisoned Alexander, 246, & seq. & O. His post after that prince's death, 270. Leagues against Antigonus, 286. Repelled by him, 287. Murders Roxana and her son, 293, 342. Invades Peloponnesus, 342. Corrupts Polysperchon, 343. Raises a confederacy against Antigonus, 345. Hatred to Alexander, 347, C. Defeated by Demetrius, 300. Makes a new alliance against Antigonus, 301. Why he did not succeed his father, as governor of Macedon, 326, B. His severity to Demades, 327. Attempt against Polysperchon, 328, & seq. Goes to Nicanor, 331. Marches against Olympias, 334, & seq. Against Polysperchon, 337. Outwits Antigonus, 338. Wars with the Ætolians, 339. Ill success in Asia, 341. His death, 346.
Cassandria, by whom built, 336.
Cathei confederate with the Oxyaracæ and Malli against Alexander, 210. Defeated, ib. & seq.
Cebalinus discovers a conspiracy against Alexander, 152.
Celtes sue to Alexander, 65. Their answer to him, ib. Ranked in the number of his allies, ib.
Cestrius, river, described, 543, P.
Chalonitis, where situate, 481, W. Whence so called, ib.
Chares the Athenian, sent to relieve Perynthus, 26. The promise of Chares becomes proverbial, ib.

Charidemus

- Charidemus* put to death, 91.
Cheronæa, the battle of, 39.
Chersobleptes invaded by Philip, 21, & 22, note. Gives up the Chersonese to the Athenians, 21.
Chersonesus invaded by Demetrius, 303.
Choasprians subdued by Alexander, 196.
Chorienes besieged in his fortress, in the Paratacæ, 193. Surrenders himself, 194.
Cilicia invaded by Demetrius, 304.
Cilles defeated by Demetrius, 289.
Cleomenes's success against the Achæans, 368, & seq. Defeated by Antigonus Dofon, 370.
Cleopatra put to death by Antigonus, 294. Daughter of Antiochus, married to Ptolemy, 512.
Cleophes, queen of India, subdued by Alexander, 198, & seq. His treatment of her, 200.
Clitander put to death for oppression, 231.
Clondicus, who, 394. Outwitted by Perseus, ib. & seq. Spoils Thrace and raises enemies to Perseus, 395.
Clytus, king of Illyria, revolts from Alexander, 65. Defeated, ib.
 ——— general of Alexander joined in command with Hephestion, 157. Reproves Alexander, 175, & seq. Killed by him, 176, & W.
Cæle-Syria reduced by Alexander, 99, & seq.
Cænas, general of Alexander, wounded at Gaugamela, 128. Made commander of Bactria, 189. Defeats the rebels, 190. His speech in behalf of the soldiers, 213. His death, 217, note F. Lamented by the soldiers, ib.
Colophon, the city of, described, 529.
Coracesium besieged by Antiochus, 502.
Corinth, the citadel of, taken by Gonatus, 364. By Aratus, 365.
Coryeus, the naval fight of, 521, 522.
Cossæans, why subdued by Alexander, 239.
Cotys II. joins the Macedonians against the Persians, 387.
Craterus appointed protector after Alexander's death, 258. Sent against Eumenes, 266. Defeated and killed, 268.
 ——— assists Antipater, 320. His death, 323. Defeats the Massagetes, 189. And other rebels, 195. Made governor of Andaca, 196.
Cratespolis, her conduct and bravery, 338.
Crenides taken by Philip, 8. Rebuilt by him and called Philippi, ib.
Crocodiles in the river Indus lead Alexander into a strange notion about the Nile 216, F. Changes his opinion, ib.
Cynans

Cynane put to death by Perdiccas, 265.
Cypriots assist Alexander against Tyre, 106.
Cyprus island taken by Ptolemy, 293. By Antiochus, 568.
Cyropolis taken by Alexander, 165, & seq.
Cyrus's camp abandoned to Alexander, 93.
 ——— tomb described, 232.

D.

DAgon's* temple burnt by Jonathan, 605.

Damides's stratagem against Polysperchon, 332.
Daniel, several of his prophecies fulfilled, 466, O. 468, P. 546, R. 552, 554, 575, & 579, B.
Daphne, the infamous grove of, described, 444, E. ---- the sanctuary of, forced by Laodice, 466. --- the games of, described, 573, X.
Dardanians expelled by the Bastarnæ, 382.
Darius marches against Alexander, 94, & seq. Defeated at Iffus, 96. His first message to Alexander, 102. Second message rejected, 111. Defeated near Guagamela, 126, & seq. A great instance of his goodness, 131, sub fin. note. His treasure at Susa, 133 & P. Flies to Ecbatane, 139. Betrayed by Bessus, 142. Murdered, 143.
Delphic oracle corrupted by Philip, 39.
Demades's speech to Philip, 68, & seq. Successful embassy to Antipater, 321. His character, 325. Severe punishment, 327.
Demetrius son of Antigonus, left with the government of Syria, 287. His character, ib. Defeated by Ptolemy, 288. Defeats Cilles, 289. His gallantry to Ptolemy, ib. Sent against Petra, 290. Measures the lake Asphaltes, ib. Marches into Babylon, 291. Recovers Cilicia, 293. His conquests in Cyprus, 294, & seq. Saluted king by his father, 296. His ill success against Rhodes, 300. His behaviour to Protogenes, ib. Degeneracy, ib. & 352. Defeated at Ipsus, 302, 303. Gives his daughter to Seleucus, 304. Becomes king of Macedon, 305, & 350. Prepares for the conquest of Asia, 307. Driven out of Macedonia, 308. Ill success against Lysimachus, &c. 309. Against Pyrrhus, ib. 352, & seq. Retires to Cassandria, 353. Surrenders himself to Seleucus, 312, & seq. His last letter to his son Antigonus, 313. Death, 314. Funeral honours, ib. Wives and offspring, 315, & seq.
 ——— the son of Demetrius, king of Cyrene, 315.
 ——— the son of Gonatus, his early valour, 363. Marries.

- ries Nicæa, 364. His troublesome reign, 366, & seq.
 — the son of Philip, his character, 373. Pleads for his father before the Roman senate, 375. Envied by his natural brother, 373, & seq. Suspected by his father, 378. Put to death, 379.
 — prince of Macedon, marries Apame, 462. Murdered by her daughter, 463.
 — the son of Seleucus sent to Rome, 552.
 — the son of Seleucus, his suit to the Roman senate, 582, & seq. Rejected, 584. Presents a second, 589. Escapes into Syria, 591. His letter to the senate, 592. Wars against Ariarathes, 595. Degenerates, 597. Courts the friendship of the Jews, 600. Defeated, 602. His extraordinary valour, ib. Killed, ib.
 — Nicator repulsed by the senate, 598. Dethrones Alexander Balas, 608. Allies with Philometor, 607. Restored to his kingdom, 608.
Demosthenes the orator, his character of king Philip, 10, note. Whether the pacific oration be really his, 18, E. His speech in favour of Diopithes, 20. Outwrestles Philip, 23. Withdraws the Thebans from him, 38, & seq. His cowardise at Chæroneæ, 40. Philip's character of him, 41, note. His excessive joy at the death of Philip, 62. Raises the Greeks against Alexander, ib.
Dicæarchus's impiety punished, 506.
Dinarchus put to death, 330.
Diodorus Siculus, how far preferable to Plutarch, 292, D.
 — a Syrian facilitates Demetrius's escape, 590.
Diogenes's treachery to the Macedonians, 368.
 — the philosopher's furliness to Alexander, 71.
Diopithes invades Philip's territories, 19.
Diophanes's brave attempt against Seleucus, 526, L.
DioscURI substituted to Bacchus, 174, 179.
Doloaspis made president of Egypt, 121.
Dolopians reduced by Perseus, 383.
Doxareas's submission and presents to Alexander, 204.
Drypetis, daughter of Darius, married to Hephestion, 235. Murdered by Roxana, 261.
Dura, where situate, 480, U.
Dymnus conspires against Alexander, 151. Dies, 152.

E.

ECLYPSE of the moon, foretold by Sulpitius Gallus, 399. Throws the Macedonians into a panic, ib.
Elateæ

Elatea taken by Philip, 37. Great advantages of seizing the place, 38, not. H.

Elea, where situate, 514.

Emilianus Scipio passes mount Olympus, 397.

Emilius Paulus, Roman consul, sent against Perseus, 396, & seq. Defeats him, 400, & seq. His speech to him, 405. Treatment of him, ib. & seq. New models the Macedonian government, ib. & seq. His triumph at Rome, 412, & seq. Behaviour to Perseus, 413.

Epaminondas, his character, 2, A. Parallel with Philip, ib.

Ephesians, their pride, 80.

Ephesus visited by Alexander, 80. Taken by Antiochus, 502.

—— the temple of, spared by Demetrius, 303.

Epigenes envied by Hermias, 475, & seq. Good advice to Antiochus, ib. Treacherously murdered by him, 478.

Epigoni, whence so called, 235.

Erasistratus's stratagem in favour of Antiochus, 453, & seq.

Erigyus defeats the Arians, 158.

Evander, a cowardly Cretan, 389. His unlucky advice to Perseus, ib. — hated by the Macedonians, 401. Takes refuge in Samothrace, 403. Put to death by Perseus, 404.

Eubœa island invaded by Philip, 23, & seq.

Euergetæ, whence so called, 157. Favoured by Alexander, ibid.

Eulæus, regent of Egypt, 557. Corrupts the young king, 563.

Eumenes II. wars with Antiochus, 513, & seq. His bravery at the battle of Magnesia, 539. Assists Antiochus, 554. Wounded by Perseus's assassins, 385. Allies with Rome against him, 389. Repulsed from Cassandria, 392.

—— Alexander's secretary, his moderation towards Hephestion, 238, 239. Declares for Aridæus, 255. His character, ib. vid. 262, & seq. His fidelity, 263. Sent against Ptolemy, 266. Defeats Neoptolemus, 267. Is proscribed, 269. His defeat, and singular valour, 271, & seq. Loyalty, 274, & seq. Repulses Antigonus, 277. Marches to Persepolis, 278. His speech to his officers, 279, C. Defeats Antigonus, 280. Betrayed to him, 283. Put to death by him, ib.

Eupalemus defeated by Ptolemy, 340.

Euthycrates betrays Olynthus to Philip, 14.

Euthydemus, king of Bactria, invaded by Antiochus, 496.
Makes peace with him, ib.

F.

FIRE-ships invented by the Rhodians, 530.
Flaminius's answer to Antiochus's ambassadors, 509.

G.

GAbene seized by Eumenes, 280. By Antiochus, 281, & seq.
Gadrosi subdued by Alexander, 228, & seq.
Galatia, whence so called, 459.
Galilee invaded by Antiochus, 488.
Gallogrecia, whence so called, 459.
Gangaridæ, where situate, 215, in fin. E.
Gauls first invasion of Macedon, 357. Second, 359. Third, ib. Rife the Royal tombs, 361. Defeated by Gonatus, 363. Settled in Asia Minor by Nicomedes, 459. Their treachery to Hierax, 470.
Gaza taken by Alexander, 113, & seq. Its governor cruelly treated, 114. By Ptolemy, 288. By Antiochus, 500.
—— in Bactria, taken by Alexander, 166.
Gentius, king of Illyria, ill treated by the Romans, 386. Outwitted by Perseus, 394. Sent prisoner to Rome, 411, & E.
Getæ defeated by Alexander, 64.
Glaucias, king of Illyrium, invaded by Cassander, 339. Makes peace with him, ib.
—— officer of Cassander, murders Roxana, and her son, 342.
Glausæ invaded by Alexander, 209.
Gold mines seized by Philip, 8.
Gordian knot, the origin of, 91. Cut by Alexander, 92.
Gracchus sent to watch over Antiochus, 573. Behaviour of Antiochus to him, 574. His report to the senate, 575.
Granicus, battle of, 76, & seq.
Greece invaded by Philip, 37, & seq.
—— the democracy, of, restored, 48.
—— alarmed at Alexander's success, 132. Forced to submit to Antipater, 141, & 320.
Greek mercenaries, how used by Alexander, 145, 146. Revolt after his death, 261. Massacred, 262, & 320.
Greeks arm against Philip, 39. Defeated at Cheronæa, ib. & seq. Chuse Alexander their general, 62. Revolt from him, 66.

Guagamela,

Guagamela, the battle of, 126, & seq.
Gymnic games instituted by Alexander, 108.

H.

H Alicarnassus besieged by Alexander, 83, & seq. Bravely defended by Memnon, 83. Demolished, 85.
Haloneſus taken from the pirates by Philip, 30. By the Pe-parethians, ib.
Halys river deſcribed, 545, in fin. Q.
Hammon, Jupiter, the temple of, 118.
Hannibal ſhelters himſelf with Antiochus, 506. Sends Ariſto to Carthage, 510, & ſeq. Outwitted by the Romans, 515.
 His advice to Antiochus, 518. Untimely rejected, ib.
Harpalus, Alexander's treaſurer, why favoured, 140. His treachery, 238. Punished, ib.
Heliodorus's attempt on the temple at Jeruſalem puniſhed, 550, & ſeq. Poisons the king, 552.
Hepheſtion wounded at Guagamela, 128. Made general of the horſe with Clytus, 157. Sent towards Indus, 196.
 Rewarded by Alexander, 235. Reproved for his treatment of Eumenes, 238. His death and obſequies 239.
Heraclides baniſhed for oppreſſion, 594. Plots againſt the king of Syria, 598, & ſeq. His ſpeech to the Roman ſenate, 599.
Heracon accuſed by the Medes, is acquitted, 231. Charged by the Sufans, is put to death for oppreſſion, ib.
Hercules the ſon of Alexander murdered by Polyspercon, 250, & 343.
Hermias firſt miniſter of Syria, his brutiſh character, 475.
 Treacherous advice to Antiochus, ib. Treachery to Epigenes, 478. Tragical end, 482.
Hermocrates the ſophiſt, his advice to Paufanias, 53, 54.
note.
Hermolaus, why he conſpired againſt Alexander, 185. His ſpeech to the army, 186. Death, 187.
Hippias, Perſeus's general oppoſes the Romans, 391. Surrenders to them, 402.
Hippoſtratus made general of Media, 284.
Holophernes's pretenſions to the Cappadocian crown, 596.
 Supported by Demetrius, 597.
Homer, his poems, why ſo much eſteemed by Alexander, 60.
Hydaſpes paſſed by Alexander, 203, & ſeq. Repaſſed, 211, & ſeq.

Hydraotes, river, passed by the same, 210. Repassed, 216.
Hyphasis, river, the boundary of Alexander's conquests, 214,
 E. & 215.
Hyrkania invaded by Alexander, 144.
Hyrcanus made governor of Judæa by Seleucus, 553.

I.

J ASON al. Jesus, buys the Jewish high-priesthood, 556 Supplanted by his brother, 558 & seq. Drives him out, 563.
Jerusalem garisoned by Scopas, 499. Taken by Antiochus, 563, & T. Burnt and sacked by Apollonius, 572.
Jews planted in Syria by Seleucus, 450. In high favour with Antiochus, 500. Persecuted by his son, 572, & seq.
Illyria invaded by the Romans, 390, 393.
Illyrians subdued by Philip, 6, 8.
Indians, defeated by Alexander, 199. Treacherously treated by him, 200.
Indus passed by Alexander, 203.
John Hyrcan, vid. Hyrcanus, 552.
Ion's treachery to Perseus, 405.
Jonathan succeeds Judas Maccabæus, 594. Courted by the kings of Syria, 600. His victories 605, & seq. Honours, 606.
Joppa taken by Antigonus, 286. Retaken by Jonathan, 605.
Ipsus, the battle of, 302.
Isaurians, their desperate end, 264.
Issus, the battle of, 96, & seq.
Judæa, Syria, &c. seized on by Antigonus, 286. By Ptolemy, 287, & seq. Recovered by the former, 289. By the latter, 302. By Antiochus, 488. By Philopator, 490. By Antiochus, 499. How it continued in the possession of Seleucus, 553. Wasted by Antiochus, 563, & seq. & 572.
Juventius sent against Andriscus, 422. His rashness, ib. Defeated and slain, 423.

L.

L Amia, concubine of Demetrius, 315.

———— a city in Thessaly, besieged, 319.

Lampsacus spared by Alexander by the address of Anaximenes, 75. Besieged by Antiochus, 502.

Langarus's

- Langarus's* known to Alexander, 65.
Laodice, married to Perseus, 384.
 ——— wife of Antiochus, 464. Poisons him, 465.
Laodicea, by whom built, and whence so called, 445.
Lasthenes, his character, 603, H.
Laurandians severely punished by Perdiccas, 264.
Lenneus, regent of Egypt, challenges Palestine, 557.
Leomedon's government after Alexander's death, 258, 270.
Leonatus rescues Alexander from the Malli, 220. His post after the king's death, 258. Succours Antipater, 319. Killed, ib.
Leonidas, tutor of Alexander, 60. Appointed to command the turbulent battalion, 157.
Leosthenes's zeal for democracy, 318. Success and death, 319.
Lepidus made guardian of Ptolemy Epiphanes, 498, & B.
Liba, where situate, 479, S.
Ligoras's stratagem at the siege of Sardis, 491, Y.
Livius the Roman admiral, defeats Antiochus, 522. His success in the Hellepont, 523. Succeeded by Æmilius, 524.
Lycophron wars with Philip, 11.
Lycus, a river, described, 479.
Lyfandra married to Agathocles son of Lyfimachus, 355. Persecuted by Arsione, ib. Flies to Seleucus, ib.
Lyfias sent against the Jews, 575. Defeated by them, 577. Seizes on the government of Syria, 582. Defeated by Judas Maccabæus, 584. Causes Octavius to be assassinated, 588. Seized by his own soldiers, 593. Put to death by Demetrius, ib.
Lyficles, defeated by Philip, 40. Put to death, ib.
Lyfimachia, rebuilt by Antiochus, 503. Forsaken by him, 531.
Lyfimachus, tutor to Alexander, 60. His post after the king's death, 258. Defends it against Seuthes, 262. Gets Thrace by the new treaty, 293. Marches against Antigonus, 301, & seq. His success against Demetrius, 307. Seizes on Macedon, 355. Poisons his eldest son, ib. Defeated and killed by Seleucus, 356.

M.

MACCABEES, their victories over the Syrians, 573, 576, 584, & seq. Make peace with Lyfias, 584.
Macedonia,

- Macedonia*, invaded by the Athenians, 19. By the Illyrians, 22. Subdued by the Romans, 402, & seq. Its new division, government, &c. 407, & seq. Various changes since, 416, & seq.
- Macedonians*, rewarded by Alexander, 235. Mutiny, 236. Frighted at a lunar eclipse, 399.
- Macedonian* empire, how divided after Alexander's death, 258, 270.
- Macron's* treachery to the king of Egypt, 561, S. Mentioned often in the Maccabees, ib.
- Magas*, king of Libya's alliance with Ptolemy, 462. Broken by his widow, ib.
- Magnesia*, the battle of, 536, & seq.
- Malli*, confederate against Alexander, 210. Defeated, ib. & seq. & 219, & seq.
- Maracanda*, besieged by the Scythians, 167. Relieved by Alexander, 170.
- Mardi*, subdued by Alexander, 145.
- Marmarians*, their desperate defence against Alexander, 86. Force the Macedonian guard, ib.
- Maronites* plundered by Onomastus, 374.
- Martius* outwits Perseus, 387. Sent against him, 390. Gets into the vale of Tempe, 391. Ill success in Macedon, 392.
- Massaga*, besieged and taken by Alexander, 198, & seq.
- Massagetæ* defeated by Craterus, 189.
- Mazaces* surrenders to Alexander, 122, 123, 130, 131.
- Medius* feasts Alexander, 244.
- Megalopolitans* besieged by Polysperchon 331, & seq.
- Megasthenes's* character and writings, 457, & M.
- Meleager* declares for Aridæus, 254. His character, ib. Supplanted by Perdiccas, 256.
- brother of Ceraunus, chosen king of Macedon, 358. Deprived by his subjects, ib.
- Memnon* defeated by Alexander, 77. Defends Miletus, 81. Defends Halicarnassus, 83, & seq.
- Menelaus* the Jew, buys the high-priesthood, 558. Apostatizes, ib. Causes Onias to be murdered, 559. Convicted of many crimes, 561.
- Menidas* wounded at Guagamela, 128.
- Menippus's* speech to the Romans, 509.
- Menythillus* facilitates Demetrius's escape, 590.
- Meroe* persuades Porus to submit to Alexander, 208.
- Messene* besieged by Demetrius, 305.
- Metellus* defeats the Pseudo-Philip in Macedon, 426. Reduces it into a Roman province, ib. & seq.

Methone razed by Philip, 9.

Miletum besieged by Alexander, 81.

Minio's haughty speech to the Roman ambassadors, 516.

Mithridates goes over to Alexander, 85.

Molo, prince of Syria, revolts from Antiochus, 474, & seq.
Defeats his generals, 476. Is defeated, 480. Kills himself, ib. His body crucified, 481.

Mosaic laws, whether copied by Aristotle, 86, F.

Musicanus's submission and presents to Alexander, 223. Revolts, and is crucified, 224, & H.

Mycaberna taken by Philip, 13, 14.

Myndians deceive with false promises, and repulse Alexander, 83.

N.

N Abatean Arabs invaded by Antigonus, 289. & seq. Make peace with his son, 290. Fall foul on his collector of the bitumen, 291.

Nearchus made admiral to Alexander, 218. Sails down the Indus, 226, & seq. & I. Rejoins Alexander, 231, 232.

Neolaus, his tragical end, 481.

Neoptolemus, a flattering poet to Philip, 46, L.

—— the son of Amyntas, killed at Halicarnassus, 84.

—— governor of Armenia, defeated by Eumenes. 267, & seq. Killed, 268.

Nicæa built by Alexander, 209.

Nicanor's lot after Alexander's death, 270. Defeated by Seleucus, 287. Refuses to obey Polysperchon's edict, 329. Defeated by Clytus, 332. Defeats him, ibid. Slain by Cassander, ibid.

Nicolaus, officer to Ptolemy, his fidelity to him, 487. Made his generalissimo, ib. Defeated by Antiochus, 488.

Nicias, Perseus's general, throws his treasure into the sea, 391. Put to death to conceal it, ib.

Nicomedes, prince of Bithynia, calls in the Gauls, 459. Gives them part of Asia Minor, ib.

O.

O ATHS how taken and given by the Romans, 544, 545.

Octavius, Roman admiral, 396. Discharges his duty well, ib. Brings Perseus prisoner to the consul, 405.

—— Sent to be guardian to young Eupator, 584. Murdered by Lyfias, 588.

Olophernes, al. Orophernes, dethrones Ariarathes VI. 597.
Olympias,

- Olympias*, Philip's queen, her character, 45. Divorce, ib. Message to Alexander, 121, 141. Forced to retire into Epirus, 274. Instances of her pride and cruelty, 326, B. Recalled by Polysperchon, 327. Her cruel behaviour at her return, 333. Shuts herself up in Pydna, 335. Besieged by Cassander, ib. Put to death, 336.
 ——— queen of Acarmania, allies with Demetrius II. 367.
Olympics instituted by Philip, 14.
Olynthians invaded by Philip, 13. & seq. Cause defended by Demosthenes, ib.
Onasiecritus, his character as an author, 215 sub fin. not. Made captain of a galley by Alexander, 218.
Onias, the worthy Jewish high-priest, falls out with Simon, 550. Opposes Heliodorus, ib. & seq. Deposed by Antiochus, 556. Murdered at Antioch by Andronicus, 559.
Onomarchus, general of the Phocians, defeats Philip, 11. Killed by him, ib.
Ora, a city in India, taken by Alexander, 209, & seq.
Oracle at Delphi, an account of it, 48, note.
Orchemenus, rebuilt by Alexander, 68.
Oreos in Eubœa taken by Philip, 24.
Oritæ subdued by Alexander, 228.
Oroandes's treachery to Perseus, 404.
Orantobates made governor of Media, 284.
Orophernes, vid. Olophernes, 596.
Orsines put to death for his cruelty, 233, & M.
Oxathres saves Darius's life, 97, I. Put to death, 234, 235.
Oxicanus submits to Alexander, 224, & H.
Oxus, how passed by Alexander, 163.
Oxyartes surrenders to Alexander, 193. Prevails on Chorienes to do the same, 194. Receives marks of the conqueror's favour, ib. & seq. His lot after that monarch's death, 270.
Oxydracæ confederate against Alexander, 218. Defeated, 222, & seq.

P.

- P Antauchus wounded in a single combat and defeated by Pyrrhus, 351, 352.
Paphlagonia submits to Alexander, 93.
Parisatis, daughter of Ochus, married to Alexander, 235.
Parmenio seizes on Darius's treasure, 98, 103, & seq. Surrounded by Persians at Guagamela, 128. Succoured by Alexander,

- Alexander, ib. & O.* Accused by his son, 153. Put to death, 154.
- Paropamisus*, the country of, described, 158, note, and 159.
- the mountain of, 160.
- Parthia*, the kingdom of, when and by whom founded, 464.
- Patrocles* forced to abandon Babylon, 291. Defeated and killed by the Bithynians, 459.
- Pattala*, the king of, submits to Alexander, 225.
- Pausanias*, murderer of Philip, his motive, 52, & seq.
- Pella*, taken by the Romans, 402.
- Pelusium* taken by Antiochus, 562, 568. Surrendered to Alexander, 115.
- Perdiccas*, Alexander's general, his advice after his death, 253. Character, 254, & seq. Supplants and puts Meleager to death, 257. His great power, ib. & seq. Subdues Capadocia, 263. Marries Nicæa, 264. Wars with Ptolemy, Murdered by his men, 269.
- a traitor to Eumenes, hanged, 271.
- Perga* delivered up to the Romans, 543, & P.
- Perinthus*, al. Perynthus, besieged by Philip, 25, 35. Relieved by Phocion, 35.
- Persepolis* destroyed by Alexander, 138, & seq.
- Perseus*, the natural son of Philip, cabals against his brother, 373, 377. Discovered, and disinherited, 381. Mounts the throne by main force, 382. His character, &c. ib. & seq. Falls out with the Romans, 383. Goes to Delphi, ib. Undermined by Eumenes, 384. Accused to the Romans, 386. Makes war with them, 387, & seq. Defeats them, 389. His pusillanimity, 391. Mad actions, ib. Covetousness, 393. Defeated by the Romans, 400, & seq. His miserable flight, 401. Takes sanctuary in Samothrace, 403. Surrenders to Octavius, 404. How treated by the Roman consul, 405, & seq. Vindicated against the Roman writers, 409, D. His miserable end, 413. Character and progeny, 414, & seq.
- Persians* worship Alexander, 182, & X.
- Petra* plundered by Antigonus, 290.
- Peucestas's* lot after Alexander's death, 270. Outwitted by Eumenes, 276, & seq. His treachery to him, 282. Punished, 284.
- Phalanx*, by whom invented, 4, B.
- Pharaimenes*, king of Chorasmen, 187. His embassy to Alexander, ib.

Phernophorus, Ptolem. Phil. why so called, 465.

Philip II. comes into Macedonia, 1. His policy, 2, & A. Defeats Argeus, 5. Makes peace with Athens, ib. His conquests, 6, & seq. Loses an eye, 9, & D. His success in Thessaly, 10, & seq. Against the Olynthians, 13, & seq. Makes peace with Athens, 16. Puts an end to the sacred war, 17, & seq. Invades part of Thrace, 21, & seq. & F. Eubœa, 24, & seq. Propontis, 25, & seq. His letter to the Athenians, 27, & seq. Driven by Phocion, 35. Defeats the Triballi, 36. Chosen general by the Amphictyons, 37. Beats the confederates, 40. Makes peace with Athens, 42. Arms against Xerxes, 43, & seq. Marries Cleopatra, 45. Murdered, 53. His character, 55, & seq.

———— Cassander's general success in Ætolia, 340.

———— the son of Demetrius II. left an infant, 367. Prospers under his uncle Doson, ib. & seq. Mounts the Macedonian throne, 371. His treachery to Aratus and his son, 372. Overpowered by the Romans, 373, & seq. Vain struggles against them, 372, & seq. Family broils, 377. Puts his son to death, 379. Runs mad, 380. His death, 381.

———— the pretended son of Perseus, vid. Andriscus, 417.

———— a Phrygian and cruel governor of Judæa, 564.

———— regent of Syria, 580, & seq. Defeated and put to death by Lysias, 587.

———— the Acarunian, his faithfulness to Alexander, 94. His lot after his death, 270.

Philistides, tyrant of Oreus, made so by Philip, 24, note.

Philla, daughter of Antipater, married to Craterus, 323.

Philo chosen chief of the rebels, 261.

Philocles betrays young Demetrius, 379. Put to death, 380.

Philotærus, first king of Pergamus, 454, K. Buys the body of Seleucus, 457.

Philotas suspected of treason, 153. Tortured and put to death, 154. His character, 155, & seq.

Philoxenus's lot after Alexander's death, 270.

Phocians war with Philip, 11, & seq.

Phocis entered by Philip, 17, & seq.

Phrygians, why submit to Midas, 92.

Pithon sent to reduce Musicanus, 224. Plots against Perdiccas, 262. Chosen protector of Macedon, 269. Put to death by Antigonus, 284.

———— attempt against Eumenes, 276.

Plataea rebuilt by Alexander, 68.

Polybius's advice to young Demetrius, 589, 591, & seq. & E.

Polydamas sent to kill Parmenio, 155.

Polysperchon chosen governor of Alexander's sons, 273.

Left with the care of Macedon, &c. 323. Appointed Antipater's successor, 325, 326, & B. His character, and wrong measures, 327, & seq. First edict confuses all Greece, 329. Cruelty to the Peloponnesians, 331. Defeated by Callas 334, & seq. Forced to flee into Greece, 337. Murders Hercules and his mother, 343.

Polyxenidas, defeated by the Romans, 522. His second defeat, 530.

Popilius, his speech to Antiochus, 570.

Porthmos in Eubæa, taken by Philip, 24.

Porus opposes Alexander, 205, & seq. Loses his son, 207.

Is defeated, 208. How honoured by the conqueror, 209.

—— another of that name abandons his kingdom to Alexander, 210.

Potidea in Macedon, taken by Philip, 7.

Praxa discovers Perseus's treachery, 385.

Propontis invaded by Philip, 25, & seq.

Prusias king of Bithynia, rejects the offers of Antiochus, 528.

Ptolemy Soter sent to seize Bessus, 163. Defeats the Aspii, 197. His advice after Alexander's death, 253. Post and government, 270. Flourishing kingdom, 265. Invaded by Perdiccas, 266. Allies with Seleucus, 286. Takes Syria from Antigonus, 287, & seq. Beaten out of it, 289. Defeated by Demetrius, 295, & seq. Takes the title of king, 296. Allies against Antigonus, 286. Invades Judæa, &c. 302.

—— Ceraunus persecuted by Lyfimachus, 355. His treachery to Seleucus, 356, 456. Seizes the Macedonian crown, 456. Treachery to Arsinoe, 357. Slain by the Gauls, 358.

—— Euergetes, whence so called, 468.

—— Epiphanes invaded by Philip and Antiochus, 497. Protected by the Romans, ib. & seq.

—— Philometor invaded by Antiochus, 561. Taken by him, 563. Restored to his crown, 568. Divides his kingdom with Physchon, ib. Marches into Judæa, 606, & seq. Allies with Demetrius, 607. Reenthrones him, 608. His death and character, 608, & seq.

Ptolemy Physcon placed on the throne of his brother, 564, 565.
Divides it with him, 568. Their joint authority established by the Romans, 570, & seq.

———— the son of Seleucus killed at Iffus, 96.

———— general of Antigonus, his treachery, 342, & seq.
Poisoned by the king of Egypt, 343.

Pydna, a city of Macedon, subdued by Philip, 7. Besieged by Cassander, 335.

Pyrrhus II. brought up by Glaucias, 346. Allies with De- metrius, ib. With Ptolemy, 307. Drives Demetrius out of Macedon, 353. Made king of it, 354. Driven out by Lyfimachus, ib. Recovers it from Gonatus, 361.

Q.

Quinda, the treasure of, plundered by Demetrius, 304.

R.

Rabbath Ammon submits to Antiochus for want of water, 488.

Rammius discloses Perseus's treachery to the Romans, 385, & seq.

Raphia, where situate, 512, G. The battle of, 489.

Rhodians ally with Perseus, 384. Their haughty message to
Antiochus, 502.

Romans protect young Ptolemy, 498. And the free cities of Asia, 503. Their first embassy to Antiochus, ibid. & seq.
The second, 514. Defeat him by sea and land, 520, & seq. And at Magnesia, 540, & seq. Make peace with him, 541, & seq. The treaty at length, 543, Q. Their degeneracy from that time, 545.

Roxana taken prisoner by Alexander, 193. Captivates him, ib. Her cruelty, 261. Imprisoned by Cassander, 336.
Murdered by him, 342.

S.

Salii, among the Romans, their office, 532, M.

Salt of Jupiter Hammon, a royal present, 120.

Samaritans apply to Alexander, 112. Disgusted at his favour to the Jews, 122. Murder Andromachus, ibid. Severely punished, ibid.

Sambus submits to Alexander, 224, & H.

Samian war, whence began, 318.

Sandrocottus

Sandrocottus drives the Macedonians out of India, 441. Concludes a peace with Selucus, 442.

Sanggala razed by Alexander, 210, & seq.

Sardis surrendered to Alexander, 79.

Satibarzanes murders Darius, 143. Revolts from Alexander, 146, & seq. Killed by Erigyus, 158.

Satyrus, his request to Philip, 15.

Scipio Nasica sent into Macedon, 421.

—— L. Cornel. sent against Antiochus, 522. Comes to Troy, 532. Defeats Antiochus, 549, & seq. Makes peace with him, 551, & seq.

—— Africanus serves under his brother, 522. His answer to Antiochus, 533. Advice to him, 534. His son restored to him, 534, 535. Speech to his ambassadors, 541.

Scopas's services to Egypt, 499, & C. Taken prisoner, ib.

Treasonable attempt against Ptolemy, 505. Punished, 506.

Scythians defeated by Alexander, 127. Reduced by him, 165, & seq. Make peace with him, 168.

Seleucia, by whom built, 444, & F. Recovered from the Egyptians, 484.

—— Trachiotis, by whom built, 505, E.

—— on the Tigris, described, 445, & seq.

Seleucidæ, whence so called, 432. A list of them, 433.

Their reigns and history, ib. & seq.

—— the æra of, how and whence computed 438.

Seleucus Nicator, founder of the Syro-Macedonian empire, 433.

His several attempts against Eumenes, 276, 434. Attachment to Antigonus, 285. Falls out with him, 285, 435, & seq. His reception at the Egyptian court, 436. Invades Babylon, ib. Defeats Nicanor, 437. Gains Susia-

na, Media, &c. ib. His great strength, 438. Recovers

Babylon from Demetrius, 440. Assumes the royal title, ibid. Goes into India, ib. & seq. Defeats and kills An- tigonus, 303, 442. Builds Antioch, 442. Allies with De- metrius, 446. Strips him of Cilicia, 447. Imprisons him, 312, 451. Yields his wife and part of his empire to his son, 452, & seq. His kindness to Ptolemy Ceraunus, 355. Defeats and kills Lysimachus, 356, 455. Takes the name of Nicator, 455. Treacherously murdered by Ceraunus, 356, 456. His character, 457, & seq.

—— Callinicus mounts the Syrian throne by parricide, 465.

Invaded by Ptolemy, 467. Defeated by him, 469. By his own brother, 470. Drives him off, 471. Taken prisoner by Arfaces, 472. His death, 473. Why called Callini- cus, ibid.

Seleucus

- Seleucus Ceraunus*, his character, 473. Death, 474.
 ——— Philopator, the son of Antiochus's success in Asia, 523.
 Driven out of Pergamus, 526. Succeeds his father, 547.
 His generosity to the temple of Jerusalem, 549. Poisoned by Heliodorus, 552.
Selga, where situate, 513, H.
Sibyrtius promoted by Antigonus, 284.
Sidon taken by Antiochus, 499. Abdalonimus made king there, 100, K.
Simon, a Benjamite, plots against the Jews, 549, & seq.
Sisygambis, how treated by Alexander, 99, 135, & seq. Her death, 261.
Sitalces, put to death for oppression, 231.
Smyrna confederates with Seleucus, 469. Besieged by Antiochus, 503.
Sogdia invaded by Alexander, 161, & seq.
Sogdian rock taken by him, 191, & seq. Described, 192, 194, B.
Sogdians revolt against Alexander, 188, & seq.
Sostrhenes chosen general of Macedon, 359. Totally destroys the Gauls, 358. Slain by a new inundation of them, 359.
Spitamenes offers to deliver up Bessus to Alexander, 163. Besieges Maracanda, 167. Defeats Pharnaces, 169. Driven off by Alexander, 170. Heads the revolted Sogdians, 189. Defeated by Cænus, 190. Murdered by the Scy-thians, ib. & A.
Statira's death and burial, 123.
 ——— daughter of Darius, married to Alexander, 235.
 Murdered by Roxana, 261.
Stesantor's lot after Alexander's death, 270.
Strato, king of Arados, submits to Alexander, 100.
Stratonice married to Seleucus, 304. Yielded by him to his son Antiochus, 452, & seq.
Suffes at Carthage, what, 507.
Sulpitius sent to Antiochus, 513, & seq.
Susa delivered up to Alexander, 133. The great treasures there, ib.
Syllanus Jun. accused by the Macedonians, 427. Condemned by his own father, 428. Hangs himself, ib. Inference drawn from his punishment, ib. note K.
Syria, the kingdom of, described, 432. Its boundaries after Alexander's death, ib. & 445. Kings, 433. Why called Tetrapolis, 445. Invaded by Eumenes and Attalus, 471. See the rest under its respective kings.

T.

- TAbæ*, where situate, 577, & Z. Thought by some to be Ecbatan, ib.
- Taxila*, a city in India, described, 204, D.
- Taxiles's* submission and presents to Alexander, 195, & seq. Speech to him, 204, D. Sent back to his dominions, 209.
- Telmiffians* great soothsayers, 91.
- Telmiffus*, the pass of, taken by Alexander, 90.
- Teos*, the city of, described, 529.
- Thebans* join with Philip against the Spartans, 23. Join the Greeks against him, 39. Defeated, ib. Revolt from Alexander, 66. Defeated by him, 67.
- Thebes* destroyed by Alexander, 67, & seq. Rebuilt by Cassander, 337. Besieged and taken by Demetrius, 350.
- Theodotus* I. founder of the Bactrian kingdom, 464. Invades Syria, 471.
- II. allies with Arfaces against Seleucus, ib. Defeated by Euthydemus, 496.
- Ptolemy's general goes over to Antiochus, 485. Made governor under him, 486. Attempt on Ptolemy's life, and escape, 489.
- Thessalonica*, taken by the Romans, 402.
- Tbimbro* defeated and crucified, 266.
- Thoas*, Ætolian ambassador's speech to Antiochus, 519.
- Thrace*, the kingdom of, invaded by Philip, 22, & note.
- Thrasydæus*, made king of Thessaly for his flattery, 46, L.
- Timarchus*, a creature of Antiochus, put to death for oppression, 594.
- Timotheus* defeated by the Maccabees with a prodigious loss, 585.
- Tlepolemus*, Alexander's general, his lot after that prince's death, 270.
- Torquatus*, Tit. Man. an instance of his great justice, 428.
- Tralles* razed by Alexander, 85.
- Triballi*, defeated by Philip, 36. Make peace with Alexander, 65.
- Tripoli*, whence so called, 588, D.
- Tuta* succeeds her husband in Illyria, 366. Her ill conduct, ib.
- Tyre* besieged by Alexander, 105. Taken and resettled, 108, & seq. Taken by Antigonus, 286. By Ptolemy, 288. Betrayed to Antiochus, 485.

Tyrians

Tyrians refuse to admit Alexander, 104. Their brave defence, 105, & seq. Cruelly butchered by him, 108.

U.

U XIANS defeated by Alexander, 134, 135.

X.

X ENOCRATES's character, writings, and death, 321, A.

Xenoetas, general of Antiochus, defeated and killed, 476.

Xenxes's salutary advice to Antiochus, 479.

Z.

Z ABDIE L. murders Alexander Balas, 608.

Zariaſpa, surrendered to Alexander, 170.

Zaira taken by Philip, 13.

Zeno, general of Antiochus, defeated, 476.

Zephyrium and other cities submit to Antiochus, 501.

Zaida Crata surrendered to Alexander, 146. Solemn games celebrated by him there, ib, Zipetes I. king of Bithynia dies for joy, 459.

———— II. defeated by his brother, 459.

The End of the Eighth Volume.

A N
Universal HISTORY,
FROM THE Earliest Account of Time to the Present:
COMPILED from ORIGINAL AUTHORS; And ILLUSTRATED with Maps, Cuts, Notes, Chronological and Other Tables. •

---

V O L. IX.

---

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ κατανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱστορικοῦ συνηξάν ἰσχύτως. Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

---

---

D U B L I N:
Printed by EDWARD BATE, for the EDITORS:
M, DCC, XLV.

---

---

C O N T E N T S

O F

V O L U M E IX.

---

C H A P. II.

S E C T. IX.

A Continuation of the history of the Seleucidæ in Syria to the reduction of their dominions by the Romans, page 1

S E C T. X.

The history of Egypt from the foundation of that monarchy by Ptolemy Soter to its being made a Roman province, 46

---

C H A P. III.

The history of the Armenians.

S E C T. I.

Description, Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Learning, Arts and Trade of Armenia, 178

S E C T. II.

The history of the kings of Armenia Major, 192

S E C T.

CONTENTS.

SECT. III.

The history of Armenia Minor, page 230

---

CHAP. IV.

The history of the kingdom of Pontus.

SECT. I.

The description of Pontus, 233

SECT. II.

The history of the kings of Pontus, 240

---

CHAP. V.

The history of the Cappadocians.

SECT. I.

Description, Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Arts, and Trade of Cappadocia, 314

SECT. II.

The history of the kings of Cappadocia. 319

---

CHAP. VI.

The history of the kings of Pergamus, 328

---

CHAP. VII.

The history of Thrace, 361

---

CHAP. VIII.

The history of the antient kingdom of Epirus, 380

CHAP.

CONTENTS.

CHAP. IX.

The history of Bithynia,

431

---

CHAP. X.

The history of the kingdoms of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, Bosphorus, Media, Bactria, Edessa, Emesa, Adiabene, Characene, Elymais, Commagene, and Chalcidene, 453

---

CHAP. XI.

The history of the Jews, from their return from the Babylonish captivity to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian, with an account of their dispersion and condition to this present time,

496

SECT. I.

From their return from Babylon to their coming under the government of their high-priests, ibid.

SECT. II.

Their government under their high-priests and Maccabees,

554

Directions to the Book-binder for placing the Maps.

|                                                                             |       |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|
| A Map of Egypt                                                       | P. 46 |
| A Map of the Kingdoms of Armenia, Pontus, Cappadocia, Media, &amp;c. | 176   |
| A Map of Palestine                                                   | 496   |

Universal History.

S E C T. IX.

A continuation of the history of the Seleucidæ in Syria, to the reduction of their dominions by the Romans.

DEMETRIUS, having now no rival to contend with, and being altogether a stranger to state affairs, left the whole care of the government to Lasthenes, who had hired those Cretans by whom he was attended into Cilicia, when he first set out from Cnidus. As Lasthenes was a man of a severe and imperious temper, he soon alienated the minds of the Syrians from their new king. The first wrong step he took was to command all the Egyptians, whom Ptolemy had placed in the maritime cities of Phœnice and Syria, to be cruelly massacred by the troops of Syria who were in the same garisons. Hereupon the Egyptian army, which was still in Syria, and had placed Demetrius on the throne, full of just horror for so barbarous an execution, abandoned him and returned home <sup>b</sup>. After this, Demetrius, at the instigation of his prime minister caused a strict search to be made after those who had been against him or his father in the late wars, and put them all to death. Having by this means got rid, as he imagined, of all his enemies, he disbanded the greatest part of his army, keeping in pay only his Cretans and some other mercenaries. By this means he not only deprived himself of those veterans who had served under his father, and, being well affected to him, would have maintained him on the throne, but made them his greatest enemies.

In the mean time Jonathān, seeing every thing quiet in

<sup>b</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 11. ver. 19. JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 8.

Judæa, having gathered together what forces he could, and<sup>d</sup> prepared the necessary engines of war, laid siege to the fortresses which the Syrians still held at Jerusalem. Hereupon complaints being made to Demetrius, that prince advanced as far as Ptolemais, and summoned Jonathan to wait on him there, and give an account of his conduct. Jonathan, ordering his men to pursue the siege with all possible vigour during his absence, set out for Ptolemais, with some of the priests and principal men of the nation, carrying with him many rich and valuable presents. These not only appeased the king's wrath, but proved such an efficacious recommendation in behalf of Jonathan, that Demetrius, having dismissed the informers, confirmed him in the office of high-priest, admitted him into the number of his friends, and, at his request, annexed to Judæa the three governments of Aphersima, Lydda and Ramatha, which had formerly belonged to Samaria. Moreover, the king agreed to free the whole country under his government from all duties, customs, and tributes, for three hundred talents to be paid to him by way of equivalent. Demetrius, having thus settled matters with the Jews, returned to Antioch, where he gave himself up to all kind of excesses, Lasthenes putting him, as he was but very young, upon most wicked attempts. This behaviour alienated more and more the affections of his people from him, and disposed the whole nation for a general revolt; which being observed by Diodotus, afterwards called Tryphon, he thought this a favourable opportunity to make a bold push, aiming at nothing less than to place the crown on his own head. Diodotus was born in the territory of Apamea, at a place called Secoan, and brought up in the city of Apamea<sup>d</sup>. He had been very sanguine in the cause of Alexander Balas, who had appointed him, in conjunction with Hierax, governor of Antioch, and therefore had no share in the confidence of Demetrius Nicator; but an obscure and private life did not suit the taste of Diodotus, who was a man of an unbounded ambition. He had very early formed vast schemes, and, if we believe Strabo, in the very beginning of Nicator's reign, seized the fortress of Coracesium in Cilicia, and made it his place of arms, scouring from thence the seas with impunity, and taking all the inhabitants of the coasts who fell into his hands, and carrying them to Delos, where he sold them to the Romans, who, after the reduction of Carthage and Corinth, piqued themselves upon having great numbers of slaves. The indolence of Demetrius Nicator, adds the same author, the avarice of the governors, who had their shares of the profits arising from his piracies, and the connivance of the king of Egypt, a declared enemy to Nicator, encouraged these robberies and other disturbances in the Syrian empire. At length Diodotus, being well apprised of the disaffection of the people to their sovereign, began to entertain thoughts of seizing the crown for himself. With this view he went into Arabia, and there laying before Zabdiel, who had been intrusted with the person and education of Antiochus the son of Alexander, the state of affairs in Syria, with great difficulty prevailed upon him to put the youth into his hands, that he might take advantage of the present disturbances to place him on the throne of his father. Appian calls this prince Alexander, and not Antiochus, contrary to the testimony of the history of the Maccabees and of Josephus. He was the son of Alexander Balas by Cleopatra, and was very young when Diodotus drew him from his retreat (L). The traitor's scheme was to make use of the pretensions of Antiochus, till he had drove Demetrius from the throne, and afterwards to cut off the young prince, and place the crown on his own head.

<sup>c</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 11. ver. 23—37. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 8. <sup>d</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 11. ver. 39. STRABO, l. xvi. p. 752. LIV. l. lii, liii. JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 9. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 132.

IN the mean time, Jonathan was carrying on the siege of the fortress of Jerusalem with great vigour; but not being able to reduce it, he sent deputies to Demetrius, desiring him to withdraw the garison which he could not drive out. As that prince was then involved in great difficulties, on account of the seditions and tumults which daily broke out at Antioch, the inhabitants of that metropolis having an utter aversion both to his person and government, he promised to grant Jonathan his request, upon condition he would send him some troops to keep the Antiochians in awe. Hereupon Jonathan sent him immediately three thousand men, by which reinforcement the king believing himself sufficiently strong to undertake any thing, resolved to disarm the Antiochians, and accordingly ordered them all to deliver up their arms. This unexpected order caused a great uproar in the city ; the inhabitants ran to their arms, and, to the number of one hundred and twenty thousand men, invested the king's palace, with a design to kill him. The Jews hastened to his relief, fell upon the mutiniers, killed about an hundred thousand of them, and set fire to the city, which soon obliged the rest to submit, and sue for pardon, which was granted them. The tumult being thus quelled, the Jews returned, loaded with spoils, to Jerusalem, after having taken this dreadful revenge on the Antiochians, for the wrongs they had suffered from them in Judæa and Jerusalem, especially in the reign of their great persecutor Antiochus Epiphanes<sup>f</sup>.

(L) Antiochus was, according to Eusebius, about seven years of age when Tryphon drew him from his retreat. Livy tells us, that he was then but two years old, wherein he contradicts himself, if some mistake has not crept into the copy; for he e'sewhere owns, that Antiochus reigned only two years under the guardianship of Tryphon, by whom he was, according to him, put to death in the tenth year of his age.

Demetrius, notwithstanding the pardon he had granted to the Antiochians, put many of them to death, confiscated their estates, and practised upon that unhappy people all sorts of cruelties and oppressions ; whereupon the whole kingdom conceived such an hatred and animosity against him, that they only wanted an opportunity to make him feel the most dreadful effects of their vengeance. That ungrateful and impolitic prince behaved no better towards Jonathan, than he did towards his own subjects ; for, notwithstanding the promises he had made to him, and the great obligations he owed him for his late assistance, he refused to stand to the treaty concluded with him at Ptolemais, in virtue of which he was to free the Jewish nation from all taxes and tributes for three hundred talents. This sum had been paid ; but, for all that, the king exacted the same taxes and tributes with the utmost rigour, by which means he alienated the Jews from him, as he had done his own subjects<sup>g</sup>.

WHILE things were in this unsteady condition, Tryphon arrived in Syria, with Antiochus the son of Alexander Balas, and laid claim to the crown in his name, stiling himself guardian and protector of the young king. He no sooner appeared, but the veterans, whom Demetrius had disbanded, and multitudes of others, whom he had provoked with his ill conduct, flocked to him, proclaimed him king, and marching under his banners against Demetrius, obliged that prince to come to an engagement, wherein his army was intirely routed, all his elephants taken, and he himself forced to shelter himself within the walls of Seleucia. Antiochus's party being thus master of the field, marched strait to Antioch, which opened its gates to them, and there placed the young prince on the throne of the kings of Syria, giving him the surname of Theas, that is, the God <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> MACCAB. I. i. c. 11. ver. 41.—52. JOSEPH. Antiq. I. iii. c. 6. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii. p. 347, 348. <sup>g</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ibid. MACCAB. I. i. c. 11. ver. 53. JOSEPH. ibid.

Antiochus being now in possession of Antioch and the throne, Tryphon, his guardian, made it his first business to gain over Jonathan and the Jewish nation. With this view he sent an embassy to Jonathan, and an obliging letter confirming him in the office of high-priest, renewing the grant of the three feignories mentioned above, to which a fourth was added, and allowing him to wear purple with a gold clasp, to drink in a gold cup, and to have place among the king's chief friends, or the first lords of the kingdom, with many other privileges and advantages to be enjoyed by the whole Jewish nation. In virtue of the same letter, which was wrote in the new king's name, Simon was appointed commander in chief of all the king's forces, from the Ladder of Tyre, a mountain so called on the sea-coast between Tyre and Ptolemais, to the borders of Egypt: the whole on condition, that the two brothers and the Jewish nation would declare for Antiochus. Jonathan, provoked at the ingratitude of Demetrius, accepted the invitation, and espoused with great warmth the new king's party; whereupon a commission being sent him, empowering him to raise forces for the king's service throughout all Cœle-Syria and Palestine, he drew together a great army, and marching round the country as far as Damascus, secured all those parts in the interest of Antiochus. In the mean time, the forces which Demetrius had, in Cœle-Syria and Palestine, invaded Galilee, in order to make a diversion, and oblige Jonathan to turn his arms that way; which he did accordingly, leaving Simon to command in Judæa. On his entering Galilee, he was very near being cut off with his whole army by a stratagem; but, while most of his men fled, being seized with a panic fear, a small body of the most resolute and courageous stood their ground, and made head against the enemy, till the rest rallied, and, returning to the charge, renewed the fight, and gained at last a complete victory. On the other hand, Simon, laying siege to Bethsura, made himself master of that important place, which had been long in the hands of the Syrians <sup>c</sup>. The commander of the king's forces in Galilee, having recruited his army with great expedition, returned against Jonathan, who, upon advice of his march, went to meet him as far as Amathis on the borders of Canaan; and there the two armies encamped over-against each other. The Syrian commander formed a design of attacking Jonathan's camp in the night-time, in hopes of surprising him; but finding, on his approach, the Jews, who had received intelligence of his design, ready to receive him, he was so discouraged at the disappointment, that he returned to his camp, and having caused fires to be lighted there to deceive the enemy, he marched off the same night, and got so far before Jonathan received advice of his retreat, that he could never come up with him; wherefore, after having pursued him in vain to the banks of the Eleutherus, he turned his arms, first against the Arabians who were of Demetrius's party, and afterwards entered the territory of Damascus, putting all those to the sword who refused to side with Antiochus; by which means he intirely suppressed the party of Demetrius in those parts, while his brother did the same in the country of the Philistines, after having made himself master of Joppa, and placed a strong garison in it<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. ii. ver. 54. — 56. LIV. Epit. l. lii. JOSEPH. ibid. APPIAN. in Syriac.      <sup>c</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. ii. ver. 57 — 62.      JOSEPH. ibid.

THE partisans of Demetrius being thus every-where destroyed or driven out of the country, Tryphon thought it high time to put in execution the design he had formed from the beginning of cutting off Antiochus, and seizing the crown of Syria for himself; but foreseeing that Jonathan would, to the utmost of his power, oppose such a black and treacherous attempt, he resolved, in the first place, to rid himself of so formidable an enemy, and with this design entered Judæa, at the head of a powerful army. Jonathan met him with forty thousand men at Bethsan, a city of the tribe of Manasseh (M). At the sight of so numerous an army, Tryphon was intimidated,

<sup>k</sup> MACCAB. l. i. ubi supra. & c. 12. ver. 24. & seq. JOSEPH. ibid

(M) The city called Bethsan by the Jews, Methora by Zonaras, and Bazan by Cedrenus, stood on the confines of Galilee, and is the same that is mentioned in the book of Joshua *. The Canaanites kept possession of this city, which was the most considerable in the Decapolis, after the Israelites had conquered Palestine. It stood in the middle of a great plain, near the mountains of Gilboa, about a mile on this side of the Jordan, and 120 furlongs, according to Josephus, from the lake of Gennesareth, and 600 furlongs from Jerusalem. The Greeks gave it the name of Scythopolis; and so it is called in the history of the Maccabees (100), because antiently inhabited by the Scythians, who, according to Herodotus, * Josh. xvii. 11. (100) Maccab. l. ii. c. 12. v. 29.

intimidated, and had recourse to artifice instead of force. No declaration of war had been made, and therefore the Syrian, under a false appearance of friendship, easily circumvented the high-priest. He told him, That he was come thither only to consult with him about their common interest, and to put Ptolemais into his hands, as a reward for the services he had done young Antiochus. Credulity is too often the fault of good men. Jonathan believed him, and suffered himself to be prevailed upon to dismiss his army, keeping only three thousand men with him, and of these he afterwards sent two thousand into Galilee, so that he entered Ptolemais with a guard only of a thousand men, expecting, according to the traitor's oath, to be put in possession of the place; but he was no sooner got within the walls, than the gates were shut upon him, and he seized, after all his followers had been put to the sword. Troops were likewise immediately detached after the two thousand men, who were upon their march towards Galilee; but they, having received advice of what had happened to Jonathan and his men at Ptolemais, put themselves in a posture of defence, being resolved to sell their lives at a dear rate; which the enemy perceiving, suffered them to proceed on their march without molestation; so that they arrived safe at Jerusalem, where they found all the inhabitants in tears for what had happened to Jonathan. However, they did not despond, but choosing Simon for their general instead of Jonathan, applied themselves, with all possible speed, to the finishing of the fortifications begun by Jonathan at Jerusalem. On the other hand, the Syrian army, leaving Ptolemais, advanced towards the land of Judah, and encamped near Addus, which is called by Josephus Addida, and stood on a mountain that commanded the plains of Judah, and was not far from Jerusalem. Simon, at the head of a powerful had, in the reigns of Psammitichus king of Egypt, and Cyaxares king of Media, extended their conquests as far as Syria and Palestine. Pliny tells us, upon the credit of an antient tradition, that Bethsan was, in former times, called Nysa, from Bacchus's nurse, whom the Scythians buried near that place. It is now known among the eastern nations by the name of Elbyzan. It was on the walls of this city, if Josephus is to be credited (101), that the Philistines hung up the dead bodies of Saul and Jonathan. Some Jewish authors say, that it was subject to the Israelites before the Babylonish captivity, they having at length driven out the Canaanites; but that the Affyrians afterwards made themselves masters of it, and held it long after the return of the Jews.

(101) Joseph. Antiq. l. vi.

army, marched out against Tryphon, and posted himself near the Syrian camp. Tryphon, not daring to give him battle, had recourse to his usual treachery; he sent a deputation to the camp of the Israelites, informing Simon that his brother was alive, that he had detained him prisoner only on account of the money which he owed to the king of Syria, and that he would set him at liberty, if the Jews sent him an hundred talents, of silver and Jonathan's two sons as hostages. The ambassadors insisted upon the delivering up of the hostages as a necessary precaution, lest Jonathan, who was highly provoked, said they, against Tryphon, should revolt from Antiochus, and join Demetrius. Simon saw plainly, that his proposal was no more than a feint, and that some treachery was concealed under these artful speeches; however, as he apprehended, that upon his refusal, Tryphon would put Jonathan to death, and the people blame him as the author of it, he resolved to comply with the request, and accordingly sent the hundred talents and the two hostages. And then the traitor, having received all he demanded, pulled off the mask, and declared himself an enemy to the Jewish nation. He returned into Syria, carrying Jonathan and his two sons along with him, and having there reinforced his army, he re-entered Judæa, with a design utterly to destroy the whole nation; but Simon kept so close to him in all his marches and countermarches, that he was forced to retire with disgrace. On his retreat, he put Jonathan to death in the neighbourhood of Bascama (N); but whether by poison or the sword, no historian is exact enough to tell us<sup>1</sup>. Tryphon, after the death of Jonathan, believing he had no body to fear, caused Antiochus to be privately murdered. That young prince was troubled with the stone, and his guardian causing him to be cut for it, ordered the surgeons to dispatch him in the operation<sup>m</sup>. Upon his death the treacherous Tryphon declared himself king of Syria in his stead, and accordingly took possession of the crown, no one daring to oppose him.

<sup>1</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 12. ver. 39—53. & c. 13. ver. 1—11 & 20. 24. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 12. <sup>m</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 13. ver. 31, 32. LIV. l. lv. STRABO. l. xvi. p. 752. JUSTIN. l. xxxvi. c. 1.

(N) The author of the history of the Maccabees tells us, that the snow which fell prevented Tryphon from entering into the country of Gilead, and that he stopped at Bascama; whence it is plain, that this city was not, according to that author, in the land of Gilead, where Josephus and some modern geographers place it.

THE first step he took, after he had ascended the throne, was to try whether he could prevail upon the Romans to acknowledge him king, since, without their protection, his affairs, as he was well apprised, could never prosper. He therefore sent ambassadors to Rome, to notify to the republic his accession to the crown of Syria, and to present the Roman senate with a statue of a victory of massy gold, weighing a thousand of those pieces of gold which were called aurei. He hoped, that, in regard of so valuable a present, and the good omen of victory which the statue carried with it, the senate would not scruple to acknowledge his title; but the Romans cunningly eluding his expectation, received the present, and ordered the name of young Antiochus, whom Tryphon had lately murdered, to be engraved on it, as if it had been sent by him <sup>n</sup>. About this time Sarpedon, one of Demetrius's commanders, attempted to recover Phœnice; but his army was defeated by the forces which Tryphon had in those parts. As the victorious army of the usurper was returning from the pursuit, and quietly marching along the sea-side between Ptolemais and Tyre, a wave swelling all on a sudden to an incredible height, and breaking with great violence on the shore, overwhelmed a great many of them, and then, running back with the same rapidity, left the dead bodies on the strand, and a vast quantity of fish mingled with them; whereupon Sarpedon's men, returning with all speed, found, that those who had escaped the disaster, had retired to the neighbouring cities, especially to Ptolemais, whither Sarpedon advanced, and, under the very walls of the city, offered up the fish, which he found mingled with the dead bodies on the shore, to Neptune the deliverer, by way of thanksgiving for the disaster which had befallen the enemy <sup>o</sup>.

Demetrius in the mean time lay idle at Laodicea, abandoning himself to all manner of lewdness and debauchery, without so much as seeming to be sensible of his misfortunes. However, as Tryphon had given the Jewish nation just reason to renounce his friendship, Simon sent ambassadors to Demetrius, with a crown of gold, to treat with him about an alliance, and to offer him all the forces of Judæa against the usurper. The ambassadors were kindly received by the king, who, as he had no other resource in the melancholy situation of his affairs, willingly granted them all they demanded, viz. a confirmation of the high-priesthood and sovereignty to Simon, an exemption from all taxes and tributes, and a general amnesty for all past acts of hostility, upon condition that the Jews joined him against Tryphon <sup>P</sup>.

<sup>n</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. legat. 31.      <sup>o</sup> STRABO. l. xvi. p. 758. ATHEN. l. viii. c. 2. ex Possidonio Stoico.

NOT long after Demetrius had concluded this alliance with Simon and the Jewish nation, he was encouraged to attempt the recovery of his kingdom by other embassadors sent to him out of the east, and inviting him thither. The Parthians having over-run and reduced most of the eastern provinces, from the Euphrates to the Indus, such of the inhabitants of those countries as were originally Macedonians, not being able to bear that usurpation, nor the pride and insolence of their new masters, earnestly intreated Demetrius, by repeated embassies, to come into those parts, promising him a general revolt from the Parthians, and a sufficient number of troops to expel those usurpers, and recover all the provinces of the east. Demetrius, seduced with these promises, embarked in this enterprize, and passed the Euphrates, leaving Tryphon in possession of the greatest part of Syria. He imagined, that, after he should have made himself master of the east, with such an encrease of power, he should be in a better condition to suppress that rebel on his return. As soon as he appeared in the east, the Elmæans, Persians, and Bactrians declared in his favour; so that, by their assistance, he defeated the Parthians in several engagements; but at last, being deceived by false appearances of a treaty of peace, he inadvertently put himself into the power of a Parthian commander, who seized on his person, and cut his whole army in pieces. The king who reigned in Parthia at this time, was Mithridates the son of Priapatius, a valiant and wise prince. As soon as Demetrius was delivered up to him, he carried the captive prince round the provinces which had revolted, exposing him every-where to public view, that the people, by seeing the person, whom they had looked upon as their deliverer, reduced to so low and shameful a condition, might be the easier brought to submit to their former yoke. After this he treated him as a king, sent him into Hyrcania to reside there, with a maintenance suitable to his dignity, and even gave him his daughter Rhologone in marriage; however, he kept him still in captivity, tho' with all the liberty that could be granted him in that condition. Justin adds, that Mithridates engaged to carry him back into Syria, at the head of a powerful army, and to drive out the usurper; but the death of the Parthian king frustrated all these expectations <sup>9</sup>. Syncellus tells us, upon what authority we know not, that Demetrius was kept in irons by Mithridates and his successor Phrabates, and that he was from thence surnamed Siderites.

<sup>P</sup> Diodor. Sicul. in excerpt. Valesii, p. 355. MACCAB. l. i. c. 11. ver. 31—32 & c. 14. ver. 38—41. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 11.

Cleopatra wife to Demetrius, upon advice of her husband's captivity, shut herself up with her two children in Seleucia on the Orontes, whither many of Tryphon's soldiers flocked daily to her ; for as he was naturally of a cruel and inhuman temper, he soon made the Syrians feel all the weight of a tyrannical government, which they not being able to bear, abandoned him, and went over to Cleopatra ; but still her party alone was not strong enough to support her, and therefore fearing least the people of Seleucia should chuse rather to give her up to Tryphon, than bear a siege out of affection to her person, she invited Antiochus Sidetes (O), her husband's younger brother, to join his interest with her's, promising on this condition, to marry him and procure him the crown ; for being abandoned by Demetrius, who had married the Parthian king's daughter, she resolved to seek a new interest, by disposing of herself in marriage to some-body else ; and not seeing how she could do this more to her advantage than by marrying the next heir to the crown, she fixed upon him, and took him in the room of his brother <sup>1</sup>. This Antiochus was the second son of Demetrius Soter, and had been sent to Cnidus with his brother Demetrius, to be kept there as in a place of safety, during the war between their father and Alexander Balas. He seems to have continued in those parts, even after his brother's accession to the crown ; for he is said to have been at Rhodes when Demetrius was taken prisoner ; and there in all likelihood the messenger sent by Cleopatra found him : For he, having accepted the offer, and thereup-

<sup>9</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 14. ver. 1, 2, 3. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9. JUSTIN. l. xxxvi. c. 1. & l. xxxviii. c. 9. <sup>1</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac p. 132. JUSTIN. ibid. JOSEPH. ubisupra. c. 12.

O: He was called Sidetes or Sedetes, from the Syriac word Zidah, which signifies to hunt, he being much given to that manly diversion (103). Syncellus thinks he had this appellation from the city of Sidon, whence he first marched against Tryphon. Josephus bestows upon him the surname of Pius (104). Justin calls him after his father's name, Soter (105), and Eusebius gives him no other name but that of Sidetes, a name, say that writer, which he well deserved from his passion for hunting.

(103) Plut. in Prob. (104) Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. & l. xiii. c. 16. (105) Justin. in Prolog. l. x. xix.

on assumed the title of king of Syria, wrote immediately a letter to Simon, dated from the isles of the sea, that is, from Rhodes, as is commonly understood, since he had been there a little before†. In this letter he complained of Tryphon's unjust usurpation, and acquainted Simon, that he was preparing to come into Syria, to take vengeance on that treacherous assassin and usurper, and recover his father's kingdom; and therefore, to gain him over to his interest, he confirmed to him all the privileges and immunities which other kings had granted to the Jewish nation, exempted Jerusalem from the jurisdiction of the kings of Syria, and to many other valuable privileges, added that of coining money, the only regal prerogative which the heads of the Jewish nation seemed to want† (P). The wise high-priest therefore did not think it adviseable to reject such advantageous offers, whereby he was invested in the rights of royalty, and made a free, independent and sovereign arbiter of the religion, revenues, and government of his country; but prepared to assist Sidetes in mounting the throne of his ancestors, and driving out the usurper.

THE young prince therefore, depending on the friendship of the Jews, in the beginning of the following year, left Rhodes, and landed in Syria, with an army of mercenaries, whom he had hired in Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands, and having married Cleopatra, joined what forces she had to his own, took the field, and marched against Tryphon. At the sight of a prince of the blood of the Seleucidæ, most of the usurper's forces, weary of his tyranny, abandoned him, and going over to Antiochus, augmented his army to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand foot and eight thousand horse. Tryphon, not being in a condition to keep the field against so great a force, had no resource but in flight; he therefore retired to the city of Dora in the

† MACCAB. l. i. c. 15. ver. 1. JUSTIN. APPIAN. ibid. † MACCAB. l. i. c. 4. ver. 2—9.

(P) Till the reign of Antiochus, the Syrian kings had constantly refused the Jews the privilege of coining money; but Simon, it seems, did not wait for the new king's grant, the kings of Syria not being then in a condition to dispute with him that prerogative. He had three years before struck medals with his own name, and the year in which the Jews had been restored to their full liberty, by the reduction of the fortress of Jerusalem. This event was represented on the reverse by the figure of a palm-tree, the symbol of Judæa.

neighbourhood of Ptolemais, where he was close besieged by Antiochus, who employed all his sea and land-forces against the place. During this siege the high-priest Simon signalized his zeal for the new king, sending him two thousand chosen men, with considerable presents in gold, silver, arms, and engines of war. But prosperity had changed the heart of Antiochus; he sent back to Simon his presents and troops, and with them Athenobius, one of his friends, to demand the restitution of Gazara, Joppa, and the fortress of Jerusalem, with several other places then held by Simon, which he claimed as belonging to the crown of Syria, or else five hundred talents in lieu of them, and five hundred more for the damages that were done by the Jews within the borders of his dominions. To this message Simon answered, That for Gazara and Joppa he was willing to pay the king an hundred talents; but, as to the other places, they originally belonged to Judæa, and had been unjustly taken from the Jewish nation; wherefore, since he had now re-taken them, he was resolved not to part with them. Athenobius was highly offended at this answer, and on his return to the king's camp, inspired him with the same rage and hatred to the Jews which he had conceived. Hereupon Cendebeus, one of the chief commanders of the Syrian troops, was immediately detached with one part of the army against Simon, while the king in person, with the other, pursued the siege of Dora. When the city was reduced to the last extremity, Tryphon found means to make his escape from thence to Orthosia, another maritime town of Phænice, and from Orthosia to Apamea, his native city<sup>u</sup>. Frontinus tells us, that all the way he scattered money on the road, in order to keep the pursuers employed, and by that means retarded the troops of Antiochus, and got safe into Apamea; but the city being taken by assault, as Josephus informs us, Tryphon was killed in the third year of the captivity of Demetrius. Appian tells us, that he was taken after a most gallant resistance, and put to death by Antiochus. Strabo says, that he shut himself up in a strong castle, where he was reduced to such straits, that, out of despair, he laid violent hands on himself; and lastly, Syncellus writes, that the city of Orthosia being set on fire, he leaped into the flames, and there perished. Thus Tryphon ended his days, after he had raised great disturbances in Syria, dethroned one of her kings, put his ward to death, possessed himself of the crown, and most grievously oppressed both his friends and enemies ( Q ). His death having put an end to the intestine broils, Antiochus ascended his father's throne without any further opposition, and enjoyed it nine years. Having now no rival to contend with, for his brother was still a captive in Parthia, he, in the first place, reduced all the cities of Syria, which, taking advantage of the late troubles, had shaken off the yoke, and made themselves independent. He then turned his arms against Judæa, and was attended in this expedition with far better success than Cendebæus one of his generals had been; for he laid siege to Jerusalem itself, and reduced it to such straits, that John Hircanus, who had succeeded his father Simon in the office of high-priest, was obliged to capitulate and deliver up the city. But as to the wars which he had made upon the Jews, first by Cendebæus, and afterwards in person, we shall relate them at length in the history of that people. As the Jews were at that time under the protection of the Romans, since the treaties made by them with Simon still subsisted under his son and successor in the high-priesthood, Sidetes fearing the resentment of that powerful republic, on account of the devastations he had committed in Judæa, sent ambassadors to Scipio Africanus, who was then in Spain, with magnificent presents, hoping, by this means, to appease the wrath of the senate, and obtain the protection of Rome, without which he did not think himself well settled on the throne. Scipio, who had known Antiochus in Asia, received his ambassadors in a very polite and obliging manner, assured them of the esteem and affection he had for their master, and accepted of the valuable jewels which they had brought so far; but immediately distributed them among his soldiers, generously rewarding the valour of those who had distinguished themselves in the siege of Numantia, which he was then carrying on <sup>w</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> MACCAB. l. i. c. 15. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 12. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 132. STRABO, l. xiv. p. 668.

( Q ) There are still some medals to be seen, representing Tryphon with a diadem on his head, and on the reverse a helmet, the symbol of war, which he had declared against his lawful sovereign. On these medals he is honoured with the title of king Tryphon, and Tryphon the powerful king. His former name, which was Diodorus, he changed, as soon as he ascended the throne, for that of Tryphon. Josephus says, that he reigned only three years; but others will have him to have reigned six years complete; that is from the beginning of the second year of Simon's high-priesthood, to the end of the seventh, when the usurper died. According to this computation, he died in the one hundred and seventy-sixth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, or the end of the Seleucidæ.

Antiochus having, as he thought, gained himself a powerful protector among the Romans, and concluded a peace with the Jews, prepared to march with a powerful army into the east, against Phrabates king of Parthia, under pretence of delivering his brother Demetrius Nicator, who had been detained several years a prisoner in Hyrkania. The captive prince had all the honours paid him that were due to a crowned head. He had married Rhodogune the sister of Phrabates, as we have related above, and seemed to live very happily with that princess, being plentifully supplied by his brother-in-law with all the pleasures and diversions he could wish for; but all this did not make him amends for the loss of a throne. In the midst of all his pomp and shew, he still considered himself as a captive and a dethroned king, and had several times attempted to make his escape, but without success, having been pursued, taken, and, for some time, more closely confined. Under the plausible pretence of delivering him, but, in reality, with a design to recover some provinces lately usurped by the Parthians, Antiochus marched with a numerous army against Phrabates. He is said to have had in that expedition above fourscore thousand men well armed and disciplined; but the train of luxury, as Justin styles it, consisting of sutlers, cooks, confectioners, actors, singers, lewd women, &c. whose only business was to promote luxury and effeminacy, was four times as numerous as the army; for they are said by Athenæus to have amounted to three hundred thousand persons and upwards; however, fortune favoured Antiochus in his first enterprizes. Upon the report of his march, the Assyrians and Babylonians flocked to him from all parts, acknowledging him for their lawful sovereign. As they had been accustomed to live under the government of the successors of Alexander the Great, they could not brook a foreign yoke. Antiochus, depending upon the affection of those who came daily to join him, advanced into Babylonia and Media, and being met by Indates the Parthian general, on the banks of the Lycus, intirely defeated him, as he did afterwards Phrabates himself in three successive battles; by which means he recovered all the provinces which had formerly belonged to the Syrian empire, except Parthia alone, where Phrabates was reduced within the narrow bounds of the antient Parthian kingdom. John, the high-priest of the Jews, followed Antiochus in this expedition, and is said by Eusebius and Sulpitius Severus to have penetrated as far as Hyrkania, and to have taken the surname of Hyrcanus from the victories he gained over that people. Be that as it will, he certainly had a great share in all the victories gained by Antiochus, and, at the end of the campaign, returned to Jerusalem, loaded with glory and rich spoils *.

<sup>w</sup> Liv. Epit. l. lvii

THE rest of the army wintered in the east, and, on account of the prodigious number of the soldiers and their attendants, amounting in all to four hundred thousand persons, were obliged to separate, and quarter at such a distance from each other, that they could not, in case of any sudden attack, join in one body for their mutual defence. The inhabitants, whom they had most tyrannically oppressed in all the places where they were quartered, taking advantage of their being thus separated, conspired with the Parthians to rid themselves of their troublesome guests, and massacre them all in one day in their several quarters, before they could come to the assistance of one another; and this they executed accordingly. Antiochus, who had kept a body of troops about his person, marched to assist the quarters nearest him; but was overpowered by numbers, and killed, with all those who attended him. The rest of the army underwent the same fate, and the slaughter was so general, that, out of such a prodigious number of persons, scarce one had the good fortune to return into Syria, and carry thither the sad news of this dreadful overthrow †. This is the account which Justin, Josephus, Eusebius, and Orosius give of this prince's death. Eusebius adds, that Phrabates killed him with his own hand; but Appian tells us, that Antiochus, having lost a battle, killed himself in a fit of despair; and Ælian, that the unfortunate prince, after the loss of a battle, threw himself headlong from the top of a high place, that he might not fall alive into the enemy's hands ‡. Some modern writers are of opinion, that this was the Antiochus, of whom mention is made in the epistle of the Jews at Jerusalem to their countrymen in Egypt, as we read in the beginning of the second book of the Maccabees. Upon the authority of that history they tell us, that Antiochus, having a mind to plunder the temple of Nanea, a goddess worshipped by the Parthians (R), declared that he would marry her, and, entering the temple, demanded the treasures of the goddess to be delivered up to him by way of dowry. This sacrilegious proceeding provoked the priests, who, to revenge the affront offered to their deity, killed Antiochus with stones thrown from the roof of the temple, cut his body in pieces, and threw them out of the temple which he had profanèd. This is what we read of one of the Antiochus's of Syria in the history of the Maccabees<sup>a</sup>. And indeed neither the time, nor the circumstances of his death, allow us to apply what is said there to any other; but whether the authority of that writer ought to be preferred in this particular to that of the profane historians, is what we leave to the decision of our readers. We have already observed, that there is a great disagreement among historians with relation to the death of this prince; which is a strong proof, that herein they were destitute of authentic records. Justin and Josephus, who tell us that he was killed in battle, add, that Phrahates would have the pleasure of seeing the dead body of his conquered enemy, which he afterwards caused to be put in a silver coffin, and sent into Syria, to be there interred among his ancestors<sup>b</sup>. Athenæus, upon the credit of Posidonius of Apamea, an antient historian, writes, that Phrahates, in beholding the dead body of his enemy, reproached him with his rashness and debaucheries in the following words: Your wine, O Antiochus, and your too great confidence, have brought you to this untimely end; you thought you could have swallowed the kingdom of Arsaces in your great cups<sup>c</sup>. Among the many captives that fell into the hands of the Parthians, were some young princesses of the blood of the Seleucidæ. One of these being carried to Phrahates, that prince was

* JUSTIN. l. xxxviii. c. 2. & 10. & l. xlii. c. 1. LIV. l. lix. ATHENÆUS, l. x. c. 12. & l. xii. c. 19. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 132. JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 16. VAL. MAX. l. ix. c. 1. OROS. l. v. c. 10. † JUSTIN. l. xxxviii. c. 10. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii, p. 374. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16. OROS. l. v. c. 10. APPIAN. ibid. ATHEN. l. x. p. 439.

‡ APPIAN. JUSTIN. JOSEPH. ibid. ÆLIAN. de animal. l. x. c. 34.

<sup>a</sup> MACCAB. l. ii. c. 1.<sup>b</sup> JUSTIN. JOSEPH. APPIAN. ibid.<sup>c</sup> ATHEN. l. i. c. 12.

(R) Most of the interpreters of the scripture are of opinion, that the goddess, which the Medes and Persians called in their language Nanea, was the same with the Diana of the Greeks and Latins. Of this Luther and Melancthon were so fully convinced, that, in the version of the bible which they published, they put Diana instead of Nanea.

so taken with her charms, that he married her. This princess was not the daughter of Antiochus, as a modern writer tells us, but of Demetrius Nicator, and had attended her uncle Antiochus in this expedition, as we read in Justin<sup>d</sup>. The death of Antiochus was universally lamented all over the Syrian empire, he being a prince endowed with some excellent qualities. He was a great lover of justice, always ready to forgive, and greatly inclined to mercy. Diodorus Siculus<sup>e</sup> and Josephus himself<sup>f</sup> tell us, it was wholly owing to the generosity and good-nature of Antiochus, that the Jewish nation was not intirely cut off and utterly destroyed; for after he had reduced the city of Jerusalem to the last extremity, he granted the inhabitants a peace upon very reasonable terms, contrary to the opinion of all his officers, and inclination of the whole army; for they all pressed him to lay hold of that opportunity, and extirpate the whole nation. They urged against them, that they had been driven out of Egypt as an impious people, hated by the gods, and abhorred by all mankind; that they looked upon the rest of human race as enemies, and therefore would have no communication with them, nor eat, drink, or freely converse with any except those of their own sect; that they did not adore the same gods, but had laws, customs, and a religion quite different from that of all other nations; on which considerations they well deserved to be treated with the utmost contempt, to be hated and abhorred by all nations, and utterly extirpated as declared enemies to all mankind. But, notwithstanding these ill-natured insinuations, Antiochus, being touched with a generous compassion for the unhappy city, granted the inhabitants more favourable terms than they could ever have expected; nay, he would not even insist upon rebuilding the fortress at Jerusalem, finding Hyrchanus unwilling to comply with this article, though he might at that time have imposed upon him and the whole nation what conditions he pleased. During the siege of Jerusalem he gave another remarkable instance, not only of good-nature, but even of piety. For John Hyrchanus, having sent a herald to him, as the feast of the tabernacles approached, begging a truce during the festival, he not only complied with his request, but moreover sent victims and other things necessary for the sacrifices that were to be offered at that solemnity<sup>g</sup>. Plutarch relates of this prince, that, having one day lost his way in the pursuit apud Phot. cod. 244. p. 1150.

<sup>d</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxviii. c. 10.

16.

<sup>e</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. xxxiv.<sup>f</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c.<sup>g</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. & JOSEPH. ibid.

of a wild beast, he was obliged to pass a night without any of his attendants, who had taken another rout, in a small cottage, where he met with a poor, but hearty entertainment. At supper he shewed himself very free and easy, and, as he was desirous to know the real sentiments of his subjects with respect to his conduct, he dexterously touched upon that topic; when the master of the house, not suspecting who he was, told him, that the king, as was commonly believed, meant well, but his immoderate love for the chase made him lay the weight of affairs on others, and repose too great a confidence in his ministers, whose actions did not always answer the goodness of his intentions. This the prince took in good part, and next morning when the lords of his court arrived at the cottage, he thanked his landlord in their presence for his kindness, but more especially for having told him the truth, which none of these, said he, has honesty enough to do, though I have taken them into my service for that purpose. A prince, says Plutarch in this place, must not expect to hear a word of truth at court, or to know what his subjects think of him, while he is surrounded by courtiers, whose chief business it is to deceive, and persuade their sovereign that his subjects are well pleased with his conduct, that he, in like manner, may be satisfied with theirs<sup>b</sup>. But to resume the thread of our history.

Phrahates, upon his being defeated in three successive battles by Antiochus, had at last set his brother Demetrius at liberty, and sent him with a body of troops into Syria, with a design to raise disturbances there, and by that means oblige Antiochus to abandon Parthia, and hasten home to the defence of his own kingdom. But upon the news of the massacre, he detached a party of horse after him, with orders to bring him back. Demetrius had been apprehensive of some order of this nature, and therefore had marched with such expedition, that he was got over the Euphrates into Syria, before the party sent after him could reach the frontiers of that country. In this manner he recovered his kingdom, and made great rejoicings on that occasion, while all Syria was in tears for the loss of the army in the east, there being scarce a family in the whole country, which had not a share in that common calamity<sup>c</sup>. The Parthian king, being flushed with the late success and victory over Antiochus, resolved to carry the war into Syria, and revenge the invasion the Syrians had made into his dominions. But, while he was making the necessary preparations for this expedition, the Scythians, whom he had disobliged, forced him to keep at home, and employ the forces he had raised against Syria, in the defence of his own dominions, as we shall relate in the history of the Parthians. Upon the death of Antiochus, Hyrcaus revolted from the Macedonians, and made himself absolute and wholly independent, neither he, nor any of his descendants, paying thenceforth to the kings of Syria any tribute or homage.

<sup>b</sup> Plut. in Apophthegm. p. 184.
c. 1.

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxix.

IN the mean time, a civil war breaking out in Egypt between Ptolemy Physcon and Cleopatra his divorced queen, the latter being greatly distressed by the loss of a battle, sent ambassadors to Demetrius, who had married her eldest daughter by Ptolemy Philometor, to implore his assistance, and promise him the crown of Egypt for his reward. Demetrius without hesitation accepted the proposal, marched into Egypt with all his forces, and there laid siege to Pelusium. As Demetrius had made himself very odious to all his subjects, by his tyrannical government and vicious manners, the inhabitants of Antioch, Apamea, and other cities, taking advantage of his absence, raised a rebellion against him. This forced Demetrius to abandon the siege, and return by long marches to his own dominions ; so that Cleopatra, being destitute of all assistance, was forced to leave Egypt. Upon her flight Physcon, having without much trouble settled his affairs at home, resolved to revenge the late invasion of Demetrius, his declared enemy. The Syrians were quite tired out with the tyranny of a prince, whom a nine years captivity had rendered still more wild and insupportable. Physcon therefore, taking advantage of this general aversion, set up an impostor against him, called Alexander Zebina. He was the son of a pawn-broker of Alexandria ; but pretending to be the son of Alexander Balas, under that title laid claim to the crown of Syria, Physcon furnishing him with an army to take possession of it (S). On his arrival in Syria multitudes flocked

(S) Josephus tells us (106), that the Syrians, not being any longer able to bear the tyrannical oppressions of Demetrius, desired Ptolemy Physcon to give them another king of the race of the Seleucidæ ; and that Physcon, laying hold of this opportunity to be revenged on Demetrius, sent Zebina into Syria at the head of a formidable army. This Zebina was, according to Justin, the son of one Protarchus, a pawn-broker of Alexandria ; but to conceal the meanness of his extraction, he gave out that Antiochus Sidetes had adopted flocked to him, without examining the justice of his pretensions, or caring whom they had for king, provided they got rid of Demetrius, whose tyranny they could no longer bear *. That prince, though deserted by most of his subjects, still supported himself with a small army. At length the two rivals came to a battle in the neighbourhood of Damascus in Cæle-Syria, in which Demetrius was entirely defeated, and most of his army cut in pieces. The fugitive king made the best of his way with a small number of faithful servants to Ptolemais, where his wife Cleopatra then was. But she still retaining her former resentment against him for his marrying Rhodagune, ordered the gates to be shut against him. Whereupon the unhappy prince having now no resource in his misfortunes, but the city of Tyre, where was a temple which his brother Antiochus had made a place of refuge, he imbarqued at Ptolemais, and sailed thither, thinking that under the protection of a place sanctified by religion, he might safely wait for a turn of fortune. But he was scarce landed, when the traitor, to whom he had committed the government of that city, caused him to be put to death, in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign after his return from Parthia <sup>1</sup>(T).

(106) Joseph. l. xiii. c. 17.

Upon

* JUSTIN. ibid.<sup>1</sup> JUSTIN. ibid.

him, and that in virtue of this adoption he had an unquestionable right to the crown. This fable was with great care and industry spread by Ptolemy, and credited by the populace, who only wanted a pretence to authorize their revolt. While all things seemed to favour the new king, the body of Antiochus inclosed in a silver coffin was brought to Antioch by order of Phrabates; and the grief Zebina expressed, with the artful tears he shed at the sight of the dead body, confirmed the people in their belief of his pretended adoption. This is the account which Justin gives us of this impostor. But Porphyrius says, that he was sent into Syria by Physcon as the son of Alexander Balas, and that he was from him called Alexander, though the Syrians gave him the surname of Zebina, because he was generally believed to be one of Ptolemy's slaves, that word in the Syriac tongue signifying bought or redeemed (107).

(T) There is a great disagreement among authors as to the manner of his death. Porphyrius says, that he was killed at Tyre, while he was going on board a ship with a design to seek for shelter somewhere else; Josephus, that he was taken prisoner by his rival, and that the hardships he suffered in his captivity put an end to his life; Livy and Appian, that he was killed by the express command

Upon his death Cleopatra retained a small part of the kingdom, and Zebina reigned over all the rest; and for the better securing himself in the possession of the crown, he entered into a strict alliance with John Hyrcanus prince of the Jews, who, as an able statesman, taking advantage of these divisions, greatly increased the power of the nation, which he governed <sup>m</sup> (U).

Seleucus

<sup>m</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

of his wife Cleopatra. That he was killed at Tyre is certain, and that the Tyrians were accessory to his death, is very probable; for from this very year they began a new epoch, as appears from Eusebius (108); whence some have concluded, that for killing Demetrius they obtained either of Cleopatra or Zebina their freedom, and liberty to live according to their own laws. In the several antient inscriptions mentioned by Grotius (109), the city of Tyre is honoured with the epithets of religious, sacred, and independent. Since therefore the epoch of their liberty and independency began in the very year that Demetrius Nicator was killed in or near their city, some writers have, not without good grounds, conjectured, that their liberty was owing to the hand they had in the death of Demetrius (110).

(U) We cannot help observing in this place, that in the troubles of Syria the Jewish high-priests, though men of unquestionable piety, and strict justice, never failed to side with such princes as offered the most advantageous terms for them and their nation, without ever examining whether those who offered them had any title to the crown or no. It was not hereditary right they minded, but the good of their country; the latter had great weight in their councils, the former none at all; in their opinion, if we may be allowed to judge of their sentiments from their conduct, that prince alone had right to govern, who governed well. For in what other manner can we account for the conduct of Jonathan, Simon, and John Hyrcanus? Jonathan supported to the utmost of his power Alexander Balas a notorious impostor and usurper, against Demetrius Soter, who was undoubtedly vested with all the right which birth can give to a crown. But Balas was like to govern better, and therefore in the opinion of the virtuous high-priest had a better title to govern. If Jonathan believed the claim of Demetrius better grounded, he was guilty of the greatest injustice and dishonesty in assisting his rival to drive him from the throne, and in putting many thousands to the sword for no other reason, but because they refused to abandon that prince, and join his competitor. On

(108) Euseb. in Chron. (109) Grotius, p. 1105. (110) Inde Usher ad Ann. Mundi 3878.

Seleucus, the eldest son of Demetrius Nicator by Cleopatra, being now in the twentieth year of his age, took upon him the title of king, and by the assistance of some of his friends, caused himself to be acknowledged in the provinces, which lay next to that part of Syria, that was held by his mother. This raised no small jealousy in the breast of that ambitious woman, who was for reigning alone ; and besides feared lest Seleucus should in time revenge his father's death, which was generally ascribed to her. To free herself therefore from this double uneasiness, having invited her son to a conference, she killed him with her own hand by plunging a dart into his breast, after he had reigned, or rather bore the title of king, one year <sup>n</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING this barbarous and horrid murder, which raised an universal indignation all over Syria, three of Zebina's captains, viz. Antipater, Clonius, and Æropus, revolted from him to Cleopatra ; and having seized on Laodicea, resolved to annoy from thence, and by degrees reduce, the neighbouring country. But Zebina, who was of a mild temper, and unwilling to use severity or violence, till all othe other hand, if Balas had, in the opinion of Jonathan, a more just title to the crown, as he must have had in whatever it was grounded, we must own there is some right which takes place of hereditary right. Nay, the whole conduct of Jonathan, of his brother Simon, and of John Hyrcanus, son to the latter, plainly shews, that these three great luminaries of the Jewish church, and nation, acknowledged no such right, but were altogether strangers to a certain doctrine, which generally obtains abroad, and has not been without its patrons even among us. For Jonathan not only espoused with great warmth the cause of Balas against Demetrius Soter, but with the same zeal supported Antiochus Theus, the son of Balas, in opposition to Demetrius Nicator, the son of Demetrius Soter. Simon, who succeeded his brother in the office of high-priest, was no less sanguine in the cause of Demetrius Nicator against Antiochus Theus, than his brother had been in that of Antiochus Theus against Demetrius Nicator. Lastly, John Hyrcanus, when raised, upon his father's death, to the high-priesthood, did not scruple to enter into an offensive and defensive league with Alexander Zebina, another usurper and impostor, against Antiochus Grypus the son of Demetrius Nicator, and consequently by birth the lawful heir to the crown. Is it not manifest from hence beyond dispute, that the heads of the Jewish nation either acted with the utmost injustice, or were quite unacquainted with what we call hereditary right ?

<sup>n</sup> LIV. Epist. l. lx. OROSIUS, l. v. c. 2. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 132. JUSTIN. ibid. PORPHYR. ibid. p. 227.

ther

ther means had proved unsuccessful, invited them to return to their duty, promising not only to pardon them, but to restore them to their former rank. Upon his parole they put themselves into his hands, and he not only generously forgave them, but even reposed the same confidence in them he had done before, without once reproaching them with their desertion. All authors agree, that this prince was endowed with many excellent and truly princely qualities. He received all who approached him, in a most affable and engaging manner, was slow to punish, and always ready to pardon, even his most inveterate enemies. In short, the good-nature he shewed on all occasions, and the great desire he had to please all, gained him the affections of the Syrians to such a degree, that even those who abhorred the imposture, by which he had got possession of the crown, could not help wishing he might long enjoy it °.

IN the mean time Cleopatra, thinking it necessary for her interest to have one, at least, with the name of king, to give countenance to the authority by which she governed, recalled her other son, by name Antiochus, from Athens, whither she had sent him for the benefit of his education. He no sooner arrived, then she declared him king of Syria, but allowed him no more than the bare title; all the authority she kept for herself, the prince, as he was then quite unexperienced, and under twenty years of age, suffering her for some time to rule without controul. To distinguish this from other Syrian princes of the same name, he is generally called Grypus, a surname taken from his aquiline nose. Josephus, and Porphyrius stile him Philometor, but on his medals he bears the name of Epiphanes P.

As Zebina had been put in possession of the greater part of Syria by troops sent him out of Egypt, Physcon insisted upon his doing him homage for his new dominions, and paying an annual tribute to the crown of Egypt, as an acknowledgment of his dependence; which Zebina refusing to comply with, Physcon, coming to an agreement with Cleopatra his niece, gave his daughter Tryphæna in marriage to her son Grypus, and sent a considerable army into Syria to drive from the throne the person he had a few years before placed on it. One battle determined the dispute: Zebina's army was defeated, and he forced to save himself by flight in Antioch. There, as he was in great want of money, he allowed his soldiers to seize on the rich furniture of the temple of Jupiter, having no other means to pay them their arrears; the statue of victory, which was of massy gold, he took for himself, saying that Jupiter had promised him victory. Hereupon the citizens, taking up arms in defence of their temples, fell upon him unexpectedly, and drove him with great slaughter of his men out of the city. In the mean time the united forces of Grypus and Phycon coming up, his army dispersed, not being in a condition to venture a second engagement. Zebina himself embarked on a small vessel, which he found ready to set sail for Greece; but being taken in his passage by a pirate, he was delivered up to Grypus, and by him put to death in the fourth year of his reign<sup>9</sup>. Josephus says, that he was killed in battle<sup>r</sup>; and Porphyrius, that upon the loss of his army he put an end to his life by poison, in the fourth year of the hundred and sixty-fourth olympiad<sup>s</sup>.

° DIONOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii. p. 377. P JOSEPH.
Antiq. l. xiii. c. 20. in Græc. Euseb. Scalig. p. 277.

Grypus, being thus delivered from a troublesome rival, began to take on him the authority, as well as the name, of king. Cleopatra could not brook this diminution of her power and grandeur; and therefore resolved to cut off Antiochus, as she had before done Seleucus, and call to the crown another son she had by Antiochus Sidetes; under whom, he being an infant, she hoped to rule, without controul, for many years, and thereby fix herself so on the throne, that her son should be entirely dependent on her. With this view the wicked woman, having prepared a poisonous potion, offered it to Grypus one day as he returned hot and weary from some exercise. But that prince, having been forewarned of her design, pretending respect to his mother, desired her to drink first; which she refusing to do, he called in some of the chief lords of his court, and in their presence told her, that she had been charged with a design of poisoning him, and that the only means she had to clear herself from all suspicion of so black a crime, was to drink herself what she had offered to him. The unhappy woman, having no other evasion or resource, was forced to yield. The poison had its full operation on her, and in a few minutes put an end to the life of a most wicked and ambitious woman, who had been, by her unheard-of crimes, for many years the scourge of Syria. She had been the wife of three kings of Syria, viz. of Demetrius Nicator, Alexander Ba- las, and Antiochus Sidetes, and the mother of four, viz. of Antiochus by Alexander Balas, of Seleucus and Antiochus Grypus by Demetrius Nicator, and of Antiochus, surnamed the Cyzicenean, by Antiochus Sidetes. She had been accessary to the death of two of her husbands ; and as to her children, she had murdered one with her own hand, and would have in like manner dispatched another, had he not made her wicked design fall upon her own head<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>9</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii. p. 378. JUSTIN. l. xxxix. c. 2. <sup>r</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii c. 17. In Græc EUSEB. Scalig. p. 227.

UPON her death Antiochus Grypus enjoyed the kingdom of Syria eight years without the least disturbance ; at the end of which a new competitor appeared, and contended with him for the sovereignty of Syria. This was Antiochus Cyzicenus his half brother. For he was the son of Cleopatra by Antiochus Sidetes, and born while Demetrius her former husband was prisoner among the Parthians. When Demetrius returned, and recovered his dominions, after the death of Sidetes, Cleopatra, fearing lest her son Antiochus should fall a sacrifice to his jealousy, sent him to Cyzicus, a city lying on the Propontis in Mysia Minor, where he was brought up under the care and tuition of Craterus, a faithful eunuch, and from thence called Cyzicenus, or the Cyzicenean. Grypus, to whom he gave umbrage, ordered him to be poisoned ; but Antiochus, being informed of his design, took up arms in his own defence, and at the same time laid claim to the crown of Syria<sup>u</sup>. Hereupon Grypus, who was then preparing to invade Judæa, dropped that enterprize, and raised what troops he could to suppress in the first place his new rival. Cleopatra, the daughter of Physcon, the late king of Egypt, had married her brother Lathurus ; but that prince, though passionately fond of her, being obliged by his mother to divorce her and marry his younger sister Selene, the divorced queen, being at her own disposal, married Cyzicenus, and having raised an army in the island of Cyprus, or, as some will have it, gained over the army, which Grypus had there, brought it instead of a dowry to her new husband. By this means the forces of the two competitors being very near equal, they came to a battle, in which Cyzicenus, having the misfortune to be routed, was forced to quit the field, and shut himself up in Antioch, which had declared for him. The Antiochians seemed disposed to stand by him to the last, and therefore leaving his wife there, as in a place of safety, he privately escaped from thence with a design to raise new forces in other parts, and return with them against Grypus. But before he could levy the necessary troops, Grypus made himself master of Antioch, where he found Cleopatra wife to Cyzicenus. Tryphæna, her sister and wife to Grypus, no sooner heard that she was taken, but she earnestly pressed her husband to deliver the captive up to her, that she might have the satisfaction of putting her to death; to such a degree was she enraged against her, though her own sister both by father and mother, for having married her husband's enemy, and furnished him with an army to invade Syria. As Cleopatra had taken sanctuary in one of the temples of Antioch, Grypus could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with his wife's request; nay, he did all that lay in his power to inspire her with more religious and humane sentiments. He urged against her revengeful temper the sanctity of the asylum, where her sister had taken refuge; and told her, that the death of her sister would be of no advantage to them, or prejudice to Cyzicenus; that in all the wars, whether domestic or foreign, which he or his ancestors had ever been engaged in, no sort of cruelty had been practised after victory upon women, especially on so near relations; that Cleopatra was her sister, and likewise nearly related to himself; and therefore he desired her to speak no more to him on that subject, since he could by no means consent to her being used with any severity, or even touched, while she was in a place of refuge. But Tryphæna, instead of yielding to his reasons, became more enraged, imagining that he was not prompted to take the part of that unhappy princess by motives of compassion, but of love; and therefore adding jealousy to revenge, one day in a violent fit of this double passion, she sent a party of soldiers into the temple with orders to kill the unhappy Cleopatra in the sacred place. At the sight of the assassins she fled to the altar, and there the soldiers, not being able to tear her from the statue of the God, which she embraced, cut off her arms, and then with a thousand wounds put an end to her life, while she was imploring the god, whose temple they profaned, and uttering with her last breath curses upon the authors of so barbarous a murder<sup>w</sup>. And truly her death did not remain long unrevenged; for Cyzicenus, having drawn together another army, came to a second battle with his brother, put his army to the rout, and in the pursuit took the cruel Tryphæna, whom he immediately sacrificed to the manes of his murdered wife, by a death which her cruelty well deserved. By this overthrow Grypus being driven out of Syria retired to Aspendus, a city of Pamphylia, whence he had the surname of Aspendius *. But the next year he returned with a great army, recovered Syria, and to put an end to the intestine broils, which weakened both parties, consented to a division of the empire, in virtue of which Cyzicenus reigned at Damascus over Cæle-Syria and Phœnice, and Grypus at Antioch over all the other provinces †. In this peaceful interval both brothers abandoned themselves to a most idle, indolent, and debauched manner of life, wallowing in all sorts of pleasures, and spending the greatest part of their time with lewd women. Cyzicenus's chief delight was to converse with stage-players, rope-dancers, pantomimes, and above all with jugglers, applying himself with great care and assiduity to the practice of their tricks, and intirely neglecting the government of his kingdom and welfare of his subjects ‡.

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. ibid. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 132. <sup>u</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxviii. c. 2. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 132. PORPHYR. ibid. p. 227. JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 17.

<sup>w</sup> JUST. l. xxvix. c. 3.

WHILE the two brothers were thus exhausting their strength in war, or abandoning themselves to the sloth and luxury of peace, John Hyrcanus, prince of the Jews, increased his power and wealth to such a degree, that he became one of the most powerful princes of his age, being master of all Judæa, Galilee, and Samaria, and besides of many frontier places in the neighbouring countries. Cyzicenus indeed, at the request of the inhabitants of Samaria, which city Hyrcanus had besieged, attempted to put a stop to his conquests, but was intirely defeated by Aristobulus and Antigonus, the two sons of Hyrcanus. Samaria after this overthrow, and the delivering up of Scythopolis, which Epicrates the Syrian general basely betrayed to Hyrcanus for a sum of money, being destitute of all hopes of relief, was obliged to surrender after having sustained a years siege §. Thus was the Syrian empire curtailed by degrees, and soon brought within very narrow bounds by the intestine troubles and divisions which reigned among the Seleucidæ, and occasioned at last the loss of the empire, as we shall see anon.

THE peace between the two brothers, Antiochus Grypus and Articchus Cyzicenus, was not of long continuance; neither of them being satisfied with their share of the empire, they began a new war; of which several cities taking advantage, shook off the Syrian yoke, and made themselves free and independent; these were Tyre, Sidon, Ptolemais, * JUSTIN. ibid PORPHYR. in GRÆC. EUSEB. Scalig. p. 62.

† PORPHYR. ibid.

‡ DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii.

§ XXXV. p. 385.

¶ JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17.

and Gaza; in others tyrants started up, usurping a sovereign power, while the two kings were wasting their strength against each other; thus Theodorus caused himself to be acknowledged the sovereign of Gadara and Amathus; Zoilus possessed himself of Dora and Straton's tower; and others of other places <sup>b</sup>

DURING these distractions Grypus was assassinated by Heraclion one of his own subjects in the forty-fifth year of his age, after having reigned, according to Josephus, twenty nine, according to Porphyrus, twenty six years<sup>c</sup>. He left behind him five sons, viz. Seleucus, Antiochus and Philip, twins, Demetrius Eucharces, and Antiochus Dionysius. Seleucus the eldest succeeded his father, and the rest all reigned, or attempted to reign, in their turns. On the death of Grypus, Antiochus Cyzicenus seized Antioch, and used his utmost efforts to make himself master of the whole empire. But Seleucus, having drawn together a considerable army, marched against his uncle, and gained a complete victory over him. Josephus tells us, that Cyzicenus was taken in the pursuit, and put to death by Seleucus <sup>d</sup>; Trogus writes, that he was killed in the engagement <sup>e</sup>, and Porphyrus, that he killed himself to avoid falling into the enemy's hands <sup>f</sup>, after he had reigned eighteen years. Upon his death Seleucus made himself master of Antioch and the whole Syrian empire; but did not hold it long. Antiochus, surnamed Eusebes from his piety, the son of Cyzicenus, having made his escape out of Antioch, by the assistance of a courtesan, when that city was taken by Seleucus, fled to Aradus, where he caused himself to be crowned king of Syria. From thence he marched at the head of a great army, made up of the soldiers who had served under his father, engaged Seleucus, and, having cut great part of his troops in pieces, obliged that prince to shut himself up in Mopsuestia, a city of Cilicia, and abandon all the rest to the mercy of the conqueror <sup>g</sup>. The Mopsuestians at first espoused the cause of the fugitive prince with great zeal; but soon after being provoked by the exorbitant taxes, with which he loaded them, they turned their affection into hatred, rose up in arms, and investing the palace, in which he resided, set fire to it, the king and all his attendants perishing in the flames <sup>h</sup>. Porphyrius says, he saved himself from the violence of the flames by voluntary death <sup>i</sup>, after a short reign of seven months. Antiochus and Philip, the twin sons of Grypus, to revenge the death of their brother Seleucus, led all the troops they could raise against Mopsuestia; and having taken the city by assault, razed it to the ground, after having put all the inhabitants to the sword. But on their return being charged by Eusebes on the banks of the Orontes, and their forces defeated, Antiochus was drowned in attempting to swim over that river on horseback. But Philip having made a judicious retreat, and kept his forces together, was thereby enabled to dispute the empire with Eusebes. As both maintained on foot great armies, the country was harassed in a miserable manner, and the inhabitants reduced almost to beggary <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 20. JUSTIN. l. xxxix. APPIAN, in Syriac.

<sup>c</sup> JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 21. PORPHYR. ibid. <sup>d</sup> JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 21. <sup>e</sup> TROGUS. l. xl. in Prolog. <sup>f</sup> PORPHYR. in Græc.

EUSEB. Scalig. p. 227. <sup>g</sup> JOSEPH. TROC. ibid. & APPIAN. p. 133.

Eusebes, to establish himself the better on the throne, had married Selene the widow of Grypus, that politic princess having, on the death of her husband, taken possession of some provinces of the Syrian empire, and provided herself with good troops. Eusebes therefore, to join her interest with his own, married her; which giving offence to Lathurus king of Egypt, whose wife she had been, till his mother, obliging him to divorce her, gave her in marriage to Grypus; that prince sent to Cnidus for Demetrius Eucæres, the fourth son of Grypus, who had been brought up in that city, and made him king of Damascus. As Eusebes and Philip were engaged in war against each other, neither of them was at liberty to oppose the new king. For though Eusebes had well retrieved his affairs, and considerably increased his power by his marriage, yet Philip made his party good against him, and at length having drawn him to a battle, gained a complete victory over him, and obliged him to quit Syria, and take refuge among the Parthians. By this means the whole Syrian empire was divided between Philip and Demetrius <sup>l</sup>. These two brothers might have long continued in peaceable possession of the kingdom, none of the neighbouring princes daring to attack them so long as they were united. But the ambition of Demetrius soon put an end to that good intelligence; he fell on that part of Syria which Philip possessed, and having driven him out of Antioch, and taken that city, pursued him as far as Beræa, now Aleppo, which he closely

<sup>h</sup> JOSEPH. TROC. & EUSEB. ibid.

<sup>i</sup> PORPHYR. ibid.

<sup>k</sup> PORPHYR. & JOSEPH. ibid.

<sup>l</sup> JOSEPH. l. xiii. c. 21. PORPHYR. ibid.

besieged,

besieged, in hopes of getting his brother into his power. But Straton, who was lord of the place, and greatly attached to the interest of Philip, called to his assistance Zizus, an Arabian king, and Mithridates, a Parthian commander; who falling upon Demetrius with their united forces, put his army to flight, and having taken him prisoner, sent him as a present to the king of Parthia, where he fell into a lingering distemper, of which he died. After this victory Philip sent home without ransom all the Antiochians, who had been taken either in the battle, or in the pursuit; which was so pleasing to the inhabitants of that great metropolis, that they welcomed the conqueror on his return with loud acclamations, and conducted him in triumph into the city <sup>m</sup>.

Philip had scarce got rid of Euchæres, when Eusebes appeared anew in Syria, supported in all likelihood by the Parthian king, in whose dominions he had taken refuge, as we have related above: for he over-ran with great rapidity the Syrian provinces bordering on Parthia, which he could not have done without the aid of some powerful prince, and in those quarters none but the king of Parthia could lend him any assistance. Philip hastened to suppress him; but while he was engaged in the north of Syria against one rival, another unexpectedly started up in the south. This was Antiochus Dionysius his brother, the youngest of the five sons of Grypus, who, taking advantage of Philip's absence, seized on Cæle-Syria, and chose Damascus for the capital of his new kingdom <sup>n</sup>. He was scarce seated on the throne, when he engaged very imprudently in a war with Aretas king of Arabia Petræa, leaving his dominions at the mercy of his brother Philip, who in his absence made himself master of Damascus by the treachery of Milesius, who commanded in the castle. But that prince not rewarding the traitor as he expected, the first time Philip went abroad, Milesius on his return shut the gates against him, and kept the place for Dionysius, and delivered it up to him on his return out of Arabia. Hereupon Philip retired, and on his retreat Antiochus returned into Arabia to renew the war there. In this second expedition he took his rout through Judæa, which giving umbrage to Alexander Jannæus, prince of the Jews, he endeavoured to stop his march by drawing lines between Joppa and Antipatris, that being the only way he could

<sup>m</sup> JOSEPH. ibid. & de bello Judaic. l. i. c. 3.

<sup>n</sup> JUSTIN.

v. xl. c. 1. APPIAN. in Syriac. & Mithridatic JOSEPH. Antiquit. ibid.

march his army. These lines were twenty miles in length, and fortified with a wall and wooden towers at proper distances. But all this was to no effect ; for Antiochus, having set fire to the towers, and obliged the Jews to retire, broke through the lines, and pursued his march without farther molestation into Arabia, where he was surprized in a disadvantageous post by Aretas, and cut off with the greatest part of his army. Those who escaped the slaughter had no better fate ; for having retired after the battle to the village of Gana, they all perished there for want of provisions. Upon the death of Antiochus, Ptolemy the son of Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, a city in that neighbourhood, attempted to make himself master of Damascus. But the inhabitants, bearing an utter aversion to him, chose rather to call in Aretas, by whom their king and their army had been lately cut off, than to subject themselves to Ptolemy. Accordingly having no other resource, for they hated Philip more than Ptolemy himself, they sent for Aretas, and made him their king. This prince was no sooner settled in the sovereignty, but he undertook an expedition against the Jews, and defeated Alexander Jannæus in a pitched battle near Addida. But soon after this victory a peace concluded between the contending parties, put a stop to all further hostilities<sup>o</sup>.

THE Syrians being quite exhausted, and tired out with the continual wars carried on in their country by the ambitious and turbulent princes of the race of Seleucus, and seeing no end of the devastations, slaughters, and other calamities which attended their intestine divisions, resolved at last to exclude them all, and submit to a foreign prince, who might deliver them from the miseries of a civil war, and restore tranquillity to their country. They first cast their eyes on Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus ; but it was feared his quarrels with Rome might bring a new war upon Syria. Some proposed Ptolemy king of Egypt ; but this proposal was rejected, by reason the Egyptians had always been declared enemies to the Syrians. They therefore pitched on Tigranes king of Armenia, and sent ambassadors to acquaint him with the resolution they had taken. Tigranes agreed to it, came into Syria, took possession of that kingdom, and reigned there eighteen years in great tranquillity ; the first fourteen of which he governed it by Megdates his lieutenant, till he was obliged to recal him, with the troops he had under his command, to make head against the Romans<sup>p</sup>, as we shall relate in the history of Armenia. Tigranes no sooner entered Syria, but Eusebes, abandoning his dominions, fled into Cilicia, where he passed the rest of his life in obscurity <sup>1</sup>. What became of Philip is not known. Porphyrus indeed mentions both these princes as living near thirty years after Tigranes had taken possession of Syria <sup>2</sup>; but herein that writer was certainly mistaken, as we shall shew in a more proper place. Selene, the wife of Eusebes, retained Ptolemais with part of Phœnice and Cœle-Syria, and reigned there many years without molestation, which enabled her to give her two sons an education suitable to their birth. These were Antiochus, surnamed Asiaticus, because brought up in Asia, and Seleucus Cybiosactes <sup>3</sup>. While Selene reigned at Ptolemais, some disturbances happening in Egypt, on account of the aversion which the people had conceived against Alexander their king, that princess put in her claim to the crown, as being sister to Lathurus; and sent her two sons to Rome to solicit the senate in her behalf. The Romans kept them there two years, giving them all the time hopes of success in their negotiation; but with no other view than to oblige Alexander by this means to buy at a dearer rate the favour and protection of the senators. And accordingly, when he had spent all the treasures he was master of in bribing the senate, he was at last confirmed in the kingdom, and the young princes ordered to return home <sup>4</sup>. Antiochus the eldest resolved to pass through Sicily, being desirous to see the curiosities of that celebrated island, and especially the city of Syracuse. While he staid there, he met with an insult, which shews how much Rome was corrupted in the times we are writing of, and what rapines and depredations were committed in the sight of the world by the magistrates sent by the republic to govern the unhappy provinces. The misfortune of young Antiochus is related at length, and set out in its proper light by Cicero <sup>5</sup>. Verres, says he, who was at that time prætor in Sicily, hearing that Antiochus was at Syracuse, and being at the same time informed that he had along with him a great deal of gold and silver plate, many valuable jewels, and rich moveables, was transported with joy, as if some rich inheritance had unexpectedly fallen to him. Upon the prince's arrival he sent him a present of wine, oil, flour, &c. for the ibid. <sup>5</sup> CIC. ibid.

<sup>o</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 23 & de Bell. Judææ l. i. c. i.

<sup>p</sup> JOSEPH. l. vi. c. i. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 118, 119.

<sup>1</sup> JUSTIN. l. xl. c. 2. APPIAN. in Mithridatic. p. 243.

<sup>2</sup> PORPHYR. in Græc. EUSEB. Scalig. <sup>3</sup> CIC in Verr. Act. 4.

JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24. STRAB. l. xvii. p. 796. <sup>4</sup> CIC.

use of his numerous retinue, and some days after invited him to an entertainment ; on which occasion the prætor displayed all his costly furniture, his palace being magnificently adorned, and the tables set off with vessels of most exquisite workmanship ; for of these Verres had great store. The banquet was truly noble, and worthy of so great a guest, the prætor having spared no expences on such an extraordinary occasion. The prince was greatly taken with the elegance and politeness of the Roman governor, and highly pleased to see himself honoured by an officer of the republic in so eminent a manner. To shew his acceptance, he invited Verres to an entertainment in his turn, exposing to public view an incredible number of gold and silver vessels, cups richly set with jewels, moveables of all sorts of an inestimable value, and amongst other things a wine-vessel cut out of one precious stone, and of such a size, that nothing like it had ever been seen. Verres, greatly surprized at such a pompous and magnificent appearance, took each of the vessels into his hand, viewed, praised, and admired them, the king expressing great joy that the prætor of the Roman people should be so well pleased with his entertainment. Verres returning home, sent next morning two of his domestics to the prince, desiring he would let him have for a day or two some of the finest vessels he had seen at his house, under pretence of shewing them to his workmen. Antiochus, without the least difficulty or distrust complied with his request ; and then the prætor sent again begging he would trust him only for a few hours with the large vessel made of a single precious stone, that he might examine it more exactly, and satisfy his curiosity more at leisure. The prince at his request sent that also. Verres, whose avarice had no bounds, seeing young Antiochus so pliant and complaisant, did not stop here. The two princes had carried with them to Rome a branched candlestick of massy gold, no less valuable for the exquisiteness of the workmanship, than for the many rich jewels and precious stones, with which it was adorned. With this they intended to present Jupiter Capitolinus ; but his temple, which had been burnt in the civil wars between Marius and Sylla, being then rebuilding, and not finished when they left Rome, they carried the present back with them without allowing any one to see it, that it might the more surprize the city, when it should first appear in the temple of Jupiter ; for they designed to send ambassadors with this magnificent present, as soon as they

they heard that the statue of the god was set up in his new temple. Verres, by some means or other being informed of all this, earnestly begged the prince to send him it, expressing a great desire to see it, and promising to conceal it even from those of his own family. Antiochus was very unwilling to comply with the prætor's request, not out of any jealousy or distrust, but because he did not care it should be seen by any, till it appeared in the capitol. However, not to disoblige Verres, he commanded his servants to carry it to his house, well covered and with all possible secrecy. The prætor, when he first beheld it, could not help crying out in the greatest surprize, This is truly a present worthy of a prince, worthy of a king of Syria, worthy of the capitol. For in that inimitable performance, says Tully, art seemed to vie with the precious materials, and the spectators were not more charmed with the number of the jewels, than with the variety of the workmanship; besides it was of such an extraordinary size, continues the same author, as plainly discovered that it was not intended for the palace of a man, but for a stately temple of some god. The officers of Antiochus, having given the prætor full time to consider it, were preparing to carry it back, when he desired them to leave it with him, that he might examine it more at his leisure, which they did accordingly. The prince was not at first alarmed, nor entertained the least suspicion of Verres; but having for three successive days sent to demand it, and the prætor always promising to return it the next day, he began to be uneasy, and at last applied to him in person. Verres received the prince with great marks of esteem and affection, and was not even ashamed to beg of him the present, which, as he had known from Antiochus himself, was designed for the great Jupiter and the Roman people. Antiochus, struck with amazement at this unexpected demand, could not for some time return any answer; but at length, recovering from the surprize he was in, he told Verres with great politeness, that he was sorry he could not gratify him, since he was bound by a vow he had made, to consecrate the candlestick to Jupiter Capitolinus. Verres did not acquiesce to this answer, but with an unparalleled impudence replied, that Jupiter would be as well pleased with such another, which might be finished before the temple could be in a condition to receive so valuable an ornament. But the prince begged Verres anew to excuse him, alledging the judgment; which the many nations that had been concerned in the workmanship of that gift, and knew for whom it was designed, would pass upon fact.

an action ; they would look upon us both, said he, as guilty of sacrilege, and consider us in the same light, as if we had plundered the temple of Jupiter. Hereupon Verres began to abuse and threaten him even with death, since he had him in his power, if he did not immediately make over to him both the golden candlestick and the other precious vessels which he had sent to his house. But his menaces being of no more weight with Antiochus than his intreaties, the rapacious prætor commanded him to depart the island before sun-set. Hereupon the prince, withdrawing to the market-place, acquainted, with tears in his eyes, the multitude that flocked to hear him, with the unjust and scandalous treatment he had met with from the prætor ; he declared, calling the gods to witness, that Verres had robbed him of a golden candlestick of an inestimable value, which was designed for the capitol, as a lasting monument in that august temple of his alliance and amity with the Roman people ; he protested, that he was not concerned for the loss of many gold and silver vessels, set with precious stones, and of other valuable effects, which the avaricious prætor detained with the most flagrant injustice ; but to see himself thus by violence deprived of a present which he had designed for the great Jupiter of the capitol, was a misfortune and an affront, which he could not well brook, &c. In the close of his speech calling upon the Roman citizens, who were there present, and Jupiter himself, to witness the sincerity of his heart and the piety of his intentions, he offered and consecrated anew the present which the prætor had in his custody, to the great Jupiter of the Romans<sup>w</sup>. Thus was a prince with the most crying injustice abused, a guest plundered, and an ally and friend of the Roman people with the highest indignity expelled the province by the chief magistrate sent thither by the republic to administer justice. This scandalous behaviour of Verres was publicly known, not only in Sicily and all over Asia, but even at Rome ; and nevertheless the injured prince could never receive the least satisfaction for the affront, or reparation for the loss he had suffered, Verres having gained by his rich presents many powerful protectors at Rome, who were not ashamed to patronize so notorious a robber, and screen him against the just prosecution of their plundered ally. But to return to our subject :

Selene finding on the return of her two sons from Rome, that her solicitations for the kingdom of Egypt had proved unsuccessful, attempted to enlarge her dominions in Syria, and prevailed upon many cities to revolt from Tigranes, and side with her. This brought the king of Armenia upon her with all his forces; he entered Syria at the head of five hundred thousand men, and having obliged Selene to shut herself up in Ptolemais, laid siege to that place, reduced it, and having got the princess into his power, caused her to be put to death at Seleucia in Mesopotamia, whither he had carried her on his return into Armenia *. She was the daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, and had been at first married to Ptolemy Lathurus her brother, but taken from him by her mother, and given to Antiochus Grypus; upon whose death she married Antiochus Eusebes the son of Antiochus Cyzicenus, and had by him her two sons, Antiochus Asiaticus and Seleucus Cybiosactes. Appian tells us, that she married Cyzicenus himself, and after his death Eusebes his son, and looks upon all the misfortunes, which afterwards befel Eusebes, as a just judgment of heaven upon him for this incest †. But we find no such marriage mentioned by any other historian, whereas all the ancients speak of her marriage with the other three princes. Upon the death of Selene, Tigranes governed Syria without any disturbance, till he was obliged to recal Megdates with all the troops he had in that country to assist him against Lucullus, who had given him a dreadful overthrow before Tigranocerta, as we shall relate in the history of Armenia. Syria being by the retreat of Megdates left naked, Antiochus Asiaticus, to whom, as the next heir of the Seleucian family, that kingdom belonged, took possession of some provinces of it, and there quietly reigned four years without the least molestation either from Lucullus or Tigranes. But these four years are comprehended in the eighteen assigned to Tigranes; for that prince retained some part of Syria while Antiochus reigned in the other, till the whole was reduced to a Roman province. And hence it is, that some authors have not ranked Antiochus Asiaticus among the kings of Syria. However, he ruled over part of that kingdom till Pompey having conquered Tigranes imposed on him the hard condition of returning into Armenia, and confining his ambition to the ancient inheritance of his forefathers. As Syria was then without a governor, and no body had more right to rule there than Antiochus Asiaticus, that prince appeared before Pompey, represented to him the misfortunes of his family, urged the justice of his claim, and intreated the Roman not to exclude him from a crown, which his ancestors had long wore with great glory. But as the Romans in the age we are writing of, had the bare appearance and outside of virtue, and did not scruple committing the most flagrant acts of injustice to promote the interest of their republic, Pompey gave Antiochus this haughty and disobliging answer: Don't imagine you shall be put in possession of a kingdom, which you have abandoned. The Syrians despise you, and will not suffer you to reign over them. Why did you not wrest the sceptre out of the hands of Tigranes? You have lived eighteen years in dread of the enemy, whom I have conquered. What pretence then have you to deprive us conquerors of the right we have acquired by our victory? The kingdom of Syria belonged to Tigranes, and now that he is conquered, all his rights devolve upon us. The Syrian empire therefore now appertains to Rome, and our republic can defend it better than you from the incursions of the Jews and Arabians<sup>2</sup>. Thus Pompey made use of his victories to oppress an unfortunate prince, rob him of his inheritance, and by the most notorious piece of injustice reduce Syria to a Roman province. Antiochus, thus stript of his dominions, spent the rest of his life in obscurity. Some writers tell us, that Pompey gave him Commagena; but these confound Antiochus Asiaticus with Antiochus Commagenus, as is manifest from Strabo, Appian, Dion Cassius, Justin, &c. As for Seleucus Cybiosactes, or as others write it, Cybiotates, he outlived his brother; for Dion Cassius<sup>a</sup>, Strabo<sup>b</sup>, and Porphyrius<sup>c</sup> tell us, that the Alexandrians, having placed on the throne of Egypt, Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, sent an embassy into Syria, inviting Antiochus Asiaticus, who by his mother Selene was the next male-heir to that crown, to come into Egypt, and marrying Berenice to reign in conjunction with her. But the ambassadors finding that he was dead, and thereupon returning home, the Alexandrians sent another embassy to Seleucus his brother with the same proposal; which he readily accepting reigned in Egypt, till Berenice growing weary of him caused him to be put to death (W). In him ended the whole race

<sup>w</sup> Cic. in Verr. act. 6, n. 61—67.

* JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24. PLUT. in Lucullo. STRAB. l. xvi. p. 742. † APPIAN, in Syriac.

<sup>2</sup> APPIAN. in Syriac. & Mithridat. DION. CASS. l. xxxv. JUSTIN. l. xl. c. 2. PORPHYR. in Græc. EUSEB. Scalig. <sup>a</sup> DION. CASS. l. xxxix. <sup>b</sup> STRAB. l. xvii. p. 796. <sup>c</sup> PORPHYR. ibid.

(W) Porphyry, as quoted by Eusebius, tells us, that Philip the son of Grypus was invited by this second embassy into Egypt. But as no mention has been made of him in history since his seizing on Damascus, which happened six and twenty years before the time race of Seleucus; no one of that illustrious family being left to survive the loss of the empire, which they had held, according

we are now writing of, he was in all likelihood dead, when the Egyptian ambassadors arrived in Syria. Besides, if he had been now alive, he would have been too far advanced in years for the proposed marriage, it being now forty years since he succeeded his father in the kingdom of Syria. The person therefore, whom this second embassy called out of Syria into Egypt after the death of Asiaticus, must have been his younger brother; for he was invited thither as the next heir to the crown, and this the brother of Asiaticus alone could be. Frequent mention is made by the writers of those times of this younger brother of Asiaticus; but none of them acquaint us with his name. However, what Strabo relates of Seleucus Cybrosactes or Cybiosactes evidently shews, that he was the person we are speaking of. For that writer tells us (111), that Seleucus Cybiosactes was invited into Egypt to marry Berenice, and that he was of the Seleucian family; both which things put it beyond doubt, that this Seleucus was the younger brother of Asiaticus, since upon the death of the latter, his younger brother was the only surviving person of the Seleucian family; and therefore in him ended, as we have related, the illustrious race of Seleucus Nicator.

That nothing may be wanting which can give us any light into the history of Syria, before we dismiss this subject, we shall give our readers a succinct account of the Syrian coins, which have been transmitted to us, and represent the princes, who have reigned in Syria, according to the order of their succession to the crown. And to begin with those of Seleucus Nicator, founder of the Syro-Macedonian empire; two different coins of that prince have reached us, wherof the first represents him with a lion's skin on his head, and the second with the same skin, and the wing of some bird covering his ear. The Macedonian kings, especially Amyntas, Philip, and Alexander the Great, are commonly represented with the skin of a lion on their heads, imitating therein Hercules, from whom they pretended to derive their pedigree. The captains of Alexander, when they usurped the sovereign power in their respective governments, assumed, in their coins, the same ensigns and ornaments which that conqueror had used, as if they had been his lawful heirs and successors. The wing, which we see in the second medal, is a symbol of dispatch, quickness, and expedition, without which no great exploits can be achieved. On the reverse of the first medal Jupiter is represented sitting, and holding in his right hand a victory, and in his left a spear reversed, to shew, that after victory clemency is to be used towards the conquered, and not arms or severity. The reverse of the second medal exhibits a butting ox, and no doubt alludes to what Appian relates of Seleucus Nicator, according to Appian, two hundred and seventy years, according to Eusebius, from the hundred and seventeenth olympiad, the

viz. that he once seized by the horns, and stopt in his full career, a wild ox, which Alexander was about to sacrifice, after he had broken the ropes by which he was held by many persons, and made his escape. Both medals bear this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΣΕΛΕΥΚΟΥ, that is, of king Seleucus, as does also a third of the same prince representing the head of Jupiter crowned with laurel, and on the reverse a chariot drawn by four elephants, and drove by Pallas darting with her right hand a javelin, and holding a shield in her left. Jupiter is frequently expressed on the Macedonian and Syrian coins, as being the pretended father of Alexander, from whom the kings of Syria derived all their power. Pallas was the tutelary goddess of Macedon; and as to the elephants, Seleucus far excelled all the princes of his age in the number he constantly kept of those warlike animals; for he brought four hundred and eighty with him against Antigonus, and had received five hundred from Sandrocottus king of India before he engaged in that war.

Antiochus Soter, the son and successor of Seleucus Nicator, is represented with a diadem on his head and a wing above his ear; on the reverse is Apollo holding in his right hand an arrow, and bow in his left with this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ; that is, of king Antiochus. Seleucus Nicator pretended to be the son of Apollo, as we have related in the history of that prince's reign, and hence it is that we meet with the figure of Apollo in most of the Syrian coins.

The medals of Antiochus Theus represent that prince with the diadem on his head, and on the reverse Apollo with what the medallists call his attributes, viz. a bow and an arrow, as in the former coin. Perhaps the medals bearing the figure of Apollo were struck by the inhabitants of Antioch, who paid a particular worship to that god in the neighbouring city or village of Daphne.

Seleucus Callinicus, brother to Antiochus Theus, is represented in the same manner, viz. with the diadem or royal fillet, on the reverse is Apollo holding in his right hand an arrow, and leaning with his left arm upon his tripod with a laurel crown upon it. We have two other medals of this prince with Apollo on the reverse of one, and a horse on that of the other: Apollo holds an arrow in his right hand, and with his left leans upon his bow; the kings of Syria took great delight in horses, and their cavalry, generally speaking, behaved with great gallantry. Besides, a horse is a symbol of war, and denotes a warlike people. Over the horse is a star, which was, as we are told by the antiquaries, the arms of the city of Aradus, where this medal perhaps was struck. The medals of Seleucus Ceraunus are in every respect like those of Seleucus Callinicus.

the third after the death of Alexander, to the third year of hundred and eightieth that is, two hundred and fifty one the years <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> EUSEB. in Chron.

The medals of Antiochus, surnamed the great, exhibit the head of that prince with the usual ensigns of royalty, and on the reverse the figure of a galley, by which symbol the Syrians represented the city of Tyre. Antiochus made himself master of that strong and important place, at the same time that Ptolemais was delivered up to him, with forty ships that were in the harbour, by Theodotus commander in chief of the forces of Ptolemy Philopator king of Egypt. The letters which are to be seen over the galley are arithmetical characters, and answer our numbers 117; whence we learn that this medal was struck in the 117th year of the Seleucian æra, which was according to some, the 28th, according to others, the 30th year of Antiochus's reign. Vaillant seems to look upon those medals of Antiochus the Great as spurious, which bear this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ, that is, of king Antiochus the Great, since the Syrian kings appear to have been averse from assuming on their coins such pompous titles.

Seleucus Philopator, the son and successor of Antiochus, is represented with the same symbols as his father. The letters CAP denote the 136th year of the æra of the Seleucidæ, which was the 11th of his reign.

Antiochus Epiphanes, so famous in the history of the Maccabees, is represented with the usual ensigns of royalty; on the reverse of some of his medals we see Apollo taking with his right hand an arrow out of his quiver, and holding a bow in his left; in others the image of Jupiter, armed with a thunderbolt and a spear; on all his medals is the following inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ ΕΠΙΦΑΝΟΥΣ, that is, of king Antiochus, the appearing god, or, of king Antiochus, who appears to be a god. This impious and haughty title was first given him, according to Josephus (112), by the Samaritans, who wrote a letter to him with this direction.

The medals of Antiochus Eupator, the son of Epiphanes, have on the reverse a Jupiter sitting, and holding a winged victory in his right, and a spear in his left, with this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ ΕΥΠΑΤΩΡΟΣ, that is, of king Antiochus Eupator. The youthful look of this prince proves that he was very young when he ascended the throne, as we have shewn in the history of his reign.

We have no fewer than eight medals of Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, all bearing the head of that prince, but different symbols on the reverses. On the first is a Jupiter, sitting with a victory in his right hand, and a spear in his left, with this inscription ; ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΔΗΜΕΤΡΙΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ ΦΙΛΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΣΩΤΗΡΟΣ, that is, of king Demetrius Theus Philopator Soter : We have spoke of the surname of Soter in the history of his reign ; but the other appellations are not mentioned by any historian. On the second is represented a victory stretching out her right hand, and holding in her left the branch of a palm-tree. The figure of victory on the coins of this prince allude, in all likelihood, to the advantages he gained over Eupator and his governor Lysias. On the third is expressed a Mercury, with the branch of a palm-tree in his right hand, and his caduce in the left. These three coins bear the same inscription, and without them we should never have known that Demetrius assumed the appellations of Theus and Philopator ; the first he probably took in imitation of his uncle Antiochus ; and the other of his father Seleucus. Mercury is a symbol of peace, and, in all likelihood, alludes here to the tranquility which reigned some time all over Syria, after Demetrius had conquered and put to death Eupator and his governor Lysias. The reverse of the fourth medal exhibits a galley, the symbol of the city of Tyre, with this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΔΗΜΕΤΡΙΟΥ Λ. ΔΝΡ. ΤΥΡΙΩΝ, that is, of king Demetrius in the year (of the Seleucian æra) 154. By the Tyrians. On the fifth we see an Apollo sitting in the apparel of a woman, and holding in his right hand an arrow, and a cornucopia in his left, with this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΔΗΜΕΤΡΙΟΥ ΣΩΤΗΡΟΣ, and the letters ΗΝΡ, that is, of king Demetrius Soter, in the year of the Seleucidæ 158. The sixth medal bears on the reverse a galley, with the characters ΘΝΡ and ΣΙΔΩΝΙΩΝ, that is, in the year 153. By the Sidonians. As Demetrius sent his son to Rome this year, Vailiant conjectures that the Sidonians conveyed him thither with their gallies, and on that occasion struck this medal. Perhaps a galley was the symbol of Sidon as well as of Tyre, the first galley, if Clemens Alexandrinus is to be credited, having been built in that city. On the reverse of the seventh medal is a cornucopia with the name of Demetrius Soter, and the characters ΑΞΡ, denoting the 161st year of the Seleucidæ, that is, the year in which Demetrius defeated Alexander Balas ; for that usurper first appeared, according to the history of the Maccabees, in the 160th year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and was defeated by Demetrius, as we read in the profane historians, the year following. The eighth and last medal of this prince has on the reverse an Apollo with an arrow in his right, and a cornucopia in his left, with the name of Demetrius Soter, and the letters ΒΞΡ, that is, in the 162d year of the Seleucian æra. We read in the history of the Maccabees, that Demetrius began his reign in the 151st year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and from this medal it appears that he was still alive in the 162d of the same æra ; hence we have preferred the authority of Polybius (113), who was contemporary with this prince, and writes that he reigned twelve years, to the testimony of Torniellus, Bucholcerus, (113) Polyb: l. iii. in fine.

(112) Joseph. l. xii.

Funccius,

Funccius, Vigneri, and Gordon, of whom the three first will have him to have reigned only ten years, and the two latter but nine. Eusebius (114), Sulpitius Severus (115), and Josephus (116), agree with Polybius.

The medals of Alexander Balas have on one side the head of that prince with the diadem, and on the other either Jupiter, Apollo, Pallas, or Neptune. Jupiter is represented sitting with a victory in his hand; Apollo with an arrow in one hand, and a bow in the other; Pallas with an helmet on her head, a victory in her right hand, and her left leaning on her shield; Neptune holding in his right a dolphin, and his trident in the left. Most of the medals of this prince bear this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ ΘΕΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΕΥΕΡΓΕΤΟΥ, ΒΕΡ, that is, of king Alexander Theopator Evergetes in the year 162. He assumed the surname of Theopator, as pretending to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, surnamed Theos or God. One of the medals of this prince represents his head, together with that of his queen Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy Philometor. On the queen's head is a bushel after the manner of Isis and Serapis, two Egyptian deities. This bushel, with the cornucopia hard by it, is a symbol of the happiness which the people promised themselves from the marriage of the king of Syria with the daughter of the king of Egypt. The dates which these medals bear, are 162, 163, 164, 165, 166. The following year, that is in 167, Demetrius Nicator, according to the history of the Maccabees, began his reign; so that our chronology agrees exactly with that of the medals, and of the history of the Maccabees, it being manifest from both that Balas was killed in the sixth year of his reign. Eusebius was therefore certainly mistaken, when he allowed him in his chronology ten years and seven months.

Some of the medals of Demetrius Nicator, the son of Demetrius Soter, bear on the reverse an eagle, some an anchor, the arms of the Seleucian family, others a galley, and some the figure of a woman, commonly believed to be Astarte, the goddess of the Sidonians; the medals with that figure having been struck by the Sidonians, as some conjecture from the legend in Phœnician characters. The inscription on the medals of this prince is, of king Demetrius, and on one, of king Demetrius Theus Philadelphus Nicator. The surname of Theus he took in imitation of his father; that of Philadelphus was given him for the great affection he had, or rather pretended to have, for his brother Antiochus; the appellation of Nicator, was bestowed upon him by his subjects for having conquered Alexander Balas, who was not of the Seleucian family. The medals of this prince are dated 167, 168.

Antiochus Theus, the son of Balas by Cleopatra, is not ranked by some writers among the kings of Syria; but on the antient coins

(114) Euseb. in Chron. (115) Sulpitius Sever. Hist. sacr. l. ii.

(116) Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 5.

he is represented like the others with the diadem, and honoured with the titles of king Antiochus, Theus, Epiphanes, Nicephorus ; the surnames of Theos and Epiphanes he took in imitation of Antiochus, the fifth of that name, whose grandson he pretended to be ; that of Nicephorus or the victorious was given him after his victory over Demetrius. Some writers exclude him from the number of the Syrian kings, because during the short time he lived, Demetrius, his rival, kept possession of the greatest part of the empire. The medals represent him very young, and he indeed was not above five years old when he ascended the throne, and was put to death by Tryphon's orders after he had reigned two years. Funccius and Vignierius will have him to have reigned three years complete, Gordon, Mercator, and Temporarius four, and Josephus writes, that he was put to death in the sixth year of his reign.

Tryphon having on the death of his pupil usurped the crown, caused some medals to be struck, wherein he stiled himself king Tryphon, and Tryphon the powerful king ; some of these medals have reached our times, and bear on the reverse an helmet, the symbol of war, to which is fastened a large horn, among the ancients a mark of power ; near the helmet is a star, the arms of the city of Aradus, which shews that the medal was struck there ; for the cities, where such medals were coined, are generally expressed either by the initial letters of their names, or by some other mark. Thus a cornucopia stands for Antioch, a galley for Tyre, the branch of an olive-tree for Laodicea, a mitre for Tripolis, &c.

The medals of Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius Nicator, express the head of that prince with the usual diadem, and on the reverse an eagle with a branch of a palm-tree and the following legend, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ ΔΟΡ. ΙΕΡ. ΑΣΥ. that is, of king Antiochus, in 174 at Tyre a sacred asylum. We have mentioned in our history the famous asylum that was at Tyre. Eusebius tells us, that the privilege of an asylum was granted to the Tyrians the 187th year of the Seleucian æra : but this medal, which was struck in the 174th year of that æra, plainly shews that he was therein greatly mistaken. Sidetes bears on all his medals the name of Euergetes ; that of Sidetes, or the hunter, by which he is generally distinguished in history from the other Antiochuses, not seeming to him worthy of being transmitted to posterity. Patinus in his account of the medals of the Syrian kings is greatly at a loss about those of Antiochus Euergetes ; to which of the many Antiochuses, says he, these medals belong, I leave others to guess ; for my part, I find no mention made by the ancients of any such king as Antiochus Euergetes. Patinus it seems, had never read Eusebius ; for Porphyry, as quoted by that writer, tells us in express terms, that Antiochus the brother of Demetrius Nicator was known by the name of Antiochus Euergetes (118). The medals of this prince bear different dates, viz. 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 181, 182. Buchaierus and Famiorarius had not seen these medals, when they wrote that Sidetes reigned only seven years.

(118) Eus. b. in Chron.

Demetrius Nicator, being set at liberty by the Parthian king, returned into Syria, and reascended the throne upon the death of his brother Sidetes, who was cut off with his army by the Parthians. All the medals that were struck after the return of Nicator represent him with a long beard after the Parthian manner, and are dated the 184th, 185th, 186th years of the Seleucian æra.

Alexander Zebina is represented on the medals with the diadem, as the other kings of Syria, tho' by few of the antients placed in that number. Most of the coins of this prince were struck at Damascus, and bear the following dates, 184, 185, 186; some of them have on the reverse an eagle, some a Bacchus with his attributes, some a Jupiter, and some a Pallas armed with a shield and spear. They all bear the same inscription, viz. of king Alexander, without any of those pompous titles which the other princes assumed.

Seleucus, the eldest son of Demetrius Nicator by Cleopatra, was scarce seated on the throne, when he was killed by his own mother; hence we have not reckoned him among the Syrian kings; neither do we find any mention made of him on ancient coins. His brother Antiochus, surnamed Grypus, the second son of Demetrius Nicator, and Cleopatra, succeeded him, as we have related. On the medals of this prince, struck in the beginning of his reign, that is, in the 187th, and 190th years of the Seleucidæ, we find the heads of Antiochus and Cleopatra joined together with this inscription, ΒΑΣΙΛΙΣΣΗΣ ΚΛΕΟΠΑΤΡΑΣ ΘΕΑΣ, ΚΑΙ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΥ, that is, of queen Cleopatra Thea, and of king Antiochus. That ambitious woman assumed the title of goddess or Thea, and even placed her own name before that of the king her son. The medals that were coined after the 190th year of the æra we are speaking of, are stamped with the head of Antiochus alone, and this inscription, of Antiochus Epiphanes; the name, or rather nick-name of Grypus which is common among authors, is not to be met with on the medals of this prince. The medals of the other princes, viz. of Antiochus Cyzicenus, Antiochus Eusebes, Demetrius Eucharres, Antiochus Dromysius, and Antiochus Asiaticus, contain nothing remarkable, which we have not already taken notice of; and therefore, not to trouble the reader with tedious repetitions, we shall here put an end to this note and history, referring those, who desire to have a more particular account of the Syrian coins, to Foy-Vaillant's elaborate history of the kings of Syria, whence we have borrowed what we have said relating to this subject.

S E C T. X

The History of Egypt from the foundation of that monarchy, by Ptolemy Soter, to its being made a Roman province.

BEFORE we proceed to the history of Egypt, under the Macedonians, it will be necessary to exhibit a series of their kings with the years of their respective reigns, according to various systems, there being a great disagreement among authors in their chronological accounts of these princes.

Ptolemy's Canon of the Macedonian kings who reigned in Egypt.

|                             | Years. |                              | Years. |
|-----------------------------|--------|------------------------------|--------|
| Ptolemy Lagus        | 20     | Ptolemy Philometor    | 35     |
| Ptolemy Philadelphus | 38     | Ptolemy Euergetes II. | 29     |
| Ptolemy Euergetes    | 25     | Ptolemy Soter         | 36     |
| Ptolemy Philopater   | 17     | Ptolemy Dionysius     | 29     |
| Ptolemy Epiphanes    | 24     | Cleopatra             | 22     |

A TABLE of the Macedonian kings who reigned in Egypt, with the years of their reigns according to Eusebius.

|                                |      |                                  |          |
|--------------------------------|------|----------------------------------|----------|
| Ptolemy Lagus           | 40   | Ptolemy Alexander         | 10       |
| Ptolemy Philadelphus    | 38   | Ptolemy Lathurus restored | 8        |
| Ptolemy Euergetes       | 26   | Cleopatra alone           | 6 months |
| Ptolemy Philopator      | 17   | Ptolemy Alexander II.     | 15       |
| Ptolemy Epiphanes       | 24   | Ptolemy Auletes           | 30       |
| Ptolemy Philometor      | 35   | Ptolemy Dionysius and     | } 4      |
| Ptolemy Euergetes or    | } 29 | Cleopatra                 |          |
| Physcon                 |      | Cleopatra alone           | 22       |
| Ptolemy Lathurus before | } 17 |                                  |          |
| his banishment          |      |                                  |          |
| wanting some months.    |      |                                  |          |

There is no small disagreement among the ecclesiastic writers with respect to the years of these princes reigns, as appears from the following table.

A TABLE

A TABLE of the Ptolemies of Egypt, with the years of their reigns, according to Clemens of Alexandria<sup>a</sup>, Epiphanius<sup>b</sup>, and Nicephorus.

|                      | Acc. to Clem. | Acc. to Epiph. | Acc. to Niceph.    |
|----------------------|---------------|----------------|--------------------|
| Ptolemy Lagus        | 40            | 40             | 40                 |
| Ptolemy Philadelphus | 27            | 38             | 38                 |
| Ptolemy Euergetes    | 25            | 24             | 25                 |
| Ptolemy Philopator   | 17            | 21             | 17                 |
| Ptolemy Epiphanes    | 24            | 22             | 26                 |
| Philometar           | 35            | 34             | 35                 |
| Ptolemy Physcon      | 29            | 29             | 17 and six months. |
| Ptolemy Lathurus     | 36            | 35             | 18                 |
| Ptolemy Dionysius    | 29            | 31             | 30                 |
| Cleopatra.           | 22            | 32             | 22                 |

We shall now proceed to the history of these princes reigns, where we shall have occasion to examine which of the various tables we have exhibited deserves the preference.

Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian race who reigned in Ptolemy Egypt after Alexander the Great, was, according to Arrian<sup>c</sup>, Soter his a native of Eordæa, a small place in the province of Myg- ~~extra~~donia in Macedon, and called Lagides, or the son of Lagus, but commonly believed to be the son of king Philip; that prince, as Curtius<sup>d</sup> and Pausanias<sup>e</sup> inform us, having given Arfinoe, the daughter of Meleager, and mother of Ptolemy, in marriage, while she was big with child by him, to Lagus, a Macedonian of a mean descent. Lagus, unwilling to father another man's child, as soon as his wife was brought to bed, exposed the new-born infant, according to the barbarous custom of those times, to be devoured by wild beasts, or to perish with famine. But an eagle, says Suidas<sup>f</sup>, touched with that compassion, which found no room in the breast of Lagus, performed with wonderful care and assiduity all the duties of a fond parent, sheltering the helpless infant with his wings against the inclemency of the weather, and nourishing it with the blood of his prey instead of milk. Lagus being greatly affected with this miraculous adventure, which, no doubt, was invented and divulged for that end, and looking upon it as an infallible prognostic of some ex-

<sup>a</sup> Clemens Alexandrin. Stromat. l. i. Menfur. & ponder. l. iv.

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. l. i.

<sup>e</sup> PAUSAN. in Atticis.

<sup>b</sup> EPIPHAN. de

<sup>d</sup> QUINT. CURT.

<sup>f</sup> SUIDAS in voce Lagus. traordinary

traordinary rise and good fortune, acknowledged the child for his son, and as such brought him up with great care: Theophylus Antiochenus, disagreeing with the above-mentioned authors, tells us, that Ptolemy was of the royal family of Macedon, not by the father, but by his mother Arfinoe, who was nearly related to Philip the father of Alexander <sup>g</sup>. Lagus, according to this writer, must have been a man of rank, since he matched into the royal family, and not an obscure or ignoble Macedonian, as Curtius and Pausanias call him <sup>h</sup>. Theocritus, in speaking of Ptolemy's family, says <sup>i</sup>, that Alexander the Great and he were of the same race, being both descended from Hercules and Hyllus; but does not tell us, whether by the father's side, or the mother's. On the other hand, Justin, without taking any notice of his pedigree, writes, that he served first under Philip, and afterwards under Alexander, in the capacity of a common soldier, and was raised by the latter for his gallant behaviour to a chief command in the army <sup>k</sup>. It appears also from what we read in Plutarch <sup>l</sup>, that Ptolemy was commonly believed to be of a mean descent. For that writer, in speaking of his great moderation and the mildness of his temper, tells us, that one day, after he had heard for a long time an empty and trifling grammarian bragging of his great skill in antiquity; he at length interrupted him with this question, well suited to the erudition of a shallow pedant: Since you are so well versed in the learning of the ancients, pray tell me, grammarian, off-hand, who was the father of Peleus. The grammarian answered without hesitation; Pray, tell me first, O king, if you can, who was the father of Lagus. This reproachful reflection on the meanness of Ptolemy's extraction raised no small indignation in the courtiers; but Ptolemy, applauding the humour, and pleased with the freedom of the grammarian, told them, that if it was beneath the dignity of a king to bear a joke, it did not by any means become him to joke upon others; that he had been the aggressor, and therefore had no more right to resent the answer of the grammarian, with whom he had put himself thereby on a level; then the grammarian had to be offended at his question. As for Ptolemy himself, he seems to have preferred the name of Lagides, or the son of Lagus, to all other appellations, since he transmitted it with his own

<sup>g</sup> THEOPHYL. Antioch. l. ii.

<sup>h</sup> CURT. & PAUSAN. ibid.

<sup>i</sup> THEOCRITUS Idyll. 17.

<sup>k</sup> JUSTIN. l. xiii.

<sup>l</sup> PLUT.

de ira cohibenda.

to all his descendants, who from him are called Ptolemæi Lagides, or the Ptolemies descended from Lagus. Nay Epiphanus tells us <sup>m</sup>, that in honour of his father he instituted a military order, calling it from his name Lageion. This, if true, proves the institution of military orders to be of a more antient date than is commonly believed. But whatever was Ptolemy's descent, all the antients, who write of those times, give him a most extraordinary character. He was Greatly one of Alexander's chief favourites, that conqueror reposing favoured in him the greatest trust, and relying intirely on his wisdom, by Alex- conduct, and courage, in the execution of his most impor- ander, and tant projects; for he attended him in all his expeditions, and loved by in most of them distinguished himself in a very eminent the army. manner. He was no less dear to the soldiers than to the king, being at the same time the prince's favourite, and the darling of the army. At the siege of Harmatelia among the Brachmans he had the misfortune to be wounded with a poisoned arrow, and must have died of his wound, had not providence intervened in a very extraordinary manner, after all human remedies had proved unsuccessful. For while Alexander was one night bemoaning with himself the loss which he had reason to apprehend of so great a commander, he fell asleep, and had scarce shut his eyes, when a vast dragon, if Diodorus is to be credited <sup>n</sup>, appeared to him in a dream, carrying a plant in his mouth, acquainted him with the nature and virtue of that vegetable, shewed him the place where it grew, and instructed him in what manner he should apply it to Ptolemy's wound. The vision no sooner disappeared, but Alexander awaking, went to the place which the dragon had pointed out to him, found the plant, and having applied it to the wound, as he had been directed, cured it in a short time, and restored Ptolemy in perfect health to the army, who looked upon his death as the greatest misfortune that could befall them. Strabo, who speaks of this adventure as happening in the country of the Orites, says, that Alexander learnt the remedy of the natives, and that either he or his flatterers gave out that it had been revealed to him by the gods <sup>o</sup>.

AFTER the death of Alexander he was appointed governor Appointed of Egypt, Libya, and that part of Arabia which borders governor upon Egypt; and these provinces he held to his death, and of Egypt. transmitted them with many new acquisitions as an heredi-

<sup>m</sup> EPIPHANIUS de mensur. & ponder. CUL. l. xvii. p. 617.

<sup>o</sup> STRABO. l. 14.

<sup>n</sup> DIONOR SI-

Whence called Soter.

tary kingdom to his descendants. But as we have already given a particular account of his wars with Perdiccas, Antigonus, and Demetrius <sup>P</sup>, we shall not trespass on the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, but only take notice in this place of some particulars relating to the reign of this prince, which we have not mentioned elsewhere. He is commonly distinguished from the other Ptolemies his successors by the surname of Soter or Saviour, which was first given him by the Rhodians on the following occasion. Antigonus having formed a design of seizing on the island of Cyprus, which was then held by Ptolemy, demanded of the Rhodians a squadron of their best ships for the carrying on of that enterprize; but as those islanders drew great advantages from their trade with Egypt, they could by no means be prevailed upon to enter into any measures prejudicial to the interest of Ptolemy. This gave no small offence to Antigonus, who, to be revenged on the Rhodians, sent his son Demetrius, with a mighty fleet, and a powerful army, to reduce their island. But Demetrius, after having spent a whole year in the siege of Rhodes, the metropolis of the island, without being able to master it, was obliged to conclude a peace with the Rhodians upon honourable terms, and leave them in full possession of their liberties. As they had been enabled by the timely succours sent them by Ptolemy to sustain so long a siege, and by his friendly offices happily delivered from it, as soon as the enemy withdrew, to testify their gratitude to their deliverer, they consecrated a grove to him, surrounded it with a stately portico, which from him they called the Ptolemæum; and, after having consulted the oracle of Jupiter Hammon, to give the action an air of solemnity, decreed, according to the impious flattery of those times, that divine honours should be paid him in that place, and the name of Soter or Saviour given him, for having delivered them from the calamities of so dangerous a war <sup>Q</sup>.

Peoples
Alexandria.

Ptolemy, upon his first being appointed governor of Egypt, chose the city of Alexandria for the usual place of his residence, as did likewise the other kings, who succeeded him; by which means that city became one of the most wealthy and populous of the world. Ptolemy granted great privileges to all who settled there, whether Greeks, Jews, or Egyptians, which drew such crowds of new inhabitants out of Judæa, that their quarter was one of the largest in the place. For the use of these, as they came by degrees to forget their own language, was made that Greek version of the sacred books, which has since been called the Septuagint, as we shall see in a more proper place. All the antients speak of Alexandria as the next in beauty, wealth, extent, &c. to Rome, some calling it the second metropolis of the world, others the city of cities, the queen of the east, a second Rome, &c.

<sup>P</sup> See Vol. VIII. p. 265, 269, 878, 293, 294. <sup>Q</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. xx. PLUT. in Demet. PAUSAN. in Atticis.

THO' Ptolemy had, from the time he was first vested with the government of Egypt, exercised the regal authority, yet he did not assume the title of king till he saw himself firmly settled in his new kingdom, which happened after the retreat of Antigenus and Demetrius, who had attempted, without success, to invade Egypt, that is, nineteen years after the death of Alexander. From this time Ptolemy in his chronological canon begins to reckon the years of his reign, having hitherto computed by those of Philip and Alexander Ægus, though the latter had been killed five years before. But this fortunate turn in favour of Ptolemy, and his being thereby firmly established on the throne, gave the chronologer a new epoch to reckon by, which took its beginning from the seventh day of our November. From this time Soter reigned twenty years, agreeable to Ptolemy's canon; and these with the nineteen ascribed by that writer to Philip and Alexander Ægus, make up the thirty nine, which authors commonly allow Ptolemy Soter to have reigned alone. For in the thirtieth year of his reign, being fourscore and upwards, he placed Ptolemy Philadelphus, one of his sons by Berenice, on the throne, declaring him his partner in the empire and successor to the crown after his death. He had several sons by his other wives, and among these Ptolemy Ceraunus, or the Thunderer; who being the son of Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, and the eldest of the male issue, looked upon the crown as his birth-right after his father's demise. But Berenice, who came into Egypt merely as a companion to Eurydice, when she first married Ptolemy, so charmed that prince with her beauty, that he likewise married her, and in all affairs of importance was intirely governed by her advice. The crafty princess, taking advantage of the ascendant she had gained over her husband, prevailed upon him to settle the crown upon her issue, and exclude Ceraunus, to whom, according to the order of succession, it belonged. To prevent therefore the wars which might ensue after his death between the two brothers, he resolved to place the crown on

Assumes the title of king.
Year of the Flood, 2695.
Before Christ, 304.

Makes his son Philadelphus his partner in the empire.

Vide DIODOR. SICUL. l. xvii. STRABO, l. xvii. MARCELLIN. l. xxii. HEGESIPP, l. iv. c. 27.

the head of Philadelphus in his life-time, and reign in partnership with him. Hereupon Ceraunus, quitting the court, retired to Lyfimachus, whose son Agathocles had married Lysandra the sister of Ceraunus both by father and mother. After the death of Agathocles he fled to the court of Seleucus, who received him in the most obliging manner, for which he was afterwards repaid with the blackest ingratitude<sup>c</sup>.

IN this year, which was the first of the hundred and twenty-fourth olympiad, the fortieth of Ptolemy Soter's reign, and the first of Ptolemy Philadelphus, was finished the famous watch-tower in the island of Pharos over-against Alexandria, which had been begun by Ptolemy Soter some years before. It is commonly called the tower of Pharos, and was counted by the antients among the wonders of the world. It was a large square structure of white marble, on the top of which fires were kept constantly burning for the direction of sailors. It cost eight hundred talents, which, if they were Attic talents, amounts to one hundred sixty five thousand pounds sterling and upwards; if Alexandrian, to twice that sum. The architect, employed by Ptolemy in this wonderful structure, was Sostratus of Cnidus, who by the following crafty device attempted to usurp the whole glory of it to himself. He was ordered to engrave on it the following inscription; King Ptolemy to the gods the saviours for the benefit of sailors; but instead of Ptolemy's name he cut out his own in the solid marble, and then filling up the hollow of the letters with mortar, wrote on it the above-mentioned inscription. In process of time the mortar with Ptolemy's name being wore off, the following inscription appeared; Sostratus the Cnidian, the son of Dexiphanes, to the gods the saviours for the benefit of sailors. This, as it was engraved on the solid marble, lasted as long as the tower itself<sup>c</sup> (A).
This

<sup>c</sup> PAUSAN. in Atticis. JUSTIN. l. xvi. c. 2. DIOGEN. LAERT. in Demet. PHALER. THEOCRIT. Idyll. 17. APPIAN. in Syriac. 128.      <sup>c</sup> PLIN. l. xxxvi. c. 12. STRAB. l. xvii. p. 791. MEMNON. excerpt. c. 9. & 13. APPIAN. in Syriac. p. 128.

(A) Nicholas Lloyd tells us out of a Manuscript copy of the Greek scholiast of Lucian, whose very words he quotes, that this tower was a square structure of a furlong, or six hundred foot on each side, and so high that it was seen at the distance of an hundred miles (1). Eben Adris, an Arabic writer, in his book, which th<sup>c</sup>

(1) Vide Nic. Lloyd in Vexic. Geographic. ad vocem Pharos.

This wonderful work has been demolished some ages since; and now in its place stands a castle, as our modern travellers inform us <sup>u</sup>, called Farillon, where a garison is kept to defend the harbour. Pharos was originally an island about seven furlongs distant from the continent, to which it was afterwards joined by a causey, like that of Tyre, and commonly called the Heptastadium, or the seven furlong causey, it being seven furlongs in length. This was the work of Dexiphanes, the father of Sostratus, who compleated it at the same time that his son put the last hand to the tower. As they were both celebrated architects, Ptolemy employed them in these and many other works, which he undertook for the adorning and strengthening of Alexandria, the metropolis of his kingdom <sup>w</sup>. Ammianus Marcellinus ascribes the Heptastadium to queen Cleopatra <sup>x</sup>; but as he contradicts therein Cæsar in his commentaries, and all the antients who speak of that great work, his authority is of no weight with us.

<sup>u</sup> THEVENOT. part I. l. 2. c. 1.      <sup>w</sup> STRAB. l. xvii. p. 792.
 PLIN. l. v. c. 31. & l. xiii. c. 11.      CÆSAR. comment. de bell.
 civil. l. iii. POMPON. MEL. l. ii. c. 7.      <sup>x</sup> AMMIAN. MARCELL.
 l. xxii. c. 16.

Latin translator styles Geographia Nubiensis, says, that this tower was three hundred cubits, or four hundred and fifty foot high. But both these accounts are altogether incredible, and generally looked upon as mere hyperboles. The first indeed is contradicted by Josephus (2), who, in speaking of the tower of Phaselus at Jerusalem, describes it as a square building of forty cubits, or sixty foot on each side, and ninety cubits, or an hundred and thirty five foot high; and adds, that it was like the tower of Pharos near Alexandria; but as to its circumference much larger. Josephus had often seen both these towers, say some writers, and could not be mistaken herein. Some writers lay great stress on the testimony of Josephus in this place; but in our opinion he depresses that wonderful work as much as the others raise it; for if the tower of Pharos was much less than that of Phaselus at Jerusalem, how came the former, and not the latter, to be so much celebrated by all the ancients, and even ranked among the seven wonders of the world? We are therefore apt to believe, that some mistake has crept into the copy of Josephus; perhaps instead of μεῖων we should read μεῖζων. However that be, the two former accounts are in our opinion very improbable, since allowing it four hundred and fifty foot in height, and six hundred in breadth on each side, it would have been a far more wonderful work than the great pyramid, which we can hardly believe.

(2) Joseph. de Bell. Judaic. l. vi. p. 914.

The image THE same year that the tower of Pharos and the heptastadion of Serapis were finished, the image of Serapis was brought out of Pontus to Alexandria, after Ptolemy had for three years together solicited in vain Scydrothemis king of Pontus to send him it. Of this deity we have the following account from Tacitus<sup>1</sup>, Plutarch<sup>2</sup>, and Clement of Alexandria<sup>3</sup>. While Ptolemy, the first of that name, was employed in fortifying Alexandria with walls, and adorning it with temples and other stately buildings, there appeared to him in his sleep a young man of extraordinary beauty, and of a stature more than human, admonishing him to dispatch into Pontus some of his most trusty friends, to bring from thence his statue, and assuring him, that the city and kingdom, which entertained it, should prove happy, glorious, and powerful: The young man having thus spoke, disappeared, mounting up into heaven in a huge blaze of fire. Ptolemy, struck with the augury and miraculous apparition, discovered his vision to the Egyptian priests, whose profession it was to be skilled in things of this nature. But as they appeared to be quite ignorant of Pontus and all foreign countries, he had recourse to one Timotheus an Athenian, of the race of the Eumolpides, who at that time had the administration of sacred things in Alexandria. From him he learnt, that in Pontus stood a city called Sinope, and not far from it a temple greatly resorted to by the natives, and consecrated to the Infernal Jupiter, near whose statue stood that of a woman commonly believed to be Proserpine. But Ptolemy in the mean time applying his mind to other things, intirely neglected the heavenly admonition, till the same vision, appearing to him anew in a more terrible manner, threatened him and his kingdom with certain destruction, if he neglected to put in execution the orders that had been given him. Hereupon Ptolemy immediately dispatched ambassadors with rich presents to Scydrothemis, who then reigned in Sinope, to try whether they could prevail upon him to part with the image. They were ordered to take Delphos in their way, and there to consult the oracle of the Pythian Apollo; which they did accordingly, and received an answer from the god, void of ambiguity, viz. that they should proceed, and carry home with them the image of his father, but leave behind that of his sister. Upon their arrival at Sinope they acquainted Scydrothemis with their errand, and at the same time presented to him rich gifts in their master's name. The king accepted the presents, and was inclined to comply with their request; but deterred from following his inclination by the menaces of the people opposing the removal of the statue. In this negotiation three years were spent, Ptolemy sparing no intreaties nor charges, but sending continually new embassadors, loaded with fresh presents both for the king and his favourites. However, Scydrothemis continued still irresolute and wavering, till he was warned by a dreadful spectre, which appeared to him in the dead of the night, no longer to retard what the deity had determined. Hereupon having assembled the people, he acquainted them with the injunctions of the god, with his own vision, and with that of Ptolemy, and assured them, that, unless they readily complied with the orders of heaven, many dreadful calamities would soon fall upon them. His speech made no impression on the minds of the populace; they envied Egypt such a blessing, and surrounding the temple in a tumultuous manner, threatened to put any one to death who should offer to remove their god. Hereupon the god, as some authors write, of his own motion and without help, conveyed himself into the embassador's ship, which lay close to the shore; and the vessel, traversing an immense tract of sea, arrived the third day after safe at Alexandria. Other writers tell us, that the inhabitants of Sinope being reduced to great straits by a famine, which made a dreadful havock in the city, consented at last to part with their god for a supply of corn, which Ptolemy sent them. The statue of Serapis, being thus brought to Alexandria, was set up in one of the suburbs of that city, called Rhacotis, where a temple was afterwards erected in his honour, suitable to the greatness of that stately metropolis, and called from the god worshipped there, Serapeum (B). This structure, according to Ammianus

<sup>1</sup> TACIT. histor. l. iv. c. 83, 84.      <sup>2</sup> PLUTARCH. de Iside & Osiride.      <sup>3</sup> CLEM. ALEXANDRIN. in Protreptic.

(B) Julius Firmicus (3), Ruffinus (4), and other ecclesiastic writers are of opinion, that the patriarch Joseph was worshipped in Egypt under this name. But they can give no other reason for this strange conceit, than that Serapis was generally represented with a bushel on his head, which, they think, denotes the bushel, with which Joseph measured out his corn to the Egyptians in the time of the famine; whereas it may as well represent the bushel, with which Ptolemy measured out to the inhabitants of Sinope the corn which he sent them for their god. This opinion, ridiculous and ill-grounded as it is, has been embraced by Vossius, Ouzellus, Spencer, and many other modern writers of no mean character (5). These nus Marcellinus, surpassed in beauty and magnificence all other edifices in the world, except the capitol at Rome <sup>b</sup>.

(3) Julius Firmic. in lib. de error. prophanar. religion. (4) Ruffin. histor. l. ii. c. 23. (5) Vide Voss de theol. gent. l. i. c. 91. & Spencer de legib. Ritual. Hebr. dissert. v. c. 3.

WITHIN

<sup>b</sup> AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. l. xxii. c. 16.

will have Serapis to be an ancient Egyptian god, the same with Apis, and derive his name from Apis and the Greek word Σορὸς, signifying a coffin; so that, according to them, Serapis is the same as Apis ἐν Σορῶ, or Apis in his coffin. Their meaning is, that the sacred bull, worshipped by the Egyptians, when alive, was called Apis, when dead, Serapis, or Apis in Soro, for from these words Apis and Soro, they derive the name of Serapis, which, according to them, was at first Soroapis, and, by corruption, came to be Serapis. For this etymology they quote Nymphiodorus, Clemens of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Ruffinus, but seem not to be aware of a very obvious objection against this derivation; which is, that the ancient Egyptians were unacquainted with the Greek tongue, that language having been introduced into Egypt by the Ptolemies; and therefore, had Serapis been an ancient Egyptian deity, his name could not have had a Greek etymology. But not to dwell on an argument which sufficiently confutes itself, being intirely founded on a forced, unnatural, and false etymology; it is certain, if the ancients are to be credited, that Serapis was not originally an Egyptian deity, nor worshipped by the inhabitants of that country in ancient times; as he must have been, had the patriarch Joseph been worshipped under that name. For Polybius tells us (6), that Serapis was first worshipped as a god on the coast of the Propontis, on the Thracian side, over-against Hierus, and that there Jason sacrificed to him when he went on the Argonautic expedition. From thence, in all likelihood, the worship of that deity was introduced among the inhabitants of Sinope, and from Sinope brought into Egypt, in the manner we have related. For till the reign of Ptolemy the first no mention is made by any writer of Serapis as an Egyptian god. Herodotus, who is so diffuse and particular in his account of the Egyptian gods, takes no notice of this; which is a plain proof, that in his time no such deity was known in Egypt. Several authors have wrote after him of the gods, religious ceremonies, and different manners of worship in use among the Egyptians, who were of all people the most superstitious, and yet none of them ever once mention the name of Serapis, till they come to the time of the Ptolemies. Macrobius tells us (7), that when the statue of Serapis was first set up at Alexandria, Nicocreon, who then reigned in Cyprus, sent to enquire what god he was, which he would not have done, had he been a deity anciently worshipped by the Egyptians; for Nicocreon was, as the above mentioned author informs us, a prince of great learning, and well versed in the Egyptian mythology. Origen, who

(6) Polyb. l. iv. p. 507.      (7) Macrobi. Saturnal. l. i. c. 20.

WITHIN the verge of this temple was a library, which in The celebrated library and academy of Alexandria. after-ages became very famous for the number and value of the books it contained. Ptolemy Soter, being a learned prince, as appears from his history of the life of Alexander, which was greatly esteemed by the ancients; but has not reached our times, to encourage and improve the liberal arts in his dominions, founded an Academy at Alexandria, or a society of learned men, who devoted themselves to the study of philosophy, and all other sciences. For the use of these he made a collection of choice books, which by degrees grew under his successors to a prodigious bulk, and was reckoned the finest library in the world. His son Ptolemy Philadelphus left in it at his death an hundred thousand volumes; and the succeeding princes of that race enlarged it still more, till at length the books lodged in it amounted to the number of seven hundred thousand volumes <sup>c</sup>. The method they followed in collecting them was this: They seized all the books that were by the Greeks or other foreigners brought into Egypt, and sent them to the academy or museum, where they were transcribed by persons employed for that purpose; the transcripts were then delivered to the proprietors, and the originals laid up in the library. Ptolemy Energetes, for instance, borrowed of the Athenians the works of Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus, and only returned them the copies, which he caused to be transcribed in as beautiful a manner as possible; the originals he retained for his library, presenting the Athenians with fifteen talents for the exchange <sup>d</sup>, that is, with three thousand pounds sterling and upwards. As the museum was at first in that quarter of the city, which was called Bruchion, near the royal palace, the library was placed there likewise; but when it was filled with books to the number of four hundred thousand volumes, another library within the Serapeum was erected by way of supplement to it, and on that account called was himself an Egyptian, speaks of Serapis as a god brought into Egypt not long before his time (8). From all we have said, it is manifest, that Serapis was not originally an Egyptian deity, and consequently could not be the patriarch Joseph.

<sup>c</sup> STRAB. l. xvii. p. 791. EUSEB. in chron. AMMIAN MARCELLIN. ibid. TERTULL. in apologetic. c. 18. PLUT. in Epicurum. <sup>d</sup> AMMIAN MARCELLIN. ibid. GELLIUS, l. 6. c. 17. ISIDOR. Origen. l. vi. c. 3. GALEN. in comment. 2. in tertium libr. Hippocrat. de Morb. vulgar.

(8) Origen. contra Celsum, l. v.

the daughter of the former. The books lodged in this were in process of time increased to the number of three hundred thousand volumes; and these two put together, made up the number of seven hundred thousand volumes, of which the royal libraries of the Ptolemies were said to consist<sup>e</sup>. In the war which Julius Cæsar waged with the inhabitants of Alexandria, the library in Bruchion was unfortunately burnt, and the four hundred thousand volumes, with which it was stocked, reduced to ashes. But the library in Serapeum still remained; and there it was, without all doubt, that Cleopatra deposited the two hundred thousand volumes of the Pergamean library which Marc Antony presented her with. These, and others added to them from time to time, rendered the new library of Alexandria more numerous and considerable than the former<sup>f</sup>; and tho' it was plundered and ransacked more than once, during the troubles and revolutions which happened in the Roman empire, yet it was again and again repaired, and filled with the same number of books, and continued for many ages to be of great fame and use in those parts, till it was at length burnt by the Saracens, on their making themselves masters of Alexandria in the 642d year of the Christian æra. The manner in which this was effected is too remarkable to be passed over in silence. We have the following account of it from Abul-Pharagius, in his history of the tenth dynasty (C): John, surnamed the grammarian, a famous Peripatetic

<sup>e</sup> STRAB. ibid. EPIPHAN. de ponder. & mensur. TERTULL. ibid c. 18. <sup>f</sup> PLUT. in Jul Cæsar. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. l. xxii. c. 16. DION. CASSIUS. l. xlii. p. 202. LIV. apud Senecam de tranquill. OROS. l. vi. c. 15.

(C) The author here quoted was a native of Malatia, a city in Armenia, near the springs of the Euphrates, and flourished in the thirteenth century. He wrote an abridgment of the history of the world, from Adam to his own times, which he divided into ten parts or dynasties; viz. 1st, The history of the ancient patriarchs from Adam to Moses; 2. Of Joshua and the other judges of Israel; 3. Of their kings; 4. Of the Chaldean kings; 5. Of the magi or Persians; 6. Of the Greek kings; 7. Of the Romans; 8. Of the Greek emperors of Constantinople; 9. Of the Arabian commanders; and here he is more diffuse than in all the rest put together; 10. Of the Moguls. He is more to be depended upon in his history of the Saracens and Tartars, than in his accounts of other nations. The learned Edward Pocock translated this work into Latin, and published his translation in 1663; he had obliged the public in 1650 with an abridgment of the history of the tenth dynasty, under the following

tic philosopher, being at Alexandria, when that city was taken by the Saracens, and in great favour with Amiri-Ebnol-As their general, he begged of him the royal library. Amiri replied, that it was not in his power to grant such a request; but that he would write to the khalif, or emperor, on that head, since, without knowing his pleasure, he dared not dispose of one single book. He accordingly wrote to Omar, who was then khalif, acquainting him with the request of his friend; and the emperor's answer was, that those books, if they contained the same doctrine with the Coran, could be of no use, because the Coran comprehended all necessary truths; but if they contained what was contrary to that book, they ought not to be suffered; and therefore he ordered, that, whatever their contents were, they should be all destroyed. Pursuant to this order, they were distributed among the public baths, where, for the space of six months, they served to supply the fires of those public places, whereof there was an incredible number at Alexandria. We may from hence form a just idea of the prodigious multitude of books lodged in that celebrated library. Thus this inestimable treasure of knowledge, which had been founded by a Macedonian prince, a great encourager of learning, was utterly destroyed by an enthusiastic tyrant, who, by his religion, founded in ignorance, and made up of inconsistent fables, was inspired with a brutish and irreconcilable hatred to all truth, learning, and politeness. The museum, in the quarter called Bruchion, stood, after the library adjoining to it was consumed, and lasted till that whole part of the city was destroyed by the emperor Aurelian in his war with the Alexandrians; for Ammianus Marcellinus tells us, that, till the reign of Aurelian, it continued to be the habitation of excellent men, meaning the members of that society, which had been founded by Ptolemy Soter, for the improvement of all useful sciences<sup>g</sup>. Strabo, in his description of this museum, says<sup>h</sup>, that it was a large structure, adjoining to the palace, and fronting the harbour; that it was surrounded with a portico, where the philosophers walked and following title, Specimen historię Arabum; sive Gregorii Abul-Faragii Malatienſis de origine & moribus Arabum succineta narratio. The epitomizer's learned observations are worthy perusing. We cannot imagine what induced Abraham Ecchellenſis to give our author the name of Gregorius Bar Hebræus Syrus (9).

<sup>g</sup> AMMIAN. MARCELL. l. xxii. c. 16. p. 343.      <sup>h</sup> STRAB. l. xvii. p. 793.

(9) Vide Pocock, Simon, Bayle's Dict. Critiq.

conversed together ; that the members of the society were under the government of a president, whose station was so honourable, that, under the Ptolemies, he was always nominated by those princes, and in the Roman times by the emperors ; and finally, that within the museum was a very large hall, where they all met at their meals ; for they were supplied very plentifully with all sorts of provisions, the museum having been endowed, when first founded, with large revenues. Hence Timon the Phliasian, who was contemporary with Ptolemy Soter the founder of it, used to call it the talaron, or the coop, denoting thereby, that the philosophers were fed in the museum, and fattened like birds in a coop<sup>l</sup>. The museum, as the reader must have observed from the account which the ancients give of it, was an institution of the same nature with the colleges of the present times ; and as to these, the kingdoms where they flourish, and above all our own, are indebted for the great men they have given to the world, so Alexandria owed to its museum the many eminent writers it produced. Among these we may reckon Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Anatolius, and Athanasius, who had their education in that city.

THE celebrated Demetrius Phalereus was the first president of this seat of learning, and as the library was a part of it, he had, in all likelihood, the books likewise under his care. We do not hereby mean what Aristeas seems to insinuate, viz. that Demetrius was librarian to Ptolemy Soter ; for this was too mean an employment for a man of his rank. He had been prince of Athens, and governed that state with absolute authority for the space of ten years<sup>k</sup>, was a great law-giver, an eminent philosopher, and the most able politician of the age he lived in. The emperor Antoninus ranks him with the greatest princes of those times, and even puts him upon the level with Philip of Macedon, and his son Alexander the Great<sup>k</sup>. To say therefore that he was library-keeper to Ptolemy, would be degrading, beyond measure, a person of his merit and reputation. Besides, we find another in this employment under Soter, and likewise under his son Philadelphus, viz. Zenodotus of Ephesus, who, being by profession a grammarian, was very proper to take care of a library, such persons being generally chosen in those times for this employment ; however, it was not below Demetrius to assist Ptolemy in what he had so much at heart, that is, in founding a museum, and making a collection of choice books for the use of the learned men who were to live in it; nay, Plutarch tells us, that Demetrius was the first who proposed to the king the founding both of the museum and library; and that the king readily embraced the proposal, as being suggested by a man, who was equally eminent for his learning and other extraordinary qualifications<sup>1</sup>. The same author adds, that Demetrius at first advised the king to collect only such books as treated of civil polity and government, telling him that he would find in them better advice and counsels than any of his friends dared to give him. And indeed this is almost the only means of conveying truth to princes, and shewing them, under borrowed names, their duties, as well as their faults. When the king had once approved of this excellent advice, and taken proper measures for the procuring of all such books as answered his first design, it is very natural to suppose that he was thereby led to collect all other sorts of books, and fill with them the library we have mentioned. Demetrius was charged with the care of collecting these books, which was no-ways an employment unworthy of so great a man, since the king himself placed therein all his pleasure and diversion; a diversion suitable to the taste of a prince, who was himself a man of eminent learning, and an encourager of it in others (D).

<sup>l</sup> ATHEN. l. i. p. 22.
350.

<sup>k</sup> ANTONIN. l. ix. c. 24. de se-

<sup>1</sup> PLUT. apophthegm. regum.

(D) Livy, in speaking of this library, styles it a noble monument of the wealth of the Egyptian kings, and of their commendable attention in propagating knowledge among their subjects; but Seneca, with all the sourness of a Cynic, finds fault with Livy for commending it, and even blames the kings who were concerned in that great work. Let Livy, says he, and other writers bestow their eulogiums on that great collection of books, and on the princes who promoted it; for my part, I look upon it as a lasting monument of the pride and vanity of those monarchs, who amassed such a prodigious number of volumes, not for their use, but merely for pomp and ostentation. Let every one purchase such books only as he intends to peruse; for others serve to feed our vanity, without improving our knowledge (10). But, with Seneca's leave, are not public libraries of great use? and who but princes can bear the charges that attend them? Public libraries, says Clemens of Alexandria, are common treasures, and those who found them, whether princes or private men, deserve the greatest commendations, since they deliver, as far as in them lies, their country from one of the greatest evils, ignorance (11).

(10) Seneca de tranquill. anim. c. 9.
in Stromat. 6.

(11) Clem. Alexand.

Ptolemy Soter dies. TOWARDS the close of this year died Ptolemy Soter, in the eighty fourth year of his age, and forty first of his reign, counting the two years he held the empire in partnership with his son. Those writers who will have him to have reigned only thirty nine years, follow therein Justin, who tells us, that he resigned his crown to his son, and, divesting himself of all power and authority, attended on the new king as one of his guards, saying that he thought it a more glorious thing to be the father of a king, than to have a kingdom <sup>m</sup>. These authors, as they do not reckon the two years he lived after his resignation, allow him to have reigned only thirty nine years. Lucian <sup>n</sup> and Macrobius <sup>o</sup> tell us, that, in the thirty eighth year of his reign, he admitted his son to sit on the throne with him, and that the father and son reigned jointly two years. According to these he reigned in all but forty years. The learned Usher, whom we have followed, observes out of Dionysius the astronomer, that Ptolemy Philadelphus was admitted to reign with his father thirty nine years after the death of Alexander; and that the son, in the second year of their common reign, as Dionysius styles it, by the death of his father, became the sole master of the Egyptian empire: Whence it is plain, that Ptolemy, according to Dionysius, who formed a new æra, beginning with the reign of Philadelphus, died in the forty first year after the death of Alexander, and consequently of his own reign <sup>p</sup>. He was the best prince of his race, and left behind him an example of prudence, justice, and clemency, which none of his successors cared to follow. He retained on the throne the same simplicity of manners, and aversion to all pomp and ostentation, which he had shewn while in a private station. His subjects had at all hours a free access to him, and were sure to find, in recurring to him, a speedy redress of all their grievances. He did not think it below the majesty of a king to converse familiarly with the meanest of his subjects, calling them his true friends, since they often told him truths, which his courtiers endeavoured to disguise, without any regard to his or their own reputation. He frequently made public entertainments, on which occasion he thought it no disparagement, as Plutarch informs us <sup>q</sup>, to borrow his friends plate, having no more of his own than what was necessary for his common use. When one of his favourites represented to him, that a sovereign ought to be better provided, his answer was, That the true grandeur of a king consisted in enriching others, and not himself. In the general division of Alexander's empire, Egypt, Libya, and that part of Arabia which borders upon Egypt, were allotted to Ptolemy, as we have said elsewhere; but that prince held, at the time of his death, the following countries, which we find enumerated by Theocritus<sup>r</sup>, viz. Egypt, Phœnice, Arabia, Syria, Libya, Æthiopia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Lycia, Caria, and some of the Cyclades. By Syria is to be understood here Cœle-Syria; for all the rest of that country was then in the possession of Seleucus Nicator.

<sup>m</sup> JUSTIN. l. xvi. c. 3.      <sup>n</sup> LUCIAN. in Macrob.      <sup>o</sup> PORPHYR. in Græc. EUSEB. SCALIG.      <sup>p</sup> Vide CLAUD. PTOLEM. in magna syntax.      <sup>q</sup> PLUT. apophtheg. p. 181.

Ptolemy had four wives, viz. 1. Artonis, the daughter of Artabazus, who brought him no children. 2. Thais, who had been formerly one of Alexander's concubines, by whom Ptolemy had Leontiscus, or, as Justin calls him, Lenticus, Lagus, and Irene. Irene married, as Athenæus informs us<sup>t</sup>, Solon king of Cyprus. 3. Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, who bore him two sons, viz. Ptolemy, surnamed Ceraunus, and another, whose name has not been transmitted to us, and as many daughters, viz. Ptolemais and Lyfandra. Ceraunus, being excluded by his father from the succession, fled to the court of Seleucus Nicator, who received him in a very friendly manner, and entertained him and his numerous retinue at a vast charge; but the wicked wretch, having no sense of gratitude for the many favours conferred on him by Seleucus, conspired against his benefactor, and treacherously murdered him, as we have related in the history of Syria<sup>u</sup>. On the death of Seleucus he seized the kingdom of Macedon, which that prince had won a few months before from Lyfimachus, who had been killed in the battle of Gerupodion in Phrygia; but as Ceraunus did not expect to enjoy the dominions of Lyfimachus in peace, so long as his children and Arsinoë his queen were alive, he resolved to put them to death, and thereby free himself from the apprehensions they gave him. That princess was half-sister to Ceraunus, being the daughter of Ptolemy Soter by Berenice; but nevertheless, as she was well acquainted with the cruel, ambitious, and treacherous temper of her brother, she had, on the death of Seleucus, conveyed both herself and her children out of his reach. Hereupon Ceraunus, feigning a passion for his sister, offered to marry her, such incestuous marriages being allowed in Egypt, and to adopt the two sons she had by Lyfimachus. Arsinoë rejected at first the proposal, fearing

<sup>r</sup> THEOCRIT. Idyll. 17.      <sup>t</sup> ATHEN l. xiii. c. 13.      <sup>u</sup> Vol. viii. p. 456.

*Marries
his sister
Arsinoe.*

it might prove fatal both to herself and children ; but Ceraunus, to remove all suspicion, repaired to a temple, which the Macedonians held in the greatest veneration, and there, in the presence of one of her intimate friends, called the tutelary gods of the country to witness the sincerity of his intentions, and at the same time embracing their statues, protested with the most dreadful oaths and imprecations, that he had nothing in view but the welfare of his sister and her children. These protestations, made before the altars, and ratified with the awful seal of religion, prevailed upon Arsinoe to consent to the marriage, which was accordingly celebrated with the greatest magnificence, and all possible marks of an unaffected joy and tenderness. Ceraunus placed the diadem on his sister's head, and declared her queen in the presence of the whole army. Arsinoe, overjoyed to see herself so gloriously restored to the high station, from which she had fallen by the death of Lyfimachus her first husband, invited Ceraunus to reside with her in her own city of Cassandria, repairing thither herself the first, to make the necessary preparations for his reception. Ceraunus made the most pompous and solemn entry that had ever been seen in those parts, the public and private houses being very magnificently adorned, and the streets thronged with incredible multitudes of people in their best apparel, who had flocked from all parts to congratulate their new king on his accession to the crown. The two sons of Arsinoe, viz. Lyfimachus and Philip, the one sixteen years of age, and the other thirteen, marched out of the city with crowns on their heads to meet their father-in-law, who received and embraced them with all the seeming tenderness that could be shewn by the fondest of fathers. They conducted him into the city, among the loud acclamations of the multitude, and, together with their mother Arsinoe, put him in possession of the citadel ; and then the perjured traitor, having nothing to fear, caused the two young princes to be murdered in the very bosom of their mother, to whom they had fled for refuge ; and, stripping her of all she possessed, caused her to be dragged out of the city, and then banished her into Samothrace, allowing her only two women to attend her<sup>u</sup> ; but providence did not suffer such enormous crimes to go long unpunished ; for the very next year he was taken prisoner by the Gauls, who had invaded Macedon, and, on his being known, tore in pieces, a death which his wickedness and treachery well deserved<sup>w</sup> ;

*Murders
her children by Lyfima-
chus.*

His death.

<sup>u</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxiv. c. 2 — 4. MEMNON. excerpt. apud Phot. c. 15.

<sup>w</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxiv. c. 5.

for it is plain, from what we have related of him, that he was a man of a most wicked and perfidious temper, and his behaviour sufficiently justifies his father Ptolemy Soter for having excluded him from the crown, that prince having, without all doubt, been well acquainted with his brutal disposition.

THE brother of Ceraunus by Eurydice was put to death by Philadelphus, for stirring up the inhabitants of Cyprus to rebellion*; and his two sisters, Ptolemais and Lyfandra were married, the former to Demetrius Poliorcetes, and the other to Agathocles the son of Lyfimachus. Ptolemy Soter's fourth wife was Berenice, by whom he had Ptolemy surnamed Philadelphus, and Argæus, with two daughters Arsinoe, whom we have mentioned above, and Philotera. Philadelphus succeeded his father, and reigned in Egypt. Argæus was put to death by Philadelphus, for having formed a conspiracy against him. Of Arsinoe we have spoke already, and shall have occasion to mention her anon. All we know of Philotera is, that she gave her name to a city built in Troglodytis by one Satyrus, whom Philadelphus had sent thither to take care of his elephants†.

Ptolemy Philadelphus became, by the death of his father, Ptolemy sole master of Egypt, and the many countries we have mentioned above; and then it was that he vented his rage against Demetrius Phalereus, which he had carefully concealed during his father's life-time. We have observed above, that Ptolemy Soter was prevailed upon by his wife Berenice to disinherit the sons of Eurydice, who were the first-born, and place the crown on the head of Philadelphus her son. When Ptolemy proposed this to Demetrius, and asked his advice about the choice of a successor, that unbiaſſed counsellor is said to have, in the first place, dissuaded him from parting with the crown in his life-time, telling him, that if he once gave it a way, he would never be able to recover it, but be obliged to live like other subjects, in an intire dependence on the capricious humours of his children, which he said, would prove insupportable to a man of his years, who had been so long accustomed to command. This seasonable advice made him change his mind, and resolve to take one of his sons for his partner, instead of divesting himself of the whole power; and in this choice he advised again with Demetrius, who earnestly pressed him to prefer the children of Eurydice to those of Berenice, being moved thereunto both by his love to justice, the children of Eurydice being the first-born, and by the affection which he bore to them for the sake of Cassander his deceased friend, whose sister Eurydice was <sup>a</sup>; but Soter, tho' in all other things he willingly followed the advice of Demetrius, was prevailed upon, by the great ascendant Berenice had gained over him, not to hearken to his counsels in this important affair; but contrary to his opinion, to appoint Philadelphus his partner in the kingdom, and successor to the crown after his death. The advice given by Demetrius greatly provoked Berenice and her son; but neither of them expressed any displeasure against him till Soter was dead; and then the king commanded him to be seized, and carried, under a strong guard, to a remote fortress, to be kept there under close confinement, till he should determine what further punishment to inflict upon him; but in the mean-time, the accidental bite of an asp put an end to the life of this great man, whose extraordinary learning and other qualifications deserved a far better fate <sup>a</sup>.

* PAUS. in Attic.† STRABO, l. xvi. p. 132.

Death of Demetrius
Phalereus

Ptolemy Philadelphus marries his sister Ar-sinoe.

AFTER the death of Ptolemy Ceraunus, Arsinoe, whom he had confined to Samothrace, left the place of her banishment, and retired into Egypt to Ptolemy Philadelphus her brother, who falling in love with her, married her, after he had divorced another Arsinoe, the daughter of Lyfimachus, whom he had married on his accession to the crown <sup>b</sup>. The reason why Ptolemy parted with his first wife, was her being convicted of entering into a conspiracy against him; for Arsinoe the wife, finding that he was in love with his sister, and, on that account, neglected her, entered into a plot with Chrysippus her physician, and several others, to cut him off; but the treason being discovered, all the others, who had any hand in it, were put to death, and Arsinoe confined to a province of the Upper Egypt bordering upon Æthiopia, there to end her days, after she had brought to Philadelphus two sons and a daughter, of whom the eldest succeeded his father, and was known by the name of Euergetes. Arsinoe being thus removed, Ptolemy married the other Arsinoe his sister, who, tho' now past child-bearing, had such charms to engage his affections, that he never married any other. In the epistle which Eleazer the high-priest of the Jews wrote according to Aristeas, to Ptolemy Philadelphus, she is honoured with the title of queen, and, at the same time, called the king's sister.

<sup>a</sup> DIOG. LAERT. in Demet. CIC. de Finib. l. v. ÆLIAN Hist. Var. l. iii. c. 7. <sup>a</sup> JUSTIN. l. xvii. CIC. in orat. pro C. Rabir.

<sup>b</sup> THEOCRIT. Scholiast. PAUS. in Atticis.

THE Romans having obliged Pyrrhus king of Epirus, after a six years war, to abandon Italy, and return with disgrace into his own country, their name began to be of great fame among foreign nations ; whereupon Ptolemy Philadelphus, desiring to enter into an alliance with them, sent an embassy to Rome for that purpose. This was the first time that any Egyptians had appeared at Rome ; whence the senate was overjoyed to see foreigners come so far to court the friendship of their republic, whose dominions were yet confined within a narrow compass. As they had then scarce any thing to recommend them but their virtue, and an obliging behaviour to their allies, they did not suffer themselves to be outdone in politeness and civility ; but immediately dispatched into Egypt four ambassadors, chosen with the utmost circumspection by the senate, whose chief point in view was to maintain the reputation they had gained in a foreign court. Q. Fabius Gurgus was at the head of the embassy, and so far from being of an avaricious temper, that in his youth, he had been greatly blamed for his prodigality. His three companions were Q. Ogulinus, and two brothers of the Fabian family, being descended from that Fabius who was surnamed Pictor, or the Painter, because he had painted the temple of the goddess of health. Ogulinus indeed was a plebeian, but had enjoyed great employments. At Ptolemy's court they met with a reception suitable to their rank, and worthy of so great a prince. He gave them a splendid entertainment, and took that opportunity to present each of them with a crown of gold, which they accepted, being unwilling to disoblige him by declining the honour which he intended to confer upon them ; but the very next morning they crowned with them the statues of the king, which were erected in the public places of the city. This contempt of riches gained the Romans great reputation in Egypt ; however, the king would not suffer the ambassadors to depart without new presents, both for their republic and themselves ; but they shewed the same disinterestedness at Rome, depositing all their presents in the public treasury, before they appeared in the senate to give an account of their embassy, declaring thereby, that they desired no other advantage from the service of the public than the honour and satisfaction of discharging it well. Ptolemy, remembering twenty years after the alliance he had made with the Romans, returned the following answer to the Carthaginian ambassadors, when they desired him to lend their republic two thousand talents, which they promised to return after the war was ended which they were then engaged in with the Romans; I will assist you against enemies, or indifferent persons; but cannot, without breach of fidelity, lend one friend any aid against another d. Hence it appears, that he had made alliances with Carthage and Rome.

* LIV. l. xiv. VAL. MAX. l. iv. c. 3. DIO. in excerpt Ursini. EUTROP. l. ii. JUSTIN. l. xviii. c. 2. ZONAR. l. vii. c. 6.

*Enters into an alliance with the Lacedæmonians and Athenians against Antigonus
Gonatus.*

AFTER the death of Pyrrhus, Antigonus Gonatus king of Macedon having made himself very formidable to the states of Greece, the Athenians and Lacedæmonians entered into a confederacy against him, and prevailed upon Ptolemy to accede to it. Whereupon Antigonus laid siege to Athens; for the relief of which city Ptolemy immediately sent a fleet under the command of Patroclus, who, not being able to persuade Areus king of Lacedæmon to attack the enemy with their united forces, was obliged, for want of provisions, to sail back with his fleet to Egypt without even attempting to relieve the city. By this misunderstanding between the two commanders, the city of Athens fell into the hands of Antigonus, as we have related in the history of Greece. Patroclus having, on his return into Egypt, touched at Caunus, a maritime city of Caria, found there the poet Sotades, famous for the unbounded licence both of his muse and manners. He had wrote a virulent satire against Ptolemy, full of cutting reflections on his marriage with Arfinoe his own sister, and fled from Alexandria to avoid the indignation of the provoked prince; but Patroclus having thus met him in his flight, thought he could not better recommend himself to his master's favour, than by making an example of a wretch who had abused him in such an insolent manner; accordingly he caused him to be wrapped up in a sheet of lead, and thrown into the sea, a punishment which he well deserved<sup>e</sup> (E).

THE

<sup>d</sup> EUTROP. l. ii. OROS. l. iv. c. 9.    <sup>e</sup> ATHEN. l. xiv. p. 620.

(E.) This infamous poet is commonly known by the nickname of Sotades Cinædus, or Sotades the pederast, which was given him not only because he was notoriously addicted to that monstrous and abominable vice, but more especially for his having wrote in iambics a poem in commendation of it, which was in great repute among those, who, like himself, were addicted to that unnatural sort of lust. Some writers have, not without good grounds, in that verse of Juvenal (12), Inter Socraticos notissima fossa cinædos, instead of Socraticos, read Sotadicos, being of opinion, that this alteration in the text was made by such as were given to that vice, which, they thought, might deserve some excuse, if they could persuade the world, that Socrates, a philosopher of great credit, was addicted to it.

(12) Juvenal Satir. 2. ver. 10.

THE

THE long peace and tranquillity which Ptolemy had enjoyed, was unexpectedly disturbed by the revolt of Magas whom the king had ever looked upon as one of his best and most trusty friends. He was half-brother to him, being the son of Berenice by one Philip a Macedonian officer, who had been her husband before she married Ptolemy Soter. As Berenice had a great ascendant over the king her husband, she prevailed upon him to give the government of Libya and Cyrene to her son Magas, who, having strengthened himself in those provinces by long possession, and likewise by his marriage with Apamea the daughter of Antiochus Soter king of Syria, not only endeavoured to render himself independent in his government, but even to dispossess his brother of the kingdom of Egypt. With this view he advanced, at the head of a numerous army, towards Alexandria, and made himself master of Paratonion on his march thither; but, as he was proceeding farther, he was obliged to drop the enterprise and return home, upon certain intelligence, that the Marmarides, a people of Libya, had revolted from him. Ptolemy, who was then with a great body of troops on the frontiers of Egypt, had a favourable opportunity of falling upon him in his retreat, and utterly destroying his army; but was, by a like revolt at home, prevented from laying hold of it; for having taken into his service four thousand Gauls, he was informed that they had entered into a conspiracy, intending nothing less than to drive him out of Egypt, and seize it for themselves. To prevent this, he hastened back into Egypt, and, having drawn the conspirators into an island in the Nile, he there shut them up so effectually, that they all perished, either with famine, or with one another's swords, to avoid that lingering kind of death<sup>f</sup>. Magas had no sooner quelled the troubles which had obliged him to return home, but he renewed his designs upon Egypt, and, in order to succeed therein more effectually, he engaged in the same war Antiochus Soter his father-in-law. The measures agreed upon between them were, that Antiochus should invade the territories of Ptolemy on one side, and Magas on the other; but while the king of Syria was making the necessary preparations for this invasion, Ptolemy, who had private intelligence of his designs, sent forces into all the maritime provinces of Syria, which committed every-where such ravages and devastations, as obliged that prince to keep at home, for the defence of his own dominions; and Magas, without his assistance, did not think it adviseable to make any further attempts<sup>g</sup>.

*The revolt of Magas.
Year of
the Flood, 2736.
Before
Christ,
263.*

<sup>f</sup> PAUSAN. in Atticis.<sup>g</sup> Idem, ibid.

The advantageous measures taken by Ptolemy for the improvement of trade.

Ptolemy, being thus delivered from the apprehension of a war, bent his mind on advancing the riches of his kingdom, by drawing to it all the trade of the east, which the Tyrians had to this time carried on by sea to Elatb, and from thence, by the way of Rhinocorura, to Tyre. These were both sea-port towns. Elatb, on the east-side of the Red-sea, and Rhinocorura at the bottom of the Mediterranean, between Egypt and Palestine; so that through them all the wares of Persia, India, Africa, and Arabia centered at Tyre, and were from thence carried into all the western countries. By this means the Tyrians were grown exceeding rich, having engrossed, while subject to the Persian kings, this whole trade. To draw it into Egypt, Ptolemy built a city on the west-side of the Red-sea, from whence he sent out fleets into all those countries to which the Tyrians traded from Elatb; but, observing that the Red-sea, towards the bottom, was very dangerous, by reason of its rocks and shelves, he transferred the trade to another city, which he built at as great a distance as he could from that part of the sea, placing it almost on the frontiers of Æthiopia, and calling it, from his mother, Berenice; but the harbour not being convenient, Myos Hormos, a city in that neighbourhood, was preferred, and all the commodities of the above-mentioned countries conveyed thither by sea, and from thence on camels to Coptus on the Nile, where they were again shipped for Alexandria, and from that city dispersed all over the west, in exchange for the merchandize which was afterwards exported to the east. By this means the whole trade being fixed at Alexandria, that place became the chief mart of all the traffick that was carried on between the east and the west, and continued to be the greatest empory in the world for above seventeen hundred years, till another passage was found out by the cape of Good-hope; but as the road from Coptus to the Red-sea lay cross the deserts, where no water could be had, nor any convenience of towns or houses for the lodging of passengers, Ptolemy, to remedy both these evils, caused a canal to be opened along the great road, into which he conveyed the water of the Nile, and built on it houses at proper distances; so that all passengers found every night convenient lodgings, and necessary refreshments for themselves and their beasts of burden <sup>b</sup>. As Ptolemy intended to ingross the whole trade of the east and west to himself, he fitted out two great fleets to protect his trading subjects. One of these he kept in the Red-sea, and the other in the Mediterranean. The latter was very numerous, and had several ships of an extraordinary size; two of them in particular were of thirty oars on a side, one of twenty, four of fourteen, two of twelve, fourteen of eleven, thirty of nine, thirty seven of seven, five of six, seventeen of five, and, besides these, an incredible number of vessels with four oars and three oars on a side*. With these fleets he not only maintained and protected the trade, but also kept in subjection, as long as he lived, most of the maritime provinces of Asia Minor, namely, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> STRABO, l. xvii. p. 185. PLIN. l. vi. c. 33.

Magas, king of Cyrene and Libya, growing old and infirm, expressed a desire of composing all differences with his brother Ptolemy, and, in order to succeed therein, proposed a marriage between his only daughter Berenice and king Ptolemy's eldest son, promising to make over all his dominions to her by way of dowry. The proposal was accepted by Ptolemy, and a peace concluded on these terms<sup>k</sup>; but Magas dying before the execution of the treaty, after he had held the government of Cyrene and Libya for the space of fifty years, his wife Apamea did all that lay in her power to break off the match between her daughter and the son of Ptolemy, since it had been concluded without her consent; but her attempts proved unsuccessful, and only served to kindle a war between Ptolemy and her brother Antiochus Theus king of Syria, which occasioned a cruel tragedy in the family of the latter, as we have related in the history of Syria<sup>1</sup>.

In the heat of this war Ptolemy did not give over his search for books wherewithal to enrich his famous library, and likewise for pictures and drawings done by eminent masters, of which he was a great admirer. Aratus, the celebrated Sicyonian, was one of the agents he employed in Greece to collect pictures for him; and that great man gained his favour by this kind of service to such a degree, that the king looked upon him as one of his best friends; and, on the Sicyonian's applying to him for his assistance towards the restoring of his native city to liberty and peace, Ptolemy presented

<sup>1</sup> STRABO, ibid. THEOCRIT. Idyll. 17. APPIAN. in præfat. Athen. l. v. p. 203. <sup>k</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxvi. c. 3. <sup>1</sup> Vid. Vol. viii. p. 462.

* It is more than probable that these vessels were of so many banks of oars; for it seems nothing very extraordinary, that two of them had thirty on a side; and besides we read in the history of Syracuse, that Hiero presented one of the kings of Egypt, probably Philadelphus, with a vessel which had twenty banks of oars, and was built by the famous Archimedes.

him with an hundred and fifty talents for this purpose. The matter is thus related by Plutarch in the life of Aratus; Aratus having expelled Nicocles tyrant of Sicyon, and recalled the exiles, great disturbances arose about the restoration of their lands, which were likely to occasion new disorders, most of those lands having been transferred to other proprietors, and passed through several hands before the exiles returned. Those who had purchased them would not part with their purchase, unless the money, which they had disbursed, were paid back to them. Hereupon Aratus, having no other way to satisfy them, applied to king Ptolemy, and that generous prince immediately ordered the sum, which he required, to be transmitted to Sicyon; by which means every one being satisfied, peace and tranquillity were restored to the city <sup>m</sup>.

*A peace concluded between Ptolemy
and An-tiochus.*

THE troubles and revolutions which happened in the east, induced Antiochus to put an end to the war, which had been for some time carried on between him and Ptolemy. The particulars of this war have not been transmitted to us; but the conditions of the peace agreed to by the contending parties, are related by Polyænus*, Strabo<sup>n</sup>, Athenæus<sup>o</sup>, and St. Jerom<sup>p</sup>. One of these was, that Antiochus should divorce Laodice, marry Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and settle the crown on the male issue of that marriage. As Antiochus, though passionately fond of Laodice, submitted to these terms, we may conclude from thence, that Ptolemy had gained considerable advantages over him. As this marriage was contracted on political views, and founded on very unjust conditions, it was attended with those fatal consequences which we have related in the history of Syria<sup>q</sup>, to which we refer our readers.

As Ptolemy, was a curious collector; not only of books, but also of statues, drawings and pictures, he observed, while he was in Syria, a statue of Diana in a temple consecrated to that goddess, which he was greatly taken with; and therefore having begged it of Antiochus, carried it with him into Egypt; but soon after his return, Arsinoë his queen being seized with a dangerous distemper, dreamt, that Diana appearing to her, told her, that Ptolemy had brought the illness upon her, by removing out of her temple the abovementioned statue. Hereupon it was immediately sent back into Syria, and there replaced in the temple from whence it had been taken. It was accompanied with many rich presents, and a great many sacrifices were offered to appease the wrath of the provoked goddesses; but all to no purpose, for the queen's distemper was so far from abating, that she died of it in a very short time, leaving Ptolemy under the greatest affliction imaginable; for though she was many years older than he, and past child-bearing when he married her, yet he maintained an inexpressible affection and tenderness for her to the last, and, after her death, did all that lay in his power to perpetuate her memory, calling several cities which he built by her name, and raising obelisks to her honour, with other monuments to express the great regard he had for her<sup>r</sup>. Of these the most remarkable was a temple, which he began in Alexandria, with a dome, which was to be lined with loadstone, in order to keep an iron statue of the queen hanging in the air. This was the project of Dinocrates, a famous architect of those times, and it was no sooner proposed to the king but he commanded it to be put in execution; but before the work was compleated, both the king and the architect died; so that no experiment was made of the virtue and power of loadstones in such a case (F). Ptolemy did not long survive his beloved Arsinoe, for being originally of a tender constitution, which he had moreover weakened by a luxurious manner of life, the infirmities of old age, and the loss of a consort whom he loved beyond measure, sunk him into a languishing distemper, which put an end to his life, in the sixty third year of his age, and fortieth of his reign<sup>c</sup>. He left be-

<sup>m</sup> PLUT. in Arat. * POLYÆN. Strat. l. viii. c. 50. <sup>n</sup> STRABO, l. vii. p. 152. <sup>o</sup> ATHEN. l. ii. p. 42. <sup>p</sup> HIERONYM. in Dan. c. 11. <sup>q</sup> Vide Vol. viii. p. 465.

*Ptolemy
Philadelphus dies.*

<sup>r</sup> LIBAN. orat. 11.      <sup>c</sup> PLIN. l. xxxiv. c. 14.      ATHEN. l. xii. c. 10.

(F) Ausonius speaks of this temple as finished by the above-mentioned architect, in the following verses:

*Conditor hic forsan fuerit Ptolemaïdos aulæ Dinocrates, quadro cui in fastigia cono
Surgit, & ipsa suas consumit pyramis umbras;
Jussus ob incesti qui quondam fœdus amoris,
Arsinoen Pharii suspendit in aëre templi (13).*

It has been long since reported, and even believed by many, that the body of the impostor Mohammed was, after his death, laid in an iron coffin, and thus hung in the air by virtue of a loadstone in the roof of the room where it was deposited; but this is a mere fable without the least foundation (14).

(13) Auson. Idyll. 9.      (14) Vide Adolph. Verner. in epitom. rer. Turci car.

hind him two sons and a daughter, whom he had by his first wife Arfinoe the daughter of Lyfimachus. Ptolemy, surnamed Euergetes, the eldest of his sons, succeeded him in the kingdom; the other, called Lyfimachus from his grandfather by the mother, was put to death by his brother, for engaging in a rebellion against him. The name of the daughter was Berenice, whose marriage with Antiochus Theus king of Syria we have related above.

His character.

Ptolemy Philadelphus was without all doubt, a prince endowed with many excellent qualities, and yet we cannot propose him as a perfect model of a good king, his good qualities being counter-balanced by faults that were altogether as considerable. He dishonoured the beginning of his reign by his resentment against a man of uncommon merit, viz. Demetrius Phalereus, for having given a piece of advice to his father, which was indeed contrary to the interest of Philadelphus, but intirely agreeable to the laws of justice and equity. He put two of his brothers to death, having, as some writers tell us, forged plots in order to give some colour of justice to his blind jealousy, which alone prompted him to embrue his hands in their blood; and hence he was ironically called Philadelphus, or a lover of his brothers. He was greatly given to all sorts of effeminate pleasures, and entirely neglected all kind of military discipline, by which neglect he left the army in a very bad condition, and quite unfit for action. On the other hand, as he was himself a prince of great learning, he was a zealous promoter and encourager of it in others, an industrious collector of books, and a generous patron of all those, who were eminent in any branch of literature. The fame of his generosity drew seven celebrated poets to his court<sup>1</sup>; who, from their number, were called the Pleiades, which are seven stars in the neck of the bull. These were Aratus, Theocritus, Callimachus, Lycophron, Apollonius, Nicander and Philicus. Theocritus wrote an idyllium, and Callimachus an hymn in praise of Philadelphus, which have reached our times. In his court flourished likewise Aristarchus, a learned grammarian, Manetho the famous Egyptian historian, Conon and Hipparchus, two celebrated mathematicians, Zenodotus of Ephesus, the first who corrected Homer's works, as Suidas informs us, and Aristophanes, who, if Vitruvius is to be credited, read over all the books of the Alexandrian library, in the order they stood<sup>2</sup>. Zoilus the critic came also to his court, and lived some time at Alexandria. He had wrote against Homer, whose works were highly esteemed and admired by all except himself, and had likewise criticised, in a very biting stile, the works of other eminent writers; whence his name grew so infamous, that it was afterwards given by way of reproach to all detracting and ill-natured critics; but though he was very eminent in his way, and far excelled in criticism all who had flourished before him, this could not reconcile Ptolemy to him, who is said indeed to have admired his wit, but at the same time, to have been so offended at the bitterness of his stile, that he would not bestow any thing upon him, though he shewed a truly royal generosity towards all other writers of any wit or learning. Being therefore abhorred by all men, and not relieved by Ptolemy, he died in a miserable manner. Some say he was stoned by the enraged multitude; others that he was burnt alive in his house; and some that he was crucified by Ptolemy for a crime which well deserved that punishment<sup>u</sup>. We have already taken notice of his extraordinary taste for books, and of his indefatigable industry in augmenting and embellishing, at an immense charge, the library founded by his father; a work which has rendered the names of both these princes more famous than the greatest conquests could have done. To Ptolemy Philadelphus we are indebted for the Greek translation of the scripture, commonly called the septuagint, of which we shall give a particular account in the history of the Jews, as in a more proper place. This prince is likewise said to have maintained, at a vast expence, and sent into different parts of the world, skilful persons, in search of all sorts of wild beasts, and by that means to have made a great many new discoveries relating to the nature of animals<sup>w</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Vide Vossium. de histor. Græc. l. i. c. 12.      <sup>2</sup> Vitruv. in præfat. ad lib. vii.

THO' Philadelphus had a peculiar taste for the sciences, yet he did not suffer them to engross his whole attention, but applied himself with indefatigable industry to business, studying all possible methods to render his subjects happy, and raise his dominions to a flourishing condition. This enticed great multitudes of the neighbouring and most distant nations to leave their native countries, and settle in Egypt; insomuch that this prince is said to have had in his dominions no fewer than thirty three thousand three hundred and thirty nine well peopled cities<sup>x</sup>. As he was well apprised that the real power of a prince consists in the number and wealth of his subjects, the greatest expences were not capable of discouraging him from pursuing such measures as were most apt to draw inhabitants into his dominions. With this view he built an incredible number of cities, and repaired others, granting many valuable privileges to all, without distinction, who came to settle in them. Among the latter were the two famous cities of Palestine, Ace, which he rebuilt on the west-side of that country, and Rabbah of the children of Ammon, so often mentioned in scripture, on the east-side of the same province. Ace he called from one of his names Ptolemais, and Rabbah from the other Philadelphia. The former of these, which is still standing, in process of time recovered its antient name, and is often spoke of in the history of the holy wars<sup>y</sup>. Besides cities, he left so many other public monuments of his magnificence, that all works of an extraordinary taste and grandeur were proverbially called Philadelphian works<sup>z</sup>. Athenæus calls him the best of kings, and the most wealthy prince of his age<sup>a</sup>; and truly he died possessed of immense riches, notwithstanding the great expence he must have been at; for he kept two great fleets, one in the Mediterranean, and the other in the Red-sea, and maintained in constant pay an army of two hundred thousand foot, and 40,000 horse, and had three hundred elephants, two thousand armed chariots, and his armory at Alexandria stocked with three hundred thousand complete suits of armour, and all other necessary implements and engines of war; but, for all this, he left in his treasury seven hundred and fifty thousand Egyptian talents in ready money, which reduced to our coin, amounts to a prodigious and almost incredible sum, each Egyptian talent containing seven thousand five hundred drachmas more than an Attic talent<sup>b</sup>. Athenæus therefore called him, not without reason, the richest of all the princes of his age; and Appian gives him this character, viz. that as he was the most magnificent and generous of all kings in laying out his money, so was he of all the most skilful and industrious in raising of it<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> VITUV. ibid. & VOSSIVS. de historic. Græc. l. i. c. 15.

<sup>w</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. l. xvii.

<sup>x</sup> THEOCRIT. Idyll. 17.

Ptolemy
Euergetes.
Year of
the Flood, 2755.
Before
Christ,
244.

HE was succeeded by his eldest son Ptolemy, who, in the beginning of his reign, engaged in a war with Antiochus Theus king of Syria, of which we have given a distinct account

<sup>y</sup> Vide RE LAND. Palestin. illustrat. SANDYS, THEVENOT, &c.
<sup>z</sup> PHILO in vita Mosis.      <sup>a</sup> ATHEN. l. v. c. 5.      <sup>b</sup> Vide BEARNARD. de mensur. & ponder. antiquorum, p. 186. & tabulam
huic operi præfixam.      <sup>c</sup> APPIAN. in præfat.

in the history of that country<sup>d</sup>. On his return from that war, he brought with him out of Syria two thousand five hundred pictures and statues, among which were many of the Egyptian idols, which had been carried by Cambyfes, when he conquered Egypt, into Persia. These Ptolemy restored to their antient temples ; in acknowledgment for which favour the Egyptians gave him the glorious surname of Euergetes, or the Beneficent<sup>e</sup>. In this expedition he made himself master of all the countries that lie between mount Taurus and the confines of India, as we read in Justin <sup>f</sup>, Ap- Ptolemy gains great advantages over the king of Syria. pian <sup>g</sup>, Polybius <sup>h</sup>, Jerom, &c. <sup>i</sup>, with whom the monument of Euergetes called monumentum adulitanum, and published at Rome by the celebrated Leo Allatius in 1631 intirely agrees. The words quoted by that writer from the said monument are as follow : Ptolemy Euergetes having received from his father the sovereignty of Egypt, Libya, Syria, Phœnice, Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades, assembled a mighty army of horse and foot, with a great fleet, and elephants, out of Trogloditica and Æthiopia, some of which had been taken by his father, and the rest by himself, and brought from thence, and trained up for war. With this great force he sailed into Asia, and having conquered all the provinces which lie on this side the Euphrates, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Ionia, the Hellespont and Thrace, he crossed that river with all the forces of the conquered countries, and the kings of those nations, and reduced Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Susia, Persia, Media, and all the country as far as Bactria.

WHEN Ptolemy Euergetes first set out on his expedition into Syria, his queen Berenice, who tenderly loved him, being apprehensive of the dangers to which he might be exposed in the war, made a vow to consecrate her hair, which was her chief ornament, in case he should return safe. The prince returned not only safe, but crowned with glory and success ; whereupon Berenice, to discharge her vow, immediately cut off her hair, and dedicated it to the gods, in the temple which Ptolemy Philadelphus had built in honour of his beloved Arsinoe, under the name of the Zephyrian Venus, on the promontory of Zephyrium in Cyprus ; but this consecrated hair being lost soon after, or perhaps contemptuously flung away by the priests, Ptolemy was much offended at this accident, and threatened to punish the priests for their neglect. Hereupon Conon of Samos, a flattering courtier, and great mathematician, to appease the king's wrath, and gain his favour, gave out, that the queen's locks had been conveyed up to heaven, and pointed out seven stars near the tail of the lion, which, till that time, had not belonged to any constellation, declaring, that they were the queen's hair. Several other astronomers, either to make their court, as well as Conon, to the king, or out of fear of drawing upon themselves his displeasure, affirmed the same thing; and hence coma Berenices, or the hair of Berenice, became one of the constellations, and is so to this day <sup>k</sup>. Callimachus, who lived in those times, and had been a great favourite of Ptolemy Philadelphus, wrote a hymn on the hair of Berenice, which was afterwards translated by Catullus, whose version is still extant among his other most elegant performances.

<sup>d</sup> Vid. Vol. VIII. p46. 2.    <sup>e</sup> Hieron. in Dan. c 11. & monument. Adulitan.    <sup>f</sup> Justin. l. xxvii. c. 1.    <sup>g</sup> Appian. in Syriac. p. 130.    <sup>h</sup> Polyn. l. v. p. 402.    <sup>i</sup> Hieron. ibid.

Euergetes offers sacrifices to the God of Israel. Ptolemy, on his return from this expedition, having passed through Jerusalem, offered there many sacrifices to the God of Israel, in acknowledgment for the victories he had gained over the king of Syria <sup>l</sup>, shewing thereby, that he preferred the true god to all the idols of Egypt. Perhaps the prophecies of Daniel had been shewn to him, whence it was obvious for him to conclude, that his fortunate conquests were owing to that God, whose prophet had so fully and distinctly foretold them. Of these prophecies we have spoke in the history of Syria, to which we refer the reader <sup>m</sup>.

Applies himself to the improving of his library. Euergetes having at last concluded a peace with Seleucus king of Syria, who had succeeded Antiochus Theus in that kingdom, devoted most part of his time to the cultivating of the sciences, and the improving of his father's library at Alexandria. With this view he sent persons of learning into distant countries, to purchase, at any rate, what books they should think proper for his design; but as a skillful librarian was necessary for the making a good choice, and likewise for the preserving of them after they were lodged in the library, upon the death of Zenodotus, who had exercised that function from the time of Ptolemy Soter, he invited from Athens Eratosthenes (G) the Cyrenian, who was a man of universal learning,
to

<sup>k</sup> HYGINI. poetic. astronom. & NONUS in histor. synag.
<sup>l</sup> JOSEPH. in Apion. l. ii. <sup>m</sup> Vol. VIII. p. 466, O.

(G) Eratosthenes had been educated by Callimachus his countryman, and is often quoted by Pliny, Strabo and others, as a man of extraordinary learning; and therefore those are greatly mistaken, who finding him called Beta, that is, the second, think he had that name to denote, that he was not in the first, but in the second to take this charge upon him, which he did accordingly, and acquitted himself in it with great applause <sup>n</sup>

Onias the high-priest of the Jews, being of a very covetous temper, had neglected to send to Ptolemy the usual tribute of twenty talents, which his predecessors had annually paid to the kings of Egypt, as a token of their subjection to the crown. As the arrears amounted to a great sum, the king sent Athenion, one of his courtiers to Jerusalem to demand the payment of the money, and to acquaint the Jews, if they did not comply immediately with the demand, that he was determined to send a body of troops into Judæa, who should drive them out of the country, and divide it among themselves. When Athenion arrived at Jerusalem with this message, the whole city was thrown into the utmost consternation, not knowing how to appease the king's wrath, and divert the impending storm. At that time Joseph, the nephew of Onias by his sister, was in great repute among the Jews for his prudence, justice, and the sanctity of his life. To him therefore his mother had recourse, and as he was in the country when Athenion came to Jerusalem, she took care to dispatch a messenger to him, with an account of what happened. Hereupon he hastened to Jerusalem, where he severely upbraided his uncle with his ill management of the public money, and told him, that since he had brought the nation into such difficulties, the only expedient he could find second class of the learned; for by that appellation nothing else was meant, but that he was the second librarian of the royal library at Alexandria. As to his knowledge in all the branches of literature, he was inferior to none of the age he lived in, as appears from the great encomiums bestowed by the ancients on the many books he wrote; but none of his works have reached us, except his catalogue of the kings of Thebes in Egypt, with the years of their respective reigns, from Menes, who first peopled Egypt after the deluge, to the time of the Trojan war. It contains a series of thirty eight kings reigning in a direct line of succession one after another, and is still extant in Syncellus. We have made use of it in settling the Egyptian chronology, it being one of the most noble, venerable, and authentic monuments of antiquity now extant, extracted out of the most antient records of that country. This extract was in all likelihood made to supply the defect of Arianetho, whose catalogue of the Theban kings begins where this ends (15).

The reputation of Joseph nephew of Onias, with Ptolemy.

<sup>n</sup> SUIDAS in voce ΑΠΠΟΛΛΟΝΙΟΥ.

(15) Vide Voss. de histor. Græc. Syncell. p. 91—147. Johan. Marsham. in canon. chron.

out

out to avert the calamities that threatened them, was, that he should go in person to the Egyptian court, and endeavour, by applying to the king himself, to make up matters. But Onias, who was a man of no parts, and besides stricken in years, declared to his nephew, that he would chuse rather to divest himself of the high-priesthood, and live a private life, than undertake such a journey, and appear at court. Joseph therefore, who was a young man of extraordinary parts, and great address, offered to go in his stead; which Onias consenting to with great pleasure, Joseph having assembled the people, acquainted them, that he had been appointed by the high-priest ambassador to the court of Egypt, and assured them, that, if they thought fit to confirm him in this charge, he should soon, by some means or other, deliver them from their present fears. The people, with loud shouts of joy, approved the appointment of the high-priest, returned Joseph thanks for what he intended to do in their behalf, and desired him to proceed without delay to the court of Egypt. Hereupon Joseph went immediately to invite Athenion to his house, where he not only entertained him with great kindness and splendor, all the time he staid at Jerusalem, but on his departure, made him very considerable presents, which the Syrian was so pleased with, that he left Jerusalem, fully determined to do all that lay in his power in behalf of the Jews, and to represent matters to the king in the best light the case would bear. Accordingly, on his return to Alexandria, he made so favourable a report to the king of his transactions at Jerusalem, and of the kind and obliging deportment of Joseph, that Ptolemy shewed a great desire to see him. In the mean time Joseph, having borrowed twenty thousand drachmas of the Samaritans, which amount to about seven hundred pounds of our money, and thereby furnished himself with an equipage to appear at the Egyptian court, set out for Alexandria, and having met on his way thither several of the chief nobility of Cæle-Syria and Palestine, who were travelling to the same place, he joined them in the remaining part of his journey. Their business at that court was, to offer terms for farming the revenues of those provinces; and as their equipages were very magnificent, they laughed at Joseph for the meanness of his, making it the subject of their diversion most part of the way. Joseph took all in good part, but in the mean time hearkening to the conversation they had with each other about their business at court, he got such an insight into it, as put him in a condition to laugh at them in his turn. On their arrival at Alexandria, they

they found, that the king had taken a progress to Memphis, and Joseph was the only person among them who set out for that city to wait on him. As he was hastening thither, he had the good fortune to meet him returning from Memphis, with the queen and Athenion in the same chariot. The king, who had heard great commendations of him from Athenion, was overjoyed to see him; and, taking him into his chariot, complained to him in a friendly manner of his uncle Onias, who had, for several years, neglected to pay him the usual tribute. But Joseph excused his uncle on account of his great age and slender parts in so handsome a manner, that he not only satisfied the king, but raised in him such an opinion of his abilities, that he took him into his favour, allowed him an apartment in the royal palace, and entertained him at his own table. When the day came, whereon the king used annually to farm out the revenues of the several provinces of his empire, and they were set up, in order to be let to the best bidder, the Syrians and Phœnicians, who had been Joseph's fellow-travellers, offered no more than eight thousand talents for the provinces of Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, Judæa, and Samaria. Hereupon Joseph, who had discovered from their conversation on the road, that they were worth more than double the sum they offered, reproached them for depreciating the king's revenues in that manner, and proffered sixteen thousand talents, besides the forfeitures, which he proposed to return into the king's treasury, tho' they had ever before belonged to the farmers. Ptolemy was well pleased to see his revenues so considerably increased; but questioning the ability of the bidder to make good his engagement, asked him what security he could give him for the performance of his agreement. To this question Joseph answered, that he would give him the security of such persons as he could not refuse or except against; and when he was ordered to name them, he named the king and the queen, adding, that they would be bound to each other for the faithful performance of what he undertook. The king was so taken with the pleasantry of this answer, that he trusted him on his own word, without any other security. Hereupon Joseph, having borrowed at Alexandria five hundred talents to pay the king his uncle's arrears, was admitted to the trust of receiver-general of all the revenues in the above-mentioned provinces; and having received a guard of two thousand men, to support him in the execution of his office, he left Alexandria, in order to act in his new station. On his arrival at Askelon, the inhabitants of that city not only refused to pay him the king's duties, but abused him with rude and opprobrious language. Whereupon having ordered his guards to apprehend the ringleaders of that tumult, he caused twenty of them to be immediately executed, and sent their forfeited estates, which amounted to a thousand talents, to the king. The same rigour he practised at Scythopolis, where he had met with the like opposition; which so terrified the rest of the cities, that they all opened their gates to him, and readily paid the king's dues: His prudent conduct, and the punctuality of his payments, gained him such favour at court, that he was continued in his office by Ptolemy Euergetes, Ptolemy Philopator, and Ptolemy Epiphanes, for the space of two and twenty years, that is, till Antiochus the Great making himself master of these provinces, annexed them to the crown of Syria, which happened in the first year of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes°. Most authors write, that he continued in this office to his death; but herein they plainly contradict Josephus, who tells us, that he died very old; nay, that he was of a great age when he sent his son Hyrchanus into Egypt, which happened some years before his death<sup>p</sup>; and on the other hand says, that he was a young man when he first entered upon this employment<sup>q</sup>. Now, if he was young at that time, he could not be old twenty-two years after; for allowing him to have been thirty when he was raised to that employment, two and twenty more would make him but fifty-two; at which age he could not be called an old man, and much less before it. After Antiochus had held the provinces of Cœle-Syria and Palestine several years; he is said to have restored them again to Epiphanes, on his marrying his daughter Cleopatra. Perhaps Joseph was then restored to his office, and died in it, being at that time, as Josephus tells us, very old. This, if true, would clear up all the difficulties which some writers have started against the account Josephus gives us of this matter.

Ptolemy's conquests.

Ptolemy, having concluded a peace with Seleucus king of Syria, applied himself to the enlarging of his dominions southward, and was therein attended with great success; for he made himself master of all the coasts of the Red-sea, both on the Arabian and Æthiopian sides, down to the streights, through which that sea discharges itself into the southern ocean. The cities and provinces which he subdued in this glorious expedition were, according to Leo Allatius in his monumentum Adulitanum, Agama, ° JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 12. c. 3. & Græc. Euseb. Scalig. p. 50.

<sup>p</sup> Idem ibid. c. 4.      <sup>q</sup> Idem ibid.

Sigfiene, Tiamus, Gambela, Maga, Zingabe, Angavis, Tiamma, Athagotis, Calea, Semena, Lazinezaa, Bega, Thancaitis, &c. Most of these provinces bordered upon Æthiopia, and, as they were under no apprehension of an invasion, Ptolemy, without much loss or trouble, reduced them, and, having garisoned the fortified towns, returned to Alexandria with an immense booty, which he generously divided among the soldiers who had attended him in that expedition<sup>r</sup>. Upon his return, the Cleomenic war being kindled in Greece, the Achæans sent embassadors to him, imploring his assistance against the Ætolians and Lacedæmonians, which he readily promised them; but they having, in the mean time, engaged Antigonus king of Macedon to support them, Ptolemy was so much offended at these proceedings, Assists that he sent powerful succours to Cleomenes king of Sparta, Cleome- hoping by that means to humble both the Achæans and their ner king of new ally Antigonus; but he had the mortification to see Cleomenes, after he had gained very considerable advantages over the enemy's united forces, intirely defeated in the famous Sparta, a- battle of Selasia, and obliged to take refuge in his dominions. gainst An- Phylarchus writes, that, about ten days before this battle, tigonus there arrived in Greece embassadors from Ptolemy to Cleomenes, Dolon and acquainting him, that their master had no mind to send him the Achæ- any further supplies of money, and advising him, in his name, ans. to come to a speedy agreement with Antigonus and the Achæans; and that thereupon Cleomenes, tho' encamped in a very advantageous post, challenged Antigonus to an engagement in the open field<sup>s</sup>. Be that as it will, Ptolemy received him with all possible demonstrations of kindness and esteem, allowed him a yearly pension of four and twenty talents, and assured him, that in due time he would use his utmost efforts to replace him on the throne. But Ptolemy, before he could His death fulfil his promise, died in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, and cha- and was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philopator<sup>t</sup>. Ptolemy rafter.

Euergetes was a no less generous encourager of learning than his father and grandfather had been; for he applied himself with the same care and attention to the enlarging of his library, and purchasing of books at an immense charge, invited with ample rewards to his court all those who were of any note for their learning, and took great pleasure in improving his own knowledge by their conversation; for he was himself, as Athenæus informs us<sup>u</sup>, well versed in all the branches of learning, having been brought up by the famous Aristarchus, and he even wrote in his youth historical commentaries, which were in great repute. He was the last of his race, in whom any virtue, humanity, or moderation appeared; those who succeeded him being destitute of all true virtue, and plunged in all manner of vice, as we shall see in the sequel of this history. We are told by Tacitus, that, in this king's reign a phoenix was seen at Heliopolis in Egypt, drawing after her great flocks of other birds, which were taken with her beauty <sup>w</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> LEO ALLAT. in monument. Adulitan.      <sup>s</sup> Vide POLYB. l. 2. versus finem.      <sup>t</sup> PLUT. in Cleom. POLYB. l. ii. p. 155.

<sup>u</sup> ATHEN. l. ii. c. 33.

Ptolemy Philopator.

Year of
the Flood, 2782.
Before
Christ,
217.

Puts his brother Magas
to death.

Ptolemy Philopator, the son of Ptolemy Euergetes and Berenice, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Egypt, and proved a most debauched and wicked prince. Justin tells us, that he was ironically called Philopator, that is, Lover of his father, because he murdered him, in order the sooner to ascend the throne <sup>x</sup>. But upon what authority Justin affirms this, we know not; Polybius, who flourished soon after the reign of this prince, tells us, that Ptolemy Euergetes fell sick and died, without mentioning any violence used either by his son or others <sup>y</sup>. It is certain, that this Ptolemy, on several coins which have reached us, bears the title of Philopator; and who can believe, that, if it had been given him by antiphrasis, or a contrary meaning, as Justin will have it, he would have suffered it to be impressed on his coins, and transmitted to posterity? He was also surnamed Tryphon, from the effeminate life he led, and Gallus, because he used to walk about the streets on the Bacchanal solemnities, or feasts of Bacchus, with a crown of ivy on his head, after the manner of the Galli, or priests of the goddess Cybele <sup>z</sup>. In the very beginning of his reign, he caused his brother Magas to be murdered, being prompted thereto by Sosibius his prime minister, who represented Magas as a man of great interest in the army, who might one day raise troubles in the kingdom, and even, with the assistance of the foreign troops, who served in Egypt, and were intirely at his devotion, place the crown on his own head <sup>a</sup>. The death of Magas was soon followed by that of Cleomenes king of Sparta. That prince, being driven out of Greece by Antigonus, as we have related above, had fled to Ptolemy Euergetes, and had been kindly received by him. But Philopator treated him in a very different manner, especially after he had got rid of his brother Magas, who gave him no small umbrage. As Cleomenes was generally ef-

<sup>w</sup> TACIT. Annal. l. vi.

<sup>x</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxix. c. i.

<sup>y</sup> POLYB. l. ii. versus finem.

<sup>z</sup> PLUT. in Cleom. POLYB. l. v.

<sup>a</sup> TROG. in prolog. PLIN. l. vii.

<sup>b</sup> POLYB. l. v. p. 380—382.

teemed a man of great wisdom and sagacity, Sofibius, who was Ptolemy's prime minister, employed him in the beginning of that prince's reign, and admitted him into his most secret counsels, even imparting to him his design of cutting off Magas, and asking his advice about it. Cleomenes did all that lay in his power to dissuade the king from such an attempt, telling him, that he had not in his court a more zealous person for his service, nor one who was more capable of assisting him with good advice in the well-governing of his kingdom. This quieted Ptolemy for some time, but his fears and jealousies being revived by the artful Sofibius, Magas, notwithstanding the advice of Cleomenes, was cut off; and the king, after his death, thinking himself secure, devoted all his time to pleasures and diversions, not suffering them to be interrupted by cares or application of any kind. His example was followed by the courtiers, who abandoned themselves to all manner of vice and licentiousness; so that, all business being neglected, the kingdom fell, as it were into a kind of anarchy. In the mean time Cleomenes, who led a very melancholy life at so vicious a court, received advice, that Antigonus king of Macedon was dead, that the Achæans were engaged in a war with the Ætolians, and that the Lacedæmonians had joined the latter against the Achæans and Macedonians. As he was not able to bear any longer the dissolute manners of the Egyptians, and all things seemed to recal him to his native country, he represented to the king the state of his affairs, and put him in mind of his former promises; for Ptolemy had promised, while he apprehended the power of his brother Magas, to send him back into Greece with a powerful fleet, and restore him to his kingdom. Finding that Ptolemy would not grant him his request, he desired him at least to give him and his followers leave to depart, since he could not hope for a more favourable conjuncture, than that which now offered, for the recovery of his kingdom. But Ptolemy was too much taken up with his pleasures to come to any resolution touching the request of Cleomenes. Sofibius, who governed the kingdom with an absolute sway, while the king was immersed in pleasures and debauches, having assembled his friends to deliberate on the request of Cleomenes, it was concluded in that council, that the king of Sparta should not only be denied the succours he demanded, but even leave to depart the kingdom. As Antigonus was dead, and Cleomenes had no rival in Greece who could withstand him, they were afraid, lest he should invade Egypt, after having recovered his own dominions; for he was thoroughly acquainted with the state of their affairs, and had the king and his ministers in the utmost contempt.

His base treatment of Cleomenes king of Sparta.

On

On these considerations it was not thought proper to grant Cleomenes the assistance he desired, or even to permit him to leave Egypt. For, as he was a bold and enterprizing prince, and had been refused the succours he demanded, they did not doubt, but he would one day or other, if allowed to return to his kingdom, revenge the affront which had been put upon him. Sosibius was even of opinion, that he should not be allowed his liberty in Alexandria; and accordingly by the king's orders he was seized, and kept under confinement, as we have related in the history of Sparta, till, in concert with his friends who used to visit him, he came to a resolution, which despair alone could suggest; this was to escape out of prison with all his domestics and friends, and to stir up the people of Alexandria to shake off the yoke they groaned under. But not succeeding in this attempt, he and his followers closed it by a tragical and bloody catastrophe, killing one another to avoid a more cruel and ignominious death <sup>b</sup>. For a more full account of the unhappy end of this great prince, we refer the reader to our history of Sparta. The king caused his body to be flayed, and hung up upon a cross, sentencing at the same time to death his mother Cratiselea, his children, and all the women who attended them <sup>c</sup>.

Antiochus king of Syria, who was afterwards from his conquests surnamed the great, taking advantage of Euergetes's death, and the succession of so voluptuous and profligate a prince, undertook the recovering of Cæle-Syria, Palestine, and Judæa, which had formerly belonged to Seleucus Nicator and some of his successors. But, as we have already given a distinct account of this war <sup>d</sup>, we shall only observe here, that Ptolemy, notwithstanding the advantages gained over Antiochus, being desirous of putting an end to a war which interrupted his voluptuous pleasures, concluded a peace with Antiochus, when he might with great ease have driven him quite out of Syria. The discontent which followed hereon, throughout the whole kingdom of Egypt, broke soon out into an open rebellion; and thus Ptolemy, by avoiding a war abroad, kindled one in his own dominions <sup>e</sup>. And indeed, that there was such a war, Polybius tells us in express terms <sup>f</sup>; but neither he, nor any other author, gives us an account of the event of it. All we know is, that Ptolemy continued to enjoy the same power and authority which he had before the civil war broke out; whence it is plain, that he mastered this difficulty, and got the better of the rebels. In whose favour the Jews declared, is no-where recorded ; but Eusebius tells us <sup>8</sup>, that about this time forty thousand of them were cut off and destroyed, very likely during these intestine broils ; for at this time they were very numerous in Egypt.

<sup>b</sup> PLUT. in Cleom. & POLYB. l. v.      <sup>c</sup> PLUT. ibid.      <sup>d</sup> Vide Vol. VIII. p. 484.      <sup>e</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxx. c. i. HIERONYM. in Dan. c. ii.      <sup>f</sup> POLYB. l. v. p. 414.

Ptolemy, being highly provoked against the Jews for their obstructing his entrance into the temple, as we have related in the history of Syria, began on his return to Alexandria to vent his rage upon such of the Jewish nation as lived in that metropolis. In the first place he published a decree, which he caused to be engraved on a pillar erected for that purpose at the gate of his palace, excluding all those who did not sacrifice to the gods he worshipped. By this means the Jews were debarred from suing to him for justice, or obtaining his protection, in what case soever they might stand in need of it. We have observed elsewhere, that the Jews, by the favour of Alexander the Great and Ptolemy Soter, enjoyed at Alexandria the same privileges as the Macedonians, and were enrolled among those of the first rank ; for the inhabitants of that great metropolis were divided into three ranks or classes ; in the first were the Macedonians, the original founders of the city ; in the second the mercenaries, who had served under Alexander ; and in the third the native Egyptians. Now Ptolemy, to be revenged on the Jews, ordered by another decree, that they should be degraded from the first rank, in which they had been from the founding of the city, and inrolled among the common people of Egypt, who were of the third rank ; by this decree they were stript at once of all the rights and privileges, which had prompted them to leave their native country, and settle in Egypt. But this was not the greatest grievance ; for in the same decree it was enacted, that all the Jews at an appointed time should appear before the proper officers, in order to be inrolled among the common people ; that at the time of their inrolment they should have the mark of an ivy leaf, the badge of Bacchus, impressed with a hot iron on their faces ; that all, who were thus marked, should be made slaves ; and finally, that if any one should stand out against this decree, he should be immediately put to death. But that he might not seem an enemy to the whole nation, he declared, that those who sacrificed to his gods should enjoy their former privileges, and remain in the same class. Notwithstanding this tempting offer, three hundred only, out of many thousands, of the Jewish race who lived in Alexandria, were prevailed upon to abandon their religion in compliance with the king's will. The others chose rather to be stigmatized in the manner the king had ordered, or to redeem themselves from that ignominious mark by parting with all they had to the king's officers. Those who continued in the religion of their forefathers excluded their fallen brethren from all manner of communication with them, expressing thereby the abhorrence they had of their apostacy. This their enemies construed as done in opposition to the king's order, which so enraged Ptolemy, that he resolved to extirpate the whole nation, beginning with the Jews who lived in Alexandria and other parts of Egypt, and then proceeding with the same severity against the inhabitants of Judæa and Jerusalem. Pursuant to this resolution, he commanded all the Jews, who lived in any part of Egypt, to be brought in chains to Alexandria, and there to be shut up in the hippodrome, which was a very spacious place without the city, where the people used to assemble to see horse-races and other public shows. When news was brought him that all the Jews, who lived in Egypt, were, agreeable to his order, confined within the hippodrome, he sent for Hermon, master of the elephants, and ordered him to have five hundred of them ready against the next day to be let loose upon the prisoners in the hippodrome. But, when the elephants were prepared for the execution and the people assembled in great crowds to see it, they were all disappointed for that day by the king's absence. For, having been late up the night before with some of his drunken and debauched companions, he did not awake the next day, till the time for the show was over, and the spectators returned to their respective homes. He therefore ordered one of his servants to call him the day following betimes, that the people might not meet with a second disappointment. But when the person appointed awaked him, he was not yet returned to his senses, having a little before withdrawn exceeding drunk; and therefore not remembering the order he had given, flew into a violent passion, threatening the person, who spoke to him of it; which caused the show to be put off to the third day. In the mean time the Jews, who continued shut up in the hippodrome, ceased not to offer up prayers to the Almighty for their deliverance, which he accordingly granted them. For on the third day, when the king was present and the elephants brought forth and let loose upon the prisoners, those fierce animals, instead of falling upon the Jews, turned their rage upon the spectators and soldiers, who assisted at the execution, and destroyed great numbers of them; which, with other appearances seen in the air, so terrified the king, that he commanded the

<sup>8</sup> EUSEB. in Chron.

The Jews miraculously delivered.

Jews

Jews to be immediately set at liberty, acknowledged the power of the God they worshipped, and, to appease his anger, restored his people to the full enjoyment of their former privileges, bestowing upon them besides many favours, and loading them with presents at their departure; for the king not only allowed them to return to their respective homes, but would himself bear the charges of their journey. The Jews seeing themselves thus restored to the king's favour, demanded and obtained leave of him to put all those of their own nation to death who had abandoned their religion; which permission they soon made use of without sparing a single man <sup>h</sup>. This miraculous deliverance is related at length in the third book of the Maccabees, which Phloftorgius, in the beginning of his ecclesiastical history, calls the book of miracles. Josephus gives us no account of this whole matter in his antiquities; but we find it mentioned in the Latin edition, which Ruffinus published; of his second book against Apion; as for the Greek original, it is there wanting. According to Ruffinus's version, this miraculous deliverance was effected in the reign of Ptolemy Physcon, many years after the time in which we have placed it agreeable to the history of the Maccabees; where this persecution, and the deliverance of the Jews is related at length, as happening in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator, immediately on his return from Syria, after the famous victory gained by him at Raphia over Antiochus, of which we have spoke elsewhere <sup>i</sup>.

ABOUT this time, the ninth year of Philopator's reign, The Romans sent M. Atilius and M. Acilius to Alexandria, <sup>mans send</sup> to renew their ancient friendship and alliance with Egypt; <sup>an embassy</sup> for they were then engaged in a war with Carthage. The <sup>to Philopator</sup> ambassadors carried as a present to the king a purple tunic and an ivory chair, and to the queen a purple robe finely embroidered with a scarf of the same colour. This queen <sup>Year of the Flood;</sup> is called by Justin Eurydice; by Livy in this place Cleopatra <sup>2791.</sup> <sup>Before</sup> and by Polybius <sup>1</sup> and the author of the third book of the Maccabees, Arfinoe. Not long after this embassy, Decius Magius, an illustrious Capuan, greatly attached to the interest of Rome, being seized by Hannibal, and put on board a vessel in order to be conveyed to Carthage, was by a storm driven into the port of Cyrene, a city belonging to the king of Egypt, and there by Philopator's order was taken out of the hands of his enemies, conducted to Alexandria, and kindly received by the king, who gave him leave to return either to Capua or Rome ; but he chose to continue in Egypt, where he lived under the protection of his deliverer <sup>m</sup>. Ptolemy willingly embraced this opportunity of obliging the Romans ; and, by protecting their friend, testified his gratitude for the presents they had sent to him and his queen.

<sup>h</sup> MACCAB. l. iii. c. 2, 3, 4, 5.<sup>i</sup> Vide Vol. VIII. p. 439.<sup>k</sup> LIV. l. xxvii.<sup>1</sup> POLYB. l. v.

Arfinoe
brings him
a son.

Arfinoe, who was both wife and sister to Ptolemy, after having been barren for several years, brought him at last a son, who was surnamed Epiphanes or the illustrious, and succeeded his father when but five years of age. His birth occasioned great rejoicings all over Egypt, and the neighbouring provinces subject to that crown. Most persons of distinction in Syria and Phaenice went up to Alexandria to congratulate the king on that occasion, and among the rest Hyrchanus the son of Joseph, the king's receiver general, of whose transactions at the court of Egypt we shall have occasion to speak in the history of the Jews. But, in the mean time, the king, pursuing his old course of life, gave himself up to riots, pleasures, and excesses of every kind. Drinking, gaming, and lasciviousness, were the whole employments of his life. Sosibius, an old and crafty minister, who had served under three kings, managed the affairs of state, in which by his long experience he was thoroughly versed, not indeed in the manner he desired, but as the favourites would permit him ; for he was subservient to the king and his worthless favourites in all their vilest designs. While things were thus managed, Arfinoe was little regarded by the king, his minister, and the other courtiers ; which she not being able to bear, spared neither her clamours nor complaints on all occasions, which much offending the king, and those who governed him, orders were given to Sosibius to rid them of her. The wicked minister complied with their request, employing for that purpose one Philammon, who had been used to such cruel and barbarous assassinations <sup>n</sup>. She had shewed on all occasions an extraordinary affection for her husband, accompanied him in his wars with Antiochus king of Syria, and not only encouraged his soldiers before the famous battle of Raphia, but continued by him the whole time of the engagement, exposing herself to the same dangers <sup>o</sup>. Upon her death the king fell in love with one Agathoclea, a woman of mean extraction, and was entirely go-

He murders his wife
Arfinoe.

<sup>m</sup> LIV l. xxii. c. 10.      <sup>n</sup> POLYB. l. xv. p. 719. VALESII
excerpt. p. 65. JUSTIN. l. xxx. c. 1.      <sup>o</sup> POLYB. ibid.

verned by her, by her brother Agathacles, who was subservient to his unnatural lust, and by their mother Oenante. These disposed of all the civil as well as military employments, which of course were filled with their creatures and favourites; insomuch, that the king himself, who was entirely in their hands, had no power at all, being only their tool and property<sup>p</sup>. The murder of Arsinoe and several other actions of the same nature provoked the people to such a degree against Sofibius, that they obliged the king to dismiss him from his service, and raise to the office of prime minister one Tlepolemus, a young man of quality, who had signalized himself in the army, and was at that time the king's treasurer. To him Sofibius resigned the king's seal, which was the badge of his office, and by virtue thereof Tlepolemus governed all the affairs of the kingdom so long as the king lived. But in that short time he sufficiently shewed, that he was no-ways equal to that charge, he having neither the experience, craft, nor application of his predecessor<sup>q</sup>.

Obliged to dismiss his prime minister.

Ptolemy, having by his continued debaucheries and intemperance wore out a very strong constitution, died in the flower of his age, as it often happens to those who indulge themselves, like him, without restraint in all manner of pleasures. He was about twenty when he came to the crown, and reigned only seventeen years. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old<sup>r</sup>. As the only persons present when the king expired were Agathacles, his sister, and their creatures, they concealed his death as long as they could, and, in the mean time, carried off all the money, jewels, and other valuable effects in the palace they could lay their hands on. At the same time they formed a project for maintaining the authority they had enjoyed under the deceased king, by usurping the regency during the minority of his successor. They vainly imagined, that they might carry this point, if they could but take off Tlepolemus, who had succeeded Sofibius in the ministry; and accordingly they concerted measures for putting him out of the way. When they thought proper to acquaint the public with the king's death, they summoned a general council of the Mace- donians, that is, of those Alexandrians who were of the Macedonian race. When they were met, Agathocles and Agathoclea appeared in the council; the former, holding the young king in his arms, and shedding abundance of tears, implored the protection of the Macedonians, telling them, that the late king, when at the point of death, had committed the young prince to the care of Agathoclea, and recommended him to the fidelity of his Macedonian subjects; and therefore he recurred, with great confidence, to them against Tlepolemus, who, as he was informed by unexceptionable witnesses, intended to seize the crown for himself. He imagined, that this weak artifice would have stirred up the Macedonians against Tlepolemus, on whose death he might have easily established himself in the regency. But, the malice of this contrivance being too glaring, the people, instead of falling upon Tlepolemus, vowed the utter ruin of him, his sister, and all their creatures. For, on this occasion, the memory of all their past crimes and misdemeanours being revived, the people of Alexandria rose in a general tumult against them; and having first taken from them the young king, and placed him on the throne in the hippodrome, they brought before him Agathocles, Agathoclea, and their mother Oenanthé, and caused them there, as by the king's order, to be put to death in his presence. Their dead bodies were dragged through all the streets of Alexandria, and tore in pieces by the incensed multitude. The other sisters, relations, and creatures of Agathocles, met with the same treatment, every one of them being cut off by the people, whom they had oppressed and abused.

The death of Ptolemy Philopator.

<sup>p</sup> POLYB. l. xv. p. 720. VALESII excerpt p. 65. JUSTIN. l. xxx. c. 1. & 2. PLUT. in Erotico. & Cleom. ATHEN. l. vi. c. 6. & l. xiii. c. 13. HIERONYM. in Daniel. c. 11. <sup>q</sup> VALESII excerpt. ex Polyb. l. xvi. <sup>r</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxv. c. 1. & 2. HIERONYM. in Daniel. c. 11.

Philammon, who had been employed to murder queen Arsinæ, being returned from Cyrene to Alexandria about three days before this tumult broke out, the women, who had attended on that unhappy princess, no sooner heard of his arrival, but, laying hold of the opportunity which the distractions of the city gave them, they resolved to revenge their mistress's death; and accordingly, breaking into his house, they killed him with stones and clubs, a death which he well deserved, for becoming the instrument of such a wicked and detestable murder<sup>c</sup>.

THE guardianship of the young king was, for the present, committed to Sosibius, the son of that Sosibius who had been prime minister during the three last reigns. Whether he was still living or no, is no-where said ; but it is certain, that he lived to a very great age, having, for the space of three score years been at the helm, and governed Egypt, we may say, with an absolute sway ; and for this reason he was surnamed Polychronos, or the long liver. He was as crafty and as wicked a minister as ever any prince employed in the administration of public affairs. He did not scruple to commit the blackest crimes, when they were any ways conducive to the ends he proposed. Polybius imputes to him the murder of Lyfimachus the son of Ptolemy ; of Arsinoe the daughter of Lyfimachus ; of Magas the king's brother ; of Berenice the king's mother ; of Cleomenes king of Sparta ; and lastly of queen Arsinoe<sup>1</sup>. It is surprizing that this old Egyptian politician, after having behaved with so much haughtiness and cruelty in his administration for such a number of years, should at last be suffered to retire unmolested, and end his days in peace. There are very few instances of this nature to be met with in history, most ministers, who acted on his principles, having fallen at last victims, either to the just resentment of the princes themselves, whom they pretended to serve, or of the people, whom they oppressed.

<sup>c</sup> POLYB. l. xv. p. 712, 713, 714. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt Valefii, p. 294. & excerpt. Polybii, p. 56. PLUT. in Cicor.

Ptolemy Philopator was, without all doubt, one of the most wicked and debauched princes that ever swayed a scepter ; for he began his reign with the murder of his mother Berenice and his brother Magas, and closed it with that of his sister and wife Arsinoe. He minded nothing from the time he ascended the throne to his death, but his pleasures and diversions, wallowing in all sorts of vices, and taking most pleasure in such as were most repugnant to nature. His favourites, catamites, and the many lewd women, with whom he spent his whole time, governed both him and the kingdom, disposing of all the employments civil and military to persons of their own stamp, and consequently no ways equal to them. However, he was not without some virtues ; witness his liberality towards the Rhodians, after the famous earthquake, which threw down their colossus, their arsenal, and great part of their walls, to the repairing of which he contributed more generously than any prince of his age ; for, upon the first application made to him in their behalf, he sent them three hundred talents of silver, a million of artabes or bushels of wheat, materials for building of twenty quinqueremes and the like number of triremes, three thousand talents for the rebuilding

Character of Ptolemy Philopator.

<sup>1</sup> VALENTI excerpt. ibid. PLUT. in Cleom. POLYB. ibid.

of the colossus, an hundred architects, and three hundred and fifty artificers, promising to pay annually fourteen talents for their subsistence so long as the Rhodians wanted them. Besides, he gave them ten thousand artabes of corn for their sacrifices, and twenty thousand for the service of their fleet<sup>u</sup>. Athenæus tells us, that he was an encourager of learning, and, when sober, took pleasure in conversing with one Se-phærus an eminent philosopher. The same author adds, that he built a magnificent temple in honour of Homer, placing in it the statue of that great poet, and round his statue the figures of the several cities that claimed him<sup>w</sup>. Ptolemy, the son of Agessarchus, a native of Megalopolis, wrote the history of this prince's reign<sup>x</sup>; which, had it reached our times, would enable us to give a more particular and distinct account of his actions.

Ptolemy
Epiphanes
Year of
the Flood,
2799.
Before
Christ, 200.

Embassy of the Romans to
Ptolemy.

HE was succeeded, as we have related above, by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of five years old. During his minority Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, entering into an alliance with Philip of Macedon, made himself master of Palæstine and Cœle-Syria; but was soon dispossessed of them again by Aristomenes, the prime minister of Egypt, as we have related in the history of Syria<sup>y</sup>; where the reader will find a particular account of the troubles which disturbed the beginning of his reign, and were occasioned partly by the ambition of Antiochus, and partly by the treachery of Scopas the Ætolian, who was commander in chief of Ptolemy's forces. In the third year of his reign the Romans, as Justin<sup>z</sup> and Li-

<sup>u</sup> POLYB. l. v. hist. l. xiii. c. 2. <sup>w</sup> ATHEN. l. v. p. 204. ÆLIAN var. <sup>x</sup> ATHENÆUS, l. x. p. 426. <sup>y</sup> Vol. <sup>z</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxx. c. 1. <sup>a</sup> LIV. l. xxxi. c. 4.

protection

protection of the Roman senate; which they did accordingly, sending a solemn embassy to Rome for that purpose. The senate complied with their request, and sent M. Lepidus to take upon him the guardianship, which he, after a short stay in Egypt, conferred upon Aristomenes, by birth an Acarnanian, but an experienced minister of that court, and thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of Egypt. He undertook the charge, and acquitted himself in it with great prudence and fidelity <sup>b</sup>. In the beginning of his administration, being informed of the ravages Philip had committed in Attica, and of the motion of the Macedonian troops to lay siege to Athens, he advised his royal pupil to send an embassy to the senate, acquainting them, that he was ready to deliver Athens from the danger that threatened her, provided it were agreeable to the Romans. This act of submission from so powerful a king was highly acceptable to the senate, who returned thanks to Ptolemy for the respect he had shewn them, and gave the ambassadors the following answer; that Rome was resolved to assist the Greeks against Philip, that she would give Ptolemy notice when she wanted his assistance, and was fully convinced of their master's fidelity and affection <sup>c</sup>. Aristomenes in like manner took care to renew the antient alliance between the crown of Egypt and the republic of Achaia, on which occasion Lycortas, the father of Polybius the historian, and two others, were sent by the Achaean confederacy into Egypt to sign the treaty <sup>d</sup>.

IN the mean time the king, having attained to the fourteenth year of his age, his enthronization, called by the Alexandrians Anaclateria, was celebrated with great pomp and magnificence; and the administration of affairs put into his hands; for at that age the kings of Egypt were, according to the custom of the country, declared to be out of their minority. So long as Aristomenes was at the helm, matters were managed in such manner as gained the king an universal applause and approbation; for he followed in all things the advice of that prudent and experienced minister. But as soon as he became his own master, the flattery of his worthless courtiers prevailing over the wise counsels of so able and faithful a servant, the kingdom suffered great calamities, and the remaining part of his reign was rendered infamous. Aristomenes did not cease to give him good advice, and intreat him to conduct himself in a manner more worthy of his exalted station; but the young prince, plunging himself into all the vices which

Offers the Romans assistance against Philip.

Puts Aristomenes to death.

<sup>b</sup> JUSTIN. & LIV. ibid. POLYB. l. xv. p 717. ubi supra.

<sup>d</sup> POLYB. legat. 37.

<sup>c</sup> LIV.

His subjects revolt.

had rendered his father's name and reign so odious, instead of hearkening to his wholesome admonitions, ordered him to be put to death for the liberty he had taken. Having thus got rid of so troublesome a censor, he abandoned himself to excesses and disorders of all kinds, following no other guides, in the administration of affairs, but his wild passions, and exercising a most cruel tyranny over his subjects<sup>c</sup>. The Egyptians, not being able to bear the grievances they suffered under his arbitrary administration, began to cabal against him; and, being headed by many persons of the first quality, entered into a conspiracy with a design to depose him, which they were very near putting in execution<sup>d</sup>. To extricate himself out of these difficulties, he appointed Polycrates his prime minister, who was a man of great abilities and experience in affairs both of peace and war; for he had commanded in quality of general under his father in the famous battle of Raphia, and, on that occasion, greatly contributed to the signal victory which was there gained. He had been afterwards made governor of Cyprus, and, happening to come from thence to Alexandria, when the conspiracy of Scopas<sup>e</sup> broke out, he had a great share in the suppressing of it<sup>h</sup>. By his means Ptolemy having got the better of the rebels, obliged their leaders, who were the chief lords of the country, to capitulate, and submit upon certain conditions. But, having got them into his power, he forfeited his promise; and, after treating them in the most cruel manner, caused them all to be put to death. This treacherous conduct involved him in new difficulties, from which he was again delivered by the wisdom of his faithful minister Polycrates<sup>i</sup>.

Cultivates the friendship of the Romans.

He maintained, during the whole time of his reign, a strict friendship with the Romans. For Livy tells us<sup>k</sup>, that he offered the Romans a thousand pounds weight of gold, and twenty thousand of silver, to carry on the war against Antiochus king of Syria, whose daughter Cleopatra he had married; nay, after Antiochus was by the arms of the republic driven out of Europe, he sent an embassy to Rome to congratulate the senate on the deliverance of Greece and the flight of Antiochus, and to offer them, in his name and in that of his queen Cleopatra, what ships, money, or provisions they wanted to pursue the war with the king of Syria<sup>l</sup>. Ptolemy hated Antiochus on account of the disturbances he had raised and fomented in his kingdom, and Cleopatra in all likelihood was shocked at his treachery and cruelty; for he is said to have married her to Ptolemy with no other view but to get rid of him by her means, and have Egypt delivered into his hands. But the virtuous young queen, inviolably attached to her duty, joined with Ptolemy against Antiochus, and preferred conjugal affection to the ties of blood <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. 294. POLYBIUS, I. xvii. p. 73. <sup>d</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ibid. <sup>e</sup> Vol. viii. p. 506. <sup>h</sup> POLYB. in excerpt. Valesii, p. 113. <sup>i</sup> POLYB. ibid. <sup>k</sup> LIV. l. xxxvi. c. 3. <sup>l</sup> POLYB. legat. 17.

Ptolemy in like manner cultivated with great care the friendship of the Achæan republic; for in the end of his reign he sent ambassadors to them, inviting the confederacy to join with him in an offensive and defensive league, and promising them six thousand shields, two hundred talents of brass, and ten ships of fifty oars rigged and equipt. His offer was accepted, and ambassadors were appointed, viz. Lycortas with his son Polybius and young Aratus, to renew the alliance, and bring the ten ships into Peloponnesus <sup>n</sup>. But while they were preparing to set out, news was brought of the death of Ptolemy. And of the Achæans.

THIS prince, having reduced his rebellious subjects at home, as has been already related, was preparing to make war abroad upon Seleucus king of Syria. But, as his finances were exhausted, one of his chief officers asked him, by what means he would raise money to carry on the war which he was ready to imbarque in. The king replied, that his friends were his treasure; which answer being spread abroad among his officers and the chief men about him, they inferred from thence, that he designed to pursue the war with their fortunes and estates. To prevent therefore this evil, which made a stronger impression upon them than any misfortune which could befall their country, they caused poison to be given to the king, which put an end to his project and life, in the twenty fourth year of his reign and twenty ninth of his age <sup>o</sup>. Cato, as quoted by Priscian the grammarian, commends him as an excellent and bountiful prince; and such he was, so long as he followed the counsels of Aristomenes; but after he had caused him to be poisoned, he abandoned himself to all manner of wickedness and debauchery. He left two sons, both under age, viz. Ptolemy Philometor and Ptolemy Physcon, and one daughter by name Cleopatra. Ptolemy Philometor, who was but six years old, succeeded his father under the guardianship of his mother Cleopatra, who for the Is poisoned.

<sup>m</sup> HIERONYM in Dan. c. 11.

<sup>n</sup> POLYB. legat. 57.

<sup>o</sup> HIERONYM. ubi supra.

Ptolemy Philometor.
Year of the Flood, 2823.
Before Christ, 176.

space of eight years governed the kingdom of Egypt with great prudence and moderation. Upon her death the regency fell to Lennæus, a nobleman of great distinction in that country, and to Eulæus an eunuch, who was charged with the care of the young king's education. These no sooner entered on the administration, but they demanded Cæle-Syria and Palestine of Antiochus Epiphanes, who at that time reigned in Syria. These provinces had always been in the possession of the kings of Egypt from the time of Ptolemy the first, till Antiochus the Great wrested them out of the hands of Ptolemy Epiphanes; and by this title alone Antiochus Epiphanes now held them. However, this demand occasioned a war between the two crowns, the particulars whereof we have related elsewhere at length <sup>p</sup>, and therefore shall not repeat in this place. Philometor having in the course of this war, either of his own accord delivered himself up to Antiochus, or, as others will have it, been taken prisoner by that prince, the Alexandrians, looking upon him as lost, raised his younger brother to the throne, who from that time took the name of Ptolemy Euergetes the second, which was afterwards changed into that of Physcon, or the great bellied, by reason of the prominent belly which by his luxury and gluttony he acquired. On his ascending the throne Cineas and Cumanus were appointed to serve him in quality of prime ministers, and charged with the care of restoring the kingdom to its former splendor, and flourishing condition <sup>q</sup>. But Antiochus Epiphanes, returning soon after into Egypt, drove Physcon from the throne, and restored the whole kingdom, except the city of Pelusium, to Philometor. His design was to kindle a war between the two brothers, and seize the kingdom for himself, after they had wasted their strength by their domestic feuds. With this view he retained Pelusium, that having this city, which was the key of Egypt, in his hands, he might re-enter that country at his pleasure. But Philometor, being well apprised of his design, invited his brother Physcon to an accommodation, which was happily effected by the mediation of Cleopatra their sister. In virtue of this agreement both brothers were to reign jointly, and oppose, to the utmost of their power, Antiochus as a declared and common enemy <sup>r</sup>. Hereupon Antiochus invaded Egypt at the head of a mighty army; but

War between him and the king of Syria.

His brother Physcon raised to the crown.

The two brothers reign jointly.

<sup>p</sup> Vide Vol. viii p. 561, & seq. <sup>q</sup> PORPHYR. in Græc. EUSEB. Scalig. p. 60—68. POLYB. legat. 81. p. 907. <sup>r</sup> Liv. l. xlv. c. 11. JUSTIN. l. xxxiv. c. 2. PORPHYR. ibid. p. 60 EUSEB. in Chron. p. 68.

was obliged by the Romans to leave that country in the manner we have related in the history of Syria <sup>f</sup>.

THE two brothers, being by the retreat of Antiochus freed from all apprehension of a foreign enemy, began to quarrel with each other ; and the divisions between them rose to such a height, that the Roman senate wrote to their ambassadors Gneius Octavius, Spurius Lucretius, and Lucius Aurelius, whom they had sent a little before into Syria, injoining them to proceed from thence to Alexandria, and use their utmost endeavours to reconcile the two kings. But before the ambassadors reached Egypt, Physcon the younger brother had driven Philometor from the throne, and obliged him to quit the kingdom <sup>tor. driven out by his brother</sup>. Whereupon embarquing for Italy, he landed at Brundisium ; from whence he travelled to Rome on foot, meanly dressed and with very few attendants. This humble appearance he affected, in all likelihood, to raise the compassion of the senate. Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopator, late king of Syria, who was then an hostage at Rome, having had notice of the arrival of Ptolemy in Italy, and of the deplorable condition in which this unfortunate prince was going to appear in the metropolis of the world, caused an equipage to be prepared for him suitable to his dignity, and went out with it himself to meet him, that he might appear at Rome as a king. He found him at twenty six miles distance from Rome, on foot, and covered with dust, embraced him, put a crown on his head, and begged he would make use of the royal equipage which he had brought for that purpose. Ptolemy expressed his gratitude for the honour and respect the Syrian had shewn him ; but had his reasons for not accepting the offers of the prince. Nay, he would not even permit him to accompany him the rest of the way ; but entered Rome on foot, with the same mean attendance, and in the same dress with which he first set out on his journey, and without any state or ceremony took up his lodging in the private house of a painter of Alexandria, his subject. The senate was no sooner informed of his arrival, but they sent for him, and excused themselves for not having received him with those ceremonies which were usual on such an occasion, assuring him, that it was not from any neglect or want of respect for his person, but merely because his coming had been kept so private, that they had no notice of it till after his arrival. After this having desired him to quit the habit in which he came, and to fix a day for an audience of the senate, in order to lay before them the motives of his journey, he was conducted by some of the senators to lodgings suitable to his royal dignity ; and the quæstor was ordered to supply him, at the expence of the public, with all things necessary during his stay at Rome <sup>u</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> Vide Vol. viii. p. 570.

<sup>t</sup> PORPHYR. ubi supra.

The differences of the two Brothers composed by the Romans.

ON the day appointed for his having an audience of the senate, he represented to the conscript fathers the injustice of his brother, and the wrong done him so effectually, that they immediately decreed his restoration ; and deputed two of their body, viz. Quintius and Canulcius, to attend him to Alexandria, and cause their decree to be put in execution. They reconducted him accordingly, and on their arrival in Egypt succeeded in negotiating an accommodation between the two brothers ; in virtue of which Physcon was put in possession of Libya and Cyrene, and Philometor of all Egypt and the island of Cyprus, each of them being declared independent of the other in the dominions allotted them <sup>w</sup>. The treaty of agreement was confirmed with the customary oaths and sacrifices. But oaths had been long among the generality of princes no more than mere ceremonies, by which they did not think themselves bound in the least. For not long after the youngest of the two kings, being dissatisfied with the part allotted him, sent ambassadors to Rome, desiring that, besides Libya and Cyrene, the island of Cyprus might be assigned him. As he could not obtain this of the conscript fathers by means of his ambassadors, he went to Rome in person to solicit the senate for it. But Menithyllus of Alabanda, whom Philometor had sent to plead his cause, maintained it with great zeal and ability. He represented to the senate, that Physcon had had a much greater share than he could in reason have expected. “ His brother, said he, has “ given him Cyrenaica ; and will not this rich maritime “ country satisfy the desires of a younger brother ? Nay, “ Philometor has done more for Physcon ; he has saved his “ life. For after the death of Cleopatra, Physcon, being “ suspected of parricide, would not have escaped the fury “ of the incensed multitude, had he not been protected by “ the king his brother. Besides, an accommodation was “ made, conscript fathers, by your ambassadors between the “ two competitors : it was agreed, that Philometor should “ reign in Egypt and in the island of Cyprus, and that Libya “ and Cyrene should be given to Physcon with the title of

New disputes between them.

<sup>u</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valerii, p. 322. VAL. MAX. l. v. c. i. POLYB. legat. 113. p. 941. <sup>w</sup> POLYB. ibid. p. 943. Epitom. LIV. l. xlv. ZONARAS, l. ii.

“ king.

“ king. This treaty was signed and ratified at the altars, “ each party binding themselves by the most solemn oaths
 “ to the observance of it. But the ambition of Phyſcon “ knows no bounds; he pays no regard to his oath, and “ even despises your decrees.” The embassadors, whom Rome had sent to negotiate the accommodation between the two brothers, being present in the senate, confirmed the truth of all Menithyllus had advanced. Phyſcon had nothing to answer, but that he was forced by the necessity of his affairs at that time to consent to the proposal of an ambitious brother, though greatly to his prejudice. “ It is cer“ tain, said he, that I was injured in the division of my fa“ ther’s dominions; and therefore, conscript fathers, I have “ recourse to your equity. That with me shall supply the “ place of gods and oaths. I still abate of what is due to “ me in justice. All I desire is the island of Cyprus, which, “ though granted, will not put me upon the level with my “ brother. Egypt is a large kingdom, and if Philometor “ reigns alone there, and in the island of Cyprus too, his “ power will become very formidable*.

NOTHING could be more equitable than the decisions of The Ro- the senate, when their own interest did not interfere and mans ad-help to turn the balance. But, as it was for the advantage judge the of the republic that the strength of the kingdom of Egypt island of should be divided, and consequently lessened, those refined Cyprus to politicians, without any regard to equity or justice, granted Phyſcon.
 the younger brother what he demanded. Polybius observes here, that the Romans were ever careful to improve to their own advantage the quarrels and disputes which arose among kings and princes, conducting themselves therein in such manner, as to make the contending parties believe that they favoured them, while they promoted their own interest, which they had solely in view in all their resolutions<sup>y</sup>. This alone prompted them to favour Phyſcon, and adjudge to him the island of Cyprus, as an addition to his share, contrary to the treaty of division concluded a little before by their own embassadors. Demetrius, who was then at Rome, and whose interest it was that Cyprus should not continue subject to so powerful a prince as the king of Egypt, supported the demand of Phyſcon with all his credit. Two commissioners were therefore sent with the king of Cyrene, viz. T. Torqua- tus, and Cn. Merula, to put him in possession of Cyprus.
 Their orders were to use gentle methods, and endeavour by

* POLYN legat. 113. p. 941, & legat. 117. p. 950.      <sup>y</sup> Idem
ibid.

fair means to prevail upon Philometor to give up Cyprus to his brother.

WHILE Phyſcon was at Rome on this occasion, he had often the opportunity of ſeeing Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, who was the pattern of her ſex and the prodigy of her age. The Egyptian, being taken, not ſo much with her charms, as with her virtue, ſuperior underſtanding, and extraordinary qualifications, cauſed propoſals of marriage to be made to her. But ſhe, being the daughter of Scipio Africanus, and the widow of Tiberius Gracchus, who had been twice conſul and once cenſor, deſpiſed the offer, thinking it more honourable to be one of the firſt matrons of Rome, than to reign with Phyſcon in Libya and Cyrene <sup>2</sup>.

Phyſcon ſet out from Rome with the two embaſſadors, and arriving in Greece on his way to Cyprus, he there raiſed a great number of mercenaries, with a deſign to ſail forthwith to Cyprus and poſſeſs himſelf by force of that iſland. But the embaſſadors having acquainted him that they were enjoined by the ſenate to uſe gentle methods, and procure him the poſſeſſion of the iſland by way of treaty with his brother, and not by dint of arms, at their requeſt he diſmiſſed his forces, and with Merula returned to Libya, while Torquatus purſued his journey to Alexandria. The deſign of the embaſſadors was to bring the two brothers to an interview on the frontiers of their dominions, and there to ſettle matters between them in an amicable manner, agreeable to the inſtructions of the ſenate. But Torquatus, on his arrival at the court of Alexandria, found Philometor no ways inclined to comply with the decree of the ſenate. He urged the late agreement made between him and his brother, by Quintius and Canuleius the former embaſſadors; in virtue of which Cyprus having been allotted to him, he thought it very ſtrange, that it ſhould, contrary to the articles of that treaty, be now taken from him and given to his brother. However, he did not abſolutely reſuſe to yield to the orders of the ſenate, but ſhewing himſelf inclined to grant ſome things, and objecting againſt others, he ſpun out the time without coming to any determination <sup>3</sup>. In the mean time Phyſcon, who waited at Apis in Libya, as had been agreed on, to hear the reſult of Torquatus's negotiations, receiving no intelligence from him, ſent Merula alſo to Alexandria, hoping that both the embaſſadors might prevail upon Ptolemy to comply with the expreſs orders of their republic. But Philometor ſtill observed

<sup>2</sup> Plut. in Tiber. Gracch.

<sup>3</sup> POLYB. legat. 113. p. 942.

observed the same conduct, treating the ambassadors with great kindness, flattering them with fair words, and entertaining them at a great charge for forty days together, without ever giving them any positive answer. At length, when he found that they would be put off no longer, he plainly declared that he was resolved to stand to the first treaty, and would hearken to no other <sup>b</sup>. With this answer Merula returned to Physon, and Torquatus to Rome.

Philometor refuses to submit to the decree of the senate.

In the mean time the Cyreneans being informed of the ill conduct of Physon during his short reign at Alexandria, conceived so strong an aversion against him, that they resolved to keep him out of their country by force of arms. It was not doubted, but Philometor fomented under-hand these disturbances in order to find his brother employment at home, and thereby divert him from raising new commotions in Egypt or Cyprus. Physon, being informed of these troubles, and at the same time receiving intelligence that the Cyreneans were already in the field, laid aside all thoughts of Cyprus, and leaving Apis where his fleet lay in harbour, he hastened to Cyrene with all his forces, but was on his arrival overthrown by the rebels. Hereupon being involved in great difficulties, he resolved to send two ambassadors to Rome, there to renew his complaints against his brother, not daring to go thither in person, till such time as the troubles raised at Cyrene were appeased. The ambassadors, setting out with Torquatus and Merula, arrived safe at Rome, where, after a long debate between them and Menithyllus, whom Philometor had sent back to Rome, on this occasion, the senate not only declared in favour of Physon, but to express their resentment against Philometor for not submitting to their decree, renounced all friendship and alliance with him, and ordered his ambassadors to leave the city in five days. Two ambassadors were immediately dispatched to Cyrene, to acquaint Physon with the resolution of the Roman senate.

The Cyreneans rise up in arms against Physcon.

Physon, having at last got the better of his rebellious subjects, established himself in Cyrene; but his wicked and vicious conduct soon estranged the minds of the Cyreneans from their new king to such a degree, that some of them entering into a conspiracy against him, fell upon him one night as he was returning to his palace, wounded him in several places, and left him for dead on the spot. This he laid to the charge of his brother Philometor, and as soon as he was recovered returned to Rome to make his complaints to the senate, and shew them the scars of his wounds, accusing him of having employed the assassins, from whom he had received them <sup>d</sup>. Though Philometor was known to be a prince of a most mild and humane disposition, and of all men living the most unlikely to have given countenance to so black an attempt, yet the senate, being offended at his refusing to submit to the regulations they had made with respect to the island of Cyprus, hearkened to this false accusation, and carried their prejudice against him to such a height, that they would not so much as hear what his embassadors had to say in confutation of the charge, but ordered them forthwith to depart the city. At the same time they appointed five commissioners to conduct Physcon into Cyprus, and put him in possession of that island, injoining all their allies in those parts to furnish him with forces for that purpose <sup>e</sup>.

A conspiracy formed against him.

<sup>b</sup> POLYB. legat. 116 p 950.

<sup>c</sup> POLYB. legat. 116, 117. p.

Physcon
defeated, and taken prisoner by his brother
Philometor, who generously pardons
him.

Physcon, having by this means got together an army, which seemed to him sufficient for the execution of his design, landed in Cyprus; but being there encountered by Philometor in person, his forces were put to flight, and he obliged to shut himself up in Lapitho, a city in that island, where he was closely besieged, and at length taken and delivered up to Philometor, whom he had so highly provoked. Every one expected he would have treated him with the severity he well deserved; but the prince gave on this occasion a signal proof of his good nature and truly generous temper; for he not only forgave him, but restored to him Libya and Cyrene, adding some other territories in lieu of the island of Cyprus, and promising him his daughter in marriage <sup>f</sup>. Thus an end was put to the war between the two brothers, the Romans being ashamed to oppose any longer a prince, whose clemency had gained him the affection of all the neighbouring nations.

Philometor on his return to Alexandria appointed one Archias governor of the island of Cyprus. But he soon after the king's departure agreed with Demetrius king of Syria to betray the island to him for five hundred talents. The treachery was discovered, before it took effect, and the traitor, to avoid the punishment which he deserved, laid violent hands on himself. Archias had formerly served Ptole-

<sup>d</sup> Idem legat. 132. p. 961.      <sup>e</sup> POLYB. legat. 133. & in excerpt. Valefii. p. 197.      <sup>f</sup> POLYB. in excerpt Valefii, p. 197. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Val. p. 334, 335. LIV. l. xiv. ZONAR. ex Dion.

my with great fidelity, and even attended him to Rome, when he was driven out of his kingdom, and forced to implore the assistance of the senate in his distress. But as he was of a covetous temper, his fidelity was not proof against money; and therefore offered to betray his trust for the above-mentioned sum, and lost his life by the bargain <sup>g</sup>. Ptolemy, being disgusted with Demetrius for this attempt upon Cyprus, joined Attalus king of Pergamus and Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, in setting up a pretender to his crown, and supporting him with all the strength of his kingdom; as we have related at length in the history of Syria <sup>h</sup>. This was Alexander Balas, to whom he even gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, after he had placed him on the throne of Syria. But he, notwithstanding these and many other favours, being suspected of having entered into a plot against his benefactor, Ptolemy, highly provoked at his ingratitude, became his greatest enemy, and marching against him routed his army in the neighbourhood of Antioch, but died a few days after of the wounds he received in the engagement; as we have related elsewhere <sup>i</sup>. He was, without all doubt, an excellent prince, and is by all the profane historians highly commended on account of his clemency and good nature. Polybius, who was his contemporary, gives him this character; he was, says that historian, an enemy to all kind of cruelty and oppression; averse from spilling the blood of his subjects, and so much inclined to mercy; that during the whole time of his long reign he put none of his nobles, nor even of the citizens of Alexandria, to death, though some of them well deserved it. Though his brother, continues the same writer, had provoked him to the highest degree, and committed such crimes as to others would have seemed unpardonable, yet he not only forgave him, but treated him with the affection of a kind brother <sup>k</sup>. 'Tis true, that in the beginning of his reign he was looked upon, as Justin informs us <sup>l</sup>, as a very mean-spirited prince, keeping, while in the army, at as great a distance from all danger as he was able, and afterwards submitting in a shameful manner to the will of Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, by whom he suffered himself to be deprived of a rich and powerful kingdom without attempting to recover it. But this mean behaviour was not owing to his want of natural courage or capacity, for he after-

Death of Philometor.

His character.

<sup>g</sup> POLYB. in excerpt. Val. p. 170.

<sup>h</sup> Vide Vol viii. p. 598.

<sup>i</sup> Vide Vol. viii. p. 608.

<sup>k</sup> POLYB. in excerpt. Val. p. 191.

<sup>l</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxiv. c. 2.

wards gave many instances of both, as we have seen ; but to his effeminate education. For the eunuch Eulæus, who had the care of his education, and was at the same time one of his prime ministers, endeavoured to corrupt him with all manner of luxury, in order to render him unfit for governing, and by that means keep the power in his own hands. He took the name of Philometor to testify his gratitude to his mother Cleopatra, for her prudent and careful administration during his minority. He allowed the Jews to build a temple in Egypt like that of Jerusalem, being induced thereunto by Onias, who was in high favour both with him and his queen Cleopatra <sup>m</sup>. Aristobulus an Alexandrian Jew, and a Peripatetic philosopher of great note, is said to have been Ptolemy's preceptor, and to have dedicated to him a comment, which he wrote on the five books of Moses <sup>n</sup>. The author of the history of the Maccabees, in his account of the troubles of Syria, represents Ptolemy as an ambitious and perfidious prince, trampling under his feet the most sacred laws of justice and nature, to raise himself on the ruins of his son-in-law Alexander Balas ; which no-ways agrees with the character given him by Josephus, Polybius, and other profane historians <sup>o</sup>.

Ptolemy
Phyſcon.
Year of
the Flood, 2858.
Before
Chriſt, 141.

Maries Cleopatra, and on the day of the nuptials murders her ſon.

Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, on the death of Philometor her brother and husband, endeavoured to secure the crown for the son she had by him, being therein supported by some chief lords of the kingdom ; but others, declaring for Phyſcon the deceased king's brother, sent ambassadors to invite him from Cyrene, where he then reigned, to Alexandria. This obliging Cleopatra to provide for her defence, she had recourse to Onias and Dositheus, two Jews, who had had the whole management of affairs during the last years of Philometor's reign. These with an army of their countrymen hastened to her assistance. But before hostilities were committed on either side, matters were compromised by the interposition of Thermus, a Roman ambassador at that time in Alexandria, on the following terms ; viz. that Phyſcon should marry Cleopatra, and reign jointly with her during his life, but at the same time declare her son by Philometor next heir to the crown <sup>p</sup>. To these terms both parties agreed ; but as Phyſcon could not but look with jealousy on the young prince, whose birth intitled him to the crown, he murdered him in his mother's arms on the very day of the nuptials. This prince, as we have observed above, was commonly called Physcon by reason of his prominent belly; but the name which he assumed was Euergetes, that is, the benefactor; this the Alexandrians changed into that of Kakergetes, or the evil-doer, a surname to which he had the justest title; for he was the most cruel, wicked, and likewise the most vile and despicable, of the Ptolemies, who reigned in Egypt. He began his reign with the murder of his nephew in the manner we have related, and continued it to the last with the same cruelty and wickedness. He was no sooner seated on the throne, than he caused all those to be put to death, who had shewed any concern for the murder of the young prince. Transported with rage against the Jews, for having espoused the cause of Cleopatra, he treated them more like slaves than subjects. Josephus tells us, that he condemned all those of that nation, who were at Alexandria, to be trod to death by elephants, and that by the miraculous interposition of heaven in their favour they escaped the fury of those animals. But that writer places a fact here which happened in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator, as is plain from the history of the Maccabees. However, it is certain, that this wicked prince made himself the curse of his people by his unparalleled cruelties; putting every day some of them to death, either on groundless suspicions, or for the smallest faults; and often for no faults at all, but merely to gratify his cruel and inhuman temper. Those who had had the greatest share in the confidence of his brother Philometor, were sacrificed the first; and next to them most of the leading men, who had declared in his favour against Cleopatra; for as they had by their interest placed him on the throne, so they might by the same, as he apprehended, drive him from it; and therefore he resolved to dispatch his own friends after he had got rid of his brother's <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> JOSEPH. contra Apion l. ii.      <sup>n</sup> EUSEB. Præp. Evang. l. xiii. c. 12. & Clem. ALEXAND. Strom. l. i.      <sup>o</sup> Vide Vol. viii p. 610.
<sup>p</sup> JOSEPH. l. ii. contra Apion. p. 1064      JUSTIN. l. xxxviii. c. 8.

IN the second year of his reign, queen Cleopatra brought him a son, while he was employed in the performance of certain religious ceremonies, practised, according to the sacred rites of Egypt, by their kings, soon after their accession to the crown. Physcon was transported with joy at the birth of a son, whom he designed for successor, calling him Memphis, from the ceremonies which he was discharging at the time of his birth in the city of Memphis. However, he could not forbear his cruel practises, even during the public rejoic-

<sup>1</sup> JUSTIN. ibid. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Valesii, p. 350.

Learning revived in Greece,
Asia Minor, &c.

ings on account of the young prince's birth ; but caused some chief lords of Cyrene, who attended him into Egypt, to be barbarously murdered, for having on that occasion cast some reflections on one of his favourite courtesans, by name Irene <sup>r</sup>. On his return to Alexandria, he banished all those who had been brought up with his brother Philometor, and, without the least provocation, gave his guards, who consisted of Greek and Asiatic mercenaries, free liberty to murder and plunder the inhabitants of that rich metropolis at their pleasure ; and the cruelties practised by those greedy and inhuman wretches upon this licence, are not to be expressed. Justin <sup>c</sup> and Athenæus <sup>r</sup> tell us, that not only the private houses, but the streets, and even the temples, streamed daily with the blood of the innocent citizens ; which so terrified the few Alexandrians, who out-lived these repeated massacres, that stealing privately away, they fled into other countries, and left their native city in a manner desolate. Physcon therefore, that he might not reign over empty houses, invited strangers, by his edicts dispersed over the neighbouring countries, to repopulate the place. Upon this invitation great multitudes flocking thither, he gave them the habitations of those who had fled, and, admitting them to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the former citizens, by this means re-peopled the city <sup>u</sup>. As there were among those who left Egypt on this occasion, many grammarians, philosophers, physicians, geometricians, and masters of other liberal arts and sciences, by their means learning was revived in Greece, Asia Minor, the islands of the Archipelago, and in other places where they settled. The wars, which had been carried on for a long tract of time among the successors of Alexander, had in a manner extinguished learning in those parts ; and it would have been intirely lost, but for the protection and encouragement given to learned men by the Ptolemies of Egypt. The first Ptolemy erected at Alexandria a museum or college, as we have related above, for the support of those who devoted their time to the study of the liberal arts ; and, adding to it a great library for their use, drew by that means most of the learned men out of Greece to his metropolis. Ptolemy the second, and also the third, having herein followed the example of their predecessor, Alexandria became the place where the sciences flourished, when they were quite neglected elsewhere, most of the inhabitants of that city being bred up in the knowledge of some science or other.

<sup>r</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. ibid. p. 374. <sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxviii. c. 8.
<sup>r</sup> ATHEN. l. iv c. 24. <sup>u</sup> JUSTIN. & Athen. ibid.

Whence

Whence when they were driven by the cruelty and oppressions of this wicked tyrant into foreign countries, as they were qualified to gain themselves a maintenance, by teaching in the places where they settled the particular arts they were skilled in, they erected schools for this purpose in the countries through which they were dispersed; and being satisfied, by reason of their poverty, with a small salary, great numbers of scholars flocked to them. By this means the several branches of learning were revived in those eastern parts, in the same manner as they were in latter ages in the western, after the taking of Constantinople by the Turks. For that city being reduced by the infidels in the year of the christian æra 1453, the learned men, who lived there and in the other parts of Greece, to avoid the cruelty of the Turks, withdrew into Italy, where, under the patronage of the Italian princes, especially of Lorenzo de Medicis, they propagated their books and their learning.

BUT to return to Alexandria; while foreigners were flocking from all parts to that metropolis, with a design to settle there, on the encouragement given them by Phyſcon, three Roman ambassadors landed at that port, viz. Scipio Africanus the younger, Spurius Mummius, and L. Metellus. They had been sent by their republic to visit the countries which were subject to Rome, as Greece and Macedon, and those also that were only in alliance with her; their commission being to pass through Greece and Macedon, and from thence to the courts of the princes of Egypt, Syria, Pergamus, Bithynia, &c. to observe the state of affairs in each kingdom, to compose what differences they should find among their kings, and to settle in all places peace and concord. The report of Scipio's coming had reached Egypt before him; and upon the news of his arrival, the inhabitants repaired to the port in great crowds, to see a man, who had filled the whole world with the fame of his exploits. On his landing he had covered his head with one of the lappets of his gown; but the Alexandrians desired him to shew his face to them, the multitude being come on purpose to see him. Scipio complied immediately with their request; whereupon he was with loud acclamations applauded by the numerous crowds<sup>u</sup>. The king himself went out to meet the ambassadors; but made such an appearance as inspired them with a contempt for him. He had, says Athenæus out of the seventh book of Posidonius the Stoic w, a great head, and a broad face, extremely deformed and shocking, upon a short squat body, with a belly enor-

Three Roman em-bassadors arrive at Alexandria.

<sup>u</sup> PRUT. in Apoph.

<sup>w</sup> ATHEN. l. xii. c. 27.

Kindly entertained by Physcon.

mously prominent. His dress was agreeable to his vicious disposition; for he wore only a fine stuff, which was so transparent as to leave those parts visible, which it is the chief end of garments to conceal. Scipio and his colleagues were extremely offended with these indecencies, but they had no right to reform them. The more conscious the king was of his crimes and wicked administration, the more respect he affected to shew to the ambassadors. He entertained them, during their stay at Alexandria, with all the varieties of the most sumptuous viands; but they, scorning that rich fare, as prejudicial both to their bodies and minds, touched nothing but what was necessary in the most temperate manner for the support of nature. Such was the temperance of the Romans, in the times we are now writing of. The king shewed them in person his palace and treasury, and whatever else was worth seeing at Alexandria. After they had viewed that great metropolis, and made themselves well acquainted with the state of affairs there, they sailed up the Nile to see Memphis and the other parts of Egypt. In this progress observing the great number of cities, the vast multitudes of inhabitants, the fertility of the soil, &c. they concluded, that nothing was wanting to render the kingdom of Egypt one of the most powerful states in the world, but a prince of abilities and application; and therefore were mighty well pleased to find a prince on the throne intirely destitute of every qualification that was necessary for such an undertaking *.

*Physcon divorces
his sister, and marries his niece.*

THE ambassadors no sooner left Egypt, but Physcon began to exercise the same cruelties upon the new inhabitants of Alexandria, which had obliged the ancient citizens to abandon their country. No day passed without some signal instance of his cruelty and tyranny; such of the Alexandrians, as were possessed of large estates, being daily murdered under some pretence or other. We have observed above, that he married Cleopatra, his sister, and his brother's widow, and slew her son in her arms on the very day of the nuptials. But now falling in love with a daughter she had by Philometor, who was also called Cleopatra, he first ravished, and afterwards married her, having divorced her mother to make room for her. These and many other excesses of the like nature exasperated the Alexandrians against him to such a degree, that they wanted only an opportunity of taking up arms, and ridding themselves of a tyrant, who was become the contempt, as well as the hatred and detestation, of his people. That he kept the crown on his head, under so general an odium and aversion of his subjects, was wholly owing to Hierax his chief minister. He was a native of Antioch, and had in the reign of Alexander Balas, in a joint commission with Diodotus, called afterwards Tryphon, governed the city of Antioch, as we have related elsewhere. On the turn of affairs, which afterwards happened in Syria, he retired into Egypt; and there, entering into the service of Ptolemy Physcon, was raised to the chief command of the army, and moreover charged with the whole management of the affairs of the kingdom. As he was a man of great valour and wisdom, he took care to gain the affections of the soldiery, by paying them punctually, and to balance, so far as in him lay, by his good and wise administration, the wicked conduct of his master; and by this means had the good luck to keep for several years all things quiet in the kingdom, under the most contemptible, brutal, and cruel tyrant that had ever swayed a scepter<sup>1</sup>. But afterwards, Hierax being either dead, or removed from his station, the Alexandrians began openly to complain of the oppressions they groaned under, and throw out threats against their king in case he did not change his conduct. But Physcon, in order to put them out of a condition of attempting any thing against him, resolved on a general massacre of all their young men, in whom the whole strength of the place consisted. Accordingly when they were one day assembled in the gymnasium or place of their public exercises, he caused fire to be set to it; so that they all perished in the flames, or by the swords of his mercenaries, whom the tyrant had placed at all the avenues. Hereupon the people, being exasperated to the highest degree, assembled in a tumultuous manner, and running without any guide, but their rage and despair, to the king's palace, set fire to it, and reduced it to ashes. But he had the good fortune to make his escape undiscovered, and to retire to the island of Cyprus, with Cleopatra his wife, and Memphitis his son by his sister Cleopatra<sup>2</sup>. Upon his flight the Alexandrians placed on the throne his divorced queen and sister; but he, fearing lest they should bestow the crown on his son, whom he had appointed governor of Cyrene, sent for him into Cyprus, and, as soon as he was landed, caused him to be assassinated. This new act of cruelty provoking the people still more against him, they pulled down and dashed to pieces all the statues which had been erected

* JUSTIN DIOL. R. SECT. ubi supra. VAL. MAX. l. iv c. 3. ATHEN. l. vi p. 273

A general massacre of all the young men of Alexandria.

Physcon driven from the throne.

<sup>1</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. Val. p. 361. ATHEN. l. iv. p. 184. VAL. MAX. l. ix. c. 1. & 2. <sup>2</sup> VAL. MAX. l. ix. c. 2. JUSTIN. l. viii. c. 8. OROSIUS, l. v. c. 10. EPIT. LIV. l. lix. to his own son, and sends his mangled members to Cleopatra his mother.*

*Murders

to him in Alexandria, which he supposing to have been done at the instigation of his divorced queen, his rage stifled all natural affection in him; wherefore considering Memphitis only as Cleopatra's child, he resolved to revenge the mother's quarrel upon him. Accordingly, without the least concern at spilling the blood of a young prince, his own son, and amiable for his beauty and rising virtues, he caused his throat to be cut in his own sight, and his mangled members to be put into a box, with the head intire, to shew thereby to whom they belonged, and sent to Alexandria. The messenger, who was one of his guards, was ordered to wait till the queen's birth-day, which approached, and was to be celebrated with extraordinary pomp and magnificence, and then to present it. His orders were executed, and the box conveyed to the queen in the midst of the public rejoicings, which were quickly changed into a general mourning. The horror and detestation which the sight of so dismal an object stirred up in all who were present, against the author of such a monstrous and unparalleled cruelty, cannot be expressed. The abominable present, being exposed to the view of the public, had the same effect on the populace, as it had on the nobles at court. They knew what they were to expect from a king who had thus treated his own son, and therefore nothing was thought of, but how to prevent that monster of cruelty from ever reascending the throne. An army was soon raised, and the command of it given to Marsyas, whom the queen had appointed general, enjoining him to take all the necessary steps for the defence of the country<sup>a</sup>.

ON the other hand, Physcon, having hired a numerous body of mercenaries, sent them under the command of Hegelochus against the Alexandrians. Hereupon the two armies meeting on the frontiers of Egypt, a bloody battle ensued, wherein the Egyptian army was intirely defeated, and their general Marsyas taken prisoner, and sent in chains to Physcon. Every one expected that so bloody a tyrant would have made his unhappy prisoner first suffer the most exquisite torments, and then put him to some cruel death. But he, to the great surprize of all, pardoned him, and gave him his liberty. For finding by experience, that his cruelties did not keep in awe, but exasperated the people, he resolved to try whether he could, by using lenity, regain their affections<sup>b</sup>. Cleopatra, being greatly distressed by this overthrow, and the loss of her army, which was almost intirely cut to pieces, sent to demand aid of Demetrius king of Syria, who had married her eldest daughter by Philometor, promising him the crown of Egypt for his reward. Demetrius, accepting the proposal without hesitation, marched with all his forces into Egypt, and there laid siege to Pelusium<sup>c</sup>. But he being, by his tyrannical government, vicious manners, and haughty behaviour, no less hated by the Syrians than Phyſcon was by the Egyptians, the people of Antioch, taking advantage of his absence, broke out into open rebellion, and were joined therein by the Apameans, and most of the inhabitants of the other cities of Syria. This obliged Demetrius to leave Egypt, and hasten back into Syria. Cleopatra, being destitute of the aid she expected, and no-ways in a condition, after the defeat of her army, to make head against Phyſcon, put all her valuable effects on board a ship, and set sail for Ptolemais, where her daughter Cleopatra queen of Syria then resided. This Cleopatra had been, in her father's life-time, first married to Alexander Balas, and afterwards to Demetrius. But Demetrius being taken prisoner by the Parthians, and detained amongst them, she had, after her father's death, disposed of herself to Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius. Sidetes dying soon after, she returned to the bed of Demetrius her first husband, upon his being set at liberty by the Parthian king<sup>e</sup>. Upon the flight of Cleopatra, Phyſcon returned to Alexandria, and reassumed the government, there being, after the retreat of Cleopatra and defeat of Marsyas, no power in Egypt to withstand him. His first thoughts, after his being settled anew on the throne, were to be revenged on Demetrius for his late invasion. With this view he set up an impostor against him, called Alexander Zebina, whose adventures we have related at length in the history of Syria<sup>f</sup>. From this time Phyſcon held the kingdom of Egypt undisturbed till the twenty ninth year of his reign, and sixty seventh of his age, when he died at Alexandria, and by his death put an end to a most wicked life, and a most cruel and tyrannical reign, he having been infamous for both, beyond all who reigned before him in that country<sup>g</sup>. His death.

<sup>a</sup> JUSTIN. ibid. DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. VAL. p. 374. LIV. l. lix. JUL. Obsequens de prodig. VAL. MAX. l. ix. c. 2.

<sup>b</sup> DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt. VALESII, p. 376.

ONE would hardly believe, that a prince, who is represented by historians as a monster rather than a man, should have deserved the reputation of being the restorer of letters, Phyſcon an encour-rager of learning.

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxviii c. 9. & l. xxxix. c. 1.

<sup>e</sup> JUSTIN.

ibid. & JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii c. 17. <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 20, & seq.

<sup>g</sup> PORPHYR. in GRÆC. EUSEB. SCALIG. PTOLEMÆUS in can.

EPHRIAN. de ponder. & mensur. Hieron. in Dan. c. 11.

and the patron of learned men. But this is attested in several places by Athenæus, Vitruvius, Epiphanius, and others <sup>h</sup>. Athenæus tells us, that, in the short intervals between his debaucheries, he applied himself to the study of the polite arts and sciences. Nay, according to this author, he had so extensive a knowledge, and so great an ease in discoursing of all kinds of literature, that he acquired the surname of Ptolemy the Philologist. The same author adds, that he wrote an history in twenty four books, and a learned comment on Homer. His history, as Epiphanius informs us, was in great repute among the antients, and often quoted by those who wrote on the same subject. Galen tells us, that he enriched the Alexandrian library with a great number of valuable books, which he purchased at a vast expence, having sent men of learning into all parts of the world for that purpose. He allowed one Panaretus, who had been a disciple of Arcefilas, and was a man of great learning, an annual pension of twelve talents, that is, of two thousand three hundred and twenty five pounds sterling <sup>i</sup>. He left three sons behind him, viz. Apion, whom he had by a concubine; Lathyrus or Lathyrus, and Alexander, his children by Cleopatra his niece, whom he had married after divorcing Cleopatra her mother. He left the kingdom of Cyrene to his eldest son Apion, and that of Egypt to his widow Cleopatra, in conjunction with one of her sons, whom she should think fit to chuse. The crown belonged, by right of inheritance, to Lathyrus, the eldest of his lawful children; but Physcon, either from an ill-judged policy, or an excessive condescension to his wife, gave her the absolute disposal of it; and she, looking upon Alexander as the most likely to leave the whole management of affairs in her hands, resolved to chuse him. But the people of Alexandria, taking up arms upon this unjust preference, obliged her to send for Lathyrus from the island of Cyprus, whither she had procured him to be banished in his father's life-time, and admit him to reign jointly with her <sup>k</sup>. But before she would suffer him to be inaugurated, according to the custom of the country, at Memphis, she forced him to divorce his eldest sister Cleopatra, whom he passionately loved, and to marry in her stead Selene his younger sister, for whom

Ptolemy
Lathyrus.
Year of
the Flood, 2887.
Before
Christ,
112.

<sup>h</sup> ATHEN. l. ii. c. 33. EPIPHAN. de ponder. & mens. VITRUVIUS in præfat. ad l. vii. <sup>i</sup> Vide USHER. ad annum mundi 3835. <sup>k</sup> JUSTIN l. xxxix. c. 5. APPIAN. in Mithridat. 255 TROG. in Prolog 39, & 40. JOSEPH. Antiquit. l. xiii. c. 18. CLEM. ALEXANDRIN. Strom. l. i. STRAB. l. xvii. p. 795. PLIN. l. ii. c. 67. & l. vi. c. 30.

he had no inclination. On his inauguration he took the name of Soter; but is called by Strabo, Trogus Pompeius, Pliny, Josephus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, Lathyrus, or Lathurus, by Athenæus and Pausanias, Philometor, which Natalis Comes, in his translation of Athenæus, changes into that of Philopator. The name Philometor was given him, as Pausanias observes<sup>1</sup>, by antiphrasis, no one having ever hated his mother more than he did. But he is commonly known by the name, or rather nick-name of Lathyrus, which in the Greek tongue signifies a chick-pea, he having in all likelihood some mark of this sort on his face. The Greek word Lathyros answers the Latin Cicer, whence the family of the Ciceros had their name, one of their ancestors having had an excrescence like a pea on his nose. Cleopatra, whom Lathyrus had been obliged to repudiate, disposed of herself in marriage to Antiochus Cyzicenus, carrying with her an army, which she raised in Cyprus, for her portion, and thereby enabling Cyzicenus to make head against Antiochus Grypus his half brother and competitor, as we have related in the history of Syria<sup>m</sup>. However, Cyzicenus was defeated by Grypus, and his wife Cleopatra dragged from one of the temples of Antioch, where she had taken sanctuary, and put to death by the command of her sister Tryphæna, the wife of Grypus<sup>n</sup>.

IN the mean time Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, the common mother of these two sisters, did not seem to be any ways affected, either with the death of the one, or the crime of the other. Her mind was so actuated by ambition and the desire of reigning, that she had no other thoughts, but how she might best support her authority in Egypt, and there continue to reign without controul during her life. To strengthen herself the better, she gave the kingdom of Cyprus to Alexander her younger son, that she might from thence be assisted by him against his brother Lathyrus, in case he should ever dispute the authority, which she was determined never to part with<sup>o</sup>.

Lathyrus had not reigned long, before his mother, provoked at some measures entered into against her will, found means by base artifices to gain over the people of Alexandria to the interest of her youngest son, and to place him on the throne. The matter is thus related by Justin<sup>p</sup>, Pausanias<sup>q</sup>, on the Porphyrius<sup>r</sup>, and Josephus<sup>s</sup>: While the two competitors for

Cleopatra drives out Lathyrus, and places her youngest son.

<sup>1</sup> PAUSAN. in Atticis, p. 7.      <sup>m</sup> See before p. 26.      <sup>n</sup> Jus- her young-
TIN l. xxxix. c. 3.      <sup>o</sup> PAUSAN. in Atticis. PORPHYR. in er son.
Græc. EUSEB. SCALIG.      <sup>p</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxix. c. 4.      <sup>q</sup> PAU-SAN in Attic.      <sup>r</sup> PORPHYR. ubi supra.      <sup>s</sup> JOS. PH. An-
tiq. l. xiii. c. 19.

the crown of Syria were wasting their strength against each other, John Hyrcanus prince of the Jews, seeing he had nothing to fear from them, undertook the siege of Samaria. Hereupon the Samaritans had recourse to Cyzicenus, who marched to their relief; but had the misfortune to be overthrown in battle by the two sons of Hyrcanus, who had besieged the place. After this victory the two brothers returned to the siege, and pursued it with such vigour, that the besieged were obliged to implore once more the assistance of Cyzicenus, who, not having sufficient forces of his own for such an attempt, desired Lathyrus, king of Egypt to send him a body of troops to be employed against the victorious Jews. Lathyrus readily complied with his request, and ordered six thousand men into Syria, contrary to the opinion and inclination of Cleopatra his mother. For as she had two Jews, Chelcias and Ananias, the sons of that Onias who built the Jewish temple in Egypt, for her chief favourites and ministers, she was very unwilling to do any thing that might redound to the disadvantage of their nation; and therefore, being highly provoked against Lathyrus for this and some other attempts of the like nature against her authority, she first took his wife Selene from him, though he had already two sons by her, and then drove him out of the kingdom. As this could not be effected without the consent of the Alexandrians, the treacherous and unnatural mother, to stir up the populace against her own son, caused some of her favourite eunuchs, on whose fidelity she could depend, to be wounded, and then bringing them covered over with blood into the public assembly of the Alexandrians, pretended that they had been thus treated and abused by Lathyrus, for defending her person against his wicked attempts. She inflamed the people by this black fiction to such a degree, that they rose in a general tumult against the prince, and would have tore him in pieces had he not saved his life on board a ship, which immediately set sail, and delivered him from the imminent danger he was in<sup>t</sup>. Upon the flight of Lathyrus, Cleopatra sent for her younger son Alexander, on whom she had bestowed the kingdom of Cyprus, and having declared him king of Egypt in the room of Lathyrus, obliged the latter to be content with Cyprus on his brother's quitting it<sup>u</sup>. This happened, according to Porphyrius<sup>w</sup>, in the eighth year of Alexander's reign in Cyprus, and eleventh of Cleopatra's in Egypt.

<sup>t</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxix. c. 4. PAUSAN. in Attic. PORPHYR. ibid. p. 60. <sup>u</sup> JUSTIN. PAUSAN. &c. ibid. <sup>w</sup> PORPHYR. in Græc. EUSEB. SCALIG.

NOT long after this revolution, Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, having settled matters at home, marched out against the inhabitants of Ptolemais, and having vanquished them in battle, obliged them to shut themselves up within the walls of their city, and there closely besieged them. Hereupon they dispatched messengers to Ptolemy Lathyrus king of Cyprus, imploring his assistance, and begging he would come in person to their relief. But the messengers were scarce gone, when, upon second thoughts, they began to repent of what they had done. They apprehended, that they might suffer as much by Ptolemy's coming to them as a friend, as they could from Alexander their enemy; for they did not doubt but Cleopatra, upon their entering into an alliance with Lathyrus, would march against them with all the forces of Egypt. Upon this consideration they resolved to defend themselves without admitting any auxiliaries at all, and took care to acquaint Ptolemy with their resolution. But he having in the mean time, with incredible expedition, increased his army to the number of thirty thousand men, and prepared vessels to transport them, notwithstanding their remonstrances, landed his forces in Phœnice, and marched towards Ptolemais, encamping at a small distance from the city. But the Ptolemaians refusing to admit his ambassadors into the town, or to enter into any treaty with him, he was under great perplexity, not knowing what course to take. While he was in this condition, messengers arrived at his camp from Zoilus prince of Dora and from the Gazæans, desiring his assistance against the Jews; for Jannæus, having divided his army, besieged Ptolemais with one part of his forces, and had sent the other to lay waste the territories of Zoilus and Gaza. Ptolemy was glad of this opportunity of employing his troops; and accordingly marched to the assistance of those who had called him. This obliged Jannæus to raise the siege of Ptolemais, and lead back his army from thence to watch the motions of Lathyrus. As he was not in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy, he pretended to court his friendship, and entering into a treaty with him, he engaged to pay him four hundred talents of silver, on condition, that he would deliver Zoilus into his hands, with the places which he held. Lathyrus closed with the proposal, and accordingly seized on Zoilus and all his territories, with a design to deliver them up to Alexander Jannæus. But in the mean time, being informed that Alexander was treating under-hand with Cleopatra, in order to bring her upon him with all her forces and drive him out of Palestine, he broke off all friendship and alliance with him,

Lathyrus passes from Cyprus, where he reigned, into Phœnice.

And makes war upon Alexander Jannæus.

And defeats him.

Cruelty of Lathyrus.

him, and resolved to do him all the mischief he could *. Accordingly the next year, having divided his army into two bodies, he detached one of them to form the siege of Ptolemais for not having admitted his ambassadors; with the other he marched in person against Alexander. At first he took Asochis a city of Galilee on a sabbath day, and carried away from thence ten thousand captives with an immense booty. From Asochis he advanced to Sepphoris, another city of the same country, which he invested; but was soon obliged to raise the siege, upon intelligence that Alexander was coming full march against him at the head of fifty, or as others write of fourscore, thousand men. The two armies met at Asophos, not far from the Jordan, and engaged with the utmost fury. Victory was some time doubtful, eight thousand of Alexander's men, who carried brazen bucklers having fought with great intrepidity and resolution; but at length the Jews were put to the rout after having lost thirty thousand, or, as Timagrinus writes, fifty thousand men, not including the prisoners taken by Lathyrus after the victory. The success of this day was chiefly owing to one Philostephanus, who observing that his men were ready to turn their backs, being warmly charged by the Jewish targeteers, flanked the enemy with fresh troops, put them in confusion, and obliged them, as they were not relieved by their companions, to give ground and save themselves by a precipitate flight †. A most cruel and barbarous action is related to have been done by Lathyrus on this occasion. For having taken up his quarters in the evening after this victory in the neighbouring villages, and finding them full of women and children, he caused all their throats to be cut, and their mangled limbs to be put into boiling caldrons, as if he intended to make a repast with them for his army. His design was to make the Jews believe that his men fed upon human flesh, and thereby strike a greater terror and dread of his army into the neighbouring country. This fact is related by Josephus on the authority of Strabo and Nicolaus Damascenus ‡. Lathyrus, after the defeat of Alexander, ravaged and laid waste the whole country, the Jews being no-ways in a condition to make head against him, or even appear in the field.

THIS victory, and the advantages attending it, alarmed Cleopatra, who apprehending, that, if Lathyrus should make himself master of Judæa and Phœnice, he would thereby be in a condition to invade Egypt and recover that kingdom, resolved to put a stop to his further progress. She therefore commanded an army to be raised, with all possible expedition, under the command of Chelcias and Ananias, the two Jews of whom we have made mention above. At the same time she equipped a powerful fleet with a great number of transports, and putting her troops on board of them, she embarked with them herself and set sail for Phœnice, where she landed her army, and so terrified Lathyrus with her unexpected arrival, that he abandoned the siege of Ptolemais and retired in great haste into Cœle-Syria. Cleopatra dispatched Chelcias with one part of her army after him, and marched with the other, which she put under the command of Ananias, to Ptolemais, expecting the citizens would open their gates to her. But they refusing to admit her, she invested the place with a design to reduce by force that important fortress. In the mean time Chelcias having lost his life in pursuing Lathyrus into Cœle-Syria, that prince, taking advantage of the disorder occasioned in the army by the loss of their general, marched with all his forces into Egypt, hoping to find it unprovided with forces in the absence of his mother, who had carried her best troops with her into Phœnice. But he was disappointed in his expectation; for the forces, which Cleopatra had left for the defence of the country, made good their ground, till they were joined by other troops, which, on this attempt of Lathyrus, she detached from Phœnice to reinforce them. Upon their arrival Lathyrus was obliged to return to Palestine, and there take up his winter quarters at Gaza <sup>w</sup>.

* JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 20.

† JOSEPH. ibid. c. 20, 21.

‡ JOSEPH. ibid.

Obliged by by Cleopatra to quit Phœ-nice.

Cleopatra, however, pursued the siege of Ptolemais with so much vigour, that she reduced it at last. She no sooner entered it, but Alexander Jannæus hastened thither with rich presents to implore her protection. What chiefly recommended him to her favour was his enmity to Lathyrus; and on this account he was received kindly by the queen; but some persons about her thinking she had now a fair opportunity of making herself mistress of all Judæa by seizing Alexander, earnestly pressed her to it. The queen was not averse from following their advice; but Ananias represented to her how base and dishonourable it would be to treat thus an ally engaged with her in the same cause; that it was contrary to the faith of treaties, which are the foundations of society;

*Cleopatra
takes Ptolemais.*

<sup>w</sup> Idem ibid.

that such a conduct would be highly prejudicial to her interest, and would not fail to draw upon her the abhorrence of all the Jews dispersed throughout the world. Partly by these considerations, and partly by his credit, which was great with the queen, he prevailed upon her to drop the design, and to renew her alliance with Alexander, who having, after his return to Jerusalem, recruited his army, took the field anew, and crossing the Jordan laid siege to Gadara *. Lathyrus having spent the winter at Gaza after his retreat out of Egypt, and finding that all his efforts against Palestine would prove ineffectual, so long as his mother opposed him, abandoned that country and returned to Cyprus. Hereupon Cleopatra on her side sailed back into Egypt; and thus Palestine, to the great joy of the Jewish nation, was delivered from all foreign forces †.

Cleopatra, understanding on her return to Alexandria, that a treaty was carrying on at Damascus between her son Lathyrus and Antiochus Cyzicenus, in virtue of which the Syrian was to supply Ptolemy with a body of troops to be employed in a second attempt upon Egypt, the queen, to render their measures abortive, gave her daughter Selene, whom she had taken from Lathyrus, to Antiochus Grypus, sending him at the same time a considerable supply of men and money. By this means Grypus being enabled to renew the war with his brother Cyzicenus, the latter had so much employment upon his hands at home, that he was not in a condition to lend any assistance to Lathyrus, who thereupon was forced to drop the project ‡ and return to Cyprus.

In the mean time Ptolemy Alexander, the younger brother, acted the base part of a slave under the specious appearance of a sovereign. But at last being tired out with the indignities he was forced to suffer from this fury, and terrified at the barbarous cruelty with which she persecuted his brother Lathyrus, especially in thus taking from him his wife and giving her to his enemy; and moreover observing, that she did not scruple to commit the greatest crimes to gratify her ambition, that prince did not think himself any longer safe near her, and therefore stole away privately from Alexandria, chusing rather to live in banishment with safety, than to reign with so wicked and cruel a mother in continual danger of his life. His flight alarmed the queen, who was well apprised, that the Alexan-

* Idem ibid.
epit. l. lxxviii.

† JOSEPH. ibid.

‡ JUSTIN. ibid. LIV.

drians would never suffer her to reign without one of her sons. She therefore used all possible artifices to prevail upon her son to return; and it was not without great sollicitation that he was induced thereunto. Not long after his return he found, that this restless woman had formed a conspiracy against his life, and hired assassins to murder him. But Alexander having notice of it prevented the plot, and by cutting her off first made it turn upon her own head. She was a most wicked woman, as her actions sufficiently shew, and well deserved this death, had it come from any other hand but her own son. As soon as it was known at Alexandria, that the son had caused the mother to be put to death, the enormity of the crime stirred up all his subjects against him; they could not suffer a parricide to reign over them, but drove him out with ignominy, and sending to Cyprus for Lathyrus, replaced him on the throne. Alexander led for some time a rambling life in the island of Cos, while his brother returned in triumph into his dominions amidst the acclamations of his people<sup>a</sup>. Alexander having got together some ships, he next year attempted to return into Egypt; but being met at sea by Tyrrhus, Ptolemy's admiral, he was defeated, and obliged to fly to Myra in Lycia. From Myra he steered his course towards the island of Cyprus, hoping that the inhabitants would declare in his favour, and place him on the throne, which his brother had left empty to return to Egypt. But Chæreas, another of Ptolemy's admirals, coming up with him while he was ready to land, dispersed his fleet, and killed him in the engagement, after he had reigned, or rather bore the title of king, for that was all his mother allowed him, for the space of nineteen years<sup>b</sup>. He left a son behind him named also Alexander, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel of this history.

Alexander murders his mother Cleopatra, and is driven from the throne.

Alexander killed.

DURING all the troubles that disturbed Egypt, Apion, the natural son of Phyſcon, maintained peace and tranquillity in his dominions; and at length, after a reign of one and twenty years, in order to secure them from the miseries, in which the countries subject to the Egyptian government were involved, devised them by will to the Romans. He was, as we have related above, son to Phyſcon by a concubine named Irene, and by him at his death appointed king of Cyrenaica. This country enjoyed its freedom, till it was reduced by

Apion by his last will leaves the kingdom of Cyrenaica to the Romans.

<sup>a</sup> JUSTIN. l. xxxix. c. 4. APPIAN. in Syriac. Epit. LIV. l. lxxvii, lxxviii. MEMNON. c. 33. EUSEB. in Chron. PAUSAN. in Attic. ATHENÆUS, l. xii. p. 550. <sup>b</sup> PORPHYR. in Græc. EUSEB. Scal.

Ptolemy the first king of Egypt; after it became subject to the crown of Egypt, it was governed by the brothers or younger sons of those princes, till Ptolemy, surnamed Apion or the lean, bequeathed it to the Romans. It comprehended the following cities, Cyrene, Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, and Apollonia, whence it was called the African Pentapolis. The first was the capital of the country, and one of the most wealthy cities in Africa. Near it was the fountain Cyre mentioned by Callimachus, and mount Cyra spoke of by Justin. Aristippus the founder of the sect of the Cyrenaics, Eratosthenes the geographer, and Carneades the philosopher, were all natives of Cyrene. This city is mentioned by the prophet Amos <sup>c</sup>, and in the second book of kings by the name of Kir; but is now called Corene and Cairan. Herodotus gives us a very particular, but fabulous, account of the origin of this city <sup>d</sup>; and Justin is pretty diffuse on the same subject <sup>e</sup>; but Strabo tells us in few words, that Cyrene was built by one Battus, a native of the island of Thera, of whom we have spoke in the history of the islands of the Ægean sea, or the Archipelago. From him the Cyreneans are called by the poet Silius Battiadae <sup>f</sup>. As the island of Thera, the native country of Battus, belonged to the Lacedæmonians, Josephus tells us, that the Cyreneans were originally Lacedæmonians <sup>g</sup>. The second of the five cities took its name from Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus and wife of Ptolemy Euergetes the first. This city was first called Hesperis and Hesperides, and stood but at a small distance from the Great Syrtis. Some have placed in its territory the famous gardens of the Hesperides, and the river Lethon or Lethe, which has furnished the poets with numberless fictions. It is at present a miserable village, called by its beggarly inhabitants Bernichio. Arsinoe, another considerable city of Cyrenaica, took its name from the wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, to whom the Egyptians, as Callimachus tells us, paid divine honours, equalling her to Venus. The antient name of this city was, according to Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, Stephanus, &c. Teuchira or Tauchira. Ferrarius gives it the name of Sues, but the Turks call it Barraru. Ptolemais was antiently called Barca, according to Pliny, Strabo, and Stephanus. But Ptolemy makes Barca and Ptolemais two different cities, placing the former in the inland country, and the latter on the coast. It is now commonly called

<sup>c</sup> AMOS, c. 9. v. 7.      <sup>d</sup> HERODOT. l. iv. c. 156.      <sup>e</sup> JUSTIN. l. xiii. c. 7.      <sup>f</sup> SILIUS ITALIC. l. xi. v. 60.      <sup>g</sup> JOSEPH. de Bell. JUDÆIC. l. xi. c. 28.

Tolemata. Cyrenaica comprehended other countries besides the Pentapolis, which the Romans upon the death of Apion did not fail to take possession of. But they were at first very moderate in the exercise of their power, declaring the people a free nation, and only obliging them to pay an annual tribute of laser, which grew here in great quantities, and was better than in any other part of the world (H). By this means

(H) The Laser of Africa, which some moderns confound with the Benjamin, was a viscus and medicinal juice drawn by incision from a plant, which the Latins called Laserpitium, and the Greeks Σιλαφίον. It grew in some places of Cyrenaica, and the liquor it produced was, according to Pliny, worth its weight in silver. Strabo tells us, that in his time the species was lost, some Nomades, who made an irruption into Egypt, having tore up the roots of that shrub (16). But Pliny ascribes the loss of it to the avarice of the publicans, or public farmers, who used to feed their cattle with it. Nevertheless, in Nero's time, there was one shrub of it found, which the natives sent as a great rarity to that emperor (17). The same author gives, in the place we have quoted, an account of the qualities of the Laser, and describes the manner of preparing it; for it was formerly prescribed in many cases by physicians, and thought to be a sovereign remedy against several distempers. The stalks baked under ashes, and taken before any other food for forty days together, purified the blood, corrected the vicious humours, and was deemed a great restorative of a worn out constitution. Pliny adds, that it had the same effects on cattle as on men. It fattened sheep and oxen, according to him, and gave the meat an exquisite flavour. In the year of Rome 660, Valerius and Herennius being consuls, it was first brought from Cyrenaica to that city, as the same writer informs us; and there greatly admired, and sought for by all the citizens. From that time the care and sale of it was committed to the quaestors. In the beginning of the civil war Julius Caesar, having seized the public treasury, is said to have taken out of it, besides other things, fifteen hundred pounds of laser. Afterwards Rome was supplied with this plant from Persia, Syria, and Media; but the laser brought from those countries had much less virtue than that of Cyrenaica. Some botanists have confounded this famous specific with Assa-fætida, and others with Benjamin, which is a valuable sort of rosin brought from the kingdom of Lao, and several parts of the East Indies. Theophrastus has given us in his history a full account of the properties and uses of the Laserpitium; and described its roots, leaves, stalks, and the peculiar form of each of its parts (18). From this antient botanist Pliny seems to have copied the accounts which we

(16) Strab. l. ix.
phrastus, l. iii.

(17) Plin. l. ix, c. 3.

(18) Theo-

means the Libyan Pentapolis enjoyed a perfect freedom, and acknowledged no foreign dominion, Rome being at present content with lessening very considerably the power of Egypt. Not long after, this country became a prey to two tyrants, who successively usurped a sovereign authority over their fellow-citizens; but Lucullus, while he served under Sylla in quality of quæstor, having touched at Cyrene as he coasted along Africa, restored the oppressed province to its former liberty, re-settled it in peace, and reformed its laws, putting at the same time the Cyreneans in mind of the answer Plato had formerly given to the deputies of their nation, desiring him to give them a plan of government. The philosopher refused to grant them their request, saying, that a people so happy and rich as they were, would never submit to the authority of laws <sup>h</sup>. But to return to Egypt.

Lathyrus takes the city of Thebes, and plunders it.

Ptolemy Lathyrus, being upon the death of his mother and brother delivered from two formidable competitors to his crown, began to settle all things on their antient footing, and to remedy, as far as in him lay, the many disorders and abuses which had crept in during the late troubles. But the city of Thebes in the upper Egypt refused to submit to his regulations, and even attempted to shake off the yoke, and resume their antient liberties. Hereupon Lathyrus marched against the rebels; defeated them in a pitched battle, and laid close siege to their city, which with incredible obstinacy held out against the utmost efforts of a victorious army for the space of three years. But it was at last taken, and by way of punishment given up to be plundered by the enraged soldiery, who left every-where melancholy marks of their avarice and cruelty. Thebes, which till that time had been one of the greatest and most wealthy cities of Egypt, was on this occasion reduced to so low a condition, that it never after made any figure in history <sup>i</sup>. It is surprising, that Pausanias, deceived by the identity of names, should apply the history of the revolt and conquest of Thebes in Egypt to the city of Thebes in Bæotia. What had the kings of Egypt to do with Thebes in Bæotia, which at this time was under the protection of the Romans, having been united in interest with that read of it in his nineteenth book. If we stand to either of these descriptions or accounts, we must own, that the laser is very different both from the Benjamin, and from the stinking and offensive drug called Assa-fœtida.

<sup>h</sup> APPIAN in Mithridat. PLUT. in Lucullo. <sup>i</sup> PAUSAN. in Atticis, p. 8.

republic

republic against the kings of Macedon, during the whole time of the Macedonian war?

TOWARDS the latter end of this king's reign, Lucullus, being sent by Sylla to procure ships from the princes who retained any regard for the Roman name, in order to block up the ports of Piræus and Munychia, landed at Alexandria; where the inhabitants, pursuant to Lathyrus's orders, received him with those honours which were paid only to the kings of Egypt. His entrance into that city was a kind of triumph. Upon the news of his approach the royal fleet sailed out in good order to meet him. The king received him with all possible marks of distinction; appointed him an apartment in his own palace, an honour which had never before been bestowed upon any foreigner; and ordered his ministers to give Lucullus's attendants four times the allowance, which was usually given to other ambassadors. But the Roman contented himself with bare necessaries, and refused a present in money, which Ptolemy pressed him to accept. He likewise declined going to Memphis, and to the other famous cities of Egypt, to see there the wonders that were the admiration of all strangers, saying, that such amusements became none but idle persons, and that it would be shameful in him to take a journey of pleasure, while his general was daily hazarding his life in the service of his country. But, after all, the king could not be prevailed upon to part with any of his ships, pretending, that he was threatened with a civil war in his own dominions. He therefore dismissed Lucullus without complying with his request, after having presented him with his picture cut in an emerald of great value*. This picture, or head of Ptolemy, cut in an emerald, Turnebius is pleased to turn into a cup set with precious stones.

NOT long after Lathyrus died, having reigned from the death of his father thirty six years, viz. eleven jointly with his mother in Egypt, eighteen in Cyprus, and seven alone in Egypt, after his mother's death. Ptolemy the astronomer takes no notice of Alexander in his canon, but reckons the whole time from the death of Ptolemy Physcon to that of Ptolemy Lathyrus, as the reign of the latter, though he lived half of them in the island of Cyprus (1). He was succeeded by * PLUT. in Lucullo.
Cleopatra

(1) Though no two persons were ever more unlike, than Cleopatra the mother of Philometor and Physcon, and Cleopatra the mother of Lathyrus and Alexander, yet the two jesuits, Catrou and Rouillé,

Cleopatra his daughter, and only legitimate offspring. She is called by Pausanias <sup>1</sup> Berenice, which was her proper name; for

<sup>1</sup> PAUSAN. in Atticis.

illé, authors of the Roman history now publishing at Paris, confound them, and charge the former, who was a princefs of an unblemished character, and governed with great equity, wisdom, and moderation, during the minority of her children, with the many enormous crimes, which by all historians, except themselves, are imputed to the latter (19). Their confounding thus the two mothers, leads them of course into the like confusion with respect to their children, and this second mistake, still more material than the former, plunges them into endless blunders, which plainly betray in those reverend writers a very superficial knowledge, not to say a total ignorance, of the Syrian history. For what they find related by the antients of Lathyrus and Alexander the sons of Phyſcon, and his niece Cleopatra, they apply to Philometor and his brother Phyſcon, the sons of Antiochus Epiphanes, and Cleopatra the daughter of Antiochus the Great. Thus, for instance, they tell us, that Phyſcon the youngest was also called Alexander, that the capricious mother, whom they call elsewhere a virtuous princefs (20), conceived a fondness for him, which tended to nothing less than robbing Ptolemy the elder brother, whom she hated, of the crown, and that hence the surname of Philometor was given him by way of derision. A few lines after they tell us, that the son, whom she tenderly loved, killed her with his own hand, and that he, and not the elder, was for this parricide ironically surnamed Philometor. What a complication of blunders, anachronisms, and contradictions! This is, if we may be allowed the expression, turning the whole history of Syria topsy-turvy. Cleopatra, the mother of Philometor and Phyſcon, died quietly in her bed, when her eldest son was but thirteen years old; for the year ensuing he was declared, as S. Jerom informs us (21), to be out of his minority, which was a great solemnity among the Egyptians, called Ααληθρηα, or, the solemnity of salutation, because they then first saluted their young prince as king. This ceremony was always performed in the fourteenth year of their king's age, he being then, according to their laws, out of his minority. Polybius tells us (22), that Cleopatra, as she was sister to Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, and mother to Philometor and Phyſcon, prevented, so long as she lived, a rupture between them; but that, upon her death, the management of affairs falling into the hands of Lenæus, a nobleman of the court, and Eulæus an eunuch, these no sooner entered on the administration, but for as all the males, according to the established custom of the royal family of Egypt, had the name of Ptolemy, so the females had that of Cleopatra, and besides other names to distinguish them from each other. Thus, for instance, Selene was called Cleopatra, and so were also her two sisters<sup>m</sup>. In like manner the daughter of Lathyrus, whose proper name was Berenice, bears also that of Cleopatra. The observing of this will remove many obscurities and difficulties which occur in the history of Egypt. Sylla, who, at this time, was perpetual dictator at Rome, and gave or took away crowns at pleasure, hearing that Lathyrus was dead without male issue, sent Alexander, the son of that Alexander, who had reigned before Lathyrus, and murdered his mother, to succeed his uncle in the kingdom, as the next heir of the male line.

(19) Vide hist. Rom. l. xliii. (20) Lib. xxxix. Ad ann. urb. 561. (21) Hieronym. in c. 11 Dan. (22) Polyb. legat. 81. p. 908.

THIS Alexander had met with many adventures. When Cleopatra, the mother of Ptolemy Alexander and Ptolemy Lathyrus, marched with her army into Phœnice against the latter, she sent her grandson Alexander, the son of the former who then reigned with her in Egypt, into the island of Cos, with a great sum of money, all her jewels, and her most valuable effects, to be deposited there as a reserve against all events. When Mithridates made himself master of that island, the inhabitants delivered up into his hands the young Egyptian prince, and the treasures which his grand-mother had lodged there with him. The king of Pontus gave him an education suitable to his birth; but he, not thinking himself safe with a prince who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own children, fled from the court of Mithridates, and took refuge in Sylla's camp, while that general was making war in Asia. From that time he had lived in the dictator's family, and in a manner among his domestics, till news was brought to Rome of the death of Lathyrus. Then Sylla sent him to take possession of the crown of Egypt, as the nearest heir male of the deceased king. But the Alexandrians, having placed Cleopatra the daughter of Lathyrus on the throne six months before his arrival in Egypt, to compromise the matter, and avoid displeasing Sylla, who governed Rome with an

Alexander
II.
Year of
the Flood, 2923.
Before
Christ,
76.

Alexander marries Cleopatra
the daughter of Lathyrus, and murders her.

<sup>m</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24.

they demanded of Epiphanes the provinces of Cœle-Syria and Palestine. This gave occasion to the war, and not the ambition of Antiochus, veiled with the specious pretence of assisting Philometor against the intrigues of his mother, prejudiced in favour of her youngest son, Cleopatra being dead a whole year before this rupture.

absolute

Is driven out.

Dies in banishment.

absolute sway, prevailed upon Alexander to marry Cleopatra and reign jointly with her. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated with great pomp and magnificence; but Alexander, either out of a dislike to Cleopatra's person, or not caring to have a partner in the government, caused her to be assassinated nineteen days after the marriage, the blackest murders and parricides being now become in a manner fashionable at the court of Egypt<sup>n</sup>. Porphyry and Appian tell us, that the Alexandrians, highly provoked at this murder and the haughty and imperious airs their new king assumed, rose up in arms, surrounded his palace, and dragging him into the gymnasium, there put him to death, after a reign of nineteen days<sup>o</sup>. But it is manifest from Suetonius and Cicero, that he reigned fifteen years after the death of Cleopatra, as we shall make appear in the sequel of this history, against the common opinion, or rather mistake, of historians and chronologers, who begin the reign of Ptolemy Auletes here, confounding it with that of Alexander. This prince reigned fifteen years, during which time he made himself so odious to his subjects by his cruelties and vices, that at last they made a general insurrection, and would have sacrificed him to their resentment, had he not seasonably withdrawn himself from the fury of the enraged multitude. He fled first to Pompey, who was then in that neighbourhood carrying on the war with Mithridates king of Pontus, and offered him rich presents and a large sum of money, in hopes of prevailing upon him, by that means, to espouse his cause and restore him to the crown; but Pompey refused to meddle with this matter, as being foreign to his commission. Hereupon the banished prince took refuge in the city of Tyre, whither he had sent before great part of his treasures, and there died some months after, perhaps of grief for the loss of his crown<sup>p</sup>. It is to be observed, that Ptolemy, in his chronological canon, does not reckon Alexander among the kings of Egypt, but begins the reign of Auletes his successor from the death of Lathyrus, tho' it is manifest, both from Cicero and Suetonius, that Alexander reigned full fifteen years between these two princes<sup>q</sup>. Perhaps Auletes, on his father Lathyrus's death, got possession of some part of the Egyptian empire; and, on this account, is looked upon by Ptolemy as his immediate successor, tho' he had not the whole kingdom till fifteen years after.

<sup>n</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 24. APPIAN. de bell. civil. l. i. PORPHYR. in GRÆC. EUSEB. Scalig. <sup>o</sup> APPIAN. & PORPHYR. ibid. <sup>p</sup> SUETON. in Jul. Cæs. c. 11. TROGUS in prolog. CIC. in orat. 2. contra Rullum. <sup>q</sup> CIC. & SUET. ibid.

Alexander, when driven from his dominions and forced to shut himself up in the city of Tyre, had, by his ambassadors, appealed to the Roman senate against his rebellious subjects; but dying before the negotiation was finished, he made over, by his last will, all his rights to the Roman people, declaring them heirs to his kingdom, not out of any affection to the republic, but to raise, by that means, a dispute between Rome and his rival Auletes, whom the Egyptians had placed on the throne. The will was brought to Rome, where it occasioned warm debates. Some, with Lucius Marcius Philippus, were for taking immediate possession of the kingdom bequeathed to them in prejudice of Auletes. Others, with Cicero, were of opinion, that no notice should be taken of such a will, since Alexander had no right to dispose of his dominions in prejudice of his successor, and to exclude from the crown all those who were of the royal blood of Egypt. Cicero represented, that such a notorious usurpation would debase the majesty of the Roman people and involve them in endless wars and disputes; that the fruitful fields of Egypt would be a strong temptation to the ambition of the restless tribunes and to the avarice of the common people, who would claim those lands as due to them on account of their poverty; and lastly, that this new acquisition would revive the bloody quarrels, which the Agrarian laws had so often raised in the heart of the republic. The authority of Cicero, and the reasons he alledged against the opinion of Marcius Philippus were of great weight with the senate; but what prevented them from seizing on Egypt at that time was, their lately having taken possession of Bithynia, in virtue of the will of Nicomedes, and of Cyrene and Libya by the like will of Apion. They thought therefore, that if they should, on the same pretence, take possession of Egypt, this might give too great umbrage, as if they designed to engross to themselves all foreign dominions; besides, as Mithridates was not at that time intirely reduced, they were afraid this might involve them in a new war, while they had the other still on their hands. On these considerations they contented themselves, for the present, with sending deputies to Tyre, to take possession of the effects of the deceased king for the use of the republic, and dropped all the rest<sup>r</sup>.

THE Egyptians, having driven Alexander from the throne in the manner we have related, called to the crown Ptolemy, surnamed Auletes, or the Flute player, the natural son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, who had no male issue by his wife, that

Ptolemy
Auletes.
Year of
the Flood, 2938.
Before
Christ,
61.

<sup>r</sup> Cic. in orat. 1. & 2. in Rull

Is acknowledged by the Romans.

survived him, but several by his concubines. One of these had the kingdom of Cyprus, where he reigned till he was, with the greatest injustice, deprived of it by the Romans. Auletes, on whom the Alexandrians bestowed the crown after the expulsion of Alexander, is also called by the historians Dionysius Neos, or the New Bacchus. The name of Auletes was given him, because he piqued himself upon his skill in playing on the flute, and even debased himself so as to contend for the prize in the public games. He took great pleasure in imitating the effeminacies of the Bacchanals, dancing in a female dress, and in the same measures that they used during the solemnities of their god Bacchus; and hence he had the name of the New Dionysius or Bacchus<sup>c</sup>. Strabo tells us, that he surpassed all the kings who reigned before him in the effeminacy of his manners, and was no less infamous on that account, than his grandfather Phyſcon was for his wickedness<sup>d</sup>. As he had but a contested title to the crown, being only the natural son of Lathyrus, and the Romans pretending, that in virtue of the last will of Alexander, his dominions were devolved upon their republic, his first care was to get himself declared an ally of Rome, which was a certain means of being authentically acknowledged lawful king of Egypt. This he obtained by applying to Julius Cæsar, who was then consul, and, being immensely in debt, willingly embraced this opportunity of raising money; for he obliged the king of Egypt to purchase the desired alliance at the price of six thousand talents, that is, one million one hundred sixty-two thousand five hundred pounds sterling, paid partly to himself, and partly to Pompey, whose interest was necessary for obtaining the consent of the people<sup>e</sup>. Tho' that prince's yearly revenues were twice this sum, yet he could not raise it immediately without over-taxing his subjects, which occasioned a general discontent throughout the kingdom. While the Egyptians were thus dissatisfied with the conduct of their king, and even ready to rise up in arms against him, a most unjust decree was carried at Rome by the tribune Clodius, for deposing Ptolemy king of Cyprus, seizing his kingdom for the republic, and confiscating all his effects. When the Alexandrians heard of the intentions of the republic, they pressed Auletes to demand that island as an antient appendant of Egypt, and, in case of a denial, to declare war against the imperious and incroaching republic;

<sup>c</sup> STRABO, l. xvii. p. 796. TROGUS in prolog. 39. LUCIAN. de non tem. cred. calum. <sup>d</sup> STRABO, ibid. <sup>e</sup> PLUT. in Cæſ. DIO. CASS. l. xx.viii.

which

which he refusing to do, the people, already provoked with the exorbitant taxes with which he loaded them, ran to arms Is driven and surrounded the palace; but the king escaped their fury, from the and, by the advice of his favourite Theophanes, who gave throne. him timely notice of the insurrection, having privately withdrawn from Alexandria, crossed Egypt, and embarked for Rhodes, with a design to implore the assistance of his old protectors at Rome <sup>w</sup>. In his flight he had time to reflect, as Tully observes *, on his change of fortune, and being very hungry and much fatigued, he applied to a peasant, who received him into his poor hut, and presented him with a piece of brown bread, which seemed so savoury to him, that he used to say, he had never had a more delicious meal.

THE king arriving in Rhodes was informed, that the famous Cato was there in his way to Cyprus, being charged by the seditious Clodius to put in execution the unjust decree of the people, depriving Ptolemy of that island, as we have related at length in the history of Cyprus <sup>y</sup>. Auletes, desirous to confer with a man of his prudence and integrity Confers about his affairs, sent immediately to acquaint him with his with Cato arrival, expecting, that, upon this notice, he would without at Rhodes. delay come and wait upon him; but the proud Roman told the messenger, that, if the king of Egypt had any thing to say to Cato, he might, if he thought proper, come to his house. Accordingly Auletes went to pay him a visit; but Cato did not vouchsafe so much as to rise when the king entered his chamber, or to salute him otherwise than as a private person. The Egyptian monarch was much surprized to see so much haughtiness and state, joined to the great simplicity and modesty which he observed in the Roman's dress and equipage, and would have entertained a very mean opinion of him, had he not discovered in his conversation an extraordinary fund of probity and good sense; for the king having laid before him the situation of his affairs, Cato blamed him for leaving Egypt, the richest kingdom in the world, in order to expose himself to the many insults and indignities which he would meet with at Rome, nothing being there in request but wealth, pomp, and grandeur. He did not scruple to tell him, that all the riches of Egypt would not be sufficient to satisfy the rapacious avarice of the leading men there; that they would not concern themselves about the interests of a king, who brought nothing with him but wants and complaints;

<sup>w</sup> DIO CASS. & PLUT ibid Epitom l. iv. l. 104

* CIC.

<sup>y</sup> Tuscul. quest. l. v.

<sup>y</sup> Vide Vol. VII. p. 314.

that new patrons, after he had purchased them at a great rate, would prove new chains to him, &c. He therefore advised him to return to Egypt, and strive, by a more equitable conduct, to regain the affections of his people, which he had lost by his male-administration. He even offered to reconduct him thither in person, and employ his mediation and good offices in his behalf<sup>2</sup>. Ptolemy, reflecting on what the wise Roman told him, perceived the error he had committed in quitting his kingdom, and entertained some thoughts of returning to it; but, the friends he had with him having dissuaded him from following Cato's good counsel, he pursued his journey to Rome.

Goes to Rome.

His daughter Berenice placed on the throne.

In the mean time the Egyptians, not knowing what was become of him, and either believing, or feigning to believe, that he was dead, placed Berenice his daughter on the throne, and sent an embassy into Syria to Antiochus Asiaticus, who, by his mother Selene the daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, was the next male heir of the family, inviting him into Egypt, in order to marry Berenice, and reign jointly with her; but he being dead, the ambassadors were enjoined by the chief men of Alexandria, to make the same proposal to Seleucus his brother<sup>3</sup>, who readily accepted the offer. This Seleucus Strabo describes as a monster of deformity, and adds, that his ill-shaped body was animated by a yet more deformed soul. The Egyptians soon discovered his true character, and gave him the nickname of Cybiosactes, that is, the Scullion; for such he was in his whole conduct and behaviour. He was scarce seated on the throne, when he gave a signal instance of his sordid and avaricious temper. Ptolemy the first had caused the body of Alexander the Great, to be deposited in a coffin of massy gold; this Cybiosactes seized, and by this shocking crime provoked Berenice, who was already grown weary of him, to such a degree, that, breaking through the most sacred ties, she caused him to be strangled<sup>4</sup>. Having thus got rid of a man, whose presence she could no longer bear, she married one Archelaus, high-priest of Comana in Pontus, who pretended to be the son of Mithridates the Great, tho' he was, in fact, only the son of that king's chief general, whom we shall have occasion to bring upon the scene in the history of Pontus<sup>5</sup>.

She murders her husband
Seleucus, and marries Archelaus.

<sup>2</sup> PLUT. in Caton.

<sup>3</sup> PORPHYR. ubi supra. & STRABO, l.

xvii. p. 796.

<sup>4</sup> SUET. in Vespas. c. xix. STRABO. l. xvii.

p. 794.

<sup>5</sup> STRABO, ibid. DIO. CASS. l. xxxix. p. 115—117.

CIC. in Pison. n. 49, 50.

Auletes,

Auletes, on his arrival at Rome, found, to his great concern, that Cæsar, on whom he chiefly depended, was making war in Gaul. However, Pompey, his other patron, who was then in the city, received him with great expressions of kindness, gave him an apartment in his house, and omitted nothing that lay in his power to serve him ; but, notwithstanding the protection of so powerful a man, the king was forced to go from house to house, like a private person, soliciting the suffrages of the senators. After he had spent immense treasures in procuring a strong party at Rome, he was at last, by the interest of Pompey, admitted to lay his complaints before the senate ; which he did with a great deal of art, exaggerating the hard usage he had met with from his rebellious subjects, and putting the senators in mind of his alliance with the republic, by the articles of which they were bound to support him to the utmost of their power, against his enemies both foreign and domestic. While Auletes was thus making interest at Rome, and courting the republic for her consent to his being restored by force of arms, the Alexandrians, being informed of what passed in Italy, sent a solemn embassy to the senate, consisting of an hundred citizens of distinction, to justify their revolt before the conscript fathers. Dion, a celebrated academic philosopher, who had many powerful friends at Rome was at the head of this embassy ; but Ptolemy found means to destroy most of them, either at Rome, or before their arrival in that metropolis ; which so intimidated the rest, that they declined acquitting themselves of their commission, and even demanding justice for the murder of their colleagues<sup>d</sup>. The rumor of these murders raised the indignation of the public, and gave a general alarm. Marcus Favonius the stoic was the first who declared in senate against Auletes. He accused him before the fathers, and exaggerated his late murders, his former mis-carriages, and the shameful meannesses of many self-interested senators, who had suffered themselves to be corrupted with his money. At the motion of this zealous senator, Dio, the chief of the embassy, was summoned to appear before the senate, in order to give, by word of mouth and upon oath, an authentic account of the assassination of the ambassadors ; but Pompey, Lentulus, and the other great men at Rome, whose interest the perfidious king had bought at a vast price, declared so openly in his favour, that Dio was afraid to appear ; however, he was soon after stabbed by an assassin,

<sup>d</sup> DIO CASS l. xcvii, xcvi. PLIN. l. xxxiii c. 10 CIC. epist. familiar. in Pison. & pro Cæ. PLUT. in Cat. MIN. STRAB. l. xvii.

Auletes whom Ptolemy had hired for that purpose. The king, knowing he could depend on Pompey's protection, was not ashamed to own himself the chief author of that crime; nay, he even pretended to justify so base and treacherous an action; but nevertheless a prosecution was carried on against Ascitius the assassin, his accomplices, who were for the most part the domestics of Lucius at whose house Dio lodged, attesting upon oath, that he stabbed him with his own hand; but, in spite of these and other unexceptionable evidences, Ascitius was acquitted. Then an action was brought by the adverse party against the judges, for selling themselves to Ptolemy and betraying their trust; but, Pompey and his faction employing all their interest against the accusers, the venal judges were likewise cleared, and injustice triumphed<sup>c</sup>.

A decree for his restoration carried in the senate

THO' the scandalous behaviour of Auletes at Rome had made him highly odious and contemptible to the generality of the Romans, yet, by the powerful interest of Pompey's party, a decree was carried in senate, whereby it was enacted, That the Egyptians should be compelled, by force of arms, to receive their king. All the great men of Rome were ambitious of being charged with the commission of re-conducting a king, who was undoing himself and ruining his kingdom, to reward those who protected him. No one had more reason to expect it than P. Lentulus Spinther the proconsul, he having been appointed governor of Cilicia, which lay in that neighbourhood, and Cicero supporting him with all his eloquence and interest. Pompey likewise, Cn. Cornelius Marcellinus, who was then consul, and many others, were no less desirous of a commission, which, they well knew, would be attended with immense profit. After several months warm debates, Pompey, whose too great power gave already no small umbrage, was excluded, under this honourable pretence, that his presence was necessary at Rome, he being charged with the care of maintaining plenty there. After the exclusion of Pompey, all things seemed to favour the proconsul of Cilicia's claim; but, what through the superstition of the people, what by the artifices of one of the tribunes, he was unexpectedly disappointed as well as Pompey. A statue erected on the hill of Alba being beat down with thunder, the Sibylline books were consulted, to discover the meaning of a prognostic which was deemed ominous. C. Porcius Cato, who was then a young man and one of the tribunes, took this opportunity of opening the Sibylline books, and thereby fruit-

But opposed by Porcius Cato.

<sup>c</sup> DIO. CASS. STRABO, PLIN. CIC. ibid.

rating the intrigues and expectations of the leading men in Rome; for he was an eloquent speaker, a zealous advocate for virtue and highly incensed at the meanness of the Roman magistrates, who, for great sums of money, had engaged to protect a king, whose crimes had rendered him insupportable to his subjects. He read, or pretended to read, in the Sibylline prophecies the following words: If a king of Egypt shall apply to you for succour, assist him, but not with an army; if you use violence, fear great dangers and misfortunes<sup>f</sup>. Cicero acknowledges, that all men of sense were convinced, that the pretended prediction was forged; but nevertheless the young tribune obliged the keepers of the Sibylline books to report it to the people, and rehearse the words in full comitia. The law required, that these oracles should never be divulged till they had been examined by the senate, who suppressed or published them as they thought fit; but Cato, being well apprized, that Ptolemy would, by his immense profusions, prevail upon the self-interested senators to suppress an oracle no-ways favourable to his restoration, had no regard to this law, but proclaimed the pretended answer of the Sibyls without imparting it to the senate<sup>g</sup>. The reading of the words of the Sibyl in the comitia had the desired effect on the minds of the people; and the decree, which empowered Lentulus Spinther to carry back Auletes to his dominions, was, at their request, revoked and annulled<sup>h</sup>. Then several expedients were proposed, in order to facilitate the king's return, without disobeying the pretended oracle; but the whole year being spent in fruitless debates, Ptolemy, tired out with these delays, resolved to leave Rome, where he had incurred the hatred of the people, and retiring to the temple of Diana at Ephesus, the most venerable asylum in Asia, wait there in safety the decision of his fate<sup>i</sup>. From thence he wrote to Ammonius, whom he had left with the character of his ambassador to the senate, desiring, that Pompey might be appointed to replace him on the throne; and his letter being read in the comitia by Aulus Plautius tribune of the people, his colleague Caninius, whom Plutarch through mistake calls Canidius, was of opinion, that Pompey, attended only by two lictors, for no violence could be used without disobeying the oracle, should go into Egypt, and, by his authority alone, bring the king into favour with

Auletes leaves Rome.

<sup>f</sup> Cic. l. i. ad familiar. ep. 1. & in orat. pro Rabir. Posthumus, & in L. Pison. PLUT. in Pomp. STRABO, l. xvii. p. 796. DIO, l. xxxix.

<sup>g</sup> Cic. l. i. ad familiar. epist. 4. &

DIO, ibid.

<sup>h</sup> Cic. ibid.

<sup>i</sup> Cic. & DIO, ibid.

his rebellious subjects ; but the tribune was herein opposed by the senate, and Pompey, notwithstanding his great interest, obliged to drop the pursuit of an honour which he most passionately desired. Pompey being thus excluded, the senators were greatly divided in their sentiments. Bibulus and the consul Marcellinus were of opinion, that the king should be restored by three ambassadors, and that those only should be chosen who had no other employment. Their view in this was to exclude Lentulus, at that time governor of Cilicia and Cyprus. Crassus agreed with Bibulus and Marcellinus, as to the re-settling of the king on his throne by three ambassadors, without an army ; but was not for excluding such as had employments. Cicero never quitted the interest of Lentulus, who during his consulship, had greatly contributed to his being recalled from banishment ; nay, he was so desirous that his friend should have the honour of re-establishing the king of Egypt, and enjoy the advantages, which, he was well apprised, would accrue to him from thence, that, after Lentulus was gone into Cilicia, he wrote to him, advising him to advance, without any further orders from the senate, with all his sea and land-forces to Alexandria, and oblige the inhabitants by force to receive their king. “ You are the “ best judge, says he in a letter he wrote to him on this “ occasion, of what you can undertake and perform. If “ you can reduce Alexandria and the other cities of Egypt, “ it is, without doubt, both for your honour and that of “ the republic, that you advance thither with your fleet and “ army, leaving the king at Ptolemais, or some other “ neighbouring place, till you have got the better of the “ rebels, and settled all things in peace, so that he may re“ turn without danger. In this manner you will re-instate “ him without troops, which as our zealots pretend, is the “ meaning of the Sibyl.” The Romans were prohibited by the oracle to re-conduct the king of Egypt with an army ; and Cicero was of opinion, that if Lentulus had first reduced Egypt by force of arms, and then carried back the king without an army, he would not have acted therein contrary to the prohibition of the Sibyl, since it would be still true, that the king had returned without an army. One would hardly believe, that such a grave magistrate as Cicero could be capable of eluding the oracle by such an evasion ; but he looked upon it only as a political contrivance to disappoint the expectations of Pompey, Lentulus, and the other great men, who were desirous to command the army on this occasion. But, Lentulus, being well apprised of the many difficulties, culties, which he foresaw, would attend this enterprize, followed the advice which Cicero gave him in the close of his letter, viz. that he should by no means undertake so great an enterprize, unless he could promise himself certain success <sup>k</sup>.

Pompey, on his being excluded from the honour of restoring the king, had wrote to him, advising the banished prince to recur to Gabinus, who commanded in Syria in quality of proconsul; and Ptolemy, seeing the senate came to no resolution with respect to his restoration, but spent the whole time in fruitless debates, determined to follow Pompey's advice. Gabinus was a man of a most infamous character, and ready to undertake any thing for money, without the least regard to law, justice, or religion. He had quite ruined by his enormous robberies and oppressions, the unhappy province of Syria, whither he had been sent after his consulship; and, finding that the Syrians could no longer gratify his avarice, had resolved to make war on the Arabians, in hopes of enriching himself with their spoils; but, in the mean time, Mithridates, who had been driven out of Parthia, by his brother Orodes, flying for refuge to him, prevailed on the avaricious proconsul, by promising him large sums, to turn his arms against Parthia, and assist him in the recovery of his crown. He had already begun his march and passed the Euphrates, with a design to replace Mithridates on the throne, not doubting but he should return loaded with an immense booty, the Parthians being deemed at that time a very wealthy nation; but as he was advancing with Mithridates, whom he took along with him for his guide, towards the borders of Parthia, Ptolemy came up with him, and delivered into his hands letters from Pompey, their common friend and patron, whereby he was desired to restore the banished king, upon such terms as he should think fit to require, and the king to grant. It was against an express law for any governor to go out of the limits of his province, or to make war, upon any pretence whatsoever, even with the neighbouring princes or states, without positive orders from the senate and people of Rome; but the authority of Pompey and the hope of a great reward made the proconsul despise this law, and undertake the re-establishing of the king of Egypt, contrary to the opinion of all the officers of the army, except Marc Antony alone, who commanded the horse, and supported with great

Rekurs to Gabinus
governor of Syria.

<sup>k</sup> Cic. ad famil. l. i. epist. 7.

warmth the king's interest <sup>1</sup>. The more dangerous the enterprize was, the more right Gabinus thought he had to make Who un- Ptolemy pay dear for it ; and therefore was not ashamed to dertakes to demand of the king ten thousand talents for his pains, that is, restore him. one million nine hundred thirty seven thousand five hundred pounds sterling, one half of it to be paid immediately, and the other as soon as he should be settled on the throne.
Ptolemy who was glad to be restored upon any terms, agreed to pay the proconsul the abovementioned sum ; but Ga- binius would not stir till the first payment was made, which obliged the king to borrow it of Caius Rabirius
Posthumius, a Roman knight, Pompey interposing his credit and authority for the payment of the capital and interest <sup>m</sup>.

Marc An- Gabinus, having received the sum of five thousand talents, tony dis- repassed the Euphrates, and, leaving Mithridates to shift for tinguishes himself; began his march towards Egypt. As he drew near himself in the borders of that country, he detached Antony with a body this war. of horse to seize the passes, and open the way for the rest of the army. As this young Roman was the chief promoter of the expedition, so he acted in it with the utmost vigour and resolution ; for he not only possessed himself of the passes of a sandy desert, and found a way through the marshes of Solonis, which the Egyptians call the exhalations of Tryphon, but took the city of Pelusium, which was a place of great importance, and the key of Egypt on that side <sup>n</sup>. For this success he was indebted to Hyrchanus prince of Judæa, and Antipater the father of Herod, who not only assisted him with provisions, but prevailed upon their countrymen, who lived in Pelusium, to favour the Romans, and introduce them into the city. Pto- lemy, on his entering the place, was for putting all the Egyp- tians to the sword ; but Antony opposed so barbarous an execution, remonstrating, that it would draw both upon him and the Romans the general hatred of the nation; and by that means retard at least, if not prevent, his restoration ; since the Egyptians would chuse rather to die in battle, than be sacrificed, after victory, to the resentment of the conqueror <sup>o</sup>.
 As soon as Gabinus received advice of Antony's good success,

<sup>1</sup> DIO. CASS. l. xxxix. APPIAN. in Parthic. & Syriac. PLUT. in Anton. CIC. in Orat. pro Rabir Posthum. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 11. & de bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 6. JUSTIN. l. xlii. c. 4.

<sup>m</sup> CIC. PLUT JOSEPH. DIO. ibid.

<sup>n</sup> PLUT. in Anton. AP-

PIAN. de bell. civil. l. v. p. 676.

<sup>o</sup> PLUT. ibid. JOSEPH.

l. i. de bell. Jud. c. 6. & l. xiv. c. 10.

he advanced into the heart of Egypt, the waters of the Nile, as it was then winter, being very low. Archelaus, who, as we have said before, had married Berenice, and reigned jointly with her, met Gabinus at the head of a considerable army, and offered him battle; but the Egyptian troops were cut in pieces, and Archelaus himself taken prisoner, so that the proconsul might at once have put an end to the war; but his avarice prompted him to prolong it; for he gave Archelaus his liberty, upon his paying a considerable ransom, and then pretending that he had made his escape, demanded fresh sums of Ptolemy to pursue the war. Rabirius, who followed the king in this expedition, lent him what money he wanted at a very high interest. Such were the artifices made use of by the Romans of this age to enrich themselves. Archelaus, when again at liberty, would have long disputed the crown with his rival, had his troops seconded his valour, for he was a young man of extraordinary parts; but the Egyptians having, in several encounters, turned their backs at the very first onset, he was at length obliged to shut himself up in Alexandria, which Gabinus closely besieged, both with his sea and land-forces. Archelaus defended the place with incredible bravery, till he was reduced to the last extremity; and then he marched out of the distressed city to hazard another battle, which put an end both to his reign and life; for being abandoned by his effeminate and dastardly troops, he chose rather to die in the field, than survive the loss of his crown<sup>p</sup>. Marc Antony, who had been his particular friend and guest, hearing that he was slain, commanded his body to be sought for among the dead, wept over it when it was found, and took upon himself to inter it with all the pomp and magnificence that was due to a person of his rank<sup>q</sup>.

Ptolemy, being now master of Alexandria, easily reduced Auletes the rest of Egypt to his obedience, and was thereby thoroughly resettled on his throne. For the preventing of new insurrections, Gabinus, before he returned into his province, left some of his Roman forces in Alexandria to keep that city in awe; but these soon exchanged the Roman manners for the Egyptian, and gave into the luxury and effeminacy of those among whom they lived<sup>r</sup>. Auletes, seeing himself again in quiet possession of the crown, began to vent his rage on all those who had been any ways concerned in the rebellion. His daughter Berenice was sacrificed the first to his reresettled on the throne.
Puts to death his daughter

<sup>p</sup> DIO. l. xxxix. VAL. MAX. l. ix. c. i.<sup>q</sup> PLUT. ibid.<sup>r</sup> CÆSAR. Commentar. de bell. civil. l. iii. LUCAN. l. x. ver. Berenice

sentment. The crime he laid to her charge was her having accepted of the vacant throne when the Alexandrians offered it her<sup>c</sup>. Afterwards he cut off most of the wealthy citizens of Alexandria, under pretence that they had been concerned in the rebellion, and confiscated their estates, in order to raise the vast sums which he was still to pay Gabinus, or had borrowed of Rabirius. To be rich was a crime for which many were condemned, the king filling his dominions, as Dion Cassius expresses it, with blood and slaughter, that he might thereby fill his coffers with the treasures of his unhappy subjects. These oppressions and violences the cowardly Egyptians suffered with great patience, being kept in awe by the Roman garison which Gabinus had left in Alexandria; but neither the fear of the Romans, nor the authority of Ptolemy, could make them put up a much less affront; for a Roman soldier having killed a cat, which animal, as it is well known, was worshipped by the Egyptians, the supposed sacrilege was no sooner known, but the Alexandrians made a general insurrection, and, gathering together in crowds, made their way through the Roman guards, dragged the soldier out of his house, and, in spite of all opposition, tore him in pieces<sup>d</sup>. Diodorus Siculus, who relates this insurrection, was an eye-witness of it.

His ingratitude to Rabirius Posthumus.

Caius Rabirius Posthumus had lent Ptolemy Auletes, as we have hinted above, immense sums to defray the expence of his expedition against the usurper of his crown, and had reason to expect in gratitude to be speedily repaid; but finding that the king affected delays, he resolved to leave Rome, where he then was, and go into Egypt. When he arrived at Alexandria, he pressed the king to perform his engagements; but Ptolemy shewed little regard to his remonstrances, excusing himself on account of the bad condition of his finances since the late revolution; nevertheless he offered to make him general collector of his revenues, that he might, in that employment, pay himself. The unfortunate creditor accepted the offer, for fear of losing his debt, for which he was himself indebted to others; but the base prince soon after, upon some frivolous pretence, ordered him and all his servants to be closely confined. This shocking treatment of a man who had assisted him in his distress exasperated Pompey as much as Rabirius, the former having been in a manner security for the debt, as the money had been lent at his request, and the whole business transacted by him at a country-house of his near Alba; however, Rabirius had reason to fear the worst from a cruel and faithless prince, and therefore, having found means to make his escape, was glad to save his life from the wicked designs of his debtor; but, to complete his misfortunes, he was prosecuted as soon as he returned to Rome, 1st, For having enabled Ptolemy to corrupt the senate with sums lent him for that purpose. 2<sup>dly</sup>, For having debased and dishonoured the character of a Roman knight, by farming the revenues, and becoming the servant of a foreign prince. And, lastly, For having been an accomplice with Gabinus, and sharing with him the ten thousand talents, which the proconsul had received for his Egyptian expedition. Rabirius seems to have been acquitted; and the eloquent oration which Cicero spoke in his defence, will be an everlasting monument of Ptolemy's treachery and ingratitude<sup>u</sup>. As for Gabinus, three actions were commenced against him as soon as he returned to Rome; one of high-treason against the people, for restoring Ptolemy to his dominions, contrary to the express orders of the republic, and thereby being guilty of the death of so many persons who were killed on that occasion; the other of bribery and corruption, since it was notorious that he had been induced, by vast sums of money, to replace that cruel and wicked prince on the throne, in defiance of the laws, and the prohibition of the Sibyl; the third action was of tyranny and oppression in his government. Cicero represented his crimes in so strong a light, that he escaped death very narrowly; for, notwithstanding the powerful interest of Cæsar and Pompey's party, and the vast sums he spent in bribing the judges, he was cleared from the first charge by a majority of six votes only out of seventy; but in the other two actions he was cast, and condemned to perpetual banishment, the only punishment which the Roman banished laws inflicted on public extortioners and oppressors<sup>w</sup>. We are told, that, before he left Rome, he was reduced to great poverty, having spent the money, which he got by oppression, bribery, and corruption, in bribing and corrupting others, in order to escape the punishment which he deserved. He lived in banishment till the time of the civil wars, when he was recalled by Cæsar, in whose service he lost his life<sup>x</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> STRABO, l. xvii. p. 796. DIO. ibid. PORPHYR. in Græc. EUSEB. SCALIG. p. 226. <sup>d</sup> DIODOR SICUL. l. i. p. 74, 75.

<sup>u</sup> Cic. pro Rabir. Posth.      <sup>w</sup> Dio. ibid. Cic. ad Attic 1. iv. epist. 16. & ad Quint. Fratr. 1. iii epist. 4.      <sup>x</sup> HIRT. de bell. Alexandrin. c 43.

Auletes
dies.

Ptolemy
and Cleo- patra.
Year of
the Flood, 2063.
Before
Christ,
35.

Auletes, notwithstanding the unheard-of tyrannies with which he harrassed his subjects, died in the peaceable possession of his kingdom, about four years after his re-establishment, and thirty after he had first ascended the throne, leaving behind him two sons and two daughters. He bequeathed his crown to his eldest son and his eldest daughter, ordering them to be joined in marriage, according to the custom of their family, and to govern with equal power; and because they were both under age, the daughter, who was the eldest, being but seventeen years old, he left them under the tuition of the Roman people, whom he conjured, by all the gods and by his alliance with Rome, to take care that his will was duly executed<sup>1</sup>. Eutropius tell us<sup>2</sup>, that a copy of his will being transmitted to Rome, the people appointed Pompey the young prince's guardian. The sons were both called Ptolemy; the daughters names were Cleopatra and Arsinoe. This was the Cleopatra who afterwards became so famous, and had a great share in the civil wars of Rome. We know but very little of the beginning of her and her brother's reign. The first thing we find recorded of her is, that two of the sons of Bibulus, who had been consul with Julius Cæsar, and was at this time proconsul of Syria, being killed in Alexandria by the Roman soldiers, whom Gabinus had left for a guard to Ptolemy Auletes, Cleopatra sent the murderers to Bibulus, that he might punish them as he thought fit; but the proconsul sent them back untouched, with this message, that the punishing of them belonged not to him, but to the senate of Rome<sup>3</sup>.

Cleopatra
driven out of her bro- ther's mi- nisters.

As Ptolemy was a minor, under the tuition of Pothinus an eunuch, and Achillas commander in chief of the Egyptian forces, these two ministers, to engross the whole power to themselves, deprived Cleopatra of that share in the sovereignty which had been left her by the will of Auletes, and drove her out of the kingdom. Cleopatra, thus injured, retired into Syria, and having raised in that country and in Palestine a very considerable army, led it herself into Egypt, with a design to assert her right by force of arms. On the other hand, Ptolemy, having drawn together all the forces he could, took the field, and marched against his sister. Both armies encamped between Pelusium and mount Casius, observing the motions of each other, neither of them being inclined to venture an engagement. While affairs were in this situation, Pompey, after the loss of

<sup>1</sup> CICERO. l. viii. ad familiar. epist. 7. CÆSAR. l. iii. Comment de bell. civil.

<sup>2</sup> EUTROP. l. vi.

<sup>3</sup> VAL. MAX. l. iv.

CICERO. l. CÆSAR. ibid. SENEC. ad Marciam.

the battle of Pharsalia, arrived off Pelusium, hoping to find Pompey in the kingdom of Egypt an open and safe asylum; for he <sup>arrives off</sup> had been, as we have observed above, the great friend and <sup>Pelusium</sup> constant protector of Auletes, the father of the reigning prince; and therefore, as his favours were of a late date, he expected to find the son, and those who were about him, grateful; but gratitude is a virtue unknown to princes and ministers, as Pompey found by woeful experience, and many others have done since his time. The unfortunate Roman, observing from the sea a great army encamped on the shore, concluded from thence, that the king was at war with his sister, and that, in such a conjuncture, he should find the young prince the more ready to protect him, since he might stand in need of his assistance; he therefore sent some of his friends to acquaint the king with his arrival, and to demand permission to land and enter his kingdom<sup>b</sup>. The king himself, who was then but thirteen years old, gave no answer; but Pothinus and Achillas, the two reigning ministers, taking Theodotus a rhetorician, who was the king's præceptor, and some others, to consult with them, advised together what answer to return. In this council some were for receiving Pompey, thinking it would be a reproach to the Egyptian nation and king to abandon him in his distress, and refuse protection and relief to one who had been the late king's zealous and constant protector, and was the present king's guardian. Others were for rejecting his petition, and desiring him to seek a retreat and asylum elsewhere; but Theodotus displayed all his eloquence to shew, that the safest course they could take was to dispatch him. His reasons were, because, if they received him, Cæsar would not fail to be revenged on them for protecting and abetting his enemy; and if they refused to receive him, and affairs should take a turn in his favour, he would, without all doubt, when again become powerful, make them pay dear for their refusal; and therefore the only safe way to guard against both these evils was to cut him off, which, said he, will gain us the friendship of Cæsar, and prevent the other from doing us any mischief; for dead men, according to the antient proverb, don't bite<sup>c</sup>. Some writers tell us, that Theodotus maintained this cruel paradox only to display his eloquence and talents; but, however that be, his advice prevailed, and was put in execution in the manner we shall relate in the history of Rome. And is murdered

<sup>b</sup> CÆS. ibid l. iv. APPIAN. p. 480. PLUT. in Pomp DIO. l. xlii. — LIV. l. cxii. PLUT. ubi supra, & in Bruto.

Julius Cæ- IN the mean time Cæsar, being informed that Pompey had far arrives steered his course towards Egypt, pursued him thither, and ar-at Alexan- rived at Alexandria, just as the news of his death was brought dria. to that city. Soon after Theodotus, or, as others will have

Where he is in great danger.

it, Achillas, presented him with the head and ring of his rival; but he wept at that sight, and, turning away his eyes with abhorrence, ordered the head to be buried in a proper place, with the usual solemnities<sup>d</sup>. Cæsar, for the greater expedition, had pursued Pompey with few forces, having with him, when he arrived at Alexandria, only eight hundred horse and three thousand two hundred foot. The rest of his army he had left behind him in Greece and Asia Minor, under the command of his lieutenants, with orders to pursue the advantages of his late victory, and secure his interest in those parts; and therefore, confiding in his good fortune and the fame of his success at Pharsalia, he ventured to land at Alexandria with the small body above-mentioned; but was very near paying dear for it; for the few forces he had with him not being sufficient to defend him against the unruly mob of that populous city, which was all in an uproar on account of Pompey's death, he, with much ado, got into the king's palace, and there shut himself up with part of his men; the rest having been driven back to their ships by the outrageous multitude<sup>e</sup>. As it was not in Cæsar's power to leave Alexandria; by reason of the Etesian winds, which in that country continue blowing all the dog-days, in the beginning of which Cæsar had entered that port, and prevent any ships from sailing out; he sent orders to the legions he had left in Asia to join him with all possible expedition; but the tumult being appeased before the arrival of his troops, he ventured out of the palace, and having, by his affable behaviour, gained the affections of the common people, he spent his time in visiting the curiosities of that great and stately metropolis, and seemed to take great pleasure in assisting at the public speeches and harangues, made by the Alexandrian orators and rhetoricians by way of trial; but, that he might not spend his whole time in diversions only, since he could not leave the place, he began to solicit the payment of the money due to him from Auletes, and to take cognizance of the difference between young Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra f.

WE have related above, that, during Cæsar's first consulship, Auletes had, by the promise of six thousand talents, obtained of him the alliance of the Roman people, and by that means secured to himself the crown. The king had paid him only part of this sum, and given him an obligation or bond for the remainder. This debt now Cæsar called for, wanting it to pay his soldiers, and exacted it with great rigour; which Pothinus the king's treasurer by several artifices made appear greater than it really was; for he plundered their temples of their gold and silver utensils, and persuaded the king and all the great persons of the kingdom to eat in earthen or wooden vessels, insinuating underhand, that Cæsar had seized on all their gold and silver plate, in order to stir up the people against him; but what most provoked them, and at last drove them to take up arms against Cæsar, was the haughtiness with which he acted as judge between Ptolemy and Cleopatra; for he not only cited them to appear before him for the decision of their difference, but issued out a peremptory order, commanding them to disband their armies, and stand to the sentence which he, after hearing their reasons, should pronounce. This was looked upon in Egypt as a violation of the royal dignity, and an open incroachment on the prerogative of their sovereign, who being independent acknowledged no superior, and therefore was not, like a subject, to be adjudged by any man. To these complaints Cæsar replied, that he did not take upon him to judge as a superior, but as an arbitrator appointed by the will of Auletes, who having put his children under the tuition of the Roman people, and all their power being now vested in him as their dictator, it belonged to him to arbitrate and determine this controversy, as guardian of Auletes's children by virtue of his will; and that he claimed for no other end than to settle peace between the king and his sister<sup>s</sup>. This explanation quieting all for the present, the cause was brought to Cæsar's tribunal, and advocates were appointed on both sides to plead before him.

<sup>d</sup> LIV. l. cxii. PLUT. in Cæsar. xlii. <sup>f</sup> CÆS. Comment. ibid. DIO. l. iv.

<sup>e</sup> LIV. ibid. DIO. l.

Endeavours to make up the differences between Ptolemy and Cleopatra.

BUT Cleopatra, being informed that Cæsar had a very particular regard for such of her sex, as were recommended to him by their youth and beauty, resolved to make use of both, and by their means attach him first to her person, and next to her cause. Accordingly she sent a private messenger to Cæsar, complaining, that her cause was betrayed by those she employed, and demanding his permission to appear before him in person. Plutarch says, that Cæsar pressed her the first to come and plead her cause before him. Be that as it will, she no sooner knew that Cæsar was inclined to see her, but

<sup>s</sup> PLUT. in Cæs. DIO, l. xlii OROS. l. vi. c. 15. CÆS. Comment. de bell. civi. l. iii.

Julius Cæsar arrives at Alexandria.

IN the mean time Cæsar, being informed that Pompey had steered his course towards Egypt, pursued him thither, and arrived at Alexandria, just as the news of his death was brought to that city. Soon after Theodotus, or, as others will have it, Achillas, presented him with the head and ring of his rival; but he wept at that sight, and, turning away his eyes with abhorrence, ordered the head to be buried in a proper place, with the usual solemnities<sup>d</sup>. Cæsar, for the greater expedition, had pursued Pompey with few forces, having with him, when he arrived at Alexandria, only eight hundred horse and three thousand two hundred foot. The rest of his army he had left behind him in Greece and Asia Minor, under the command of his lieutenants, with orders to pursue the advantages of his late victory, and secure his interest in those parts; and therefore, confiding in his good fortune and the fame of his success at Pharsalia, he ventured to land at Alexandria with the small body above-mentioned; but was very near paying dear for it; for the few forces he had with him not being sufficient to defend him against the unruly mob of that populous city, which was all in an uproar on account of Pompey's death, he, with much ado, got into the king's palace, and there shut himself up with part of his men, the rest having been driven back to their ships by the outrageous multitude<sup>e</sup>. As it was not in Cæsar's power to leave Alexandria, by reason of the Etesian winds, which in that country continue blowing all the dog-days, in the beginning of which Cæsar had entered that port, and prevent any ships from sailing out; he sent orders to the legions he had left in Asia to join him with all possible expedition; but the tumult being appeased before the arrival of his troops, he ventured out of the palace, and having, by his affable behaviour, gained the affections of the common people; he spent his time in visiting the curiosities of that great and stately metropolis, and seemed to take great pleasure in assisting at the public speeches and harangues, made by the Alexandrian orators and rhetoricians by way of trial; but, that he might not spend his whole time in diversions only, since he could not leave the place, he began to solicit the payment of the money due to him from Auletes, and to take cognizance of the difference between young Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra f.

Where he is in great danger.

WE have related above, that, during Cæsar's first consulship, Auletes had, by the promise of six thousand talents, obtained of him the alliance of the Roman people, and by that means secured to himself the crown. The king had paid him only part of this sum, and given him an obligation or bond for the remainder. This debt now Cæsar called for, wanting it to pay his soldiers, and exacted it with great rigour; which Pothinus the king's treasurer by several artifices made appear greater than it really was; for he plundered their temples of their gold and silver utensils, and persuaded the king and all the great persons of the kingdom to eat in earthen or wooden vessels, insinuating underhand, that Cæsar had seized on all their gold and silver plate, in order to stir up the people against him; but what most provoked them, and at last drove them to take up arms against Cæsar, was the haughtiness with which he acted as judge between Ptolemy and Cleopatra; for he not only cited them to appear before him for the decision of their difference, but issued out a peremptory order, commanding them to disband their armies, and stand to the sentence which he, after hearing their reasons, should pronounce. This was looked upon in Egypt as a violation of the royal dignity, and an open incroachment on the prerogative of their sovereign, who being independent acknowledged no superior, and therefore was not, like a subject, to be adjudged by any man. To these complaints Cæsar replied, that he did not take upon him to judge as a superior, but as an arbitrator appointed by the will of Auletes, who having put his children under the tuition of the Roman people, and all their power being now vested in him as their dictator, it belonged to him to arbitrate and determine this controversy, as guardian of Auletes's children by virtue of his will; and that he claimed for no other end than to settle peace between the king and his sister<sup>s</sup>. This explanation quieting all for the present, the cause was brought to Cæsar's tribunal, and advocates were appointed on both sides to plead before him.

<sup>d</sup> LIV. l. cxii. PLUT. in Cæsar.

<sup>e</sup> LIV. ibid. DIO. l.

cxiii. <sup>f</sup> CÆS. Comment. ibid. DIO. l. iv.

BUT Cleopatra, being informed that Cæsar had a very particular regard for such of her sex, as were recommended to him by their youth and beauty, resolved to make use of both, and by their means attach him first to her person, and next to her cause. Accordingly she sent a private messenger to Cæsar, complaining, that her cause was betrayed by those she employed, and demanding his permission to appear before him in person. Plutarch says, that Cæsar pressed her the first to come and plead her cause before him. Be that as it will, she no longer knew that Cæsar was inclined to see her, but

Endeavours to make up the differences between Ptolemy and Cleopatra.

<sup>s</sup> Plut. in Cæs. Dio, l. xlii. Oros. l. vi. c. 15. Cæsar. Comment. de bell. civil. l. iii.

Cleopatra gains over Cæsar to her interest.

Ptolemy stirs up the Alexan-drians against him.

taking along with her only one of her servants, Apollodorus the Sicilian, she imbarqued in a small vessel, and, in the dusk of the evening, arrived under the walls of Alexandria. She was afraid of being discovered by her brother, or those of his party who were masters of the city, and would not have failed to stop her, and prevent her from going to Cæsar's house. In order therefore to get thither without being known, she caused herself to be tied up in a mattress, and was thus carried by Apollodorus on his back through the streets of Alexandria to Cæsar's apartment. There he laid down his burden at Cæsar's feet, saying he had brought him a present, and having untied it, up started a fine lady with the best airs she could put on. Cæsar was highly pleased with the stratagem, but much more with the person of Cleopatra, whose extraordinary beauty so charmed him, that he kept her with him all that night, and thinking himself engaged by the favours she granted him, to do all that lay in his power in her behalf, the next morning he sent for Ptolemy, and pressed him to receive his sister again upon her own terms. By this proposal Ptolemy found, that Cæsar from being their common judge, was become her advocate, and being at the same time informed, that his sister was with him in that part of the palace where he lodged, the young prince left Cæsar in a violent passion, and running into the streets, took the diadem off his head, tore it to pieces, and threw it on the ground, complaining with his face bathed in tears, that he was betrayed, and relating the whole to the multitude that flocked round him, in a moment the whole city was in an uproar; the king himself, at the head of the populace, led them tumultuously to charge Cæsar, which they did with all the fury which is usual on such occasions. The Roman soldiers who were near him secured the king's person, and delivered him up to Cæsar; but nevertheless, as the rest of his forces, who knew nothing of what passed, were dispersed in the several quarters of that great city, Cæsar must necessarily have been overpowered, and tore to pieces by the enraged multitude, had he not had the presence of mind to shew himself from a balcony which was out of their reach, and from thence assure them, that he was ready to do whatever they should think fit to suggest to him. These fair promises appeased the tumult for the present <sup>b</sup>.

The next day, having summoned a general assembly of the people, he brought out to them Ptolemy and Cleopatra, and then

<sup>b</sup> FLORUS l. iv. c. 2. DIO, l. xlii. SUT. in Julio. PLUT. in Cæs. LIV. l. cxii. CÆS. ubi supra.

then causing their father's will publicly to be read, he decreed as guardian and arbitrator, that Ptolemy and Cleopatra should reign jointly in Egypt agreeable to the will; and that Ptolemy the younger son and Arfinoe the younger daughter should jointly enjoy the island of Cyprus. He added this last article to appease the people, and by that means escape their fury, which he was then in great fear of; for the island of Cyprus had for some time belonged to the Romans, as we have related elsewhere. This decree pleased all except Pothinus; for as he had been the cause of the breach between Cleopatra and her brother, and also of the expulsion of that princess, he had reason to apprehend, that she on her return would deprive him of the great power he had at court, and perhaps of his life. To prevent therefore Cæsar's decree from taking effect, he inspired the people with new jealousies, giving out, that the Roman dictator had, by force and against his inclination, bestowed the crown on both; but that his true design was to place Cleopatra alone on the throne. When he had, by sowing such reports among the populace, stirred them up anew against Cæsar, for the Egyptians could not bear to be governed by a woman alone, he solicited Achillas, by private letters and messengers, to advance at the head of the army from Pelusium, where he was then encamped, to Alexandria, in order to drive Cæsar out of the city. The general was easily prevailed upon to fall in with his measures, and approaching Alexandria with twenty thousand regular and well disciplined troops, put all things again therein in confusion. Cæsar, who had but a small number of forces with him, persuaded the king to send out ambassadors to Achillas, ordering him to forbear using any violence, since he was well pleased with what Cæsar had decreed. Dioscorides and Serapion, who had been ambassadors at Rome and had great authority at court, were employed on this occasion; but Achillas was so far from complying with the king's orders, that he commanded the two ambassadors to be seized and put to death; and accordingly one of them was killed on the spot, and the other carried off by his own men for dead. Cæsar, finding that Achillas would hearken to no proposals, resolved to keep within the walls of the town, not being in a condition to make head against the enemy in the open field. He therefore posted his men so well in the streets and avenues of that quarter of the town which he had taken possession of, that he found no difficulty in supporting the attack of the whole Egyptian army. Achillas, not being able to force that quarter, changed his measures, and went to attack the port, with a design to make himself master of the Egyptian fleet at anchor

Cæsar besieged in Alexandria.

The library in the quarter called Bruchium burnt.

anchor there, to the number of seventy two ships, and by that means to shut up the Romans by sea, and prevent them from receiving succours and convoys on that side; but Cæsar prevailing there likewise, caused the fleet to be set on fire, and at the same time seizing the tower of Pharos, placed a strong garison in it, and by this means secured his communication with the sea, without which he must necessarily have been soon obliged to surrender at discretion. Some of the ships, when on fire, driving to the shore, communicated their flames to the adjoining houses, which, spreading into the quarter of the city called Bruchium, consumed the noble library, which had been the work of so many kings, and contained at that time four hundred thousand volumes <sup>1</sup>.

Cæsar, finding himself thus engaged, contrary to his expectation, in a dangerous war, dispatched messengers into all the neighbouring countries, soliciting speedy succours. He wrote, amongst others, to Domitius Calvinus his lieutenant in Asia, properly so called, acquainting him with the danger he was in. That general, upon the receipt of his letter, immediately detached two legions, putting the one on board some transports which he had ready, and sending the other by land. The former arrived very seasonably; but the latter did not reach Alexandria till the war was over. But Cæsar was best served by Mithridates of Pergamus, a man of great valour and experience in war; for he being sent into Syria and Cilicia to hasten the supplies there, brought those forces which extricated him out of danger, as we shall see in the sequel <sup>2</sup>.

In the mean time Cæsar, that he might not be forced to fight the numerous troops of the enemy till his succours arrived, fortified that quarter of the city where he lay, with walls, towers, and other works, including within them the palace, a theatre adjoining to it, which he made use of as a citadel, and a passage to the harbour. Cæsar, from the very beginning of the tumult, had taken care to get the king into his power, that this war might seem to be undertaken only by a few malecontents, and not by his authority or approbation. While he was thus detained in Cæsar's quarters, Pothinus, who attended him there as his governor and chief minister, carried on a private correspondence with Achillas, and by letters secretly conveyed to him, gave him intelligence of all that passed, encouraging him to push on the war with vigour ; but at length one of his letters being intercepted and the treason thereby discovered, Cæsar caused him to be put to death. Hereupon Ganymedes, another eunuch, who was charged with the education of Arfinoe the king's younger sister, fearing the same punishment, as having been privy to the treasonable practices of Pothinus, secretly conveyed the young princess out of Cæsar's quarters, and fled with her to the Egyptian army, who, wanting one of the royal family to head them, were overjoyed at her arrival, and proclaimed her queen ; but Ganymedes, who entertained thoughts of supplanting Achillas, caused an accusation to be formed against him, as if he had betrayed the fleet which Cæsar had burnt in the harbour, and having by this means got him condemned and executed, he took on himself the command of the army and the administration of all the affairs of that party ; and indeed he was thoroughly qualified for the employment of a prime minister, being a man of great penetration and activity, and no probity. He contrived a thousand artful stratagems to distress Cæsar during the course of this war, shewing himself at the same time a discerning statesman and a crafty general ; for instance, he found means to spoil all the fresh water in Cæsar's quarters, and thereby reduced him to great straits ; for the Alexandrians having no other fresh water but that of the Nile, the whole city was vaulted underneath their houses for the receiving and keeping of it. Once a year, on the great swell of the Nile, the water of that river came into the city by a canal cut for that purpose, and being by several sluices let into the vaults, filled them all, they being built without any partitions in a general communication from one to another under the houses. The water let in on this occasion served for the common use of the inhabitants the whole year, every one having an opening in his house, not unlike the mouth of a well, through which the water was drawn in buckets or pitchers. Ganymedes having stopt up the communications between the vaults or reservoirs in Cæsar's quarters and those of the rest of the city, found means to turn the sea-water into the former, and thereby spoiled all the fresh-water that was kept in them. This raised a general uproar among Cæsar's soldiers, and he would have been obliged to abandon his quarters very much to his disadvantage, had he not immediately ordered wells to be dug, and discovered, after he had sunk them to an incredible depth, springs of fresh-water, which made amends for that which was spoiled<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> CÆS. & DIO. ibid. OROS. l. vi. c. 15. SENECA. de tranquill. anim. c. 9. AUL. GELL. l. v. c. 17. AMMIAN MARCEL. l. xxii.

<sup>2</sup> A. HIRTIUS. de bell. Alexandrin. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. vii. that

<sup>1</sup> HIRTIVS, PLUT. & CÆS. ibid.

AFTER this Cæsar receiving advice, that the legion which Calvinus had sent him by sea was arrived on the neighbouring coasts of Lybia, but was detained there by contrary winds, advanced with his whole fleet to convoy it safely to Alexandria, being then reduced almost to the utmost extremity, and his men quite tired out with the continual assaults of the enemy. Ganymedes immediately assembled all the Egyptian ships he could, with a design to intercept him on his return. Cæsar was unwilling to engage, being desirous to get the legion safe into the city; but a Rhodian galley, which was placed in his right wing, being attacked by several of the enemy's ships, he could not forbear assisting his faithful allies, which brought on an engagement between the two fleets, wherein Cæsar gained a considerable advantage, and would have intirely destroyed the Egyptian fleet, had he not been obliged by night coming on to retire with his ships and legion into the harbour <sup>m</sup>.

To repair this and other losses, for Cæsar had by this time destroyed an hundred and ten Egyptian ships, partly in the harbour, and partly in the arsenal, Ganymedes drew together all the ships that were in the mouths of the Nile and in the private arsenals, and, having formed with them another fleet, entered the port of Alexandria. This produced another fight at sea, in which Cæsar gained a second victory, which was owing chiefly to the great valour and skill of the Rhodians in naval affairs. To make the most of the advantage he had got, he endeavoured to seize the town of Pharos, and the mole leading to it called the Heptastadium; but after he had landed his troops in the island, he was repulsed with the loss of above eight hundred of his men, and was very near perishing himself in his retreat; for finding the ship in which he endeavoured to escape ready to sink, by reason of the numbers of those who had crowded into it, he threw himself into the sea, and with great difficulty swam to the next ship, whence he saw, to his great concern, the vessel which he had left sink with all the men <sup>n</sup>. And here we must not pass over in silence a circumstance which is omitted by Hirtius, but recorded by Dion Cassius <sup>o</sup>, Plutarch <sup>p</sup>, Suetonius <sup>q</sup>, and Orosius <sup>r</sup>. These tell us, that Cæsar, while he thus made his escape, carried his commentaries, which he had then with him, in one hand, holding it up the whole time, lest the water should reach them, and swam with the other. Appian relates this whole affair in a quite different manner; for he writes; that Cæsar, being surrounded on a bridge by the enemy, was obliged to throw off his purple garment, and leap into the sea, and that the king's soldiers pursuing him he swam under water, arising up his head now and then, to one of his own ships, where he was known and taken up<sup>c</sup>. Suctonius tells us, that he held his purple coat in his mouth, dragging it after him, lest it should fall into the enemy's hands; and Florus<sup>d</sup>, with whom Plutarch agrees<sup>e</sup>, that he left it in the waves, either by chance or on purpose, that the enemy pursuing him might discharge their darts and arrows at his garment. Appian and Dio add, that the Egyptians having got it, fixed it on a trophy which they had set up for having put the Romans to flight, and seemed to be as much pleased and elated, as if they had taken Cæsar himself<sup>w</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> DIO. CASS. l. 42. HIRTIUS, ibid.      <sup>n</sup> HIRTIUS, ibid.
<sup>o</sup> DIO. l. xlii.    <sup>p</sup> PLUT. in Cæsar.    <sup>q</sup> SUET. in Julio.    <sup>r</sup> OROS.
 l. vi. c. 15.

THE Alexandrians, finding that the Romans were rather encouraged than disheartened by their late loss, and were making the necessary preparations to repair it, sent ambassadors to Cæsar, demanding their king, and assuring him, that his compliance with their request would gain over the multitude to him, and put a speedy end to the war; For your keeping the king confined, and in a manner prisoner, said they, is what chiefly provokes the populace, and prevents them from hearkening to any terms of an accommodation: allow him his liberty, and you will find them ready to lay down their arms and come to an agreement. Cæsar, though well acquainted with the subtle and deceitful temper of the Alexandrians, readily complied with their request, knowing, that he hazarded nothing in giving them up their king's person; and that, if they failed in their promises, the continuation of the war and the evils attending it would be laid to their charge. Before he dismissed the young prince, he exhorted him to take this opportunity of inspiring his subjects with sentiments of peace; to redress the evils which a war, very imprudently undertaken, had brought upon his dominions; to approve himself worthy of the confidence he reposed in him by granting him his liberty, and to shew himself grateful for the services he had rendered his father. Ptolemy, early instructed by his masters in the art of dissimulation and deceit, begged Cæsar, with tears in his eyes, that he would not oblige him to depart, assuring him, that he had rather live with him like a private person, than reign without him. The event soon shewed how little sincerity there was in the young king's tears and professions of friendship; for he was no sooner at the head of his troops, than he renewed hostilities with more vigour than ever. The first thing Ptolemy, who was intirely governed by Ganymedes, attempted, was to intercept with his fleet all Cæsar's provisions. This occasioned a new fight at sea near Canopus, in which the Romans, under the conduct of Tiberius Nero, had again the victory. In this engagement Euphanor, the Rhodian admiral, lost his life and his ship, after having signalized himself in a very eminent manner*; but by this time Mithridates of Pergamus was drawing near with an army which he had raised with great expedition in Syria.

<sup>c</sup> APPIAN. de bell. civil. l. ii. p. 523.<sup>d</sup> FLOR. l. iv. c. 2.<sup>e</sup> PLUT. ib.<sup>w</sup> DIO. ibid. & APPIAN. ubi supra. p. 481.

Mithridates had been sent, as we have related above, into Syria and Cilicia, to raise there what forces he could, and lead them into Egypt. In this commission he acquitted himself with such diligence and prudence, that he soon formed a considerable army, being greatly assisted therein by Antipater the Idumæan, who not only joined him with three thousand Jews, but prevailed upon Hyrchanus, who was then at the head of that nation, and the neighbouring princes of Arabia and Cale-Syria, to send him considerable reinforcements. With these troops Mithridates, attended by Antipater in person, marched into Egypt; and on his arrival at Pelusium, took that important place by storm. This advantage was chiefly owing to Antipater; for he was the first that mounted the breach, and thereby opened the way to the others. From Pelusium they advanced towards Alexandria; but as they approached the borders of the province of Onion, they found all the passes seized by the Jews who inhabited that part of Egypt; so that it was impossible for them to proceed any farther. This unexpected obstruction would have rendered their design abortive, had not Antipater, partly by his own authority, and partly by that of Hyrchanus, from whom he brought letters to the Jews, prevailed upon them to embrace Cæsar's party†. Their example was followed by the Jews of Memphis, and Mithridates was plentifully supplied by both. Asinius the Trallian, who wrote an account of the civil war, tells us, that Hyrchanus himself invaded Egypt with Mithridates. As they drew near the Delta, Ptolemy detached a considerable body of troops to dispute with them the passage of the Nile. This drew on a battle, in which Mithridates commanded one part of the army, and Antipater the other. Mithridates's wing was soon obliged to give ground, being attacked by the Egyptians with incredible fury; but Antipater, who had defeated the enemy on his side, hastening to his relief, the battle began anew, and the Egyptians were totally routed. The two victorious generals pursued the advantage, drove the enemy out of the field with great slaughter, and having taken their camp, obliged those to repass the Nile who had the good luck to make their escape<sup>2</sup>. Mithridates immediately acquainted Cæsar with this victory, ascribing with great ingenuity, if Josephus is to be credited, the whole glory of it to Antipater.

* HIRTIUS & DIO, ibid.
Antiq. l. xiv. c. 14 & 15. DIO, ibid.

† HIRTIUS, ibid. JOSEPH.

THE king, upon advice that the troops he had sent were defeated, advanced with his whole army against Mithridates and Antipater. At the same time Cæsar, leaving the city in the night-time, marched with all possible expedition to join Mithridates, before the Egyptians could fall upon him. Accordingly he was the first who brought him intelligence of the king's design. The Egyptian army appeared soon after; whereupon a bloody engagement ensuing, most of the enemy's forces were cut in pieces, and the king himself drowned in the Nile, as he was attempting to make his escape in a boat. His body was afterwards thrown on the shore, and there known by the gold cuirass which the Ptolemies of Egypt used to wear, as Julius Capitolinus informs us<sup>3</sup>. He had reigned from the death of his father Auletes three years and eight months. In this engagement twenty thousand Egyptians were killed in the battle and the pursuit, and twelve thousand taken prisoners. On Cæsar's side five hundred only were killed, and about a thousand wounded. Among the latter was Antipater, who fought with incredible bravery, and had a great share in the victory<sup>4</sup>.

Cæsar, in confidence of this victory, returned to Alexandria, and entering that city, without opposition, bestowed the crown of Egypt on Cleopatra, obliging her to marry Ptolemy her younger brother. This was in effect giving it to Cleopatra alone, the young prince being then but eleven years old. The passion which Cæsar had conceived for that princess, was the sole motive that prompted him to imbarque in this dangerous and infamous war; and therefore, having been attended with success in so bold an enterprize, he took care that she should reap the advantages of his victory. The same passion detained him longer in Egypt than his affairs could well admit; for tho' he had settled all matters there in January, yet he did not leave that country till the latter end of A- pril, passing his time in revels and banquets with Cleopatra, and the Egyptians of her court. He took great pleasure in diverting himself with her on the Nile in a large galley called Thalamegos, being attended by a fleet of four hundred sail. Suetonius tells us, that he designed to sail with her as far as Æthiopia, but that his troops refused to follow him<sup>c</sup>. He had even a mind to carry her with him to Rome, and there marry her, after having caused a law to pass in the comitia, by which the Roman citizens should be allowed to marry such women, and as many, as they pleased. Marius Cinna, then tribune of the people, declared after Cæsar's death, that, at his earnest request, he had prepared an harangue for the proposing of that law to the people<sup>d</sup>. In this war Cæsar having taken Arfinoe prisoner, carried her to Rome with him, and there caused her to walk before his triumphal chariot, bound with chains of gold. After that shew was over he gave her liberty, but would not allow her to return to Egypt, lest her presence should raise new troubles in that kingdom. The banished princess took up her residence in the province of Asia; for there Antony found her after the battle of Philippi, and, at the request of Cleopatra her sister, caused her to be put to death<sup>e</sup>. Before Cæsar left Alexandria, in acknowledgment of the assistance he had received from the Jews, he confirmed all the privileges they enjoyed in that city, and commanded a brazen pillar to be raised, whereon all those privileges were engraved, with the decree confirming them<sup>f</sup>. What made him at last take his leave of Egypt and his beloved Cleopatra, by whom he had a son called from his own name Cæsarion, was the war with Pharnaces, king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and son of Mithridates, the last king of Pontus. The success that attended that prince, in the recovery of his father's dominions, roused Cæsar out of the lethargy into which Cleopatra's charms had lulled him, and put him again upon action. He left part of his forces in Egypt to protect Cleopatra, and with the rest marched into Syria.

<sup>2</sup> HIRTIUS & JOSEPH. ibid.    <sup>3</sup> HIRTIUS & DIO. ibid. LIV. l. xii. OROS. l. vi. c. 16. FLOR. l. iv. c. 3. EUTROP. l. vi.

<sup>4</sup> JOSEPH. l. xiv. c. 15.

AFTER Cæsar's departure, Cleopatra enjoyed the crown without the least disturbance, having all the power in her own hands during the minority of her brother; but the young prince no sooner attained to the fourteenth year of his age, when, according to the laws of the country, he was to share the royal authority as well as the name; but she caused him to be poisoned in the fourth year of his reign, and from that time governed Egypt <sup>b</sup> without a partner. Not long after Cæsar being killed at Rome, and the famous triumvirate formed between Antony, Lepidus, and Octavius to avenge his death, Cleopatra declared, without hesitation, for the triumvirs, and sent to Albienus, the consul Dolabella's lieutenant, four legions, which were the remains of Crassus and Pompey's armies, and part of the troops which Cæsar had left with her to guard Egypt. These four legions were taken by Cassius, who, by frequent messages, solicited Cleopatra to join him against the triumvirs; but she being indebted to Cæsar for her crown, could, neither by solicitations nor menaces, be prevailed upon to assist his murderer. Hereupon Cassius began his march towards the frontiers of Egypt, with a design to invade that kingdom; but being pressed by Bru-tus to join him, he dropped that enterprize. Cleopatra being thus delivered from all apprehensions of an invasion, sailed with a numerous fleet to join Antony and Octavius; but falling sick was obliged to return to Egypt, after having lost a great number of her ships by a violent storm <sup>h</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> SUE TON. in Julio. APPIAN. l. ii. de bell. civil. p. 484. JOSEPH. l. xiv. c. 17. & l. ii. contra Apion. p. 1063. <sup>d</sup> SUE TON. ibid. <sup>e</sup> CÆS. DIO. HIRTIUS, APPIAN. & ibid. <sup>f</sup> JOSEPH. ubi supra.

Antony, after the battle of Philippi, having passed over into Asia to settle all matters there for the interest of the conqueror, was informed that Cleopatra, or at least some of her governors, had sent succours to Cassius against Dolabella. Hereupon he summoned the queen of Egypt to appear before him at Tarsus in Cilicia, whither he was then going to settle the affairs of that province. Cleopatra, convinced of the great power of her charms, by the proof she had already so successfully made of them on Cæsar, did not doubt but she should easily captivate Antony, and the more, because the former had been acquainted with her only when she was very young, and had no knowledge of the world; whereas she was going to appear before Antony at an age, when women unite to the bloom of their beauty a ripeness of understanding, which qualifies them to treat of and conduct the greatest affairs; for she was then twenty-five years old, had a great deal of wit and humour, and was no less agreeable in her conversation than in her person. She provided herself with rich presents, vast sums of money, and above all with magnificent and sumptuous habits and ornaments; and thus provided embarked on a stately galley, and, attended with the rest of her fleet, set sail for Cilicia, crossed the sea of Pamphylia, and, entering the Cydus, arrived at Tarsus, where Antony waited for her. Never had there been seen in those parts a more splendid equipage than her's. Her galley was gilt all over, the sails of purple, and the oars plated over with silver. The queen appeared under a canopy of cloth of gold, raised on the deck, in the same attire and attitude as Venus was then generally painted, being surrounded by a great many comely youths fanning her like Cupids, and beautiful virgins, representing, some the Nereids, and others the Graces. The dales and hills echoed, as she sailed up the river, with the melodious sounds of various instruments, with which the oars keeping time, seemed in a manner to double the harmony. The great quantity of perfumes that were burnt on the deck spread their odours, on each side of the river to a great distance, and filled the air with the most fragrant scents. As soon as it was known in the city that the queen of Egypt was drawing near, the citizens of all ranks and ages, abandoning their houses, and interrupting their most serious occupations, crowded out of the gates to meet her ; inso-much, that Antony, who was distributing justice and hearing causes in the forum, saw his tribunal all on a sudden deserted, not a single person remaining with him but his lictors and domestics ; and indeed no wonder, that the whole city flocked to see her, a rumour being spread all over Tarsus, that the goddess Venus was coming to pay a visit to Bacchus, and confer with him about the good of Asia. She was no sooner landed, than Antony sent to invite her to supper ; but the queen answered, that, according to the rules of civility, he ought first to come to her, and that therefore she expected to see him that very night in the tents, which would be soon set up on the banks of the river. Antony complied with her invitation, and was received and entertained with a magnificence not to be expressed. Antony invited her in his turn for the next day, and no expence was spared ; but, in spite of his utmost efforts, he owned his entertainment far inferior to the queen's, and was himself the first to ridicule the parsimony and plainness of his own, when compared with the splendor and elegance of Cleopatra's. The more Antony conversed with the fair Egyptian, the more he was charmed with her conversation, which, being attended with all possible sweetness and gaiety, had attractions still more irresistible than her form and features. Little or no mention was made of the complaints which had been brought against her, and were indeed without foundation. She soon got so absolute an ascendant over her judge, that it was not in his power to refuse her any thing she asked, however repugnant to the laws laws of justice, humanity, or religion<sup>1</sup>. At her request assassins were dispatched to Miletus, as Appian tells us<sup>2</sup>, or to Ephesus, as Josephus will have it<sup>3</sup>, with orders to murder Arfinoe, which were accordingly executed in the very temple where she had taken refuge. Cleopatra, to attach Antony the more to her person and interest, made daily entertainments during her stay at Tarsus, inviting him and the chief officers of his army to partake of them, and spending on those occasions immense sums of money. In one of these banquets Antony expressing great surprize at the vast number of gold cups, enriched with jewels which were displayed on all sides, the queen told him, that since he admired such trifles, he was very welcome to them, and immediately ordered her servants to carry them all to his house. The next day she invited him anew, and desired him to bring a good number of guests along with him. He accepted her invitation, and came attended with all the chief officers at that time in Tarsus. When the banquet was over, and the numerous company ready to depart, Cleopatra presented them with all the gold and silver plate which had been made use of during the entertainment<sup>4</sup>. In one of these feasts happened what Pliny, and after him Macrobius, relates of Cleopatra's magnificence, or rather profuseness. The queen had at her ears two of the finest and largest pearls that ever had been seen, each of them being valued at fifty two thousand five hundred pounds of our money. One of these she caused to be dissolved in vinegar, and then swallowed it for no other end, but to shew the little account she made of such toys, and how much she could spend on one draught. She was preparing in like manner to melt the other when Plancus, who was present, stopt her, and saved the pearl, which was afterwards carried to Rome by Augustus, and, being by his orders cut in two, served for pendants to the Venus of the Julian family<sup>5</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> JOSEPH. Antiquit. l. xv. c. 4. PORPHYR. in GRÆC. EUSIB. SCALIG. <sup>h</sup> APPIAN. l. iv. p. 675.

In the mean time Antony being obliged by his affairs to leave Tarsus, Cleopatra accompanied him as far as Tyre, and there taking her leave of him returned into Egypt. But the triumvir was so taken with her charms, that he could not now live without her; having therefore appointed Plancus to be his lieutenant in Asia Minor, and Saxa in Syria, he hastened after her to Alexandria, and there spent the whole

<sup>1</sup> PLUT. in Anton. APPIAN. l. v. p. 671—576. DIONOR. SICUL. l. xlviii. p. 371. JOSEPH Antiq l. xiv. c. 23. <sup>2</sup> APPIAN. l. v. p. 676. <sup>3</sup> JOSEPH. l. xv. c. 14. <sup>4</sup> ATHEN. l. iv. p. 147, 148. <sup>5</sup> PLIN. l. xxxiii. c. 3. ARNOB l. iv. continuing

